from mountains; consequently, none more fertile. And such is the plenty of grain here, that the common labourers have five or six meals of it a day, in the various forms it is used in the country; though little of what the English call meat. The district of Strathyla drives a considerable trade in lime and fat cattle. The lime-stones here are so plentiful that they build the houses with them. They also carry on a trade in fine linen, by means of the weekly market, or rather annual fair, at Keith, a neighbouring village. Upon the banks of the Spey, in this country, is the Bog of Gicht, or Gordon-castle, the noblest palace in the north, and belonging to the duke of Gordon; the paternal inheritance of which family is Strathawin, or Strathavon, a valley on the river Avon, one of the clearest in Scotland, which falls into the Spey. This tract is more inclined to pasture than grain; besides fine estates, and other seats hereabouts, which belong to them. In Balveny is found that stone from which allum is prepared; and in the district of Boyne large quarries of spotted marble have been discovered. Bamf-shire sends a member to the British parliament.

BAMF, a royal borough in the last-mentioned shire of the same name. It is the third in order of the following districts of boroughs, namely, Elgin, Cullen, Innerbury, and Kintore, which by turns send a member to the British parliament. It is a neat town, situated in the N. E. part of the shire, at the mouth of the river Doveron or Deveran, on its N. banks, upon the German ocean, and in the district of Boyne. In it the sheriff holds his courts. Here are the ruins of an old castle, and in the neighbourhood those of the abbey of Deer, formerly belonging to the Cistercian monks, and founded by William Cumming, earl of Buchan. Not far from the town is a grand modern house of lord Braco's, on the river, being adorned with noble columns and towers, with summer-houses upon little islands in the Doveron. But the inside is left unfinished, and, from some disgust, abandoned by the proprietor, for a recluse seat among the mountains of Strathbogy. Bamf consists of two principal streets, which are long, besides several short ones or wynds. Here also are some genteel buildings, and two little harbours for shipping; but vessels of burthen cannot come near them. Along the sea-coast, just beyond Bamf, you have views of the rising mountains near the frith of Cromarty, but at a considerable distance. The trade here is but little, except from its corn, salmon-fishery, and some coasting vessels; for the townsmen are fonder of tillage than commerce. The Ogilbies, with their vassals, of whom the earl of Finlater and Airley is chieftain, possess most of the adjacent country; and that nobleman has a fine seat here, but it was pillaged in the late rebellion. It lies 7 miles E. of Cul-

BAMIYAN, a city of Asia, situated in the province of Zablestan, ten days journey from Balkh, and eight from Gazna. It is remarkable only for its dreadful catastrophe when taken by Jenghiz Khan in 1221. At that time the city belonged to sultan Jalalodin, the last of the famous Mahmud Gazni's race. Jenghiz Khan was at that time about to attack Gazna, that prince's capital; but was stopped by the garrison of Gazna, which he had hoped would give him no trouble. In this, however, he was disappointed. The people had for a long time expected an attack; and had therefore ruined the country for five or six leagues round, while the peasants had carried away the stones, and every thing that could be of use to the besiegers. Accordingly, Jenghiz Khan having erected wooden towers, and planted his engines upon them, was in a short time obliged to give over his attacks till mill-stones and other materials could be brought from a great distance. The walls of the city were very strong, so that the engines of the moguls made but little impression; and the garrison making frequent and furious sallies cut off whole squadrons of their enemies, and frequently overthrew their towers and engines. This exceedingly chagrined Jenghiz Khan; who one day returning from a fruitless attack, and hearing of the defeat of one of his generals by Jalalodin, swore to be revenged on Bamiyan. This fury cost the life of one of his grandchildren; who exposing himself too much, to please his grandfather, was slain with an arrow. At last, however, by the numberless multitude of the moguls, who continued the attacks without intermission, the city was taken, after its walls had been ruined in many places, and the bravest soldiers and officers of the garrison slain in its defence. The mother of the young prince who had been killed, entering with the troops, and more deserving the name of a fiend than a woman, caused the throats of all the inhabitants to be cut, without excepting one. She even gave orders to rip up the bellies of all the women with child, that not an infant might be left alive. In short, to gratify the rage of this inhuman monster, the buildings were all levelled with the ground; the cattle, and every living creature, destroyed; insomuch that the hardened moguls themselves gave this place the name of Maubalig, which in their language signifies The unfortunate city. A strong castle has since been built out of its ruins.

BAMPTON, a market-town of Devonshire, and an old corporation; but, from an odd plea of poverty, was excused from sending members to parliament. Its fairs are on Whitfun-Tuesday, and October 24, for cattle. In 614, a battle was fought between the Britons and Saxons, when the former were defeated. It lies 8 miles N. of Tiverton, and 160 W. of London. Lat. 51, 5, N. Long. 3, 40, W.

BAMPTON, an old market-town of Oxfordshire, on the borders of Berkshire. It is situated on the river Isis, navigable only by boats, and has the remains of a castle. Here is the greatest market in all England, for furs and fell-mongers wares, sheep-skins being dressed and stained for leather jackets, gloves, and breeches; stockings, &c. are also brought hither from Whitney, and sold into Berkshire, Wilts, and Dorsetshire. Its fair is on August 26, for horses and toys. It lies 10 miles S. W. of Oxford. Lat 51, 40, N. Long. 1, 35, W.

BAN, BANE, or BAAN, the principal river in the county of Londonderry, and province of Ulster, in the N. of Ireland. The word in Irish and Erse imports beautiful or fair, it being clearer than any other river in Europe, and for that reason the best stocked with salmon; which fish particularly delights in clear water. Its source is in the Mourne-hills, in the county of Downe; and, after losing itself and its name for about 30 miles, in Lough-Neagh, or Sidney-lake, recovers its name again at Toom-castle; from whence, being crowned with woods on both sides, and dividing the county of Antrim from that of Londonderry, it runs by Coleraine into the sea. Of the same name is also a lesser river in Ireland; and therefore, by way of distinction, this we are now upon is called the Great Baan, though otherwise not a very large river.

BANAGHIR, a place belonging to King's county, and province of Leinster, in Ireland, noted only for its bridge over the Shannon, which is a great pass on the borders of Gallway. In it are barracks for two companies of foot. It lies 25 miles from Philipstown, the capital of the county, and sends two members to parliament. Lat. 53, 20, N. Long. 4, 15, W.

BANARAS, or BANNARON, a handsome large city in the southern division of Indostan in the East Indies, in Asia. It is situated on the E. side of the Ganges, about 100 miles above Patna, in the road to Agra. The houses are of brick and stone, being higher than usual in India; but the streets are very narrow. Here is a seminary or university for the mathematics, as well as for educating their youth in the mysteries of their religion. It is held in high veneration for its sanctity; so that Banians come hither over land from Surat, and the Pagan priests fill gallon-pots with the water of the Ganges, which they send all over India for sale, or as presents to their friends, who make them good returns. A draught of this water is thought to obtain a plenary absolution from all sin: so that at weddings, &c. 500 crowns are commonly laid out upon it.

Banaras has a considerable trade in callicoes and silks, which must not be sold till stamped with the Mogul's seal, on pain of a fine or the bastinado. Here are fine Mahometan sepulchres, and one of the noblest idol-temples in the Indies. In the neighbourhood, according to Catrou, is plenty of pulse, and all sorts of grain, with manufactures of rich stuffs of gold, silver, and silk; also magnificent turbans, fine girdles, and light vestments for the ladies of the seraglio.

BAN-BRIDGE, a town belonging to the county of Downe, and province of Ulster, in the north of Ireland: it is so called from a bridge over the river Bane. In and near it are several bleaching-yards for the linen-manufacture, the water of the Bane being proper for this purpose. Here are the greatest fairs for linen in the whole kingdom. It lies 3 miles from Gilford.

BANBURY, Oxfordshire, on the river Charwell, and the edge of Northamptonshire, in the road from Buckingham to Bridgnorth, 17 miles from Oxford, and near 77 measured miles from London. A castle was built here, anno 1125. In the first of queen Mary it was made a borough, consisting of a bailiff, 12 aldermen, and 12 burgesses. In the reign of James I. it was made a mayor town, with 12 aldermen, and 6 capital burgesses; and, in 1718, it had a new charter from king George I. with the style of mayor, aldermen, and capital burgesses. It is now governed by a mayor, high-steward, recorder, 6 capital burgesses, and 30 assistants, a town-clerk, and two serjeants at mace. It has a fine large church, a free-school, two charity-schools, and a work-house. There is such good land hereabouts, especially rich pasture, that it was famous, even in Camden's time, for good cheese, as it is now for cakes and ale; and in the ploughed fields near it are often found coins of the Roman emperors. Here is held in the market at set times of the year, that which in other places is called a statute for hiring servants, but here a mop. Its fairs are on the Thursday after January 17, the first Thursday in Lent, Ascension-day, Corpus Christi, June 13, August 12, and Thursday after October 10. Market on Thursday. The town, including six hamlets belonging to it, contains about 700 houses; and it has two meeting-houses. The pyrites-aureus, or golden fire-stone, is found here in great plenty, in digging of wells. Banbury is situated 20 miles N. of Oxford, and 60 N. W. of London, in lat. 52, 5, N. Long. 1, 20, W.

BANCA, a town of Upper Hungary, noted for hot baths, whose waters have a white sediment, but instantly dye silver and copper black. The Waag has overflowed several of them. It lies 15 miles from Friedstadt.

BANCA, an island near the S. E. part of Sumatra, in Asia, being separated from the latter by a narrow channel. It is about 50 leagues long, and 16 broad in some places. The coast is very foul for 6 leagues within Monapin-point, which is the N. W. cape of the island; and on that headland is a high mountain called Monapin-hill. On the N. W. coast navigation is very dangerous, by reason of many banks and rocks under water, and practicable by none but praws and such small craft. Lat. 2, 5, S. Long. 105, 10, E.

BANCALIS, a port-town, situated on the E. coast of Sumatra, an island of the East Indies, in Asia. Here is a Dutch settlement, who sell cloth and opium, for which they have pepper and gold-dust in exchange; the latter supposed to be from Achin. Here are vast numbers of wild swine, the flesh of which is very sweet and fat; it is singed, and salted for sale. It lies 130 miles W. of Malacca, in lat. 2, 5, N. Long. 99, 7, E.

BANCOCK, or BENCOCK, an island of Upper Siam, in India, beyond the Ganges, in Asia. It is formed by the river Menan. Here are large gardens supplying the inhabitants with plenty of fruit. It lies 40 miles S. of the city of Siam, in lat. 13, 30, N. Long. 101, 5, E.

BANDA island, or Lantor, in the East Indies, (E. long. 128. S. lat. 4, 1 half) is the principal and largest of the Nutmeg-islands, yet not above 20 miles long and 10 broad, but is exceeding fertile, yielding oranges and other fruits, besides whole forests of nutmeg-trees and cloves, without cultivation. Our English merchants, in their first navigations, sent ships hither. Capt. Keeling's voyage in 1607, shews them well acquainted with this trade at that time; but the Dutch, even so early as that, were busy in engrossing it. These islands have been always much esteemed on account of these spices. The Arabs first brought them to Egypt and the coasts of the Levant, and from thence they were distributed all over Europe. The Portuguese, having found a way to Asia, round the Cape of Good Hope, about the year 1500, trafficked with the natives of India, and brought these spices to Europe. The Dutch invaded these islands about the year 1609, when the natives put themselves under the protection of the English, and acknowledged the king of England their sovereign; but the Dutch expelled both the natives and the English, usurped the dominion of them, and keep possession of them to this day, excluding all other nations from these valuable spices, which, it is pretended, will grow no where else. This island is like a horseshoe in shape, the two points whereof, running out N. and S. are 9 miles distant. In the bay between them is the chief village; and all the coasts about are covered with abundance of nutmeg-trees, whose blossoms spread such a fragancy, as if nature had employed all her art to make them wonderfully sweet. These trees by degrees quit the green, so natural to all vegetables, and put on a blue, mixed with black, red, and gold colour, like the rainbow, though not so regularly distributed. Beyond this delightful plain there rises a little mountain, in the middle of the island, from which flow some brooks that water the country; and then follows another plain, covered with the same trees, growing naturally out of the earth. The natives are strong, but ill-favoured, wear long hair, and live to a great age, though of a revengeful and melancholy temper. They are mostly Mohammedans, and very zealous and strict in their way, but some are Pagans, having no king or lord, but the eldest are obeyed. They have ships of force each of 3 or 4 cannon. Their hand-arms are carbines, bucklers, large scymitars, lances of hard wood, and darts, having also back and breast-plates, and glory in shewing their weapons bloody. Fruit is their chief food. The women till the ground, and do all the drudgery; the men having nothing to do but to eat, drink, sleep, or walk about. They have three harvests in a year, viz. in February, July, and October. The trees, Gemini tells us, are in common, and their fruits when gathered is divided among the inhabitants, in their several villages. They, at the instigation of the English, and others, have several times revolted against the Dutch; but are now entirely reduced.

This island has that of Ceram on the north, that of Celebes or Macassar west, and the ocean on east and south, and it lies east of Amboyna 170 miles. It is divided into three parts, each 3 leagues round. At the west end is a mountain, with 324 stone steps to the top of it, where the Dutch have a fort, and at the foot of it a town for their negroes, which is also well fortified; and they have likewise fortifications at every landing-place. Their chief factory is at Nera, which is well fortified, and is the residence of the governor and his council. The commodities chiefly imported here are, rice, cloths of Coromandel, Cambaya, and Malacca; broad-cloth, flannel, damasks, taffatas, velvets, gold chains and coins, silver cups gilt, China boxes, basons, head-pieces, guns, and damasked sword-blades. There are five or six other very small islands which produce nutmegs, and lie all round about Banda at a few leagues distant, named Pullo-way, Pulorin, Nera, Gumanapi, Guiliaen; all which the Dutch have in subjection. Of these the Dutch allowed Pullo-way to belong to the English, says captain Hamilton, after they had kindly cut down all the clove and nutmeg trees that grew on it, and made it death for the natives ever to plant any on it. The nutmeg-tree is as large as our common pear-trees, and its leaves like those of the peach-tree, but somewhat rounder. Two of these islands are uncultivated, and almost entirely uninhabited; the other three claim the distinction of being the only islands in the world that produce the nutmeg.

B A

If we except this valuable spice, the islands of Banda, like all the Malaccas, are barren to a dreadful degree. What they produce in superfluities they want in necessaries. The land will not bring forth any kind of corn; and the pith of the sago serves the natives of the country instead of bread.

As this food is not sufficient for the Europeans who settle in the Malaccas, they are allowed to fetch provisions from Java, Macassar, or the extremely fertile island of Bali. The company itself carries some merchandize to Banda.

BANDEIRA, one of the forts defending the harbour of Lagos, in Algarve, a province of Portugal.

BANDEL, in the bay of Bengal, was formerly a Portuguese colony, but now governed by the Mogul's fouzdaar. Hamilton says, it deals only in those commodities that are in request at the court of Venus.

BANDELSDORF, a church-village belonging to the island of Femarn, in the duchy of Sleswick, in Denmark.

BANDER-ABASSI. See GOMBRON.

BANDER-CONGO, a port-town of Asia, on the east-side of the Persian gulph, and situated 100 miles west of Gombron, in Lat. 27. 5. N. Long. 54. 50. E.

BANDO, the same with ASMER; which see.

BANDONBRIDGE, a small borough belonging to the county of Cork, and province of Munster, in Ireland. It is situated on both sides the river Bandon or Baan; and, though fortified by the Irish rebels, Oliver obliged them to surrender. In 1690 its three castles, which served for gatehouses, and its walls, were demolished by the French and Irish. It sends 2 members to the Irish parliament, and lies about 8 miles west from Kinsale.

BANDORA, BANDARA, or BANDURA, Long. 72. 30. E. Lat. 19; the capital, or most conspicuous village, of the island of Sasset or Canorin, on the west coast of the Hither India, divided from the island of Bombay by a channel half a mile wide, subject to the Portuguese. It is situated between Versua and Bombay, and is opposite to Mahim, which is on the south-side of the channel, as this is on the north. It is large, with tiled houses, and many handsome buildings. The Portuguese have no trade here, because the channel belongs to the English, and all customs of goods exported or imported are paid to the custom-house of Mahim. It is fordable at low-water, and the mouth of its river has so many rocks, that no ships of burthen can enter it. In 1720, the priests of the island having disturbed the English at Mahim, and animated the people to take arms against them, a bomb or two was thrown into the church here, which, by killing one or two priests and some lay brothers, convinced the rest that war was not properly their trade.

B A

The Jesuits had a battery of 7 guns, and abundance of small arms, besides a block-house here, as well as a noble college.

BANDY, or GREAT BANDY, is a town on the coast of South Guinea, consisting (Barbot says) of about 300 houses, divided into parcels, and stands in a marshy ground, made an island by a branch of the river from the main. It is well peopled with blacks, who employ themselves in trade, and some at fishing, by means of long and large canoes, some 60 feet long and 7 broad, rowed by 16, 18, or 20 paddlers, carrying European goods and fish to the upland blacks, and bringing down slaves, of both sexes, and all ages, with large elephants teeth, to supply the Europeans trading in that river. Several of these blacks act therein as factors, either for their own countrymen or Europeans.

BANGOR, or BANCHOR, a very ancient city, but now decayed, and still the see of a bishop, in Caernarvonshire, one of the counties of North Wales. Its Latin name is Bangertium; it was formerly very large, and therefore called Bangor Vaur, as the latter word imports great: its strong castle has long been demolished. The diocese comprehends the counties of Caernarvon and Anglesey, together with part of Denbigh, Merioneth, and Montgomery; has 107 parishes, 36 of which are appropriated; and under it are 3 archdeacons; namely, Bangor, Anglesey, and Merioneth; one of which is added to the bishopric, for the better support of its prelate. The cathedral, which is the oldest in all Britain, was consecrated in 516; and having been miserably effaced by Owen Glendour and others, is now but a despicable structure. The principal buildings are the bishop's palace and free-school-house. It is inclosed by a very steep mountain on the south and a hill on the north. One of the bishops, called Bulkeley, sold, says the Monasticon, the revenues and bells of the bishopric. The bishop's revenues now are valued in the king's books at 131l. 16s. 4d. and the clergy's tenths at 151l. 14s. 3d. It lies 30 miles W. of St. Asaph, and on the arm of the sea or Meneu, dividing the isle of Anglesey from Caernarvonshire, where it has a harbour for boats. The town is governed by the bishop's steward, who holds the court; and has a market on Wednesday. Fairs April 5, June 25, and October 28. Lat. 53. 21. N. Long. 4. 18. W.

BANGOR, a small borough, with a provost and 12 burgesses, belonging to the county of Downe, and province of Ulster, in Ireland. It sends two members to parliament. Here was the first church built of stone in the whole province; and duke Schomberg, sent against the rebels in 1689, landed at Bangor, of which he was soon after created earl. Some noble remains of its very ancient abbey are still still to be seen. The town contains about 200 houses, but has little trade; though it spins considerable quantities of fine linen-yarn; and on this, as on all the coasts of the county, is plenty of fish. It lies 5 miles from Donnaghadee, and 6 from Carrickfergus.

BANHO, a town of Viseu-district, in the province of Beira. It belongs to the Dowager of Portugal, and contains 440 inhabitants.

BANIALUCKA, a sangiacate belonging to Bosnia and Turkish Illyria, in Europe. Of the same name is a stout fortress, where the beglerbeg resides, and near which a battle was fought between the Christians and Turks in the year 1737.

BANJAR, a river in Borneo, one of the Indian islands in Asia; in the mouth of which, twice as broad as the Thames at Gravesend, is a floating town, where the English East-India company have a factory.

BANKISH, a province of the Mogul, and situated in the north part of the Hither India, in Asia, and S. W. of the province of Cassinere.

BANNABAT, BANNACHIR, or BUNNALIN. See BANAGHIR.

BANNE, or BANNOW, a town belonging to the county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, in Ireland. It is situated on a bay. See BAN.

BANNOCKBURN, a place near the ruins of Cambuskenneth-abbey, in Stirlingshire, Scotland; famous for a battle in which Edward II.'s vast army was routed by the Scots; and he himself narrowly escaped in a boat: also for another battle, fought between James III. of Scotland, and his nobility; the latter of whom, with the young prince, his son, at their head, taking up arms against the king, on account of his tyranny, defeated his army; and he himself was killed in the flight, and lies buried under a hawthorn-tree, near the above-mentioned ruins.

BANNOS, a village situated in a small plain, between the skirts of Tunguragua, and the Cordillera of the Andes, in South-America. It has its name from hot medicinal baths much resorted to. South of Cuenca, and not far from another village, called Bannos, are other hot waters, gushing out through several apertures on the summit of an eminence, the heat of which hardens eggs sooner than boiling water. These several streams uniting, form a rivulet of a brackish taste. In the aforesaid eminence are many crevices, through which issues continual smoke, a sufficient indication of its containing sulphur and nitre in great abundance.

BANSTEAD-DOWNS, one of the most delightful spots in England: first, by reason of its fine carpet ground, covered with a short herbage, perfumed with thyme and juniper, which makes the mutton of this tract, though small, very sweet; secondly, for the seats around it; and, thirdly, for its pleasant prospect of several counties on both sides of the Thames; including a view of the royal palaces of Windsor and Hampton-court, and also of London, from the tower to Westminster, it being a tract of no less than 30 miles, extending from Croydon to Farnham, though under different appellations. The soil, being for the most part a sort of chalk mixed with flints and sand, is dry soon after rain. There is a four miles course on them, which, in the season of horse-races, is much frequented, as all the Downs are, throughout the whole summer, for their wholesome air.

BANTALL, an English settlement in Sumatra, one of the Indian islands in Asia, 100 miles N. of Bencoolen.

BANTAM, once the metropolis of a large kingdom in Asia. It is situated on the N. W. coast of Java, one of the Indian islands. It was very populous, well fortified, and one of the greatest ports in those seas, where the English East-India Company had one of their principal factories. But the Dutch having attacked and deposed the king of Bantam, drove the English and other Europeans out in the reign of king James II. and still retain the possession of the place, permitting one of the race of their ancient kings to enjoy the title. The city stands in a plain at the foot of a mountain, from which issues a river that divides itself into three streams; two of these surrounding the town, and the third running through it. Bantam is now a poor ruinous place, without trade or gentry, both which are engrossed by Batavia. The houses are built of reeds and canes. It has a good safe road and pleasant bay, in which are several little islands, that retain their English names. It lies fifteen leagues west of Batavia. Lat. 6, 30, N. Long. 105, E.

BANTRY, a barony of Desmond, which is united to the county of Cork, and belongs to the province of Munster, in the S. W. part of Ireland. It has a commodious bay, running twenty miles in land to the town, from which it has its name, and contains several havens; the mouth of the bay called Beerhaven, from an island lying in it, is four miles wide. Bantry town is situated in Lat. 51, 15, N. Long. 10, 46, W.

BANTRY, also one of the baronies, in the county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, in Ireland.

BANTRY, or BRAINTREE, a little town, with a free-school, in the county of Suffolk, in New-England.

BANWELL, in Somersetshire. Here are two fairs, on January 18, and July 18.

BAOL, or BAOUL, a kingdom of Guinea, and Negroland, in Africa. It is bounded by that of Cajor, and does not extend above twelve leagues southwards along the coast, having the river Brissalum, or Barfalla, to the south.

BAPAUME

BAPAUME, a prefecture or bailiwick of Artois, belonging to the government of the latter name and Picardy, in France. It gives denomination to a small town, fortified after the manner of M. de Ville. It is called in Latin Bapalma, or Balma, and situated near the borders of Picardy, in a dry country, which is very much in want of water; and this is said to be its principal defence. It has an old castle, which gave the first occasion to the building of this town. Here is a particular governor, a royal prefecture, and forest-court. In the year 1641 the French took it from the Spaniards. It lies eleven miles from Peronne to the N. Lat. 50, 6. Long. 2, 56.

BAQUEVILLE, a town in a county of the same name in Normandy.

BAR SUR L'AUBE, a very old town of Val-de-Aube, a subdivision of Upper Champagne, and government of this last name and Brie, in France. In Latin it is called Barium super Albulam, or Albam and Bar-Albula: both names shew its situation on the river Aube. It lies at the foot of a hill. It was formerly a very considerable city, since at its four annual fairs separate quarters were assigned the Germans, Dutch, the people of Lorraine, and those of Orange. The Jews also had their quarters, and a synagogue. It gives the title of count, is the seat of a collection and royal provostship, and has a particular governor and chapter. It lies twenty-six miles E. of Troyes, and is noted for excellent champagne. Lat. 47, 50, N. Long. 4, 22, E.

BAR, a small town belonging to the palatinate of Podolia, in Little Poland. It is situated on the river Kiow, and upon a hill in the midst of marshes, 65 miles N. E. of Kaminiec. Lat. 48, 20, N. Long. 28, 5, E.

BAR, a fortress in the duchy of Aosta, and valley of this name, in Piemont, in Upper Italy. It is subject to the duke of Savoy, and commands the passage out of the above-mentioned valley into Piemont.

BAR, or BARROIS, duchy of, in the government of Lorraine and Bar, now belonging to France. It was anciently an earldom, and had its name from the castle of Bar. The lordship or territory of Bar on the other side of the Maes became a French fief in the year 1354, and afterwards continued so; but in ancient times it was an imperial fief, as well as the territory on this side that river, which was always a feudal dependancy on the empire. How the duchy of Bar was annexed to Lorraine, see under LORRAINE: and afterwards had the same fate with it, having been ceded by the emperor to the French, who divide the duchy of Bar into the four following general divisions:

I. Barois Mouvant; i. e. a fief of France, containing these two prevotés, namely, Bar le Duc and Bassigni. 1. Bar le Duc comprehends the prevoté of Souillieres, and earldom of Ligni; 2. The prefecture of Bassigni, includes the prevoté of Gondrecourt, the provincial bailiwicks of La Motte and Fourmont, the prevotés of La Marche, Chatillon, and Conflans, with the lordship of St. Thieboud.

II. Barrois Non-mouvant, i. e. not feudatory to France, and comprehended in the bailiwick of St. Mihiel, which is a large territory, extending between the Maes and Moselle, as far as the frontiers of Luxemburg. This includes the castle-wards of Sanci, Foug, and Bouconville (to the last of which belong the lordships of Trognon and Thiécourt), the lordships of Mandre aux Quatre Tours and Amermont, the castellanies of Chaussée and Conflans, the prevotés of Estain and Brie, the village of Muffi, the prevoté of Longuion, the marquise of Pont a Mousson, the castellany of Condé, the lordships of Avantgarde and Pierrefort.

III. The earldom of Clermont, in Argonne, including the city of the same name on the Air: to which also belong the lordships of Varennes and Vienne.

IV. Several lordships lying between the Maes and Moselle, depending neither on Lorraine nor Bar: and these are the lordships of Apremont and Commerci, the marquise of Hatton-Chastel, the lordships of Dieulouard and Gorze, with the small town and district of Malatour.

This duchy of Bar is bounded by Luxemburg on the N. and part of Lorraine on the S.

BAR, a prefecture or lordship of Lower Alsace, belonging to the city of Strasbourg.

BAR, castle of, in the lower district of the isle of Schutt, belonging to the circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary.

BAR LE DUC, a prevoté of Barrois, in the government of Lorraine and Bar, in France. Of the same name is a city belonging to it, which is the capital of the duchy of Bar. It consists of the upper and lower town, with some suburbs, and is situated on the river Ornei. In the upper division formerly stood its strong castle; and there is also the ducal palace, with two chapters: besides these, in the whole town is one parish-church, a priory, 7 convents, a late Jesuits college, and an hospital. It lies thirty-five miles W. of Nancy, and formerly belonged to Lorraine, but now to France. Lat. 48, 40, N. Long. 5, 15, E.

BAR LE MONT, a town of Hainault, in French Flanders. It is situated on the river Sambre, fifteen miles S. of Mons, in Lat. 50, 10, N. Long. 3, 40, E.

BAR SUR SEINE, a town of La Montagne, a territory in the government of Burgundy, in France. It is situated on the Seine, as its name imports: it is the capital of a county, the seat of a bailiwick, prevoté, election, forest-court, salt-house, and the residence of a particular governor. This small town has only one parish-church, a chapter, a little college, college, with three convents, and an hospital. It lies 20 miles S. E. of Troyes, near the confines of Champagne. Lat. 47, 50, N. Long. 4, 22, E.

BARABIACO, a small place of the duchy of Milan, in the Upper Division of Italy. It is situated on the river Olona.

BARACAL, a small and mean place, belonging to Guarda, a district of Beira, a province of Portugal. It contains 300 inhabitants.

BARACAN, or PARKAN, formerly a strong place on the Danube, belonging to the county of Gran, in the circle on the further side of that river, in Lower Hungary. In 1594 the Imperialists attempted it without any success: in 1684 the Turks were defeated near it, and the Imperialists took the town by storm. It is situated directly opposite to Gran; for which reason it is looked upon as a part of that city.

BARACOA, a town on the N. E. part of the island of Cuba, in the gulph of Mexico, North-America; 50 miles N. E. of St. Jago de Cuba. Lat. 21, 5, N. Long. 76, 10, W.

BARAGON, or TROMBAY, a little island adjoining that of Sallet, in India, near Bombay.

BARANCO, a port-town of St. Martha, in the Terra Firma of North-America. It lies on the river Grande, 30 miles south of its mouth, and 75 north-east of Carthage. It is the see of a bishop. Lat. 11, 10, N. Long. 75, 30, W.

BARANWAHR, a town of Lower Hungary. It is situated near the Danube, and subject to the house of Austria, 25 miles N. W. of Essek, in Lat. 46, 20, N. Long. 20, 5, E.

BARAVE, a small town on the river Vene, in the marquisate of Marquero; belonging to the bishop of Montpelier.

BAR AUBE. See BAR SUR L'AUBE.

BARBACENA, a small place in the district of Elvas, belonging to the province of Alentejo, in Portugal. It contains 700 inhabitants.

BARBADOES, the most easterly of all the Caribbee islands, subject to Great-Britain, and, according to the best geographers, lying between 59, 50, and 60, 2, of W. Long. and between 12, 56, and 13, 16, of N. Lat. Its extent is not certainly known: the most general opinion is, that it is 25 miles from north to south, and 15 from east to west; but these mensurations are subject to so many difficulties and uncertainties, that it will perhaps convey a more adequate idea of this island, to tell the reader, that in reality it does not contain above 107,000 acres. It lies 20 leagues east from St. Vincent, which may be seen from it on a clear day; 25 from St. Lucia, 28 from Martinico, 60 from Trinidad, 80 from Cape de Salinas, and 100 from St. Christopher's: it is usually ranked among the windward division of the Caribbees, being a day or two's sail from Surinam, the Dutch colony.

B A

Though the time when he not absolutely certain, yet it is generally agreed that the Portuguese were the first discoverers of this island, because as they had regular commerce with the Brasils long before the former was known to the English, it is not probable they should make many voyages thither without falling in with this island, which lies so much in the way. And it is as little doubted that they gave it the name it bears; though why they called it so is not easy to determine. Nor is it much more certain in what month or year it was first known to, or planted by, the English. That it was discovered by them in the reign of king James I. is, however, very evident; it being proved by record, that about 1615 an English vessel called the Olive, homeward-bound from Guinea, touched here, and, landing, set up a cross in or about St. James's-town, now called the Hole, and marked on a tree, "James, King of England and this island." In 1625, the William-and-John, J. Powell, commander, put 30 men ashore in the leeward part of this island, near the Hole-town, where they fortified, and set up his majesty's colours, under captain W. Dean, whom they chose their governor. In 1627 the earl of Pembroke, lord-chamberlain, obtained a grant for this island, in particular, in trust for Sir William Courteen, unknown to James lord Hay, earl of Carlisle, who had before obtained a grant of all the Caribbee islands, from king James I. to him and heirs, to be a province by name of Carliola. In 1628 the latter earl agreed with several London merchants for 10,000 acres under a governor of their own choosing; and accordingly a colony was sent under Charles Wolferstone, governor. But having not room for a regular history of its settlements, &c. it must suffice us to take notice, that the first planters of note were gentlemen of Devonshire and Cornwall, some of whom being Parliamentarians retired hither during the civil war; but that, on lord Willoughby's arrival, 1650, removed back to England. This nobleman farmed the island of the earl of Carlisle for twenty-one years.

When the English first landed here, it had not the least appearance of having ever been peopled even by savages. There was no kind of beast of pasture or prey, no fruit, herb, nor root, fit for the support of human life. Yet as the climate was good, and the soil appeared fertile, some gentlemen of small fortunes in England resolved to become adventurers thither. They met with difficulties and discouragements, which nothing but the noblest courage, and a firmness that cannot be too much praised, could have carried them through. By degrees some of the trees yielded fustic for the dyers; cotton and indigo agreed well with the soil, and tobacco answered tolerably: so that the country began to submit to cultivation.

The

These good appearances in America, and the storm which some time after began to gather in England, encouraged many to go over. But still the colony received no sort of encouragement from the government. However, as this colony had the hardest beginning, and most laborious infancy of any among our settlements; so it was far stronger in its vital stamina, and grew consequently with greater speed. For in this small island, in little more than 20 years after its first settlement, that is, in 1650, contained upwards of 50,000 whites; of all sexes and ages, and a much greater number of blacks and Indian slaves: the former of these they bought, and the latter they seized upon without any pretence, and carried those unhappy men into slavery; a practice which has rendered the Caribbee Indians irreconcilable to us ever since.

But this small island, peopled by upwards of 100,000 souls, was not yet above half of it cultivated, nor was the industry of the inhabitants at a stand. A little before the last-mentioned period, they learned the method of making sugar: and thus enlarging the sphere of their trade, they grew prodigiously rich and numerous.

About this time the government in England, then in Cromwell's hands, confined the trade of Barbadoes to the mother-country, which before was managed altogether by the Dutch: at the same time, by the rigour exercised towards the royal party, a great many gentlemen of very good families settled in this island. After the Restoration it continued still to advance by hasty strides. At that time king Charles created 13 baronets from the gentlemen of this island; some of whom were worth 10,000*l.* a year, and none of them so little as 1,000.

In 1676 this settlement was at its height, when their whites were computed to be still much about 50,000; but their negro slaves were increased to upwards of 100,000 of all kinds. They employed 400 sail of ships, one with another of 150 tons, in their trade: and their annual exports in sugar, indigo, ginger, cotton, &c. amounted to upwards of 350,000*l.* and their circulating cash at home was 200,000*l.* Not the best inhabited spots on the globe, perhaps, have ever been peopled to the same proportion, nor has land of the same dimensions produced any thing like the same profits, excepting the land upon which great cities are built. But since that time the island has been much upon the decline. The growth of the French sugar islands, and the settlement of Antigua, St. Christopher's, Nevis, and Montserrat, as well as the greater establishment in Jamaica, have drawn away from time to time a vast number of their people. A terrible contagion attacked the island in the year 1692. It raged like a pestilence; 20 died in a day in their principal town; and all parts of the island suffered in proportion. War raged at the same time with this distemper; and the Barbadians, who raised a good number of men, lost many of them in fruitless attempts against the French islands. The land too began not to yield quite so kindly as formerly; and in some places they were obliged to manure it. All these causes contributed to reduce the numbers and opulence of this celebrated island. But it is only in comparison of itself, that it may be considered in any other than the most flourishing condition even at this day. For, at present, it contains 20,000 whites, and very near 100,000 negroes. The principal articles of exportation are aloes, cotton, ginger, sugar, rum, molasses, which in 1770 to Great-Britain amounted to 311,000*l.* to North-America 120,000*l.* and to the other islands 1,100*l.* amounting in the whole to 432,000*l.* sterling.

The climate of this island is very hot, especially for 8 months; but not so excessive as in the same latitude on the continent of America, by reason of the sea-breezes blowing all the year round, from E. or N. E. except in the tornado months of July, August, September, and October, when it chaps about for an hour or two to the south. As the weather is generally serene, so the length of the days is nearly equal. The twilights are so short, that it is dark three quarters of an hour after sunset. The rains fall when the sun is vertical. This excess of moisture and heat is the reason that their trees and plants grow to such a height. The coast is defended by rocks and shoals on the east-side or windward shore, so as to be two-thirds inaccessible; and by breast-works and redoubts on the west or leeward side. Besides, the whole coast is defended by a good line, and several forts in proper places. There is scarce a harbour in the island except that of Bridge-town, in Carlisle-bay, nor a stream that deserves the name of a river, though on the east-side are what they call Scotland-river and Joseph's-river. It is said, near the center is a bituminous spring that sends forth a liquid like tar, which is washed from the hills by rains; and serves for the same uses as pitch, or lamp-oil. They have wells of good water almost every where, without digging very deep, and large ponds and reservoirs for rain-water. It is mostly a level country, with some small hills covered with wood. Some parts of the soil are said to be hollowed into caves, some of them capable of containing 300 people. These are imagined to have been the lurking places of runaway negroes, but may as probably be natural excavations. The woods that formerly grew upon the island have been all cut down, and the ground converted into sugar-plantations. When those plantations were first formed, the soil was prodigiously fertile, but has since been worn out, insomuch, that about the year 1730, the planters were obliged to raise cattle for the sake of their dung, by which means the profit of their plantations was reduced to less than than a tenth of its usual value. Notwithstanding the smallness of Barbadoes, its soil is different; being in some places sandy and light, in others rich, and in others spongy: but all of it is cultivated according to its proper nature; so that the island presents to the eye the most beautiful appearance that can be imagined.

No English grain is sown here; and only the Indian or Guinea corn are cultivated by the poor; our corn they have generally in flour from Britain. They have also potatoes, yams, &c. planted all the year. Here are all sorts of oranges and lemons, the fruit of which is large, and the juice delicious. Here are abundance of citron-trees: of the peel of their fruit are made, by the Barbadoes ladies, the finest cordial and sweet-meats in the world, besides choice roots, leaves, &c. pickled. The lime-tree here is as prickly as our holly: and since punch has been drank in England, the juice of its fruit has become a staple commodity, some tuns of it being imported into England and Ireland in a year. China limes are frequent, as also China or sweet lemons, tamarinds and palm-trees, bananas and pine-apple, with the aloes, mangrove and callabash trees, the cotton, cedar, mastic, and bulley trees, the sugar-apple, sour-sop, and shaddock, with the cocoa-tree, of whose shells they make cups, and of the nuts is made chocolate; and other trees and shrubs of note. Here are the fig-tree, cassia, fistula, the shrub physic-nut, the prickled-apple, pomegranate, papa, guava, custard-apple, macow-tree, palmetto, locust-tree, iron-wood, plantain-tree, and mangoe-tree, from the East-Indies.

The chief plants of Barbadoes are ginger and red pepper, with an infinity of others, too tedious to enumerate here. In Barbadoes is plenty of all sorts of excellent pulse: but our shrub-fruits do not thrive here. Of their potatoes they make a brisk small-beer, called mobby. The inhabitants have coach-horses from Old-England, saddle-horses from New-England, and others for common uses from Bonavista, Cape de Verd islands, and Curassou. They have a breed of their own, mettlesome, but not strong. Bulls are yoked in the cart with their cows. They have asses which run along where horses cannot pass, and are very serviceable in carrying burthens to and from the plantations. The hogs of Barbadoes are finer eating than those of Britain, but the few sheep they have are not near so good. They likewise have goats, which when young are excellent food. Racoons and monkies are also found here in great abundance. Among their birds the largest is a buzzard, but less and swifter than our grey fort, and they destroy rats very much. Here is store of large turtle-doves, and a less kind. The principal singing-bird is a thrush, and another sort like a wren, but seldom or never sings. They have a sort of fowl called oxen and kine, and the men-of-war birds; the last so called as flying twenty leagues from land to make discoveries, and return when they espy a ship, their intelligence of this kind seldom failing the Barbadians: an hyperbolical, if not incredible, relation! They have plenty of wild and tame fowl. Their most common insects are snakes and scorpions. Here are no toads nor frogs, but muskettoes and cock-roaches; the latter of which always leave a sting; with many more insects, which we must pass over for want of room.

The precincts of this island are subdivided into south, west, north, and east, consisting of eleven parishes:

I. In the south part of the island, St. Michael's or Bridge precinct, are the parishes of St. Michael, St. George, and St. John. In St. James's or the Hole precinct are the parishes of St. James and St. Thomas. In St. Peter's or Speight's precinct, is the parish of St. Peter, with All-Saints chapel.

II. In the west is the parish of St. Lucy.

III. In the north, in St. Andrew's Over-hill, or Scotland precinct, are the parishes of St. Andrew and St. Joseph.

IV. In the east, in Ostine's precinct, are the parishes of Christ-church and St. Philip.

The civil government of this island consists of the governor, a council of 12, who are appointed by letters of mandamus, and an assembly of 22, chosen annually out of the several parishes by a majority of votes. The governor's title is, captain-general and chief governor of the island of Barbadoes. His title used also to extend over all the islands belonging to Britain to windward of Guadeloupe, which is now disused; those islands being now distinct governments. The members of the council sit in the chancery with the governor, and are by virtue of their posts styled honourable. The governor's salary is 2000*l.* sterling a year, paid from the Exchequer in Britain; and he is entitled to no perquisite except a third of seizures, unless it be granted as a settlement by the first assembly he meets after his arrival. The duty to the king on the exports of this island is $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. established in 1660; the settled duties on (appropriated to the use of the stores and forts) goods imported are, 4*lb.* of gunpowder on every ton, which is paid in specie, and four pounds ten shillings a pipe on Madeira wine, both of which may amount to near 1000*l.* a year. (A pipe of Madeira also pays seven pounds ten shillings duty to the king). All liquors, &c. imported pays a duty, and the others are such as the assembly raises for the use of the colony, generally by a pound rate or poll-tax; but there is nothing settled on the sovereign but the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

The military government, except in time of war, consists only of the militia, which is a very respectable force.

The rectors of the 11 parishes, who are of the church of England, which is the religion established here, as in the other islands, are allowed 150 or 200*l.* a year, paid quarterly, besides perquisites, which in some parishes are very considerable. The living of Bridgetown is valued at 6 or 700*l.* but the account does not say whether this money be sterling or currency. Here are few Dissenters; and on this island has been no pastor of this denomination since the year 1690. The surrogate of the bishop of London, who is the ordinary of all the English colonies in America, has the church-affairs here under his government.

In general here is an appearance of something more of order, and of a settled people, than in any other colony in the West Indies. In Bridgetown, which is the capital of the island, is a college, founded and well-endowed by several contributions, but principally by the liberality and virtue of that valuable man, colonel Christopher Codrington, who was a native of this island, and the most shining ornament it ever had.

The Barbadians trade with New England, Carolina, Pennsylvania, New-York, and Virginia, not only for timber, but for bread, flour, Indian corn, rice, tobacco, salt beef and pork, fish, pulse, and other provisions: with Guinea for Negroes: with Madeira for wine: with Tercera and Fayal for wine and brandy: with the isles of May and Curassow for salt: and with Ireland for beef and pork. From Great-Britain and Ireland they import osnaburghs, the chief wear of their servants and slaves; linen of all sorts, broad-cloth, kerseys, silks and stuffs, red caps, stockings and shoes, gloves, hats, millinary-wares and periwigs, laces for linen, pease, beans, oats, biscuit, wine, strong beer, which they have also from New-England, and pale ale, pickles, candles, butter and cheese, with all sorts of iron-ware for their sugar-works, leaden, brass, and copper-ware, with powder and ball: all kinds of Indian goods and toys, coals, pantiles, hearth-stones, hoops, and in short every thing fit for an English market, the difference of the climates being always considered. The planters send to Guinea guns, powder, and arms, perpetuanas, tallow, &c. with hats, and other wearing-apparel, which they have from England, and dispatch small vessels thither to bring slaves for their plantations, which must be recruited every year with 20 or 30 negroes to every 4 or 500 acres: insomuch that this island has required a supply of 100,000 negroes every 30 years. Upon a parliamentary enquiry into the African trade, it appeared, that, in three years only, the number of negroes imported at Barbadoes, Jamaica, and Antigua, amounted to 42,000, besides those carried to St. Christopher's, Nevis, and Montserrat. Madeira wine being the principal drink of the gentry here, about 3000 pipes of it, with Malmsiey and Vidonia wines, are imported into this island in a year.

The inhabitants of this island are of three classes; namely, 1. The masters, who are English, Scots, or Irish, with some few Dutch, French, Portuguese, and Jews; 2. The white servants; and 3. The black slaves. The masters live very elegantly, with rich equipages and fine liveries, &c. The white servants are either by covenant or purchase; and the latter are of two sorts, such as sell themselves in Great Britain or Ireland, for four years or more. The servitude of the blacks is perpetual; yet great care is taken of them; because, if a negro dies, it is 40 or 50*l.* loss to the owner. They are purchased by lots, after being all viewed quite naked; and the men are allowed two or three wives, in order to increase the planter's stock. Few of these have been converted: nor are the planters, it is said, very forward in promoting their conversion. The masters are obliged to treat the negroes very severely, not only by reason of the stubborn, treacherous temper peculiar to all of their complexion and country; but as being greater in number than the whites, and having made frequent attempts to get the mastery.

This island, particularly in July and August, is subject to hurricanes; but not so much as in the other Caribbee islands. The trade-wind at all other times blows continually from the eastward. The island was nearly ruined by a dreadful hurricane in October 1780; and in April 1662 it was attacked by the Dutch Admiral De Ruyter, who attempted to land some troops; but was obliged to desist from his enterprize with great loss.

BARBAGIO, a large village of Nebio, a district in the N. E. division or country on this side the mountains in the island of Corsica, in Upper Italy.

BARBANTANE, a small place belonging to the country bailiwick of Arles, in Lower Provence, and government of this name, in France. It stands on an eminence near the confluence of the Rhone and Durance.

BARBARAN, a large village of Il Vicentino, a province belonging to the republic of Venice, in Upper Italy. It is the seat of a vicariate, under which are 15 smaller villages.

BARBARY's vast tract of ground is bounded N. by the Mediterranean (which divides it from Europe), E. by Egypt, S. by Sara or the Desert, W. by the Atlantic Ocean. Its extent from E. to W. (i. e. from Cape Non, on the western coasts of Morocco, to the confines of Egypt) is almost 37 degrees, or about 2200 miles. As for its breadth from N. to S. it is very unequal, in some parts not above 6 or 7 degrees, and where widest (as from Cape Non above-mentioned to Tangier) not above 10 degrees or 600 miles. Geographers have given it much greater extent both ways, some as far as 4000 miles in length, and 1200 in breadth, which can only be meant including creeks and windings, which are too unknown to be depended on. Barbary is, next to Egypt, the most fertile, populous, trading part of Africa. The soil abounds with plenty and variety of grain and fruits, especially citrons, oranges, dates, figs, olives, grapes, pomegranates, almonds, &c. in all which the inhabitants drive a considerable traffic, as well as in coral. Excellent hemp and flax grow on their plains; and by the report of Europeans, who have lived there for some time, the country abounds with all that can add to the pleasures of life; for their great people find means to evade the sobriety prescribed by the Mahometan law, and make free with excellent wines, and spirits of their own growth and manufacture. Algiers produces salt-petre, and great quantities of excellent salt, and lead and iron have been found in several places of Barbary.

Neither the elephant nor the rhinoceros are to be found in the states of Barbary, but their deserts abound with lions, tigers, leopards, hyenas, and monstrous serpents. The Barbary horses were formerly very valuable, and thought equal to the Arabian. Though their breed is now said to be decayed, yet some very fine ones have been lately imported into England. Camels and dromedaries, asses, mules, and kumrahs, a most serviceable creature, begot by an ass upon a cow, are their beasts of burden. Their cows are but small, and barren of milk. Their sheep yield but indifferent fleeces; but are very large, as are their goats. Bears, porcupines, foxes, apes, hares, ferrets, weasels, moles, cameleons, and all kinds of reptiles are found here. Besides vermin, says Dr. Shaw, (speaking of his travels through Barbary) the apprehensions we were under in some parts of this country, of being bitten or stung by the scorpion, the viper, or the venomous spider, rarely failed to interrupt our repose; a refreshment so very grateful, and so highly necessary to a weary traveller. Partridges and quails, eagles, hawks, and all kinds of wild fowl, are found on this coast; and of the smaller birds, the capsparrow is remarkable for its beauty, and the sweetness of its note, which is thought to exceed that of any other bird, but it cannot live out of its own climate. The seas and bays of Barbary abound with the finest and most delicious fish of every kind, and were preferred by the ancients to those of Europe.

The air is temperate though hot, being refreshed by constant breezes from the Mediterranean. The inhabitants are of good stature, strong, swarthy, expert horsemen, and peculiarly dextrous at bow, arrow, and lance, in the inland: and on the coasts well accustomed to the use of fire-arms. The dress of these people is a linen shirt, over which they tie a silk or cloth vestment with a sash, and over that a loose coat. Their drawers are made of linen. The arms and legs of the wearer are bare, but they have slippers on their feet; and persons of condition sometimes wear buskins. They never move their turbans, but pull off their slippers when they attend religious duties, or the person of their sovereign. They are fond of striped and fancied silks. The dress of the women is not very different from that of the men, but their drawers are longer, and they wear a sort of cawl on their heads instead of a turban. The chief furniture of their houses consist of carpets and mattresses, on which they sit and lie. In eating, their slovenliness is shocking. They are prohibited gold and silver vessels; and their meat, which they swallow by handfuls, is boiled or roasted to rags. Adultery in the women is punished with death; but though the men are indulged with a plurality of wives and concubines, they commit the most unnatural crimes with impunity. They are generally represented by our writers proud, fierce, choleric, jealous, and revengeful; ignorant, idle, treacherous, and cruel, addicted to robbery, piracy, and all manner of debauchery. They are supposed indeed originally to have been, for most part, the very dress and refuse of the ancient Egyptians, who spread themselves along these coasts, all the way westwards: and the name Barbary is most generally thought given by the Romans on account of the ferocity and barbarity of their manners. They are for most part Mohammedans; but, for sake of commerce, tolerate Jews, Christians, or any people they can gain by. Neither do all profess the same kind of Mohammedanism, those of Fez and Morocco being of the sect of Hamet, those of Algier differing from them in many things, and both have introduced superstitions and tenets of their own.

The language in most of the sea-ports, and all along the coast, is the Arabesk, or corrupt Arabic, which is more or less so in some kingdoms than in others, in Morocco least. But the traders, in commerce with strangers, use an ungrammatical jargon, a kind of odd compound of Spanish, Portuguese, &c. not unlike the Lingua Franca. The greatest part of this vast country is divided into kingdoms and provinces, under dominion of the Turk, each under a particular basha or viceroy. Some few others are under Arabian or African princes, either wholly independent or tributary to the Turks and others of his vassals; and a third sort are only obliged to furnish a sum of money or number of men to their principal lords. The remainder is absolutely subject to the king of Fez and Morocco. The natural rarities being but few, and the artificial consisting chiefly in noble remains of antiquity, stately mosques, and other buildings, urns, statues, &c. which are brought in under their proper articles, we shall only single two of them here, each each remarkable in its kind. A few miles distant from Tangier is a vast hole like that of a coal-pit, many fathoms deep, which leads into a great number of subterranean apartments, all of them done with good marble, very fine and noble; and from the many statues, urns, and ancient Punic (or Carthaginian) inscriptions, supposed to have been so many repositories for the dead. The other is an odd kind of bridge, as commonly termed, over the river Sabu, where it runs between the two mountains of Benja-Julga and Silego; but it is more properly a quick and easy ferry over it, by help of two large stakes on either side, both well fixed in the ground, between which are extended two strong ropes, to one of which is fixed a large basket able to contain 10 men, and into which passengers being entered, and pulling one of the ropes which turns by a pulley, waft themselves over much easier and quicker than can be done by bridge or ferry-boat.

The kingdoms under the common name Barbary along the Mediterranean coast (and exclusive of those inland ones commonly but falsely included under the general name Biledulgerid) are, 1. Barca, 2. Tripoli, 3. Tunis, 4. Algier, 5. Fez, and 6. Morocco. The race of Ham from Egypt, it is (as before hinted) supposed, began first to people the E. coasts of this country. Its far from impossible that some Asiatic nations, in time, from the straits of Babelmandel along the coasts of Zanguebar, &c. came also by sea hither, and spread into the inland countries. It likewise received others from Phœnicia, and of the Canaanitish race, since even so late as St. Austin's time they called themselves Canaanites. These being more inured to war and trade than the rude natives of Afric, we may reasonably imagine, did by assistance of the Numidian and Mauritanian soldiers, hired as auxiliaries, subdue their next neighbours first, and spread their conquests gradually westward, from the frontiers of Egypt to the mouth of the Straits. The Carthaginians, jealous of the overgrown Romans, passed over into Spain and Sicily; which gave birth to the three Punic wars; which terminated in the destruction of Carthage. The Romans, not content with the conquest over these, extended it farther, reducing Numidia and its king Jugurtha, and next the brave Juba, king of Mauritania. Thus became this whole country subject to the Roman yoke. The Vandals in their turn, forcing way through France, entered Spain with the Suevi and Alani, and after 18 years possession of the coasts of Andalusia, hard pressed by the Goths, anno 427, passed over into Afric under their king Ienserik, and subdued the greatest part of what the Romans were then possessed of. But in 534, the renowned Belisarius, the emperor's Justinian's general, overthrew Gili-mar their last king, and reduced anew all that whole region under the Roman empire. It remained a Roman præfecture till 647, when Othman, third caliph of the Saracens, sent Hucha his general with a mighty army, who wrested this large province from the Roman empire; from which time it became subject to the Mohammedam Arabs. The caliphs or Mirammolins held it till anno 800, when the governor Aglab Ibraim erected it into a monarchy, and made himself sovereign in the province of Africa Propria, and countries adjacent, and so left it to his posterity, who held it under title of Aglabites till anno 900, by which time they had extended dominion from Egypt quite to Tunis. Much about the time of Aglab, the Edrissites, descended from Edris, of the race of Ali, or Haly, Mohammed's son-in-law, erected another in the W. of Barbary, which contained all Mauritania and Numidia, where that family continued 100 years, keeping their court at Tangier, Fez, and Ceuta. But both these kingdoms were gained by Abo Mohammed Obeidalla, who pretended to be a prophet descended from Fathimah, Mohammed's daughter, who took on him the title of Mehedi, or Director of the Faithful, and left all these countries to his successors, who afterwards conquered Egypt also. These styled themselves caliphs, of which was a succession of 14, reigning till anno 1163. But Adhedh, the last of them, being hard pressed by the Christians, craved aid from Nouredin, sultan of Bagdad, who sent Saladin with a mighty army, who, ridding the Franks (or Christians), took possession of the country for his own prince; after whose death he himself assumed the supreme power, and became one of the most formidable of those Mohammedan sovereigns. About anno 1076, Joseph Ben Taf-Setin, one of the Almoravides race, having extended conquest quite to the ocean and Mediterranean, built the city of Morocco; and, passing over into Spain, subdued all the Moors there; and left his African and Spanish dominions to his successors, till 1136, when Mohammed Abdalmoumen, another prophet militant, overthrew and expelled that race; and his posterity enjoyed that throne till 1290, Morocco being their chief seat, &c. Bukar Aben Merin, in time, seized the supreme power, made Fez his capital, and had a viceroy in Morocco. His successors held the sovereignty till Alboacen, the eighth in descent, having been defeated with a great slaughter in Spain, was, on his return, dethroned by his son Alboamen; but the eastern part of Afric soon revolted from him, and the Portuguese took several considerable places from him in the west. About 1508, another revolution came about; of which we cannot spare room for particulars: only may, on the whole, observe that the family which now reigns have assumed the title of Sherifs, Zerifs, or Xerifs, a title highly revered among them as belonging to the successors of Mohammed. How the provinces of Algiers and Tunis came came to withdraw from the dominions of those mighty princes, how they became subject to the Turks, yet still are states, &c. are to be seen in their several proper places. We need only add, that Barbary, after a vast variety of changes, is now divided between the grand signior and the emperor of Fez and Morocco, except those few towns which the Portuguese and Spaniards still keep along the coasts; the former have only the port of Magazan on the Atlantic coast, and the latter Mazalquivir, Melilla, and Pennon, within the Mediterranean, and Ceuta upon the Straits mouth.

BARBARINA, a noble villa at Rome, belonging to the Barbarini family, and built by Pope Urban VIII. from which is a fine prospect of the city. Here are good paintings, with other curiosities; and it has beautiful gardens. Near this palace is the bastion, before which the intrepid Charles of Bourbon lost his life in the year 1527.

BARBARINO, a market-town belonging to the territory of Florence, and grand duchy of Tuscany, in the Middle Division of Italy. It is the birth-place from which the Barbarini family above-mentioned derive their origin. It lies 12 miles S. Florence. Lat. 43, 40, N. Long. 12, 15, E.

BARBAS, or DAS BARBAS, a little river running into the ocean on the coast of South Guinea.

BARBASTRE, or BARBESTRE, a bourg of Lower Poitou, and government of the latter name, in France.

BARBATE, a small place of the kingdom of Seville, a subdivision of Andalusia, a province in Spain. It is situated on a little river bearing the same name.

BARBAZAN, a little place belonging to the small territory of Nebouzan, in Upper Cominges, and province of Armagnac, in the government of Guyenne and Gascony, in France. Here are mineral waters.

BARBE, (St.) or St. BARBARA, a town of New Biscay, a province belonging to the audience of Guadalajara, in Old Mexico or New Spain, in N. America. In its neighbourhood are silver-mines; and therefore it is well-inhabited. It lies 240 miles N. of Zatatecas, and 500 N. W. of the city of Mexico, in lat. 26, 10, N. Long. 110, 5, W.

BARBERN, Great and Small, a place of Bausk territory, belonging to Semigallia, a province of the duchy of Courland. Near both these is a medicinal spring.

BARBESIEUX, in Latin Barbezillum, a little town of Saintonge, in the government of this name, and Angoumois, in France. It is a marquisate, now in the house of Louvois. It has a manufactory of linen, which is sold not only within the kingdom, but also to the English. The capons of this place are reckoned extremely nice, and accordingly they are sent to Paris for the tables of the delicate. Here are two parish-churches and a convent; and not far from hence is a mineral spring. It lies about 5 leagues from Angoulesme to the S. W. and 14 from Bourdeaux to the N. E.

BARBESUL, a town and river of Boetica, and a colony in the resort of the Conventus Gaditanus in Spain; now Marbella in Granada.

BARBI, a place near the influx of the Saal into the Elbe, in the principality of Anhalt, and electorate of Saxony, in Germany. It belongs to the Weissenfels branch of Saxony, who has erected a noble castle here, finely painted and furnished. Its gardens are delightfully situated on the side of the Elbe. The duke of Barbi is the only prince of the Saxon family who is a Calvinist. It lies between the cities of Anhalt and Magedburg.

BARBORA, a maritime town of Africa, in the kingdom of Adel, on the strait of Babel Mandel. The inhabitants are negroes, and feed abundance of cattle. There is also an island of this name in the Red Sea, to the west of the Bay of Barbora. Long. 47, 2, E. Lat. 10, 45, N.

BARBOSA, a little district of Porto, belonging to the province of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal.

BARBOUTHOS, BARBUDA, or BARMUDA, one of the Leeward islands, among those called the Caribbees, in the Atlantic ocean, North America. It belongs to Great Britain, and lies 45 miles N. of Antigua, being about 20 miles long and 12 broad. It is low land, but fertile, and was planted by the English as early as any of the Leeward islands, except St. Christopher's; but were often forced to desert it by reason of invasions by the Caribbeans from Dominica. At length, gathering strength, and the Barbarians diminishing, they repossessed it; so that in a few years it had 500 inhabitants; and in 1778 the number amounted to 1500. A governor is appointed by the Codrington family, the proprietors, who have here, as well as at Barbadoes, great numbers of negroes. Part of this island, and of the estate of Christopher Codrington, esq. to the value of about 2000 l. together with two plantations in Barbadoes, he gave to the Society for propagating the Gospel, towards instructing the Caribbean negroes in Christianity, and erecting a college in Barbadoes for teaching the liberal arts, particularly physic and surgery.

Here is plenty of black cattle, sheep, goats, kids, fowls, &c. the breeding of which is the principal employment of the inhabitants; and they sell these to the neighbouring islands to considerable advantage. Barbuda is said to produce citrons, pomegranates, oranges, raisins, Indian figs, maize, pease, and cocoa-nuts, besides tobacco, and several raw woods, herbs, roots and drugs. Here are serpents of various sorts; some of which are very large, but not poisonous; and they destroy rats, toads and frogs; of others the bite is incurable, if an antidote be not applied in two hours. This island is better vided for shipping than Nevis, which lies to the S. W. though not so well inhabited and planted as the latter is; for on the W. side it has a good road, well sheltered, and clear of rocks or sands. But from the N. W. and S. W. points, two shoals of sand run upwards of two leagues into the sea. Lat. 18, 5, N. Long. 61, 3, W.

BARBUSINSKOY, a town of Asia, in the empire of Russia, seated on the eastern shore of the lake Baikal, at the mouth of the small river Barbusigga.

BARCA, a country of Africa, whose inhabitants, the Barcæi, are mentioned by the ancients, for their brutal ferocity, and by Virgil lateque furentes; under which character they are no less known at present; those who live on the coasts of the Mediterranean being all given to piracy, and those of the inland to robbery and plunder. It is bounded on the E. by Egypt, on the S. by part of Biledulgerid, on the W. by Tripoli, and on the N. by the Mediterranean sea. It is commonly divided into two parts; namely, the kingdom and the desert of Barca, otherwise Marmarica and Deserta. The Arabs commonly call it Sobart, or Ceyrat-Barca, i. e. the desert, or stormy way of Barca, it being little else but a vast, wild, and sandy desert, reaching from the province of Mezrata, and Cape Raxaltin, on the W. quite to Alexandria on the E. that is, about 160 miles; and upwards of 200 from N. to S. comprehending the two regions anciently styled Cyrenaica and Marmarica. It is at present commonly known by the name of the coast of Derma, so called from the latter, which is the principal city now left on it; all the rest, which were formerly in great number, and most of them rich and well-built, being either dwindled into villages or heaps of ruins. Amongst these were the following; namely, Berniche, Bengasi, Tolometta, Persis, Grenna or the ancient Cyrene, Port Soufu, Rasat, Laranja, Ludouera, Docra, Bonandra, Tavera, Derma, Cape Raxaltin, Patriarcha, Trabuck, Port Salonetta, Brada or Bracka, Port Soliman, and some few others of less note.

It labours almost every where under a great scarcity of water; and except in the neighbourhood of towns and villages, where the ground produces some small quantities of grain, such as millet, and some maize, the rest is in a manner quite barren and uncultivated, or, to speak more properly, uncultivable: and even of that small quantity which those few spots produce, the poor inhabitants are obliged to exchange some part with their indigent neighbours, for dates, sheep, and camels, which they stand in greater need of than they, by reason of their great scarcity of grass and other proper food; for want of which, those that are brought to them seldom thrive or live long. In this country stood the famed temple of Jupiter Ammon; and notwithstanding the pleasantness of the spot where it stood, this part of the country is said to have been the most dangerous of any, being surrounded with such quick and burning sands as are very detrimental to travellers; not only as they sink under their feet, but being light, and heated by the rays of the sun, are easily raised by every breath of wind; which, if it chance to be in their faces, almost burns their eyes out, and stifles them for want of breath; or, if vehement, often overwhelms whole caravans. Against this temple Cambyses king of Persia dispatched an army of 50,000 men. They set out from Thebes in Upper Egypt, and under the conduct of proper guides reached the city of Oasis, seven days journey from that place; but what was their fate afterwards is uncertain; for they never returned either to Egypt, or to their own country. The Ammonians informed Herodotus, that, after the army had entered the sandy desert which lies beyond Oasis, a violent wind began to blow from the south at the time of their dinner, and raised the sand to such a degree, that the whole army was overwhelmed and buried alive.

Concerning the government or commerce of this country we know nothing certain. Most probably the maritime towns are under the protection of the Porte: but whether under the basha of Egypt or Tripoli, or whether they have formed themselves into independent states like those of Algiers and Tunis, we cannot say; only we are told that the inhabitants of the maritime towns are more civilized than those that dwell in the inland parts. The first profess Mahometanism, and have imbibed some notions of humanity and justice; whilst the latter, who have neither religion, nor any sign of worship among them, are altogether savage and brutish. They are a sort of Arabs, and like them live entirely upon theft and plunder. By them this tract, which before was a continued desert, was first inhabited. At their first coming in, they settled themselves in one of the best places of the country; but as they multiplied, and had frequent wars with one another, the strongest drove the weakest out of the best spots, and sent them to wander in the desert parts, where they live in the most miserable manner, their country hardly affording one single necessary of life. Hence it is that they are said to be the ugliest of all the Arabs; their bodies having scarcely any thing but skin and bone; their faces meagre, with fierce ravenous looks; their garb, which is commonly what they take from the passengers who go through these parts, tattered with long wearing; while the poorest of them have scarce a rag to cover their nakedness. They are most expert and resolute robbers, that being their chief employment and livelihood; but the travellers in these parts are so few, that the Barcans are often necessitated to make distant excursions into Numidia, Lybia, and other southern countries. Those that fall into their hands are made to drink plenty of warm milk: then they hang them up by the feet, and shake them, in order to make them vomit up any money they think they have swallowed; after which they strip them of all their clothes, even to the last rag: but, with all this inhumanity, they commonly spare their lives, which is more than the other African robbers do. Yet, notwithstanding every artifice they can use, the Barcans are so poor, that they commonly let, pledge, or even sell their children to the Sicilians and others from whom they have their corn, especially before they set out on any long excursion.

Along the foot of mount Atlas on the north is a spacious plain, said to be fruitful, and well watered. The air is more subject to cold than excessive heat; and in winter they have deep snows. The mountains yield fruits, but no grain; and the woods are full of all sorts of wild beasts. Lybia, properly so called, lay, according to Procopius, between Cyrene to the west, and Alexandria, in Egypt, to the east.

BARCA, or BARCE, a city, which some authors of note are in doubt whether there ever was such a place; but Strabo mentions Barea or Barca as the capital of the Barcæi; and Pliny, Scylas, Ptolemy, and Stephanus do the same. The two former and the last make it to have occupied the same spot where Ptolemais afterwards did; but the other couple are of different opinion. It seems, therefore, to have stood to the west of Cyrene, and to have had a port near the greater Syrtis. Herodotus affirms Barca to have been built by the brothers of Arcefilaus III. king of Cyrene, above a generation before the beginning of Cyrus's reign; and also that it was taken by Amasis the Persian general for Pheretina, mother of Arcefilaus IV. who had been murdered in the city.

BARCA, (Ponte de,) a little town of Vianna district, and province of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal. It contains 600 inhabitants in one parish. To its jurisdiction belong 25 parishes.

BARCELLOS, a town belonging to an audience which bears its name, and subject to the dowagers, in the province of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal. It is situated on the river Cavado, and surrounded with walls and towers. It has a collegiate and a parish church, a house of mercy, an hospital and convent. It contains but 400 inhabitants. It is the seat of an audience, an auditor, and judge called juiz da fora, appointed by the royal house of Braganza. This place, after the erection of the kingdom, was the first earldom in Portugal, and then raised to a duchy by king Sebastian. But at present nobody bears the title, it being absorbed in the royal house of Braganza. It lies 12 miles west of Braga. Lat. 41, 20, N. Long. 9, 15, E.

BARCELONA, a handsome, rich, and strong city of Spain, in the province of Catalonia, of which it is the capital. This city was originally founded by Hamilcar Barcas, and from him called Barcino. It was reduced by the Romans, and continued subject to them till the kingdom of Spain was over-run by the Goths and Vandals, and afterwards by the Saracens or Moors. In the beginning of the ninth century Barcelona was in the hands of the Moors, and under the government of one Zade. This governor having more than once abused the clemency of Charlemagne, at last irritated Lewis king of Aquitaine, and son to Charles, to such a degree, that he gave orders to his generals to invest the city, and not to rise from before it till they had put Zade into his hands. The Moor made a most obstinate resistance, so that the siege lasted many months: at last, finding it impossible to preserve the city much longer, and being destitute of all hopes of relief, he determined, or rather was compelled by the inhabitants, to go to the Christian camp, and implore the emperor's mercy; but here he was no sooner arrived than he was arrested, and sent prisoner to Charlemagne, who condemned him to perpetual banishment. The people gaining nothing by this expedient, continued to hold out for six weeks longer, when the king of Aquitaine himself took the command of the siege. To him they made a proposal, that if he would allow them to march out, and go where they pleased, they would surrender the place. Lewis having agreed to this, made his public entry into Barcelona, where he formed a design of extending his father's dominions as far as the Ebro: but being recalled before he could put his design in execution, he appointed one Bera, count of Barcelona. The city continued subject to him and his successors, who still enjoyed the title of counts of Barcelona, from the year 802 to 1131; during which time we find nothing remarkable, except that the city was once taken by the Moors, but soon after retaken by the assistance of Lewis IV. king of France. In 1131 it was united to the crown of Arragon by the marriage of Don Raymond V. count of Barcelona with the daughter of Don Ramiro the monk, king of Arragon. In 1465 the Catalonians revolted against Don Juan II. king of Arragon, out of hatred to his queen Donna Juanna; the consequence of which was, that Barcelona was besieged by that monarch in 1471. Various efforts were made by Lewis XI. of France, and the duke of Lorraine, in order to raise the siege, but without effect. Things at length were brought to the utmost extremity, when the king offered to pardon them all, without the smallest punishment, either in person or property, provided they would submit: but these terms they rejected, chiefly through the influence of the count de Pailhars, who had been pardoned the year before. The army, on the other hand, was very earnest in being led on to the assault, in hopes of plunder. The king, however, wrote a letter to the citizens, dated the 6th of October, in terms as affectionate as if he had been writing to his children, bewailing the miseries they had brought on themselves, and concluding with a protestation, that they, and not he, must be answerable for the consequences. Upon this, at the persuasion of a priest who had a reputation for sanctity, they sent deputies to the king, and made a capitulation on the 17th of the same month. In this the king acknowledged they had taken up arms on just motives; and forgave every body except Pailhars, who was, however, suffered to escape. On the 22d of October the king made his entry into the city, and confirmed all their ancient privileges. In 1697, Barcelona was taken by the French, after a bloody siege of 52 days; and the loss of this city had a considerable effect in disposing the Spaniards to agree to the treaty of Ryswick. In queen Anne's time it was taken by the allies under the earl of Peterborough; but being afterwards shamefully denied assistance by the English ministry, was obliged to submit to Philip II. by whom the whole province was deprived of its ancient privileges.

Barcelona is situated by the sea-side, of a form between a square and an oval; it is surrounded with a good brick wall, round which is another, with 14 bastions, horn-works, ramparts, and ditches; the ramparts are high, broad, and spacious, inasmuch that an hundred coaches may be seen every evening driving thereon for pleasure. The city is divided into two parts, the Old and the New, which are separated from each other by a wall and a large ditch; the streets are handsome, well paved with large stones, wide, and very clean. It is the residence of a viceroy, is a bishop's see, has a fine university, a mint, a good port, and is adorned with handsome buildings. Here is a court of inquisition, which the inhabitants look upon as an advantage. The remarkable buildings are the cathedral, which is large, handsome, and adorned with two high towers; the church of the Virgin Mary; the palace of the bishop; that of the inquisition; and several religious houses: add to these the palace of the viceroy; the arsenal, which contains arms for 1000 men; the exchange, where the merchants meet; the terfana, where they build the galleys; and the palace where the nobility of the country meet, called La Casa de la Deputation. This last is built with fine large free stone, and adorned with columns of marble; there is in it a large hall, with a gilt ceiling, and a handsome portico, wherein persons may either walk or sit; the hall is adorned with the portraits of all the counts of Barcelona. There are several fine squares, particularly that of St. Michael, into which all the great streets run. At the church of Capilefmona, i. e. alms-taker, close by the cathedral, 300 poor are fed every day upon charity. The number of houses in Barcelona is reckoned at about 15,000. Its bishop is a suffragan to the metropolitan of Terragona, and his annual income is reckoned to be 10,000 ducats. Here also is an university, an academy of the fine arts erected in 1752, a court of inquisition, and a royal audience of Catalonia, in which, next to the governor and captain-general, sits the regent. The other members here are ten counsellors, five criminal or justiciary officers, and two fiscals.

The port is wide, spacious, deep, and safe; defended on the one side by a great mole, and on the other sheltered from the west wind by two mountains, that advance into the sea, and form a kind of promontory: the mole is 750 paces long, with a quay, at the end of which is a light-house, and a small fort. One of the mountains, called Mount Joy, is very high, and rises in the middle of the plain near the city: it is covered with gardens, vineyards, groves of trees, and has a strong fort for the defence of the city: this mountain being a rock, yields an inexhaustible quarry of fine hard free stone. Barcelona is a place of great trade, on account of the conveniency of its harbour; and it has a manufacture of knives greatly esteemed in Spain, as also of blankets. Here are also several glass-houses. The inhabitants are diligent, and equally fit for labour and trade; they are also very civil to strangers. The women are well shaped, and as handsome as any in Spain; they are brisk and lively in their conversation, and more free and unrestrained in their behaviour than in other parts of Spain. E. long. 2, 13. N. lat 41, 26.

BARCELONETTE, a valley and territory of Provence, in France. It is situated on the Alps, on the confines of Dauphiny, and the county of Nice, in Italy. Francis I. king of France, took it from the duke of Savoy, and annexed it to Provence; but Henry II. restored it to Savoy: at last, by the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, it was ceded to France, and in the following year united to the government of Provence. The principal place in it is of the same name, which was built in the year 1230 by Raymond Berenger, count of Provence; who, in memory of the origin of his predecessors from Barcelona, in Spain, called it Barcelonette. It lies 20 miles S. E. of Embrun. Lat. 44, 35, N. Long. 6, 40, E.

BARCELOAR, or BASSELORE, in the Mogul territories, India, stands 30 miles S. from Batacoa, 40 from Onor, 120 from Goa, and 100 S. W. from Raolconda, on a broad river 4 miles from sea, and one from the mouth of the river, which has a bar on it of 13 feet water at spring-tides, and a castle on the north side to secure the entrance. The Dutch have a factory here to buy rice for Malabar; the Portuguese also get supplies of it for Goa, exchanging horses, dates, pearl, &c. The English have a fort here called Moor's Fort, to the S. E. of the Dutch fort, and the Danes a factory. They have two crops of rice yearly by means of lakes, from whence water is let out.

to water the fields at will. Here is a good trade for pepper, ginger, and drugs. In the road from hence to Mangolor, 9 miles, are planted four rows of trees to shade passengers, and huts kept by poor people, so appointed by the government, to supply them with fine fresh water gratis, Lat. 13, 45, N. Long. 74, 15, E.

BARCINO, a town of the Terraconensis in Spain, and capital of the Laletani. Now BARCELONA. See that article.

BARCOS, a town of Lamego, a district belonging to the province of Beira, in Portugal. It contains 380 inhabitants.

BARDASTRANDAR, a district belonging to the western quarter of Iceland, in Norway.

BARDES, an island of the Mogul, in the East Indies, in Asia. It lies N. of Goa. The land here is high, under which the Portuguese anchor, loading or unloading their ships; on it are the forts Aguada and Los Reys. It is full of cocoa-trees. From hence a good deal of palm-wine is exported.

BARDEWICK, or BARDANWICK, in Latin Vicus Bardorum, Bardejugum, or Barderopolis, now a village of Brunswick and Lower Saxony, in Germany. It is situated on the river Ilmenaw; and of its ancient grandeur only the cathedral is left, after the bishopric was transferred to Verdun, the district about it being turned into kitchen-gardens. It was destroyed in 1189, except the cathedral, by Henry the Lion, duke of Brunswick; as it was by the Saxons, in 1371. In 1529 Lutheranism was introduced here. It lies about a mile northward of Lowenburg, in Lat. 53, 40, N. Long. 10, 6, E.

BARDFIELD, a small place in Essex. An annual fair is kept here June 22, for cattle and toys.

BARDI, a small place belonging to the Val di Taro, and duchy of Parma, in Upper Italy. It is situated on the river Cevo.

BARDO, a mean place belonging to the duchy of Aosta, in the principality of Piemont, in Upper Italy. Here is a mountain castle.

BARDONACHE, a place in the valley of St. Martin, and principality of Piemont, in Upper Italy. There is also another place of the same name in Dauphiny, in France, and may be seen in the particular maps.

BARDSEY-ISLAND, in Cardiganshire, South Wales; it forms the north point of Cardigan-bay. Within Bardsey is good anchoring, in the little bay of Aberdaron; but it has a difficult entrance for large ships in case of hard weather.

BARDT, a port-town of Pomerania, in Germany, situated on the Baltic Sea, 10 miles W. of Stralsund, 73 N. W. of Stetin, and 30 N. E. of Rostock; E. long. 13, 20. Lat. 45, 20. It is subject to Sweden, and was once the metropolis of Upper Pomerania. It is situated on a bay, but too shallow to be a good harbour. It is very ancient, most probably having its name from the mouth of the river Bardt, which, being joined by the Beke-nitze, falls into the Baltic near this town. It is populous, and defended by a strong castle, and the adjacent fields abound with all sorts of corn. A sort of beer is here brewed, which is much valued. A yearly fair is held on the Sunday after Michaelmas. In 1587 the whole town was consumed by fire. The earl of Brandenburg took it in 1677, but restored it to Sweden in 1679.

BARDUTZ, a juridical seat, united to that of Udvarhely, in the Terra Sicularum, or N. E. part of Transylvania, belonging to the kingdom of Hungary. It contains a town of the same name, which is well inhabited, and where they make great quantities of salt.

BAREBOE, or BAASELANDSWERK, an iron-manufactory, belonging to the diocese of Christianland, in Norway, about 2 miles from the town of Arndal. It is one of the oldest in this country, and is in a middling condition. In this neighbourhood also are several iron-mines.

BAREGE, in Latin Vicus Baredgimus, a little place in the valley of Lavedon, and ancient earldom of Bigorre, belonging to Lower Armagnac, in Gascony, and government of the latter name, and Guyenne, in France. It is situated at the foot of Mount Tormalet, which is famous for its warm baths, of which four have different degrees of heat, and are good for the cure of rheumatic pains, &c. It is about a league distant from the kingdom of Aragon, from which it is separated by the Pyrenees, and 5 leagues almost S. from Bagneres.

BAREITH, a marquisate in the eastern division of Franconia; in Germany, formerly subject to its own margrave, who was a prince of the empire, and had a vote in the diet; but since the extinction of this branch, in the year 1726, it is now in that of Culmbach. It extends 38 miles from N. E. to S. W. but is of a very unequal breadth, being 17 at the two extremes, and not above 4 in the middle. The margrave being a branch of the Brandenburg family, is thence styled Brandenburg Bareith.

BAREITH, the capital of the last-mentioned marquisate, or margravate, is a fine city, defended by a castle, where the prince resides. This is but an old huge pile, and incommodious. He has a pretty house ingeniously contrived about 2 miles off, called the Hermitage. Bareith lies 15 miles S. E. from Culmbach.

BAREME, (valley of), one of the four vigueries belonging to the provincial bailiwick of Digne in Upper Provence, and government of this latter name, in France. To this valley belongs a large village of the same name, situated on the river Alle. It is the seat of a collection, and the principal place in the valley.

BARENTON,

B A

BARENTON, a town of France, in Lower Normandy, and in the diocese of Auvranche, near the source of the river Ardee.

BARESUND, a place in the fief of Linkioping, belonging to East-Gothland, in Sweden; to which ships can come out of the open sea towards the towns of Norkioping and Soderkioping. Here is a custom-house, at which vessels are visited.

BARETTA, a fort in the isle of Anthony Vaez, about half a league from Fort William, and as much from the continent, on the coast of Brasil; and commands the avenues both by sea and land to the Cape of St. Austin and the Receif.

BARFLEUR, or Val de Cere, in Latin Barro-fluctum, and Vallis Cereris, a small town, with a little port, belonging to the territory of Cotantin, a subdivision of Lower Normandy, in the government of the last name, in France. Formerly it was the best port in this province, where the kings of England, when masters of it, used to land; but it is now choked up with sand. Here is the seat of a viscounty and admiralty, in 1346 the English destroyed it, and filled up the harbour. At the Cape of Barfleur, 12 miles E. of Cherburg, was once a royal yard, where part of the royal navy of France was destroyed the day after the victory of La Hogue, obtained by the confederate fleet under Admiral Rooke, in the year 1692. Lat. 49, 37, N. Long. 1, 16, E. Cape Barfleur is a very low and long piece of land, which has a small dry harbour on the east side, fit only for vessels of 9 or 10 feet draught; the entrance is very easy, for it requires no more than to keep in mid-channel.

On Cape Barfleur stands the fourth light-house, erected in 1775, by the Chamber of Commerce of Rouen: this light-house, situated on the point of the rock which forms Cape Gatteville, level with the surface of the water, is raised on a base in order to preserve the foot of it from the breaking of the sea. From the foundation of this base the body of the light-house is 88 feet, and the iron lanthorn which contains the fire, is 15 feet high. The point of Cape Gatteville towards the sea, is near a quarter of a league from Barfleur to the north, forming a very low rocky point, running into the sea about 300 fathoms. All the neighbouring coast is very rocky, of a kind of granite, of which the tower is built.

BARGA, a little town of the Florentine territory, in the grand duchy of Tuscany, and Middle Division of Italy.

BARGE, a small place of Rostino, one of the districts of the N. E. division of Corsica in Upper Italy.

BARGEMON, a bourg or large village, belonging to the provincial bailiwick of Draguignon, in Lower Provence, and government of the last name, in France. It is situated on a hill, which is covered with vines and olive-trees, and surrounded with mountains.

BARGENY, the ancient Berigonium of Ptolemy, a little town, and the only place of note in the bailiery of Carrick, a district belonging to the shire of Aire, in Scotland. It has the privilege of holding a market, and gives the title of lord to a branch of the Hamilton family.

BARGI, a castle of the Bolognese, a province of the Ecclesiastical State, in the middle division of Italy.

BARGIE, one of the baronies in the county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, in Ireland.

BARGON, an inconsiderable place in the eastern division of the Genoese dominions, on the main land, in Upper Italy.

BARGUSIN, a small river of Asiatic Russia, in the neighbourhood of which the bitumen, or mountain-tar, is thrown up in the Baikal lake very plentifully, and burnt by the inhabitants in their lamps.

BARGUZINSKOI-OSTROG, or pallisadoed place, in the circle of Selenginski, and province of Irkutzkaja, in Asiatic Russia. It is situated on the little river Barguzin, which falls into the lake of Baikal.

BARI, or TERRA DI BARI, a territory of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, of which the above-mentioned city is the capital. It is bounded on the north by the Capitanata, on the north-west by the Ulterior Principato, on the south by the Basilicata, on the south-east by the Terra de Otranto, and on the north-east by the gulph of Venice. It has no considerable river except the Offanto, which separates it from the Capitanata. The air is temperate; and the soil produces plenty of corn, fruit, and saffron; but there are a great many serpents, and spiders called tarantulas. The principal towns are Bari, the capital, Frani, Andria, Bavo, Bilonto, Conversano, Monopoli, Polignano, Barletta, and Malfetto.

BARI, the capital of the last-mentioned province, bearing the same name, in Latin Baris, Barium, or Barrietum. It is a well-built, fortified, and populous city, on the Adriatic. It drives a good trade, notwithstanding the Venetians spoiled its harbour. The archiepiscopal see was formerly at Canosa; but, upon the Saracens destroying that town, the Patriarch of Constantinople united its church with that of Bari; for which reason the metropolitan of Bari is stiled archbishop of Bari and Canosa. His suffragans are the bishops of Bitetto, Bitonto, Conversano, Giovenazzo, Lavello, Monorvino, Polignano, and Ruvo. Bari was anciently the residence of the Greek governor or exarch, in Apulia and Calabria.

In 1465 Ferdinand I. of Aragon, took the city and duchy of Bari from the prince of Taranto, together with all his other lands, and gave them to

B A

Francis Sforzia, duke of Milan. Afterwards it came, together with the principality of Rossano, to princefs Bonna, who, in 1517, was married to Sigismund, king of Poland; after whose death she resided at Bari, and appointed king Philip II. of Spain, her heir to Bari and Rossano. In a council held at Bari by pope Urban II. in October 1, 1098, St. Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, disputed against the Greeks upon their union with the Latin church. It lies 85 miles N. W. of Otranto, in Lat. 40, 40, N. Long. 17, 40, E.

BARJAC, or BARGEAC, a little town in the diocese of Uzez, belonging to Lower Languedoc, and government of the latter name, in France. It has the title of a barony; and close by it stands the castle of Banos.

BARILLE, a little place of the Basilicate, belonging to the kingdom of Naples, in the Lower Division of Italy.

BARILLES, a large village and bailiwick of Lower Foix, in the government of the latter name, in France. It is situated on the river Auriege.

BARILLOWITZ, a town, with a garrison, belonging to the generalate of Croatia Proper, on the farther side of the Save, in the kingdom of Hungary.

BARIS. See ANTONIO.

BARJOLS, or BARJOUX, a pretty large and well-inhabited town, in the viguery of the same name, belonging to the provincial bailiwick of Brignoles, in Lower Provence, and government of this last name, in France. It is a seat of the collection of the tailles and viguery, also of a royal jurisdiction. Here is a collegiate church and 2 convents.

BARIUM, a town of Apulia on the Adriatic; so called from the founders, who being expelled from the island Bora, built this town. It is now called Bari; see that article.

BARKAM. See BARAKAN, in Hungary. It is situated at the confluence of the Ibola and Danube; and is memorable for the victory which John Sobieski, king of Poland, and the duke of Lorraine, obtained here over the Turks in 1684.

BAKHAMSTEAD (Great), anciently Durobrivæ, a market-town of Hertfordshire. Here are the ruins of an old castle, which was very large and strong, on the north-side of the town, where the kings of Mercia resided: a parliament was also held here in 697, and Ina's laws published. In this town was the famous meeting between William the Conqueror and the English nobility, after the former had defeated Harold; the issue of which was, that he was obliged to swear he would inviolably keep the ancient laws of the kingdom: though he afterwards took away their lands. The church of St. Peter is a handsome structure, having many chapels and oratories. The chapel of St. John is for the use of the master, officers, and scholars of the free grammar-school, built by dean Incent of St. Paul's. The town extends itself in handsome buildings and a broad street; at the south-east end of which is St. Leonard's hospital, and at the other that of St. James's. It lies 9 miles W. of St. Alban's, and 25 N. W. of London. Lat. 51, 41, N. Long. 40, W.

BARKING, a large village in the marshes of Essex, not far from the Thames; mostly inhabited by fishermen. It has a large parish, with a chapel of ease at Ilford, and another, called New-chapel, on the side of Epping forest. Here was erected the first nunnery in England, by Erkenwald, bishop of London, of which there are no traces left. The soil here is rich, but the air unhealthy. A little beyond the town, on the road to Dagenham, stood a large old house, where, tradition says, the gun-powder treason was first contrived, and all the consultations holden about it. On the same road is the famous breach which laid about 5000 acres of land under water; but after 10 years inundation, and the works being several times blown up, it was stopped by captain Perry. The annual fair of Barking is on October 22. It lies 9 miles E. of London.

BARKLEY. See BERKLEY.

BARKWAY, a market-town of Edwine-street hundred, in Hertfordshire. It is a considerable thoroughfare in the north road, with good inns, and is a populous place. The church, which stands in the middle of the town, has an aisle on each side, and a tower with 5 bells, and a turret clock. The bodily representation of the Deity, like a man in a loose robe down to his feet, on some of the window-panes, with the globe before him, and emblems of the six days creation, is very gross, and was placed there in the Roman Catholic times: and St. George slaying the dragon, a bishop, &c. on a window in the north-aisle, owes its origin to the same times. Here are several handsome monuments, and about a mile off is Northamsted, a chapel of ease to it: it was greatly damaged by a fire on August 18, 1748. Its annual fair is on July 20. It lies 15 miles S. of Cambridge, and 36 N. of London.

BARÉDUC. See BAR and BARROIS.

BARLETTA, a little town in the province of Bari, belonging to the kingdom of Naples, in the lower division of Italy. It is the see of a metropolitan, who styles himself archbishop of Nazareth (where one of them anciently was prelate), also bishop of Cannæ and Monteverde. He likewise has the privilege of wearing the cross and pallium.

BARLEVENTO-ISLES. See CARIBBEE.

BARMACH, a famous and very high mountain on the coast of the Caspian sea, in Schirvan, a province of Persia, in Asia. It is very cold at the top, though the air is mild at the foot of it.

BARMSTED

B A

BARMSTED, a town of Segberg division, in Stormar, and duchy of Holstein, in Germany. It belongs to the ducal branch of Holstein.

BARNAGLASS, or rather BAHR-NAGHASH, i. e. lordship of the sea, a district of the kingdom of Tigra, in Asia. It is so called, as extending to the coast of the Red-sea, on which it had the famed seaport of Arkkio or Arquico, which rendered its commerce very considerable. But as that hath been seized by the Turks, Bahr-naghash has dwindled to little or nothing.

BARNAGUL, in the bay of Bengal, India, about 6 miles from Governapore, and the village next to it on the river side above Calcutta, where the Dutch have a house and garden, is as infamous as Bandel (in its place mentioned) for a seminary of whores. The Dutch anchor here sometimes, for refreshment, and to take in their cargoes for Batavia.

BARNARD-CASTLE, vulgarly BARNY-CASTLE, properly BERNARD'S-CASTLE, having been built by Bernard Baliol, great-grandfather of John Baliol, whom Edward I. of England, made king of Scotland. It is a large structure, situated on a rock, and guarded upon one side by the river Tees, and in the bishopric of Durham. The castle, which is on the west-side of the town, is of great antiquity. The buildings of the town are elegant, being built of a white free-stone; the principal street is spacious, and near a mile in length. It is not incorporated, but is governed by a steward and jury of the manor of Darlington, which consists of the principal inhabitants. It is very populous. At the foot of the market-place stands an open structure of fine free-stone work, cupolaed, and covered with blue slate, surrounded with an octagonal colonade, as a stand for the market-people. At the head of the market-place, this fine-street is blocked with shambles and a town-house. This is an inland town, and has one of the greatest corn-markets in the N. of England, but is surrounded by 6 or 8,000 acres of land, capable of the highest improvement by cultivation, lying waste. Here they have an excellent method of dressing their hides into leather, of which are made the best bridles, reins, and belts. The manufacture of stockings flourishes here, as does also the jockey-trade. The annual fairs are on Easter-Monday, Wednesday in Whitsun-week, and St. James's day, July 25. It lies near Marwood-park, about 26 miles S. W. of Durham city, in Lat. 54, 26, N. Long. 1, 3, W.

BARNAVELDT, an island of South America, in the Straits of Magellan, to the S. of Terra del Fuego, discovered in 1616. Long. 78, 10. W. Lat. 56, 20, S.

BARNESLEY, a well-built and populous little market-town, in the West-Riding of Yorkshire. Here manufactories of iron and steel works are very flourishing. It is called Black-Barnesley; but whether from its smoaky appearance, or from the moors near it, which look all like Bagshot-heath, is uncertain. The annual fairs here are on May 12, and October 10. It lies 10 miles from Doncaster, and 177 from London.

BARNET, (East), a thoroughfare town of Hertfordshire, and well supplied with inns. It lies high, and was formerly much frequented for its medicinal waters; but now for its hog-market. In its neighbourhood, near Enfield-chace, are several very handsome houses belonging to the citizens of London.

BARNET, (Cheaping), a place of Hertfordshire, a little farther N. in the St. Alban's road; it is famous for the decisive battle fought there on Easter-day 1468, between the houses of York and Lancaster, in which the make-king, earl of Warwick, with many of the nobility, and 10,000 men, were killed. The field of battle is supposed to be a green spot near Kiksend, between St. Alban's and Hatfield-road, a little before they meet. And here, in the year 1740, a stone column was erected, with an inscription, giving an account of the battle. In the street are six alms-houses, also a free-school-house. It lies 10 miles N. W. of London. Lat. 51, 42, N. Long. 20, W.

BARNEVELT islands, so called by Schouten and Le Maire, in S. America. They are grey and barren rocks, surrounded with several other smaller ones, and lie in about lat. 56, 35, S. Long. 73, 10, W.

BARNSDALE, a moor 5 or 6 miles from Pontefract, in the West-Riding of Yorkshire, across which the great Roman causeway runs, from Doncaster to Castleforth.

BARNSTABLE, or BARNSTAPLE, a well-built and populous borough of Devonshire, on the river Taw, 30 miles N. of Exeter, and 194 miles from London. The name is compounded of Bar; which, in the British language, is the mouth of a river, and staple, which, in the Saxon, is a mart of trade. It had walls formerly, with a castle, the liberties of a city, and a haven, which became at last so shallow, though at spring-tides the neighbouring fields are overflowed, that most of the trade removed to Biddiford; yet it has still some merchants, and a good trade to America and Ireland, from whence it is an established port for landing wool; and it imports more wine and other merchandizes than Biddiford, and is as considerable; for though its rival cures more fish, it does not drive so great a trade with the serge-makers of Tiverton and Exeter, who come hither to buy fish, wool, yarn, &c. This town is pleasantly situated among hills, in the form of a semi-circle, to which the river is a diameter, and has an old stone bridge over it of 16 arches, with a paper-mill. The streets are clean, and well paved, and the houses of stone. It is a mayor-town, (by charter of queen Mary) with with 24 common-council, of whom two are aldermen, besides a high-steward, a recorder, his deputy, &c. Here are two charity-schools. It has sent burgesses to parliament ever since the 23d of Edward I. Its fairs are September 19, Friday before April 21, and the second Friday in December, and last four days, toll-free. Market on Friday.

BARNSTAPLE (County), in New-Plymouth colony, Massachusetts province, in New-England, lies to S. E. of Plymouth county, along the bay of its own name, at the N. end of which is Cape Cod, the highest and longest Promontory on the coast, so called from the abundance of cod usually caught there. It is a large bay, capable of receiving 1000 sail of ships; and in 1602, when Capt. Gofnold landed here, was encompassed all round, even to the very sea, with oaks, pines, sassafras, juniper, and other sweet woods. The town of the same name, and capital of the county, lies at the north end of the bay on the Hayenas river and creek, and on the south side of the peninsula open to the Atlantic ocean.

BARNWELL, i. e. according to Camden, hairns or children's wells, to which youth resorted for merriment on St. John's eve; and hence called midsummer-fair. It is a little village with a church, in the hundred of Flendish, Cambridgeshire. Here was formerly an abbey, now in ruins. It lies 1 mile from Cambridge. In 1731 and in 1757 the whole town was almost consumed by accidental fires.

BARNWELL, a fort of North Carolina in America, situated about 20 miles to the N. W. of New-Berne, a town on the southern bank of the New-river.

BAROCHE, or BROTCHA, a walled town of Cambaya, in the empire of the Mogul, and Hither India, in Asia. It is situated on the river Nerdaba, which runs into the bay, where it has a port. Here the English and Dutch had factories formerly; but now only agents. It is inhabited by weavers and other manufacturers of cotton cloth; the bastas of this town, a long fine sort of cotton stuffs so called, being famous all over India, and the country being level, produces the best cotton, as well as wheat, rice, and barley. But Thevenot says, its principal trade is in agates, brought from quarries in the mountains, on the S. W. called Pindatsche. On the top of a hill is a fort: it has one great street for the markets; and calicoes are brought hither from all parts, in order to be whitened, the water here being excellent for that purpose. It is a thoroughfare to Lahor, Delli, Agra, and Amadabat. The river is broad, rapid, and deep, but in many places choaked up with sand; though pilots bring up large vessels to the very walls, where they load salt and corn. It lies 60 miles N. of Surat. Lat. 22, 15, N. Long. 72, 5, E.

BARONIES, a territory belonging to the Upper Delphinat, and government of Dauphiny, in France, so called, as consisting of two large baronies, which formerly were free imperial lordships. These are the barony of Meuoillon, and that of Montauban.

B A

BAROS, a town of Sumatra, one of the Indian islands in Asia, belonging to the Dutch. It is situated on a considerable river, and abounds in gold, camphire, and benjamin, but admits of no foreign commerce. Captain Hamilton says, that it lies within the south end of Hog-island, and bounds the kingdom of Achin.

BAROUSSE, valley of, a subdivision of Upper Armagnac, in Gascony, and belongs to the government of the latter name, and Guyenne, in France.

BARQUEIROS, a little district of Lamego, belonging to the province of Beira, in Portugal. It includes one parish.

BARR, and BARRI. See BAR, and BARI.

BARR, isle of John, so called by F. Labat. It lies in the river Sanaga, or Senegal, as the French name it, and belongs to Guinea, a province of Negroland, in Africa. It is situated above the bar, being 5 or 6 leagues in circuit, but longer than it is broad. It is extremely fertile, with beautiful high trees upon it in some parts. It is subject to two negro lords, who have their particular district and respective villages therein.

BARRADA, a desert of Siberia, in Asia, between the rivers Irtisch and Ob. There are no trees; but in some places good land, which might turn to account if there were any inhabitants.

BARRA-FRACA, a marquisate of Val di Noto, a province of Sicily, in the lower division of Italy.

BARRADY, a river of Syria, formerly the Chrysorrhoeas, which, rushing from Anti-Libanus down to Damascus, is there divided into endless streams for the supply and decoration of that city; whence, recollecting at some distance, it soon loses itself in a bog.

BARRAY, one of the Hebrides, or western isles of Scotland, situated in W. long. 6, 30. N. Lat. 56, 55. Of this island Dr. Smollet gives the following description. "About two leagues and a half to the S. W. of South Vist appears the isle of Barray, or Barra, 5 miles in length and 3 in breadth, partly mountainous, and partly capable of cultivation, having the advantage of a commodious harbour on the E. side, and a good fishery of cod, ling, and salmon; which last are speckled, surprisingly nimble and shy, insomuch that the fishermen are obliged to use three nets within one another, that, if the fish springs over two, it may be caught in the third. In the south end of Barray, there is an orchard planted with fruit-trees, though few of them produce fruit; but all sorts of pot-herbs and roots grow here in great perfection; nay, the natives even raised tobacco; but it never answered their purpose or expectation. This island, together with the adjacent smaller isles, belongs to the laird of Macneil, said to be the 36th in lineal descent from him of the same name who first possessed this estate. He holds it, however, in vassalage, from Macdonald of Slate, to whom he pays a yearly quit-rent. In the little isle of Kermul, about a quarter of a mile to the southward of Barry, is the family seat, furnished with a watch-tower, and surrounded by a kind of fortification. The cockman, or watchman, is constantly on the tower, to reconnoitre and prevent surprize; and the government of the castle is vested in a constable, who is very cautious of admitting any stranger in the absence of Macneil or his lady. The church of this island is dedicated to St. Barr, a wooden image of whom stands on the altar, and of this patron they recite a legend of miracles: hard by is a little chapel, in which Macneil and his descendants are interred. The inhabitants are very courteous and hospitable: as soon as any stranger lands on the island, they oblige him to eat, on the supposition, that the keen air of the ocean must have sharpened his appetite. When three or four guests arrive, each, by ancient custom, is lodged in a separate house; and thus man and wife are very often parted. The natives chiefly employ themselves in fishing, and climbing rocks for eggs and sea-fowl. The chief climber is distinguished by the name of gingich, or hero; and pays dear for his pre-eminence. When the boat approaches the rock, the gingich first leaps upon it, and, with the assistance of an horse-hair rope, draws his companions after him from one precipice to another. At their return to the boats with their booty of eggs and fowls, the gingich, at the hazard of his life, jumps into the vessel, which is generally tossed by a violent agitation of the sea, and keeps her steady to the rock, until the rest enter: in compensation for his courage and dexterity, he is gratified with a larger proportion of their plunder.

When a tenant's wife dies, the husband makes application to Macneil, desiring him to recommend another help-mate, and his request is immediately granted: then he visits her, carrying along with him a bottle of strong waters for the celebration of the marriage, which is consummated without farther ceremony. When the husband dies, the widow presents the same petition, and is accommodated in the same manner. Should a tenant lose his milk cows by the severity of the season, or any other misfortune, Macneil is obliged to supply him with the like number; and when an old man is past his labour, the laird maintains him in his own family, for the remaining part of his life.

BARRA, or BARRAH, a kingdom of Negroland, in Africa. Here is a point or headland of the same name, which reaches about 20 leagues along the N. side of the river Gambia. The king of Barra is of Munding extraction, and tributary to that of Barfally. The Royal African company of England had 2 factories in this country; but the trade is now open with all their settlements in Africa, having been lately resigned, are now lodged in the government for a valuable consideration; the one of these was at Gillyfree, lying opposite to Jamesfort; the other at Colar, upon a river of the same name, which discharges itself through one mouth into the Gambia, and which is upwards of 8 leagues above James-island. In this kingdom, about 6 leagues from the sea, is Charles-island, lying about a musket-shot off Barra-shore: on which island formerly stood a fort, but it is now gone to ruin. James-island is opposite to Gillyfree, from which a spit of land and rocks runs out a great way, N. N. W. vulgarly called the Company's spit. In 1663 the king of Barra was prevailed on by the Dutch to attack the English factory.

BARRABA, a wild desert and waste of Siberia, in the Asiatic part of Russia, lying between the rivers Irtysh and Ob, or betwixt the town of Tara and Ostrog, i. e. a pallisadoed place of Tschaukskoi. Here is little wood, but the finest arable land, of which part might be turned into meadow-grounds: yet hitherto uninhabited. Here are a great many lakes, abounding with a fish, which is a kind of black sea-dog, and a species of carp, called Karwasehen; also in this waste are several rein and red deer, foxes, ermines and bears. Among the inland or fresh-water lakes, the principal is Tschane, in which are many isles. Some fortified places in this desert had afterwards their names from the province of Jenesei. On a mountain called Piclowa, from the picta or white firs that grow on it, are some rich copper-mines. Every hundred weight of ore found here, yield 12 pounds of pure copper, and produces a quantity of silver besides. It lies very near the surface of the earth.

BARRACUNDA, a place belonging to the kingdom of Yany, in Negroland, and on the river Gambia, in Africa, upwards of 50 miles from Fata-tenda in a straight line, but many more by water, on account of the windings in this river. This was once a place of good trade, but grown so wild since the demolition of the town, that at present there is not so much as a ferry. The inhabitants have retired to Jah, an inland town about 9 miles farther. See GAMBIA. About three-score miles above Barracunda, which is 250 leagues from the sea, the tide flows up this river; and vessels of 150 tons can come almost to it.

BARRAUX, simply, or LE FORT DE BARRAUX, a large village, with a fort, in Graisivandau, a district of the Upper Delphinat, and government of Dauphiny, in France. It is situated on the river Isere, and on the frontiers near the entrance into the valley of Graisivandau: it is the residence of a particular governor, deputy-governor, and major.

In 1528 the duke of Lefdineres took it in less than two hours, though a garrison were ready to receive them with lighted matches. It has Montmelion on the N. from which it lies a league distant, and Grenoble on the S. Lat. 45, 5, N. Long. 5, 30, E.

BARREIRO, a town belonging to the audience of Setuval, in Portuguese Estremadura.

BARRERA, (one of the western islands of Scotland) is one of the lesser islands to the N. which has a harbour on the south side, and is possessed by one of the Macleans.

BARRETS, a barony belonging to the county of Cork, in the province of Munster, in Ireland.

BARRIMORE, a barony in the last-mentioned county and province, in Ireland.

BARRINGTON, a viscounty in Ireland.

BARRINGTON (Town), in Bristol-county, Plymouth-colony, New-England, seated on the river Swansey, 6 miles N. from Bristol.

BARROIS. See BAROIS.

BARROW, one of the principal rivers in the province of Leinster, in Ireland. It rises in Queen's county, and, after running E. and then S. it washes Catherlogh and Loughlin; then taking in the province near Waterford, falls together with it into the ocean.

BARRY, an island of Glamorganshire, in South Wales; so called from one Baruch, a holy man, buried there.

BARSALLY, a country next adjoining to Samjally, on Gambia river, in Negroland, Africa; is a very noted one, governed by a king of the Jalloff nation. In this country is our African Company's chief factory at Joar. The town is inhabited by Portuguese, but is much lessened of late years. At present it contains not above 10 houses, besides the king's and the company's, which two take up as much ground as all others. About a mile from the town is a ledge of hills, high and rocky, but nevertheless full of trees, which the natives say run 100 leagues up the river. The ships that come to trade at Joar always take up their stock of water out of the river, it being ever fresh there. The country of Barsally extends about 15 leagues eastward along the river, and also inland northward, and then westward.

BARSONY-PILSEN, or BARSONS, an old mine-town and colony of Saxons, in Lower Hungary; but now subsists by agriculture, and belongs to the archbishop of Gran.

BARTE, a bourg belonging to the valley of Nestez, on a river of this last name, in Upper Armagnac, a subdivision of Gascony, in the government of Guyenne, and Gascony, in France.

BARTEN, one of the capital bailiwicks belonging to the circle of Rastenburg, in the kingdom of Prussia. It contains a country uncommonly pleasant; for which reason several of the principal families have built themselves seats here. The eight churches in its district are under the inspection of the archdeacon of Rastenburg. Among other towns it comprehends the little town of BARTEN, which is well-built, and has a beautiful castle, erected about the middle of the 14th century, upon the Liebe. It was sometimes the residence of the bishops of Pomesan, and knights of the Teutonic order.

BARTENLAND, a country formerly so called, in the circle of Brandenburg, belonging to the kingdom of Prussia, in which lies the capital bailiwick of Prussian Eylau. The 16 churches of the latter, and of the capital bailiwick of Bartenstein, are under the inspection of the archdeacon of Bartenstein.

BARTENSTEIN, a capital bailiwick which belonged to the ancient Bartenland. In it is BARTENSTEIN, the most regular and best town of all Natangia, and situated in a pleasant country, on the Alle. It has the precedency, and holds the first rank among all the Prussian towns. Its old castle, which was built by the knights of the Teutonic order, about the middle of the 13th century, has formerly stood out several assaults from the enemy. Here is an archdeacon. See BARTENLAND.

BARTFA, BARTHFELD, or BARDIOW, a royal free town belonging to the province of Saros, and circle on this side the Theiss, in Upper Hungary. It lies at the foot of the Carpathian mountains, and drives a considerable trade in wine towards Poland.

BARTHOLOMEW-ISLES, a parcel of small islands in the South Sea, not far from the Hebrides.

BARTHOLOMEW, (Isle of), St. one of the Lesser Caribbees, in the Atlantic ocean, 20 miles N. of St. Christopher's, and 30 N.E. from Saba. It is reckoned to be about 5 leagues in circuit, but has little ground fit for culture. It produces tobacco and cassava; and is covered with trees, among which are some excellent ones, highly valued; as, the soup or aloes tree, the calabash tree, the canapia tree, which bears a flower of five leaves, that close at last in the form of a cherry, with a white pulp and yellow juice. It blossoms in October and December, and has ripe fruit the two following months. Upon a fire being made about the tree, it yields plentifully a pleasant gum used in physic as an aperient. The parotane tree, whose boughs grow downwards; and, being plaited thick together, serves sometimes for bulwarks. Under these lie the wild hogs; and on the banks near the rocks are sea-trees, whose boughs are surprisingly plaited together, and look as if they were glazed.

On the shore are found the fish called the sea-star and sea-apple. Here is a vast variety of birds, and a particular kind of lime-stone exported to the adjacent islands. The inhabitants have no fresh water but what rain they save in cisterns, of which every house has one or more. The island is encompassed with so many rocks that it proves dangerous for ships of burthen to approach it.

Poincy, the French governor general, peopled it at his own charges, in the year 1648. But Sir Timothy Thornhill took and plundered it in 1689, after beating the French from their works, and a fortification of the extent of two acres of land, encompassed with a double row of palisades 6 feet high, the intervals being filled with earth, and a wide trench without, and well-manned. After burning many of the houses, Sir Timothy carried off about 700 people with their cattle and goods, the men to Nevis, and the women and children to St. Christopher's. The inhabitants were afterwards allowed to return, but under an English governor, who kept it in the king of England's name. Yet by the peace of Ryswick it was restored to the French. But in 1746, the English, in two privateers of Antigua, suddenly attacking the French, took 300 negroes and about 400 white people prisoners, 140 of which were able to bear arms. In the island is a good harbour well fortified, from which the French greatly annoyed our trade. In 1763, at the peace of Paris, it was restored to the French, but was taken again by the British forces, March 15, 1781. This island is besides considerable for lignum-vitæ, and that fort called iron-wood. It lies in lat. 18, 6; N. Long. 62, 15, W.

BARTON, a place about 12 miles from Liverpool in Lancashire, where is a remarkable salt spring, proceeding from some rock of salt, and not from the sea; as it has been proved by experiment, that a quart of sea-water will yield but an ounce and an half of salt: whereas the same quantity of this spring produces near half a pound of a good, white, and granulated salt. See BURTON.

BARTON, a mean straggling town in Yarborough Wapentake, and Lindsey division, in the N. of Lincolnshire. It is situated on the S. shore of the Humber; over which is, at this place, a sorry and dangerous passage to Hull in an open ferry-boat, in which sometimes 15 horses, 10 or 12 cows, intermingling with 17 or 18 passengers, are tossed about four hours, more or less, on the Humber, before they can get to the harbour at Hull. It lies 25 miles N. of Lincoln, and 140 of London. Fair, Trinity-Thursd. Market on Monday.

BARTON UPON NEEDWOOD, Staffordshire, so called by reason of its situation upon that forest near Whitchnor. There is a chapel here in the form of Henry VIIIth's at Westminster. Fairs May 3, and November 8.

BARUTH, a market-town lying on the water of Lobau, about half a German mile from Weissemburg, in Lusatia; in a spot remarkably fertile, and called the Golden Meadow. Here is a well-built citadel, and some fairs held; and the town belongs to the family of Gersdorf.

BARUTH, an ancient town of Turkey in Syria, with a Christian church of the Nestorian persuasion. It is situated in a fine fertile soil, but is inconsiderable now to what it was formerly. E. Long. 34, 20. N. Lat. 33, 30.

BARWALD, a district containing many villages, inhabited by Lutherans, in Marienburg, Poland.

BARWICK. See BERWICK.

BAS, an island belonging to the bishopric of Quimper, or Cornouaille, a subdivision of Lower Britany, in the government of the latter name, in France. It lies opposite to Roscof, and forms an excellent road. Lat. 48, 50. Long. 4, W.

BASADOIS, in Latin Ager Vasatensis, a territory of Gascony, in the government of the latter name, and Guyenne, in France. It takes its name from the Vasati or Basati. The middle part of this country is sandy. It is bounded by Guyenne Proper on the N. and W. the Landes on the S. and Agenois with Condomois on the E. It is generally fertile in corn, wine, and fruit.

BASARTSCHICK, a town belonging to the sangiacate of Kirkeli, and province of Romania, in European Turkey. It is much cried up by the Turks, and situated on the river Maritz, into which another stream falls that runs round the town. It is altogether well-built, has pretty broad and clean streets, carries on a considerable trade, and lies in a delightful country. Here also are several baths. Lat. 41, 49, N. Long. 24, 40, E.

BASAS, in Latin Vasatium, anciently Cossium and Civitas Vasatica; the capital of Basadois, a territory of Gascony, in the government of this last name, and Guyenne, in France. It stands on a mountain; the foot of which is washed by the little river Lavasane, and is the seat of a prevoté, country bailiwick, a provincial, and royal jurisdiction. Its bishop is under the metropolitan of Auch, has a diocese containing 234 parishes, and 37 chapels of ease, with an income of 18,006 livres a year; and he pays an assessment of 600 florins to the court of Rome. Besides the cathedral, here are three parish-churches and a college. It lies about 8 miles from the Garonne, and 30 S. of Bourdeaux. Lat. 44, 20, N. Long. 25, W. See BAZA.

BASCARA, a little town belonging to Catalonia in Spain. It is situated on the river Fluvia.

BASHAN. See ARGOB.

BASIL,

B A

BASIL, bishopric of, though reckoned a part of the Franche Comte, is situated in the circle of the Upper Rhine, in Germany. Its bishop is a prince of the empire, whose diocese is part of the ancient territory of the Rauraci, being situated between France and Switzerland. It is bounded by Sundgane Proper on the N. by Franche Comte on the W. and by the cantons of Basil, Berne, and Solothurn, on the S. and E. It is an ally of the Swissers, and divided into two parts; namely, Elsgaw, which is the largest, and the Free-mountains. It extends about 30 miles from E. to W. and 33 from N. to S. It abounds with corn, wine, fruit, wood, meadow and pasture grounds. The lake Biel yields store of a kind of fish, called hourlings, which, when salted, are sold at a good price. The bishop's lands consist of the bailiwics of Porentru, Biederthan, Florimont, &c. The towns of principal note are only four; namely, Porentru, and Delmont, in both which the bishop has seats, Bienne, and Arlesheim. The inhabitants of the bishopric of Basil speak broken German, and are composed of Papists and Protestants; but the latter are more numerous.

BASIL, (Canton), is not properly within the limits of ancient Switzerland, but includes the country of the Rauraci, who even in Cæsar's time were allies of the Helvetians. It is bounded by the canton of Solothurn on the S. by the Brisgaw belonging to the empire, and the territory of Rhinfelden, a forest town, on the E. and by Alsace on the W. It advances on the territories of Germany beyond the Rhine, and is bounded by the Brisgaw on the N. Its extent from N. to S. is about 24 miles, and from E. to W. 21. It is entirely Protestant, containing only 30 parishes, and 6 bailiwics, from which each bailiff receives 1000 or 1200 livres per annum. This is a pleasant, rich, and fruitful country in all the necessities of life; it produces also for exportation, excellent corn and wine, particularly about the city of Basil, the neighbourhood of which consists of a fine level tract reaching to Mount Jura. The air is salubrious and temperate, though the country be much exposed to the northern winds. The inhabitants are tall, proper, and well-set men, being ingenious, sincere, courteous, cheerful yet grave, and live amicably with one another. The men mostly wear the French dress, as do the greatest part of their women. Their language is High-Dutch, though the French is also much used. The revenues of the Canton principally arise from secularized abbeyes, their bailiwics, and the imposts laid on goods carried through their country, to and from France, Germany, and Italy. Their chief strength lies in the wealth and number of inhabitants in the city of Basil; exclusive of which they can raise only 4000 men.

BASIL, or BALE, as the French call it, which is the capital, stands on the Rhine, upon the con-

finis of Alsace and the empire. In Latin it is called Basilea, from the mother of Julian the Apostate. It had its rise from the ruins of Augusta Rauracorum; some vestiges of which are still to be seen near Aust, a village 7 miles to the E. It was a Roman colony erected by Augustus, and much enlarged afterwards. It is reckoned the largest of all the towns in Switzerland, having 220 streets, 6 market-places, and 99 wells. Its situation is uneven, most of the streets being crooked and paved with sharp stones, which however is designed for the surer footing of the horses that carry loads uphill. This city has at different times suffered greatly by fire, inundations and earthquakes; particularly the latter in the year 1356, when it was almost ruined; but it recovered itself in 1431, when the famous council, consisting of but few members, was held here, in the vestry of the cathedral, which lasted 17 years, in which Pope Eugenius IV. was deposed, and Æneas Sylvius its bishop declared it was preferable to Ferrara or Florence; and, when he came hither in 1460, being pope, by the name of Pius II. he established a university in Basil, with very ample privileges; and to it belongs a noble library of 16,000 volumes, besides MSS. among which is the library of Erasmus, who died here in 1536.

This city was formerly subject to the landgraves of Alsace, but made imperial about the close of the 14th century, yet was not quite independent on the empire till the treaty of Munster in 1648. It was formerly an episcopal see, under that of Basle. But since the reformation, the bishop has been obliged to reside at Porentru near Upper Alsace, the Protestants styling him bishop of the former place. But though he still retains the sovereignty of a considerable part of the bishopric, he has no jurisdiction in the city of Basil. And though he comes once a year to receive the money, which this city is bound to pay him in lieu of his rights, he must be gone as soon as he receives it; the city is also independent of the canton. Trade, especially that in ribands, still continues to flourish at Basil, 6 or 8 factories sending each (to the value of 30 or 40,000 guilders of that commodity annually to the Franckfort fair. Most of the offices here are bestowed by lot, and none but qualified persons admitted to be candidates. There is a proper alternation in the lucrative posts: so that a person seldom holds a place above three years. No person without the city is to wear gold or silver lace, under the penalty of three guilders. All unmarried women are prohibited silk clothes.

The bridge over the Rhine, which is all of wood, except six piers of stone, next the little town, is 250 common paces in length. The city on the German side of the Rhine is called the lesser town, has its own jurisdiction, but in subordination to the great town; and its privileges have been considerably abridged, on account of their having declared formerly for the house of Austria. The little town has no fortifications, and those of the great town are of no importance, its principal strength consisting in its union with the Swiss cantons. St. Peter's square, with its row of limes, is the best walk in the great town. The cathedral is an old building, with two towers. Among the tombs here of eminent personages, is that of the celebrated Erasmus; the inscription on which is verbose, but not very elegant.

The government of the city is aristocratical, and divided into 15 trading companies, from which are chosen the members of the great and little council; the former having no power, and is only assembled on extraordinary occasions, when the little council thinks proper to communicate any matter of importance to it. Two burg-masters govern by turns. From the bridge, the greater town, which stands on a rising ground, looks like an amphitheatre: and both can raise 3000 men; and, when joined together, form near one half of the state. On the Rhine are 31 mills, 21 of which are for corn, and 6 for making paper; which art, at least with regard to ordinary paper, is said to have been first invented here, in 1417, by Antony and Michael Gallicion. The town-house, not far from the cathedral, is an ancient fabric, adorned with fine paintings, mostly by Holbein, who was a native of this city. The great town, which is 7 miles and a half in circuit, has 9 or 10 churches, and 7 or 8 convents, but for no other uses than to harbour monks. The little town, which is two or three miles round, has four churches and three convents. The clocks in the city of Basil are always an hour faster than those of the country: the reason for which is variously told; among others, it is said, that it was in order to bring the fathers of the famous council, which sat here, earlier together, for the quicker dispatch of business: however the custom still continues. The salmon come up to this part of the Rhine to spawn, and bits of gold are now and then found in this neighbourhood; which shew mines of gold to be somewhere near this river, but hitherto undiscovered.

About a quarter of a league without the city is a lazaret-house, with a church on the spot, where, in 1444, about 1600 Swiss fought for 10 hours with 30,000 French under the dauphin; the former of which were all killed, except 16, but not before they had slaughtered 6000 of their enemies. The princes of Baden Dourlach have a palace in Basil, with a large collection of curiosities. Fort Hunningen, built by the French in the last century, is so near Basil, as to cannonade each other. It lies 40 miles S. of Strasburg, Lat. 47, 56, N. Long. 7, 40, E.

VOL. I.—No. 20.

BASILICATE, or BASILICATA, a province belonging to the kingdom of Naples, in the lower division of Italy. It is partly surrounded by the Appenine mountains, and formerly comprehended the greater and better part of the ancient Lucania, as also some part of Calabria. It is bounded by the Capitate on the N. by the gulph of Tarentum, and part of Bari, on the E. and by the two principates on the W. Its length from N. to S. is about 66 miles, and its breadth from E. to W. about 50. The Appenines in this province divide themselves near Venosa into two principal arms, both which terminate at the sea. This country, though mountainous, is very fertile in corn, wine, oil, saffron, cotton, honey, wax, fruits, &c. And along its coasts are found pearls, though neither large nor fair. Notwithstanding the goodness of the soil, the Basilicate is at present neither well peopled nor well cultivated; on which accounts the greatest part of it would be looked upon as naturally barren, had it not been formerly famed for its fertility.

BASILIGOROD, a town of the Russian empire, in the Muscovite Tartary, seated on the right side of the river Wolga, at its confluence with the Sura.

BASILIPOTAMO, i. e. the royal river; the present name of the ancient Eurotas, a river of the Morea, in European Turkey. It discharges itself into the Golfo de Calochina.

BASILUZO, anciently Insula Herculis, one of the little islands lying round that of Sicily, in the lower division of Italy.

BASINGSTOKE, a large and populous market-town in the N. part of Hampshire, 16 miles N. E. of Winchester, and 48 from London; from whence it is a great thoroughfare to the west. It is a large populous town, with a great market for all sorts of corn, especially barley, here being a great trade in malt, as there is also in druggets, shalloons, &c. It is a mayor-town, with a recorder, 7 aldermen, 7 capital burgesses, &c. Besides the church here was a very neat chapel, now ruinous; the roof of it was adorned with the history of the holy prophets, apostles, and disciples of Christ. Near it is a free-school; besides which here are 3 charity-schools, in one whereof 12 boys are taught, clothed, and maintained by the Skinners company in London. The adjacent country, though surrounded with woods, is rich in pasture, and sprinkled with fine houses, and a brook runs by the town, which has plenty of trout. Its fairs are Wednesday in Whitsun-week, and October 10. Market on Wednesday.

BASINGSTOKE Downs, Hampshire, has a fair on Easter-Tuesday, and September 16.

BASKIRA, or BASKIRI, a territory of Russian Tartary, in Europe. It is bounded on the N. by part of Bulgaria and Tumean Tartary; on the E.

B A

it is separated from that part of Great Tartary called Albi, and Kalmaki, by a ridge of mountains extending quite to the White sea; on the S. by another ridge called Gertora: and on the W. by part of Bulgaria, from which it is divided by some mountains which produce iron, crystal and other fine stones. In this country is Mount Albater, from which rise the rivulets Vye and Loskama; which, uniting some leagues afterwards, forms the river Tobol, which runs into Siberia, and gives name to the city and territory of Tobolskoi.

BASKIRIANS, or BASKIRS, and Ufiskoi Tartars, a people inhabiting the western and southern parts of Asiatic Russia. They are included in the government of Casan. The former dwell towards the W. between the river Kama, the Uralskoi mountains, and the Wolga; the latter principally in the northern parts. They live promiscuous, and intermarry together. They are strong-bodied and tall men, have a broad brownish visage, black hair, and long beard. Their dress is not unlike that of the Russians. They yield good horsemen, are warlike, and very expert at the bow and arrow. With regard to their religion, they may rather be reckoned Pagans than Mahometans, from the latter of which they have only retained circumcision and some other rites. Some of them have been brought to profess the religion of the Greek church. They dwell in villages, and support themselves by breeding of cattle, hunting, and agriculture. They have no want of honey and other wild productions. They thresh their corn in the open fields, and so carry it home. They pay their tribute from the produce of the lands, namely, corn, wax, honey, horned cattle, and pelletory. They have abundance of swine; but they eat none of them. Besides horses, they use also the two-bunched camel. They take as many wives as they can maintain; and they truck these for horses: so that frequently six or seven are given for one woman. Not only the Baskirians, but likewise the Tartars, have several times revolted from Russia, and the last insurrection was in the year 1735: but they were soon reduced to obedience again. And whenever they design any new enterprize, a particular judge from among the principal inhabitants is appointed in every district or bailiwick, and an overseer of the Russian nation set over each village: so that no future rising is readily apprehended; as at the same time they are curbed and overawed by several fortresses now erected in their country.

BASMOE, a place of Borresyssel, one of the districts belonging to Christiana diocese, in Norway. It is fortified both by nature and art, and is a pass into the Swedish frontiers.

BASOCHE, a barony of Le Perche Gouet, belonging to Lower Orleans, in the government of the latter name, in France.

B A

BASQUE, or BASQUES, the S. W. division of the government of Galcony, in France, upon the Bay of Biscay, and confines of Spain, as far as the river Bidassoa.

BASS, an island within the mouth of the frith of Forth, in Fifeshire, Scotland; about a mile from the S. shore of East Lothian, and opposite to the remains of Tantallon castle, on the N. shore. It is inaccessible every way, except by one narrow passage, which only a single person can pass at a time, and that not without the help of a cable or crane. At the top of that passage was a fort; but neglected since the Revolution. It was but slightly fortified; rather to prevent its being made a retreat for pirates, than for any use it could be of to command the sea, the entrance of the frith being so wide, that ships can go in and out without the least annoyance from the Bafs. The whole island is a mile in circuit. In the times of king Charles II. and his brother James II. it was a sort of state-prison for the western people called Cameronians, particularly those Presbyterians who had been in arms at Bothwell-brigg against the government. After the Revolution a desperate crew got possession of it; and having a boat, which they hoisted up on the rock or let down at pleasure, took a great many coasting vessels; and held out the last of any place in Britain for king James. But their boat being either seized or lost, and for want of the usual supplies from France, they were obliged to surrender.

The Solan geese are the principal inhabitants of this island; a fowl which is found no where in Britain except here, in some of the lesser Orkney isles, and that of Ailsy in the mouth of Clyde. They come periodically, as the swallows and woodcocks do. They mostly feed on herrings, and therefore come just before or with them, and go away with them also; though they do not follow the shoals, going all away northward; but whither is not known. The neighbouring inhabitants make a great profit both of the flesh and feathers of their young, which are taken from their nests by a person let down the rock by means of a rope. At the top of the Bafs is a fresh-water spring, with a small warren for rabbits; and on it is pasturage for about thirty sheep; but the soil at the bottom of it is almost worn through by the violence of the sea. It was purchased by king Charles II. Besides the Solan geese, here are incredible flocks of other fowl; so that, in May and June, the surface of the island is almost covered with their nests, eggs, and young. The Bafs rises very high above the sea, in the form of a cone. It lies forty-five miles E. of Edinburgh. Lat. 56, 3, N. Long. 2, 20, W.

BASS, (La,) a town of French Flanders, on the river Lender, and on the frontiers of Artois. Lat. 24, 5, N. Long. 51, 5, E.

BASS

B A

BASS-ISLE, or ISLE DE BAS, on the coast of Brittany, France, between Morlaix and Ushant, N. of Pol de Leon, surrounded by rocks and shoals.

Bass-isle is about 3 miles in length from east to west, and 1 mile in breadth, being separated from the land by a narrow channel, at the eastern end of which lies Roscou, or Roscof, a small harbour, which some years ago was made, by the French government, a kind of free port for the exportation of rum from their colonies, which is here deposited and sold to our smugglers. You may enter that harbour by the two ends of the channel; but the shore of the island is encumbered with a multitude of rocks above or under water, which render the passage difficult.

BASSAC, the name of a mountain in Persia, somewhere between the city Lar and Bander Congo, on which the way is so bad and full of precipices, that there is no riding it, and took up Gemelli and his company (as he acquaints us) twelve hours in passing but ten miles.

BASSAM, (Grand,) a town of Guinea Proper, in Africa. It is situated at the mouth of the river Sueira da Costa.

BASSAIM. See Bacaim.

BASSANO, a little town, or large village, of La Marca Trevigiana, one of the provinces belonging to the republic of Venice, in Upper Italy. It is situated on the Brento. Here is a podestaria, to whose jurisdiction twelve villages are subject, which gives the name of Bassanese to the neighbouring territory. Between it and the Alps are several hilly grounds, famous for their fertility, particularly in exquisite wines. In Bassano a great deal of silk is wrought and manufactured.

BASSE-TERRE, a part of the (Caribbee) island of St. Christopher's, in possession of the French till yielded to Great-Britain by the peace of Utrecht, 1713. It is the chief town of the island, built by the French under the cannon of their fort. The houses are of good brick, freestone, and carpenter's work, with a town-house, hospital, and large church. The castle stands on the east side of a high mountain shaded with trees, always verdant, half a French league from sea. It is built of brick and freestone three stories high, has noble halls and apartments wainscotted with cedar, and a fine prospect of plantations of sugar and ginger, and a long walk of orange and lemon trees, leading to a large court, before it. It is defended by five sconces mounted with cannon, has a chapel, and great stone cisterns into which water is brought by pipes under ground. The town and fort both stand on a cape, which has a bay on each side fit for shipping. It is eight miles S. from Cayenne or Chiann.

BASSE-TERRE, in Guadalupe. See GUADALOUPE.

BASSEE, a little town belonging to the Quartier la Wepe, and castellany of Lisle, in the government of French Flanders. It is situated on the Deule, and formerly it was fortified.

BASSETER. See BASSETERRE.

BASSIGNI, a bailiwick of Barrois, in the government of Lorraine and Bar, belonging to France. It only comprehends a part of the territory so called, the other part being in the government of Champagne. It consists of six districts or jurisdictions; namely, the prevoté of Gondrecourt, the provincial bailiwicks of La Motte and Bourmont, the prevotes of La Marche, Chatillon, and Conflans; with the lordships of St. Thieboud.

BASSINGTHWAITE-LAKE, in Cumberland, 5 miles N. of Keswick, in the road to Cockermouth, remarkable for its beautiful prospect, being surrounded by mountains piled on mountains; which form an awful circle, and seems to shut it in from all the rest of the world.

BASSORA, a city of Arabia Deserta, in the province of Eyraca Arabic, Asia, stands about 250 miles S. E. from Bagdad, and about 240 S. W. from Isfahan, in lat. 30, and E. long. 57, on the frontiers of Persia, about half a league from the Euphrates (which the Arabs call Scetel Areb, or the Arabic river) and on the confluence of that and the Tigris into the Persian Gulph. It is a modern city, built by order of Omar, the second caliph, in 636, to cut off the communication of the Persians with India. It is large and opulent, 12 miles in circumference, but hath nothing extraordinary in its buildings, public or private. It stands on such a sandy and stony ground that there grows nothing about it, especially as it never rains there. But there is a small river pretty near it which enriches the valley through which it passes to such a degree, that the Arabs make it one of the four Paradises of the East. And the inhabitants are supplied with water from the Euphrates by a canal able to carry vessels of 50 tons. It has a fortress at the mouth of it, to prevent strangers coming into it without leave. It stands about 45 miles from sea, but the tide rises near as much again above it quite to the castle of Gorno.

The whole country about it lies so low, that if it was not for a stout dike or bank, which extends all along the coast, it would be in danger of being laid under water. It is between 3 and 4 miles long, 12 miles in circumference, and built of large square stones, so well cemented that the water cannot affect it, though the sea runs somewhat strong, it being at the very end of the Persian Gulph. This city hath undergone many changes and revolutions, and was taken from the Arabs by the Turks about 100 years ago; but they at length shook off the Turkish yoke, and a lord of the country made himself absolute master of the place. Since that time Cha-Abas, king of Persia, having taken Ormus, sent Iman-Couli-Can to besiege Bassora; but the the prince who then commanded in it hired some of the Arabs of this province to go and break the dike, which let in the sea with such force that the besiegers had like to have been all destroyed, so that the siege was immediately raised. This city is however under the Turkish dominion, though governed by a cadi appointed by the prince. This prince gives full liberty to all nations and sects to come and trade to this capital; where they are so civilly used, and so good an order kept, that one may go safe through the streets at all hours of the night. The circumjacent track is looked upon by the Arabs to be one of the most delightful spots in Asia, and even as one of the most beautiful gardens in the world: however, the hot winds that frequently blow there are very troublesome to travellers, and sometimes overwhelm them with sand driven by the force of these winds out of the neighbouring deserts. The city is inhabited by Jacobites, Nestorians, Jews, Mahometans, and Chaldean Christians, commonly called Christians of St. John, which last are pretty numerous here.

The abbé Raynal values the merchandise annually brought to Bassora at 525,000*l.* of which the English furnish 175,000*l.* the Dutch 87,500*l.* and the Moors, Banians, Armenians, and Arabs, furnish the remainder. "The cargoes of these nations (says he) consist of rice; sugar; plain, striped, and flowered muslins from Bengal; spices from Ceylon and the Molucca islands; coarse, white, and blue cottons from Coromandel; cardamum, pepper, sanders-wood, from Malabar; gold and silver stuffs, turbans, shawls, indigo, from Surat; pearls from Baharen, and coffee from Mocha; iron, lead, and woollen-cloth, from Europe. Other articles of less consequence are imported from different places. Some of these commodities are shipped on board small Arabian vessels; but the greater part is brought by European ships, which have the advantage of a considerable freight.

"This merchandise is sold for ready money; and passes through the hands of the Greeks, Jews, and Armenians. The Banians are employed in changing the coin current at Bassora, for that which is of higher value in India. The different commodities collected at Bassora are distributed into three channels. One half of them goes to Persia, whither they are conveyed by the caravans; there being no navigable river in the whole empire. The chief consumption is in the northern provinces, which have not been so much ravaged as those of the south. Both of them formerly made their payments in precious stones, which were become common by the plunder of India. They had afterwards recourse to copper utensils, which had been exceedingly multiplied from the great abundance of copper mines. At last they gave gold and silver in exchange, which had been concealed during a long scene of tyranny, and are continually dug out of the bowels of the earth. If they do not allow time for the trees that produce gum, and have been cut to make fresh shoots; if they neglect to multiply the breed of goats which afford such fine wool; and if the silks, which are hardly sufficient to supply the few manufactures remaining in Persia, continue to be so scarce: in a word, if this empire does not rise again from its ashes; the mines will be exhausted, and this source of commerce must be given up."

BASSY, (Port), in Negroland, Africa, is about 22 leagues above Yamyaconda; and Bassy-town lies about 6 leagues to the south of the port.

BASTI, a town of the province of Bætica in Spain, situated to the west of the Campus Spartarius. Now Baca in Granada. See BACA.

BASTIA, a sea-port town of Albania in Turkey in Europe, over against the island of Corfu, at the mouth of the river Calamu. E. long. 10, 35. N. lat. 39, 40.

BASTIA, a little town of Modenese Proper, in Upper Italy. It is pleasantly situated on an island formed by the river Panaro, about 16 miles below the city of Modena.

BASTIA, the capital of the island of Corsica, (see CORSIKA), in the division of it on this side the mountains, in Upper Italy, and on the N. E. part, upon the sea, on the site of the ancient Mantinum. It was the seat of the Genoese governor, has a good harbour, and is defended by a strong castle. Here also resides the bishop of Mariana Destrutta: and they have likewise at Bastia an academy of the fine arts. The malecontents of Corsica have made several attempts on this city, for which reason it was provided with a strong Genoese garrison. In 1745 it was bombarded by the English, very much damaged; and, after taking it, given to the Corsicans, who were driven out again by the inhabitants in the year 1746. It was besieged by the Austrians and Piemontese in 1748; but defended itself so valiantly, that the besiegers were obliged to retire. Terra Vecchia is a suburb of Bastia. It lies 7 miles E. of San Florentino, and 120 S. of Genoa. Lat. 42, 20, N. Long. 9, 40, E.

BASTIADA, a little town of Old Castile in Spain.

BASTICK, or BASTIA, a sea-port of Turkey in Europe, near the island of Corfu, and subject to the grand signior. Lat. 38, 42, N. Long. 45, 5, E.

BASTIDE de Seron, a very little town of Upper Foix, in the earldom and government of the latter name, in France. It stands high.

BASTIDE de Clarence, a little town belonging to the district of Amix, and kingdom of Lower Navarre, in the government of this last name and Bearn, in France. It was built in the year 1306.

BATAVIA in the EAST INDIES.

half a mile from the coast of Darien, in South America, and a little to the E. of Porto Bello. They are famous for a British fleet under the late Admiral Hoffer continuing so long before them, in a state of inaction. These islands are mostly high, one of them being peaked, and all clothed with woods. Upon one of them, part of which is a sandy bay, and a good riding and landing-place, is a spring of very good water: and all together form an excellent harbour between them and the isthmus, the bottom of which affords good anchorage. It is safe coming in with the sea-wind, between the most easterly island and the next to it; and also going out with the land wind the same way, this being the principal passage. Further W. before one comes to Porto Bello, lie two small islands, which are flat and without either wood or water. They are pretty close together, the soil is sandy, and they are surrounded with rocks, particularly towards the sea. Between these and the isthmus is a very narrow channel, not fit for ships to enter.

* BASTIOGNE, or BASTOGNE, in Latin Bastonia, or Bellonaneum, a town of Luxemburg, in the Austrian Netherlands, and county of Chiny, near the forest of Ardenne, twenty-eight miles N. W. of the city of Luxemburg. It is the seat of a provostship, containing 145 villages in its district; and the birth-place of John Beck, who, from a messenger, was made captain-general and governor of Luxemburg. Lat. 50, 5, N. Long. 5, 26, E.

BASTION DE FRANCE, a fortress on the Barbary coast, and kingdom of Tunis, in Africa. It lies eighty miles W. of the city of Tunis. Lat. 36, 30, N. Long. 8, 5, E.

BASVILLE, a sea-port town of the island of Martinico, built by the French.

BATA, or BATA-SZEK, a handsome town belonging to the county of Tolna, and circle beyond the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It is situated in a fruitful country, and united with a rich abbey of St. Michael the Archangel.

BATACALA, or MATACELO, a small East Indian island, on the N. E. side of that of Ceylon, and sixty S. E. from Trinque-male. On it is a sort of about two leagues in circuit, and three within the mouth of the river bearing its name. It was the first place taken from the Portuguese by the Dutch, who here made an alliance with the emperor of Ceylon, and fortified the place with high stone walls and three bastions. It lies 160 miles N. E. of Colombo. Lat. 8, 2, N. 81, 3, E.

BATALHA, or BETALHA, a town belonging to the district of Leiria, in Portuguese Estremadura. It contains upwards of 1800 inhabitants, and the best built church in the kingdom, said to be finished by some English architects. Some Portuguese kings lie buried here.

BATAN, one of the many valleys belonging to the kingdom of Navarre in Spain.

BATANGAS-BAY, in Manila, inhabited round about by Indians; near the point whereof is a small island called la Caza, as abounding in game.

BATAVA, (Castra understood) a citadel of Vindelicia, so called from the Cohors Batava, in garrison under the commander in Rhætia; now Paffau; being first called Batau, from the Batavi; then Bassau, and Paffau; situated in Bavaria at the confluence of the Danube, Inn, and Ills. See PASSAU.

BATAVI, the ancient inhabitants of Holland, mentioned in Cæsar's Commentaries, who were friends and allies to the Romans. The modern Hollanders also retain the name of Batavi. This ancient people, in the time of Vitellius and Vespasian, carried on a very vigorous war under the command of their valiant leader Claudius Civilis. The modern Betaw or Betuwe, which is the general appellation of the quarter of Nimeguen belonging to Guelderland, one of the United Provinces, was the ancient Batavia, and the seat of the Batavi, who were part of the Catti. These leaving Austria (the towns of Battenburg and Batterhausen having some traces of their name) settled first here; and afterwards extended their limits over part of the track lying between the Waal and Maese. Their territories are supposed to have extended from Rhinberg in the duchy of Cleves, to Catwyck on the sea in Holland; which is probable, from Tacitus assigning them the ocean for their boundary upon one side: so that they possessed most of that called the isle of the Rhine; namely, part of South Holland, of the duchy of Guelderland and lordship of Utrecht, which was formerly inhabited both by the Batavi and Menapii.

BATAVIA, the capital of all the Dutch settlements in the East Indies, and center of their commerce in Asia. It is situated on the N. E. part of the island of Java, S. E. of Sumatra, and S. W. of Borneo. Here is the residence of their governor general, and council of the Indies. It has a most excellent harbour belonging to it. The Dutch at Batavia can now fit out so many ships that no European nation at that distance can cope with them: so powerful are they, and so numerous are the subjects and dominions dependent upon them. When they first came hither, which was in the year 1619, the place was only a village, in a flat country, with fenny grounds round it: but they have since made it a very beautiful city, built of white stone, having cut canals faced with stone, on the borders of which are evergreens planted, running all along the principal streets; so that the water of land-floods is carried off. About 17 or 18 small islands in the Offing so break the violence of the winds and waves that 1000 sail may ride safe thereat a time, besides small craft, which go into the river, and lie close in-shore fastened to piles. Two large large piers run out about half a mile into the sea, between which 100 slaves are constantly employed in taking up the mud and soil from the town, otherwise it would soon be choked up. Across the river below the town is a boom, which is shut up every night, and well guarded. Here all vessels pay toll. A sea-gale rises every morning about ten, to bring vessels into the bar; and a land-one about ten at night, to carry them out. The one comes from the N. and the other from the S.

The city is nearly square, being divided into two parts by a river, and is between five and six miles in circuit. The streets are spacious, exactly crossing each other alike; and over the canals are reckoned no less than 56 stone bridges, besides those of timber and draw-bridges. The buildings in general are neat, most of the houses having handsome gardens. The public structures are magnificent, particularly the governor's house, with a lofty turret, which may be seen a good way at sea. Here are several spacious market-places; and in the middle of the city is a large square, which serves as a parade for the garrison. On its W. side stands the great church, and on the S. the Stadthouse. The suburbs reach almost half a league into the country. Any inhabitant of Batavia permitting a stranger to sleep, though but for a single night, in his house, without an order, incurs a penalty of 500 dollars; the hotel being the only licensed lodging-house, the governor appoints the keeper of it. This hotel is the most superb building in the city, having more the air of a palace than an inn. All the streets of Batavia are well disposed, and having canals running through them, resemble the cities in Holland. Here the Chinese have their temples and burying-ground: and here live Malaysans, Javans, and other nations, which the Dutch have transported from Bauda, Amboyna, &c. The reformed Portuguese and Malaysans have each a church in Batavia; but neither Papists nor Lutherans are tolerated.

The city has four stately gates; namely, two on each side of the river, and it is surrounded with a good rampart faced with stone, as is also the curtain between its two bastions, and planted with cannon so contrived as to be equally serviceable against an invasion or insurrection, the guns being easily brought to point down the principal streets. On the W. side of the city is a large quadrangular fort, commanding both the town and road. There are also five very strong forts erected two or three leagues from the town, in order to defend the avenues against the incursions of the natives. The city may be so surrounded with water, that no approaches nor attacks can be formed against it in the ordinary way. In the islands of Omus and Onroft in the bay, and about two leagues from Batavia, are several good platforms of guns lying level with the water; they have also yards and docks for ships, with plenty of timber and other naval stores. This city is said to be the best supplied with flesh meat of any factory in the Indies, though the beef is generally lean, and the mutton dear.

The regular troops that garrison the city and neighbouring forts are 10 or 12,000; about 1000 of which mount guard every day. And these consist, 1. of Chinese, who are computed at no less than 80,000 under this government. 2. Dutch. 3. Reformed Malaysans. 4. Mahometans. 5. Amboynese. 6. Javanese, who are all Mahometans. 7. Topasses or Mardykens, who are a mixture of Indian and other nations. 8. The Bugasses and Macassars, descended from the ancient inhabitants of Macassar and the neighbouring islands. And, 9. the Timoreans, transported hither from the island of Timor, whose inhabitants were formerly barbarous Pagans; but many of them have turned Christians or Mahometans. The Dutch have in Batavia a spin-house, or house of correction; a pest-house, a house of artisans, and a Chinese-hospital for sick and old people. They have set up a printing-office, and founded schools for teaching the learned languages as well as the liberal arts. Most Indian languages are spoken here, though the Malayan and the bastard Portuguese are most in use: and these two serve a man in almost any part of this country. This city being the great magazine of the Dutch East India Company, they import hither not only what Europe affords, but the merchandise of Japan, the Spice-islands, Persia, Surat, Bengal, the coasts of Malabar and Coromandel, &c. Though they suffer no Europeans to trade hither, yet 15 or 20 sail of Chinese junks, from 300 to 500 tons apiece, come hither every November or December, and return the beginning of June: by which means the Dutch are furnished with the goods of China much cheaper than if they sent their fleets thither. All the other governments belonging to the Dutch East India Company, are not only subject to the governor-general and council at Batavia, but the following chief-ships and factories are immediately under their direction; namely Japan, Tonquin, Macassar, Siam, Bantam, Japara, Jambee, Pulambam, and Arrakan. The governor and his lady have their respective guards, and splendid equipage, like those of princes.

Every thing in Batavia being subject to a duty, the revenues of this government must be very considerable. Here, or in any part of Java, are few common servants, besides the slaves brought hither from almost every country of Asia. Crocodiles are so much dreaded here that the company give 30 florins for every one that is killed. That frequent disturbances arise from such a medley of different nations is not to be wondered at, considering that none of them are celebrated for their probity. A plot of the Javanese to destroy this whole colony was discovered but a few days before that fixed for the execution of it, namely, January 2, 1722; when the ringleader, with eighteen of his adherents, was put to death. A more dangerous plot contrived in 1740, by the Chinese, was frustrated by Governor Imhoff; when many thousands of that nation were massacred, and 635 of them committed to prison, were directly put to death. Batavia lies in lat. 6, 15, S. Long. 100, 50, E.

BATAVIA, the name of a river in the Terra Australis, first discovered by the Dutch, and situated in that part of it called Carpentaria, or Carpentier-landt.

BATAVORUM (Insula,) the island of the Batavians. Of this island Tacitus gives the following description. "The Rhine flowing in one channel, or only broken by small islands, is divided at its entering Batavia, as it were into two rivers. One continues its course through Germany, retaining the same name, and violent current, till it falls into the ocean. The other washing the coast of Gaul, with a broader and more gentle stream, is called by the inhabitants Vahalis; which name it soon changes for that of Mosæ, by the immense mouth of which river it discharges itself into the same ocean." According to Tacitus, therefore the island of the Batavians was bounded by the ocean, the Rhine, and the Vahalis, now the Waal. Cæsar extends it to the Mosæ, or Meuse; but Pliny agrees with Tacitus. However, this island was of greater extent in Tacitus's time than in Cæsar's; Drusus, the father of Germanicus, having by a new canal conveyed the waters of the Rhine into the ocean a considerable way north of the former mouth of that river. The Batavi were a branch of the Catti, who, in a domestic sedition, being expelled their country, occupied the extremity of the coast of Gaul, at that time uninhabited, together with this island situated among shoals. Their name Batavi they carried with them from Germany; there being some towns in the territory of the Catti called Battenberg and Battenhausen. The bravery of the Batavi, especially the horse, procured them not only great honour from the Romans, being called their brothers and friends, but an exemption from taxes, being obliged only to furnish men and arms. The modern name of this island is Betu or Betaw.

BATTLE, a people of Germany, formerly inhabitants of what is now called Hesse. Being dissatisfied with their situation there, they settled on the island formed by the Vahalis and Rhine, which from them took the name of Batavia, or Batavorum Insula. Their government was a mixture of monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy. Their chief was, properly speaking, nothing more than a principal citizen, whose business was rather to advise than to command. The principal men who exercised jurisdiction and commanded the troops, in their respective districts, were chosen, as well as the kings, in an assembly of the people. A hundred persons selected from among the people presided over every county, and acted as chiefs in the different hamlets. The whole nation was, in some measure, an army always in readiness. Each family composed a body of militia, which served under a captain of their own choosing.

BATENBURG, or BATTENBURG, in Latia Batenburgum, Arx Batavorum, and anciently Batavodorum, a small city of Guelderland, one of the seven United Provinces. It is the seat of a little district called Maes and Waal, as lying between those two rivers, near their confluence. It gives title of baron. And two brothers, barons of Battenburg, were beheaded at Brussels in 1596, by the Duke of Alva's orders. It lies on the N. shore of the Maes, ten miles from Nimègue, towards the S. W. and nearly opposite Ravenstein. Lat. 50, 45, N. Long. 5, 35, E.

BATH, a city of Somersetshire, in England, seated in W. long. 2, 30. N. lat. 51, 27. All the different names that this city has borne in different ages and languages have been taken from its medicinal waters, as the aquæ solis, or "waters of the sun," of Antoninus; the Cæsar Baden, and Cæsar Ennant, i. e. "the city of baths," and "the city of ointment," of the Britons; and the Ackman-chaster, i. e. "the city of valetudinarians," of the Saxons. The baths consist of the king's-bath, the queen's-bath, the cross-bath, the hot-bath, the leper's-bath, and the duke of Kingston's bath. This place was of old a resort only for cripples and diseased persons; but now it is more frequented by the sound for pleasure than by the sick for health. The waters are very pleasant to the taste; and impregnated with a vitriolic principle, yielding, upon evaporation, a little neutral salt, and a calcareous earth and iron. They are very efficacious in strengthening the bowels and stomach, bracing the relaxed fibres, and invigorating the circulation. In bilious complaints they are counted specific; and and prove serviceable in most nervous, paralytic, rheumatic, and gouty complaints. At the king's-bath is a handsome pump-room, where the gentlemen and ladies go in a morning to drink the waters; and there is a band of music that plays all the time. In the cross-bath is a monument of marble, representing the descent of the Holy Ghost attended by angels, erected by the earl of Melfort (who was secretary of state for Scotland) when king James II. met his queen here. The king's-bath is a large basin of 65 feet 10 inches by 40 feet 10 inches, containing 346 tuns, 2 hogshheads, and 36 gallons of water when filled to its its usual height. In the middle is a wooden building with niches and seats for the accommodation of the bathers. There are also iron rings all round for them to hold by; and guides, both male and female, to attend them in the bath. The person intending to bathe puts on, at his own lodgings, a bathing dress of brown canvas hired for the purpose; and is carried in a close chair, of a particular make, to one of the slips which open into the bath. There he descends by steps into the water, where he is attended by a guide. Having staid his stated time in the bath, he ascends again into the slip, where he puts off his bathing-dress, and being wrapt up in blankets, is carried home to bed, where he lies for some time to encourage perspiration. The King's-bath is overlooked by the company in the pump-room; and adjoining to it are places furnished with pumps to pour the hot streams on any particular part of the body. The Queen's-bath communicates with the King's, from which it is filled; therefore the water of it is not so hot, being at a greater distance from the source. As the heat is here more moderate, the bathers descend first into the Queen's-bath, and advance gradually to the center of the other.

In the year 1755, the abbey-house, or priory, belonging to the duke of Kingston, was taken down, in order to erect a more commodious pile of building; and in digging for the foundation, the workmen discovered, about 20 feet below the surface of the earth, the remains of Roman baths and sudatories constructed upon an elegant plan, with floors suspended on pillars, and surrounded with tubulated bricks, for the conveyance of heat and vapour. These were supplied by a spring of hot water, of the same properties and temperature with those of the King's-bath; and the sewer was found still entire, that conveyed the waste water into the river. The duke, having cleared the spring and the sewer, has erected several convenient baths and sudatories on the spot, where invalids may be accommodated at all hours, by night as well as by day. The two seasons are the spring and fall; but those who take the waters purely for their health do not regard the seasons, but drink them all the year round. There are a number of genteel sedan-chairs, which carry people to any distance, not exceeding half a mile, for sixpence.

The company assemble in the afternoon, alternately, at two stately rooms, to converse together, or play at cards. At a very pretty new theatre near the parades, plays are acted every other night; and there are balls twice a week, for which and the rooms, and books at the libraries, the gentry generally subscribe. The city is surrounded with hills on all sides, except a little opening to the east and west, through which the Avon runs. This river, which has been made navigable to Bristol by act of parliament, washes the city on the east and south sides, and there is an elegant bridge over it. This city hath formerly had a slight wall, of which some part still remains, as well as one or two of its gates; but almost all the new buildings, and much the greatest and finest part of the city, is without the walls, particularly the fine square called Queen's-square, in the middle of which is a small garden, with gravel walks, and an obelisk in the center. But the greatest ornament at Bath is the Circus: it is of a circular form, consisting of houses built on an uniform plan, with three openings at equal distances to the south, east, and west, leading into as many streets. The fronts of the houses, which are all three stories high, are adorned with three rows of columns in pairs, of the Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian orders, the frieze embellished with sculpture. The whole has an air of magnificence, which cannot fail to strike the most indifferent spectator. In the center of the area is a reservoir, or basin, filled by two or three springs rising in the neighbouring hills; whence the streets in this district are supplied with water. On the south side of the town are the north and south parades, two noble walks, paved with hewn stone, raised upon arches, facing each an elegant row of houses on one side, and having a stone balustrade on the other. These, with the two streets that join them, were planned and executed by one Mr. Wood, an able architect, who likewise built the Square, and projected the Circus. The two public rooms stand betwixt the North-Parade and Orange-grove; which last is a square planted with trees, having in the middle a stone obelisk, inscribed in Latin to the late prince of Orange, who recovered his health in consequence of drinking the Bath waters, and gave his name to this part of the town. Several new streets and rows have of late years been built on the north-side of Bath, in the neighbourhood of the square, such as Gay-street, Milford-street, Edgarrow, Harlequin-row, Bladud's-buildings, King's-mead-street, and Brock-street.

Their advantages for building here are very great, having excellent free-stone, limestone, and slate in the neighbourhood. One sort of their lime is as white as snow. The guild-hall of Bath stands in the market-place, and is said to be built on a plan of Inigo Jones; which, however, exhibits nothing worthy of that great architect: besides, one end of it has been rebuilt in a different style. The hall is ornamented with some portraits of the late prince of Wales and other remarkable personages: but the greatest curiosity of the place is a Minerva's head in bronze, a real antique, dug up in Stall-street, in the year 1725. Bath boasts a noble infirmary, or general hospital, for the reception of the sick and lame from all parts of the three kingdoms. It extends 100 feet in front, and 90 in depth, being capable pable of receiving 150 patients. Here was anciently a monastery, of which the present cathedral was the church. It is a venerable pile; the principal front of which is adorned with angels, ascending and descending. The bishop of the diocese is nominated both from Bath and Wells; yet he and his chapter always reside at Wells. There are three other churches in Bath, and several chapels and meeting-houses. Besides the infirmary, there are several other hospitals, alms-houses, and charity-schools.

The corporation consists of a mayor; 8 aldermen, of whom two are justices of the peace; and 24 common-council men. The city is extremely well provided with stage-coaches, post-coaches, chaises, machines, and waggons. Bath is the general hospital of the nation, and a great number of invalids find benefit from the waters; but as the city lies in a bottom surrounded by very high hills, the air is constantly surcharged with damps; and indeed this place is more subject to rain than any other part in England. The markets are remarkably well supplied with provisions of all kinds at reasonable rates, particularly fish and poultry. They also afford excellent mutton fed upon Lansdown, one of the highest hills that overlook the city. This down, remarkable for its pure air, extends about three miles; and at the extremity of it there is a stone monument, with an inscription, erected to the memory of Sir Bevil Granville, who was here killed in a battle which he fought with the Parliament's army in the reign of Charles I.

The cloth manufactures in Bath are very considerable. The magistracy take great care in preserving good order; and the prices of lodging, of coach and chair hire, &c. are under certain regulations. In and about Bath are also pleasant walks, a theatre, and every thing that can render the place agreeable. In 1774 it suffered much from an inundation. In 1755 some of the Roman baths were discovered in digging below the foundation of the old abbey-house. They send two members to parliament. Its annual fairs are on February 3 and June 29. It is situated 12 miles E. of Bristol, and 110 W. of London. Lat. 51, 21, N. Long. 2, 30, W.

BATH, BATOWTZE, or FRAUMARK, a small town belonging to a district of the first name, in the circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary. In its neighbourhood are fine corn fields and vineyards. It has also considerable annual fairs and weekly markets. It lies 18 miles E. of Esseck. Lat. 49, 5, N. Long. 20, 40, E. See BATS.

BATH-GATE, a Roman causeway so called, in the peak of Derbyshire.

BATMONSTER, a town of Hungary, in the county of Bath, seated on the east bank of the Danube.

VOL. I.—No. 21.

B A

BATHOR, a town belonging to the county of Szabolts, and circle, on this side the Theiss, in Upper Hungary, together with the castle of Nair-Bathor, from which the ancient family of Bathori takes its name, and who also are proprietors of it.

BATHTOWN, in Albemarle county, belonging to North Carolina, in America, on the northern bank of the Pantego or Pamticoe river, in lat. 35, 30, N.

BATI, or the LESSER JAVA, an island in the East Indies, lies to East of Great Java, from which it is divided by the channel of Balambuan.

BATICALA, or BATACOLA, the most southern kingdom of Canara, belonging to India, on this side the Ganges. It is bounded on the N. by that of Onar, on the W. by the ocean, on the E. by Garzopa, and S. by Malabar. It is, according to Luyts, a fruitful country. But the Portuguese, by blocking up its harbours, and making incursions into the country, reduced it thrice, compelling it to pay them tribute. But since that time the Dutch have engrossed all its trade.

BATICALA, the capital of the last-mentioned kingdom of the same name, is situated on a small river, about four miles from the sea, and 30 leagues S. of Goa. It seems to have been once a considerable place; but now it has nothing remarkable in it, except half a score pagods covered with copper and stone. The country producing such good pepper, the English had formerly a settlement here; but at a hunting-match, about the year 1670, an English bull-dog happening to kill a cow devoted to a pagod, the priests of the country raised a mob, by which the whole factory, consisting of 18 persons, with John Best, the principal of them, was murdered; as appears from an inscription upon one large grave in which they were all buried. The English have never settled at Baticala since, though they still buy pepper there.

BATIE, an earldom belonging to the castleward of Montmerle, in the sovereign principality of Dombes, and government of Burgundy, in France.

BATISFALVA, a castle and large village belonging to Zips county, and circle on this side the Theiss, in Upper Hungary. It is situated in a fruitful plain, at the foot of the Carpathian mountains. This is the native place of the ancient Marassi family, and one of those articulated towns in which the Lutherans may perform divine worship without any molestation.

BATNE, anciently a city in the province of Anthemusia, on the Euphrates, where a great fair was annually kept for the vent of Indian and Chinese commodities.

BATORKESZY, a spacious and well-inhabited town belonging to the county of Gran, and circle on the other side of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It is subject to Palfi: and its neighbouring land has become very fit for producing grain and vines.

BATS, or BATH, in Latin Comitatus Bathensis, a county belonging to the circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It was formerly united with that of Bodrog, and is mostly under the jurisdiction of the royal chamber. The inhabitants are Hungarians, intermixed with a good many Servians or Rascians.

BATS, or BACHIA, in the last-mentioned county of the former name, in Hungary Proper, an episcopal town, which was formerly famous, not only as being the residence of a bishop, but for the number of its inhabitants. But it has since declined very much, and been united with the archbishopric of Colocza.

BATURIN, a town of Severia or circle of Nefchinz, belonging to the government of Kiew, in the European division of Russia. Before it was demolished by the Russians, it stood upon a little hill on the river Sem, and was the residence of the Hettman of the Cossacs. In the year 1708 it was taken sword-in-hand by the Russians without considerable loss, pillaged, reduced to ashes, and all the inhabitants cut to pieces. The castle has been since rebuilt for the new Hettman, and all proper methods, by means of public decrees, used for the re-edifying the town.

BATTE. See BATAVI.

BATTAGLIA, a little town of Paduano, one of the provinces belonging to the republic of Venice, in the Upper division of Italy. It lies about an Italian mile from Cataio.

BATTEL, or BATTLE, a large village of Sussex, in the rape of Hastings, so called from the decisive battle fought October 14, 1066, between king Harold and William duke of Normandy, in which the former, with 60,000 men on both sides were killed. This is commonly called the battle of Hastings. By this decisive blow in favour of the conqueror, the English became subject to him, and he was soon after acknowledged king of England. On Heathfield, or rather Headfield plain, where the battle was fought (so called, probably, from so many heads or lives having been lost on it) which is not far off, he founded a monastery of Benedictines, dedicated to St. Martin, whose abbot was mitred, and called it Battel-abbey, both in commemoration of his own success, and that the monks of it should pray for the souls of the slain. This appears from its remains, to have been a very stately pile, and a mile in circuit; of which the gatehouse is almost entire, and still used for the sessions and other public meetings. In the town of Battel is made very fine gun-powder, and the best perhaps in Europe. Its weekly market, formerly on Sundays, has since the year 1600 been changed by act of parliament to Thursday; and it has another the second Tuesday in every month. Its annual fairs are on Whitfun-Monday and the 22d of November, also on Battel-field, August 2. In the town is a charity-school for forty boys. The incumbent of the church here is called the dean of Battel. The town stands in a low dirty site; consequently not very healthy. Near it is Beacon-hill, from a beacon now upon it, but formerly called Standard-hill, where the Norman invader set up his great standard of defiance the day before the above-mentioned decisive battle. Here is a harbour for large barges. It lies six miles N. of Hastings, and forty-eight S. E. of London, in lat. 50, 55. N. Long. 35, E.

BATTEL-EDGE, a place near Burford in Oxfordshire, where Cuthred, king of the West Saxons, beat Ethelbald, king of the Mercians, in a pitched battle, and shook off the yoke of the latter. In commemoration of this battle, as they say, a kind of festival is celebrated annually on Midsummer-eve.

BATTENBURG. See BATAVI and BATENBURG.

BATTERBAY, a fine harbour in the bay of Gallway, and province of Connaught, in Ireland. It is four miles long, narrow, but with a very safe entrance; in some places a mile broad, and in others two, with a channel of ten or twelve fathom water, and not less than five close to the shore, on both sides. It has good anchorage without any rock or shoal: but here are no town's ships nor trade, as is the case all over this coast.

BATTERSEA, a pleasant village of Surrey, in the neighbourhood of London, and not far from the Thames. It has numerous seats on that river belonging to the Londoners; and its grounds are mostly laid out for furnishing the markets of the metropolis with vegetables, and is particularly noted for its asparagus.

BATTLE-FIELD, a village in Shropshire, 5 miles N. of Shrewsbury; where a victory was gained by Henry IV. over the rebels under Henry Piercy, surnamed Hotspur. It has one fair on August 2, for horned cattle and sheep; is governed by a constable, and consists of about 400 houses, and 1400 inhabitants. It has a large church, and one long broad street paved; but no manufactory.

BATUA, BUTUA, BUTHOE, or BUTHOECE, a town of Dalmatia, situated on the Adriatic; now BUDOA; which see.

BATUSABER, a town of Asia in the East-Indies, seated on the S. part of the Peninsula of Malacca.

BAVARI, anciently BOII and BOIARES, a warlike people of Germany, who carried their victorious arms into Italy, Greece, and beyond the Hellespont. They were the first Germans that traversed the Alps, and pitched their standard on the banks of the Tyber and Thermodon. They possessed settled that part of Germany lying between Pannonia, Suabia, Italy, and beyond the Danube.

BAVARIA (the Circle of) in Germany, is part of the Rhetia Vindelicia and Noricum of the ancients, and took the (Latin) name Boiaria (from whence is Bavaria) from the Boii, a warlike people, who came from Gallia Celtica, and settled here about 470 years after Christ, being governed at first by their own kings, and afterwards by dukes, to the time of Charles the Great, who erected it into a kingdom which extended from the mountains of Franconia to the frontiers of Hungary and the Adriatic gulph. It comprehended the countries of Tirol, Carinthia, Carniola, Stiria, Austria, and other states, which are now fallen to different princes. In this state it continued about a century, when its king Lodowick dying childless, the Bavarians chose Arnold governor, who contented himself with the title of duke, as did his successors till Maximilian I. who had the dignity of Elector conferred on him, together with the Upper Palatinate, by emperor Ferdinand II. in 1623. At present it is bounded E. by Austria and Bohemia, S. by Carinthia and Tirol, W. by Suabia and Franconia; and it lessens to almost a point towards Upper Saxony, N. According to a new estimation, its greatest length from N. to S. is 190 miles, and greatest breadth from E. to W. 115; but it is much indented every way. The present state of Germany makes Upper and Lower Bavaria 130 miles long and 100 broad, exclusive of the independent states, reckoned in this circle, the archbishop of Salzburg, bishoprics of Ratisbon, Passau, and Freisingen, duchy of Neuburg, landgrave of Leichtenberg, besides imperial cities. The air is healthy, the soil producing corn and pasture, though but little wine, and the country is much interspersed with forests and mountains, the former yielding venison, and the latter mines of copper and some silver, and quarries of marble. Here are baths and salt-works. Its chief rivers are the Danube, Lech, Inn, Isar, Aiber, Saltz; and lesser ones Altmul, Nabe, Rogen, &c. and has 16 lakes.—It contains 35 cities, of which Munich is the capital; 94 towns; 720 castles; 4700 villages; eight great abbeys; and 75 cloisters or monasteries, besides those of the Mendicants. It is divided into four great bailliages called governments. These are Munich, Landshut, Straubing, and Burkhauseu. The principal cities are Ingoldstadt, Donawert, Landsberg, Freiberg, Straubingen, Willhausen, Wasserberg, Eling, Raim, &c.

Besides these two provinces, the duke of Bavaria possesses the Upper Palatinate of Westphalia, which has been united to Bavaria, and comprehends several counties, cities, towns, and villages. On the other side of this province is Chamb, the chief city of the county of the same name, belonging likewise to the duke of Bavaria. He also possesses the landgraviate of Leichtenberg, which fell to him by the death of Maximilian Adam, in consequence of family pacts made between the house of Bavaria and that of Leichtenberg for their mutual succession. In 1567 the county of Kaag fell to the duke of Bavaria by the death of Ladislaus the last count of that name. There are likewise family pacts of mutual succession established betwixt the house of Bavaria and the Palatine of the Rhine.—The inhabitants of this country are strong and laborious, exercising themselves in shooting with rifled muskets at a mark, in order to render themselves more expert in war.

The house of Bavaria is universally allowed to be one of the most ancient in Germany. The counts of Scheuren, whose castle at present is a cloister, gave them the name. At that place are shewn the tombs of more than 26 lords of Scheuren. At the death of the late elector on the 30th of December, 1777, on the palatine's succeeding, the emperor claimed part of the electorate, but the king of Prussia obliged him to desist from his enterprize.

BAVAY, in Latin Bavacum, Ptolemy's Bagacum, or Antonine's Bagacum; a very old little town belonging to the French part of Hainault, and in the government of Flanders, belonging to that kingdom. It is situated on the river Oiseau. It was, under the Romans, the capital of the Nervii, and a considerable place, from which were several causeways that led to Maestricht, Cologne by Tongres, to Rheims, through all Champagne, besides many others. At present it contains not above twenty families. It lies 12 miles S. W. of Mons, and three of Malplaquet; to which the French retired after the glorious battle of the latter name, wherein was the greatest slaughter of any fought in queen Anne's wars, almost the whole force of both sides being engaged that day; the confederates under the command of the duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene, and the French under that of the Marshals Villars and Boufflers. Lat. 50. 26, N. Long. 3. 36, E. See MALPLAQUET.

BAUERWITZ, or PAURWITZ, an open little town having a popish church, seated in a rich corn country, in the Prussian part of the principality of Jagerndorf.

BAUGE, a town of France, in Bresse, pleasantly seated on a fruitful hill, with the title of a marquise; three miles from Macon; Long. 4. 54, E. Lat. 46. 20, N.

BAUGE, or BEAGUE, in Latin Balgium, or Baugium, the name of two little towns lying contiguous, in the government of Anjou, in France. The one is called Beauge le Vieux, and the other Beauge sur Coesnon; both of them on the river of the last name. Near Beauge le Vieux the French obtained a victory over the English in the year 1420.

B A

In the other town is a royal court of justice. It contains but one parish, with between 5 and 600 families. It lies 20 miles E. of Angers. Lat. 47, 30, N. and under the same meridian with London.

BAUGENCI, a town of France, in Proper Orleans, with an Augustine abbey.

BAULA, or BAULI, a pleasant country lying beyond the castle of Baia, in the Terra di Lavoro of Naples, and Lower Division of Italy. A little farther in land are some very genteel seats, with the ruins of several more, particularly Hortensius, Pompey, &c.

BAUME, a marquisate belonging to the little territory of Royanez, a subdivision of the Upper Delphinat, in the government of Dauphiny, in France.

BAUME, (St.), a mountain in France, in Provence, between Marseilles and Toulon. Mary Magdalen is said to have died here, on which account it is much frequented.

BAUME-LES-NONES, a town of France, in the Franche Comte, with a rich nunnery, seated on the river Doux, 15 miles N. E. of Besancon. Five miles from this town is a famous cavern, whose entrance is 20 paces wide, and after descending 300 paces, a gate of a grotto is seen, twice as large as that of a city. It is 35 paces deep, 60 wide, and is covered with a kind of a vaulted roof, from which water continually drops. There is also a small brook, frozen in summer, but not in winter, and at the bottom are stones that perfectly resemble candied citron-peel. When the peasants perceive a mist proceeding from the mouth of the cave, they are certain it will rain the next day. Long. 6, 20, E. Lat. 47, 12, N.

BAUMEN, or BAUMAN, a cave of Lower Saxony in Germany, about a mile from Wermigerode, and 18 from Goslar. The entrance is through a rock, and so narrow that not above one person can pass at a time. There are several paths in it, which the peasants have turned up, in searching for the bones of animals, which they sell for unicorn's horns. Some think this cave reaches as far as Goslar; but be this as it will, the skeletons of men have been found in it, who are supposed to have been lost in the turnings and windings.

BAVORD-CASTLE, a fortification raised by king Alfred in Kent, and just by the town of Sittingham, when in pursuit of the Danes; but now in ruins. Here they say one Norwood entertained king Henry V. on his triumphant return from France, very elegantly, at the expence of no more than 9 s. 9 d.

BAUSKE, a little town, in a parish of the same name, belonging to Semigallia, a subdivision of the duchy of Courland. It lies between the rivers Maus and Mommel, with a strong castle near it, which is called Bauskenburg, and situated upon a rock. It has a large garrison. In 1701 the Swedes took it, with the king of Poland's magazines, valued at 300,000 crowns; and he demanded 60,000 crowns from the duchy, besides vast quantities of provisions. In 1705 the czar Peter surprised the town by stratagem, and forced the Swedish garrison to surrender, just after the victory he had obtained over them at Muhrendorf. They repossessing Bauske, quitted it, and the whole duchy of Courland, in 1709, after levying great sums from the inhabitants. It lies 17 miles E. of Mittau. Lat. 36, 22, N. Long. 46, 10, E.

BAUTRE, or BAWTRY, a town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, about 3 furlongs in length, and situated on the Idle, which parts this division from Nottinghamshire. It stands on the post-road to Scotland, and has very good inns. The river, though small, has a deep channel and quick stream, which carries flat-bottomed vessels into the Trent, within 7 miles of it to Stockwith, from thence to Burton, and then to Hull, if the weather be fair. From Stockwith, vessels of 200 tons burthens may come up to the town. By this navigation upon the Idle head, mill and grind stones are brought into Derbyshire; all sorts of iron wares from Sheffield, and the adjacent country of Hallamshire, this being the center of all exportation, particularly for heavy goods, from this riding. Its weekly market is on Saturday, and annual fairs are Holy Thursday, Old Martinmas, November 22. It lies 3 miles E. from Tickhill, and 147 N. of London.

BAUTZEN, BAUDISSEN, or PANTZEN, in Latin Budissina or Bubesia, the capital of the marquisate of Lusatia, and Upper Division of it, in the circle of Higher Saxony. It is situated on the Spree, which river rises about 2 miles above it, at the village of Sprueberg. Its castle stands on a high and steep rock. It suffered much in the civil wars of Germany, particularly from the elector, and when the Imperialists, setting fire to the suburbs, to dislodge his forces, was driven into the town, which was quite burnt down; and since this disaster it has never recovered its lustre. The church here serves both the Lutherans and Roman Catholics to perform divine service in. It lies 35 miles N. E. of Dresden. Lat. 51, 15, N. Long. 14, 30, E.

BAUVILLERS, a small place in the environs belonging to the district of Amont or Gray, in the government of Franche-comte, in France. It lies on the frontiers of Lorraine.

BAUX, or BAULX, (Les), in Latin Baltium, and by corruption Baucium, a large village belonging to the provincial district of Arles in Lower Provence, and government of the latter name, in France. It stands on a mountain with an antique castle, which was formerly very strong. The lords of this place were powerful and very considerable; for they possessed possessed all that tract of country which from Baux is called Terres Baussenques, and to which 79 places belonged. At length, by failure of heirs, this lordship of Baux, belonging to a daughter of the Orange family, married to John of Challon, was after her death, annexed to the earldom of Provence, and reckoned among the adjacent countries. Lewis XIII. raised Baux to a marquisate; which title he conferred upon the prince of Monaco, in the year 1642.

BAY. See under the proper name of each.

BAY LE GRAND, and BAY LE PETIT, two of the many forts belonging to St. Malo, in the government of Bretagne, in France. See MALO.

BAYA, E. long. 19, 50. Lat. 46, 40. a town of Hungary, situated 65 miles S. E. of Buda, and 45 N. W. of Esseck.

BAYA DE FRANCE, on the coast of N. Guinea. See RUFISCO.

BAYAO, a small district of Porto in Entre dourou e Minho, in Portugal. It contains 18 parishes.

BAYDOUR, a town of Canara, in the subdivision of Malabar, belonging to the peninsula within the Ganges, in Asia. It lies about two days journey from the sea, and is the residence of a lady who generally governs this country. See CANARA.

BAYEUX, in Latin Baiocum, formerly Biducassum, or Juliobona, a town belonging to the territory of Bessin, in Lower Normandy, and government of the latter name, in France. It lies near the English channel, on the river Eure, which a little below is said to lose itself under ground. It is the see of a bishop, the seat of an election, bailiwick, viscounty, admiralty, forest-district, and salt-granary. Here are 17 parishes, 9 convents, 2 hospitals, a college, and a seminary. The bishop is a suffragan to the archbishop of Rouen, has a diocese consisting of 615 parishes, with a revenue of 60,000 livres, and he is assessed to the court of Rome in 4433 florins. The cathedral of St. Mary is very magnificent, with two high spire-steeple, besides a stately tower. The city is divided into upper and lower town, or the suburbs of St. John, George, and Patrick. In Bayeux were set up manufactories of cloth, serge, and stockings, which succeeded very well; but the high taxes obliged the merchants not only to abandon these, but to leave the city and settle elsewhere. It lies 15 miles N. W. of Caen. Lat. 49, 17, N. Long. 0, 38, W.

BAYKUL. See BAIKAL.

BAYLUR, the principal sea port on the Red Sea, in the kingdom of Dancali, in Africa. Here the Abyssinian patriarch, who was sent from Rome, landed.

BAYNA, a town belonging to the district of Bodok, and county of Neutra, in the circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary. Its inhabitants almost in general follow agriculture.

Vol. I.—No. 21.

B A

BAYON, a town of France, in Lorraine, seated on the river Moselle, 12 miles S. of Nancy. Long. 14, 42, E.

BAYONA, a little town of Galicia in Spain. It is situated on a small bay, which forms a commodious harbour at the mouth of the river Minho. The sea-coast abounds with fish, and the territory belonging to the town produces fine fruit. Near the entrance of the bay are some islands, which the ancients called the Islands of the Gods. It lies below Vigo, and contains about 400 houses. In this bay the French and Spanish ships, in 1702, were burnt by the English and Dutch.

BAYONNE, in Latin Bajona, or the ancient Lapurdum, is the capital of Labourd, a territory belonging to Gascony, in the government of the latter name, and Guyenne, in France. It lies near the confluence of the rivers Adour and Nive, not far from the mouth of the former, whose united streams fall a little below into the Bay of Biscay. It is of a middling largeness, the see of a bishop, the seat of a collection for the tailles, a provincial district, admiralty and mint. The name Bayonne is compounded of the Basque words Baja and Ona, which signify a good harbour. It is considerable on account of the great resort to it for trade, though its entrance is difficult, by reason of a sand-bank. The river Nive runs through the town, the Adour surrounds its walls, and afterwards both streams unite. They divide the town into three parts. The great town, as it is called, lies on this side the Nive; the little town is between the Nive and Adour; and the suburb St. Esprit, where great numbers of Jews reside, lies on the further side of the latter river. Each of the two former parts of the town, besides fortifications, has a small strong castle. But the suburb, exclusive of its good works, has also a citadel on an eminence, which is a regular square, fortified after Vauban's manner; so that it defends all the three parts of the town, the harbour, and the neighbouring country.

The bishop of Bayonne is under the metropolitan of Auch, has a diocese of 72 parishes, an income of 19,000 livres, and repays an assessment of 100 florins to the court of Rome. Besides the cathedral, dedicated to the Holy Virgin, and its chapter; there is also in the suburb a small chapter; exclusive of all which, in this city is a college and five convents. This is the only place in France which has the advantage of being situated on two rivers, into which the tide flows. Here are imported all sorts of foreign goods, which the merchants send into Aragon and Upper Navarre, on the backs of mules, that return loaded to Bayonne, with Spanish wool, that is afterwards exported into several countries of Europe. From the forests, on the Pyrenean mountains, they have great quantities of masts, which they send to Brest and other French ports, ports, where the king's ships are built. They send also a great many ships to the whale and cod fisheries; and they were the first who sent vessels, in the year 1605, to the coast of Finland and to Groenland, for the former purpose; but the fish spoiling, by reason of their being far from home, they contrived a method of making the fat into oil at sea. The inhabitants have the privilege of keeping two of the city gates in their own hands; the third leading into the suburb, being the only gate which is guarded by the king's troops. It lies 85 miles S. of Bourdeaux, 360 S. W. of Paris, and but five leagues from the frontiers of Spain, on which side it is one of the keys of France. Lat. 43, 30, N. Long. 1, 25, W.

BAYPIN, VAYPIN, or VIAPIA, is an island belonging to the Mogul territories in India, on the coast between Cranganore and Couchin, 4 leagues long, but not 2 miles broad.

BAZA, BAZAS, or BASA, a pretty old and large town of Granada in Spain. See BACA.

BAZADOIS, a province of Guienne in France, which makes part of Lower Gascony. It is a barren heathy country. Its capital is Bazas.

BAZAS, a town of France, and the capital of the Bazadois, with a very ancient bishop's see. It is seated on a rock, whose foot is washed with a small river, 5 miles from the river Garonne, and 35 S. E. of Bourdeaux. Long. 0, 30, W. Lat. 44, 20, N.

BAZIEGES, a town of France in Languedoc, and in the territory of Tolouse, between the city of Tolouse and Carcassone.

BAZOCHE, or BAZOGE, a little place belonging to the country of Thimerais, part of the county of Perche, and government of the isle of France. It lies on the rivulet Coitron, and contains about 240 families. See BASOCHE.

BAZOIS, a district belonging to the government of Nivernois in France. It consists of valleys, which lie under the mountains of Morvant. It produces only a little wheat and rye; for which reason it yields the more pasture, wood, and pit-coal.

BAZZANO, a mountain of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, situated in the territory of Acquila, and in the Ulterior Abruzzo. It was formerly called Aufidus.

BEACHLY, a town of Monmouthshire; the ferry between which and the village of Ault is here called Beachly passage, and on the opposite side that of Ault. It is two miles from Chepstow, a port-town on the river Wye.

BEACHY-HEAD, a promontory on the coast of Sussex, between Hastings and Shoreham. It is noted for shipwrecks in stormy weather, and has several caverns made in it by the sea. It projects perpendicularly over the beach, from which it has its name, and is the highest cliff on all the south coast. From beyond Arundel to this headland, the country along the coast, for a good breadth, rises into high hills, called the South Downs. This cape is memorable for a defeat of the English and Dutch near it, by a superior fleet of the French, June, 30, 1690. Though it was alledged by the Dutch, that Torrington did not fight; yet, having been tried for it, at the solicitation of the States-General, he was acquitted by a court-martial, mostly composed it was said, of the earl's friends. Lat. 50, 48. Long. 0, 25.

BEACON-HILL, a very high hill of Essex, on the S. side of the mouth of Harwich harbour, about half a mile from that town, and opposite to Landguard-fort, on which stands a large light-house, commanding an extensive view of the coasts of Suffolk and Essex. Here is a well of petrifying water.

BEACONSFIELD, a small market-town of Buckinghamshire, on the Oxford-road; it has several good inns, and stands on a dry hill. It lies eight miles from Marlow, and 22 miles W. of London. Its market is on Thursday; and its fairs are February 13, and Holy Thursday.

BEANE, a river in Hartfordshire, which runs into the Lea river, near Hoddesden.

BEAR-ISLANDS, a cluster of small uninhabited rocky islands, situated on the N. coast of Siberia, in the frozen ocean. Lat. 73, N. Long. 173, E. from Ferro.

BEAR, a barony belonging to the county of Desmond, united to that of Cork, in the province of Munster in Ireland.

BEAR-ALSTON, or BERAL-STON, or as some call it, BORALSTON, in Devonshire, on the river Tave, three miles from Tavistock, and 200 miles from London, is a small, but ancient borough by prescription, and is governed by a portreeve, who is chosen yearly. The burgage-holders who pay 3d. a year, or more acknowledgement for the land they hold in the borough to the lord of the manor, are the only voters for its members, who are returned by the portreeve. This place though of such consideration as to send two members to parliament, is only a hamlet in the parish of Bear-Ferris, from the church of which it lies near two miles. It did not send members till the 27th of Elizabeth, when many other mean boroughs had the like summons; and, in its first return, it was called Berealveston. Its houses, which are not a hundred, are but ordinary; and its market on Thursday, but inconsiderable.

BEARNE, a territory and principality, which, with Navarre, is one of the governments in France. It takes its name from the ancient town of Bearnum, whose situation cannot be ascertained; in Latin it is called Benearnia, and lies at the foot of

of the Pyrenean mountains. It is bounded on the E. by Bigorre; on the S. the Pyrenees part it from Aragon and Upper Navarre; on the W. it borders on the provostship of Acqs, Lower Navarre, and Soule; and on the N. it has Lower Armagnac, Turfan, and Chalosse, parts of Gascony. It is 16 French leagues in length, and 12 in breadth, being mountainous and dry; yet the vallies are pretty fruitful. Here they have but little wheat and rye, but quantities of mailloc or manioc, a sort of Indian corn; and they sow flax, of which they make linen. On the rocks are vineyards, the wine of which, in some places, is excellent. In the mountains contiguous to Monein, are copper, iron and lead mines, with great numbers of fir or pine trees, from which masts and deal boards are made. In the vallies of Ossau and Aspe, and near Oleron, are mineral waters. The principal rivers are Gave Bearnois, and Gave d'Oleron, both which are very rapid, and fall into the Adour. At Saillies is a salt-spring, which furnishes the whole government with salt. In the year 1695 the number of inhabitants in Bearne was found to be 198,000. The inhabitants are strong, laborious, lively, and frugal, but not very open and sincere, minding only their own interest. The municipal law, by which justice is administered in Bearne, they call Forz. At Pau is a supreme council; of which, with the chancery of Navarre, also a sovereign court, is composed the parliament of Navarre, sitting at Pau. The States are composed of two bodies; namely, the clergy and nobility, the other of the commons. The trade of Bearne consists in exporting the wine produced in the seneschalship, or provincial bailiwick of Morlas. The English and Dutch buy up great quantities of it. The inhabitants sell also to the Spaniards linen, cattle, and vast numbers of little horses, which suit a mountainous country. Besides seven considerable towns, here are 434 villages or boroughs.

BEAT, (St.) a fortified little town, belonging to the upper part of the diocese of Comiages, and Upper Languedoc, in the government of the latter name, in France. It lies between two mountains, near the confluence of the rivers Garrone and Pique, being divided by the former into two parts. All the houses in St. Beat are built of marble, there being no other stone in this country. In the town is a priory; and here a considerable trade is carried on in cattle, horses and mules.

BEATA-ISLAND, on the south coast of Hispaniola, opposite a cape of the same name on that island, about four miles. It is low, and covered with bushes and trees; on the south side is a well with fresh water in it at certain times of the year. This island is a very good place for cruising ships to anchor, when they want to heel, or boot-top, or to refit any of their rigging: and 7½ miles from the S. W. of this island is Altavela rock.

This rock, the most southerly of Hispaniola, in lat. 17, 20, is the land you steer for in going down from the Leeward islands to Jamaica; for by keeping in its latitude you avoid falling into the dangerous bay of Neyva.

BAYAHA, or PORT DAUPHIN, is one of the finest ports in the island of Hispaniola; it would contain a great number of ships, as much shut up as in a basin, being only a quarter of a league broad, but about one league up it divides into two branches, one to the S. E. the other, to the S. W. in both which are several little islands so steep that you may careen the largest ships along side of them. You may anchor near the land, and carry an hawser on shore; the ground is good every where; the only inconvenience here is that the river in the bottom is very deep, and you must go a great way up before you find the water fresh.

BEAUCAIRE, in Latin Belliquadra, so called from an old quadrangular castle, which was demolished in the year 1632. It is a town belonging to the diocese of Nîmes in Lower Languedoc, and government of the latter name, in France. It is situated on the Rhône, directly opposite to Tarascon. Here is a very considerable annual fair kept on the 22d of July, which lasts about ten days. They hold it in a large meadow near the town; the duty on all merchandise, and even unopened bales, amounting to about 30,000 livres. The trade in this fair is carried on for upwards of six millions of livres: and merchants resort hither from Italy, Germany, Spain, Turkey, Armenia, Smyrna, &c. Here is a collegiate church. It lies seven miles north of Arles, and about 12 from Nîmes. Lat. 43, 40, N. Long. 4, 40, E.

BEAUCE (Proper), or the territory of Chartrain, in Latin Belsia Propria, in the government of Orleanois, in France. It lies between Orleanois, Blaisois, Perche, and the isle of France, being 14 leagues in length and eleven in breadth. It is a country very fruitful in grain.

BEAUDESERT-PARK, a place in Staffordshire, near the Trent; where are the remains of an old fortification, called Castle hill, supposed, by Camden's annotator, to have been cast up by Knute, the Dane, in his ravages over this part of the country.

BEAUFORT, in the valley, a town belonging to the government of Anjou, in France; in Latin Bellafordia. It lies near the river Authion, on a branch of the Coesnon, which divides the town into two parts. It formerly belonged to several particular Lords, but is now united to the crown. Though this place is small, it has two parish-churches, and a convent of Recollets, and contains not

not above 90 families. It lies 15 miles east of Angers. Lat. 47, 30, N. Long. 15, E.

BEAUFORT, an archiepiscopal barony, which anciently was an imperial state, belonging to Ambrunois, a territory of the Upper Delphinate, and government of Dauphiny, in France.

BEAUFORT, a little town of Savoy Proper, a subdivision belonging to the duchy of Savoy, in Upper Italy. It lies 30 miles E. of Chamberry. Lat. 45, 30, N. Long. 6, 40, E.

BEAUFORT, a town and district in S. Carolina, including all the places to the S. from Combahee river, and the swamp at the head of the S. branch of that river, between the sea, including the islands; the boundary continuing from the main swamp to Matthew's Bluff, on Savannah river.

BEAUFORT, a sea-port town in the county of Granville, in South Carolina, situated on the island of Port Royal, 26 miles from Purryburg, and 43 from Charles-town to the S. W. It has a good fort, but is not well fortified. It is expected from its harbour and situation that it will become the capital of South Carolina, as it is already the station of the British Squadron in those seas.

BEAUFORT, a county of North Carolina, in the district of Newbern.

BEAUFORT, a sea-port town in North Carolina, in the county of Carteret, and district of Newbern, in Core Sound.

BEAUGE. See BAUGE.

BEAUGENCY, in Latin, Balgenciacum, or Baugentiacum, a town and earldom of Upper Orleans, in the government of this last name, in France. It is situated on the Loire, over which there is a stone-bridge of 22 arches. Its neighbourhood abounds with corn, wine, fruit, and game. It is the seat of an election, royal presidentship, a bailiwick, salt-granary, forest-district, castleward of the bailiwick of Orleans, a hunting-jurisdiction, with a chapter. In 1104 and 1157 councils were held here, in one of which a divorce was obtained by Lewis XI. from Eleanor, heiress of Guyenne, on the score of consanguinity, though he had two daughters by her. She afterwards married Henry duke of Normandy, who became king of England; and she carried her daughters with her. This was the occasion of a bloody war between France and England, which continued above 300 years. In Beaugency is a manufactory for serges and other stuffs. It lies 15 miles S. W. of Orleans. Lat. 47, 48, N. Long. 1, 36, E.

BEAUJEU, in Latin Bellus Locus, a little town of Beaujolois, a subdivision of the government of Lyonnois, in France. It stands on the river Ardier, with an old castle upon a mountain. It was formerly the capital of the country; but at present only a large borough, and gives name to Beaujolois. It lies 25 miles W. of Lyons, in lat. 46, 15, N. Long. 4, 30, E.

B E

BEAUJOLOIS, a territory belonging to the government of Lyonnois, and S. E. division of it, in France. It is about 10 French leagues in length, 8 in breadth, and a very fruitful country. It was anciently a barony, which Edward II. in the year 1400, made a present of, together with the lordship of Dombes, to Lewis II. duke of Bourbon; from which house it came by inheritance to that of the duke of Orleans. It is bounded by the subgovernment of Lyonnois on the S. Maçonnois on the N. on the W. it is parted from Forez by the Loire, and on the E. from the principality of Dombes by the Saone.

BEAULIEU, a little town belonging to the viscounty of Turenne, and government of Limosin, in France. In it is an abbey. Of the same name is another small town, and a barony, which belongs to the government of Touraine, in France. Its name in Latin is Bellus Locus. It is situated on the river Indre, lying opposite to Loches, to which it is joined by a bridge. Here is a Benedictine abbey of St. Maur, where stands a pyramid, with characters that could never be decyphered.

BEAULIEU, or BEWLEY, a village of the Ard, belonging to Inverness-shire, in Scotland; where stood, before the Reformation, a famous monastery, in a very rich clayey soil, and in the language of the country called Mannachin, which denotes such a religious foundation. It lies on the river or water of Beaulieu. Here is a celebrated water-fall, where great numbers of salmon are caught, particularly by means of a creel or large kind of hamper, into which the fish tumble back in their attempting to mount the cataract. It lies not far from Castle-Downy, the demolished seat of the late lord Lovat. Beaulieu gives name to the neighbouring arm of the Murray-frith, which reaches up to it, and about 8 miles N. W. of Inverness. The Rev. Mr. James Fraser, in one of the earliest papers of our Philosophical Transactions, supposes this frith to have formerly been firm land, from long oaks with their roots having been found lodged under the sand in the middle of it; unless the rapid water of Beaulieu, otherwise Farrar, in its inundations, should have carried such trees down with its stream from the adjacent lands. At Beaulieu are annual fairs held, which were formerly much resorted to by the Highlanders. The monastery seems to have been secularized and engrossed by the Lovat family. The salmon-fishery on the river brought in annually 500l. sterling in the late lord Lovat's time, and is now let for about 400l. to one of the merchants of Inverness, who holds it of the crown.

BEAULIEU, a place in Hampshire, where are annual fairs kept, on April 15 and September 4.

BEAUMARIS, a well-built town-corporate, belonging to the isle of Anglesea, and on the E. side of it, in North Wales. It is governed by a mayor, &c. It has its name from its standing in a moorish place place or fine plain. It is the county-town, where the sessions and county-jail are kept. Here are two good streets; and its markets, which are on Wednesday and Saturday, are well supplied with provisions. It is the usual town for the reception of passengers, before they take shipping for Ireland at Holyhead. It has a handsome church, with some fine monuments, and, among others, some of the Knight's-templars. It lies in a very level, fruitful, and healthy soil; and sends one member to parliament. The annual fairs held here are on Feb. 13, Holy-Thurday, Sept. 19, and Dec. 19, all for cattle. Here was formerly a castle, built by king Edward I. now in ruins. It lies 9 miles N. of Bangor, and 200 N. W. of London. Lat. 53, 20, N. Long. 4, 11, W.

BEAUME LES NONNES, a little town belonging to the bailiwick of Amont, in the government of the Franche Comte, in France. It lies on the Doux; but it has been ruined by the wars. Here is a parish-church, and two convents.

BEAUMINSTER, a place in Dorsetshire, where an annual fair is kept September 19.

BEAUMONT LE ROGER, in Latin Bello-montium Rogeri, a little open town and earldom, belonging to the territory of Ouche, in Upper Normandy, and government of the latter name, in France. It stands high, on the rivulet Rille: It has but one street and one parish, with a priory in it. Here is a high court of justice, a mayor, captain, and lieutenant. At Beaumont are made woollen stuffs and linen cloth. It is joined by a bridge to the large borough of Vielle, where vast quantities of linen are bleached. It lies 16 miles S. of Alençon. Lat. 48, 20, N. Long. 5, E.

BEAUMONT EN AUGÉ, a borough belonging to the county of Augé, in Lower Normandy, and last-mentioned government. Here is a forest-court, a college, and priory.

BEAUMONT LE VICOMTE, a small town of Upper Maine, belonging to the government of the latter name, and Perche, in France. It lies on the Sarthe. It was a duchy-peerage in 1543, and the first title of Henry le Grand in his father's lifetime, now in the house of Teflé. It has but one parish, and about 500 inhabitants, with a royal court of justice, salt magazine, marshal's sea, and a convent.

BEAUMONT, a little town belonging to the ancient viscounty of Lomagne, and Lower Armagnac, in the government of Guyenne, and Gascony, in France. It is situated on the Gimone.

BEAUMONT, a borough of Lower Perigord, and last-mentioned government. It lies on the Couffe.

BEAUMONT, a small town belonging to Argonne, and Upper Champagne, in the government of this last name, and of Brie, in France. It has a royal court of justice and prevoté, where is also a regal mayory under the bailiwick of Rheims. Besides the Beaumonts above-recited there is one in Vexin François, a subdivision of the government of the Isle of France, at the foot of a hill, upon the Oise, over which is a fine bridge. It stands on the confines of Beauvaisis, about 6 leagues N. of Paris, and 2 below Pontoise. Here is a collegiate church.

BEAUMONT, a town of French Hainault, in the government of Flanders. It is situated on the top of a fine hill, whence it has its name, and in Latin Mons Bellus. In 1684 the Spaniards delivered it up to the French; but king William having taken it in 1697, had the castle blown up. It lies 12 miles S. W. of Charleroy. Lat. 50, 20, N. Long. 4, 15, E.

BEAUMONT, a village of Swisserland, in the territory of Vaud; seated between the river Orb and Mount Jura, and the chief of a small government, depending on the canton of Bern.

BEAUNE, in Latin Belna, a fortified town of Dijonois, a district belonging to the government of Burgundy, in France. It is situated on the river Bougeoise, and in the territory of Beaunois. Here is the seat of a bailiwick, a royal prevoté, salt granary, and a particular governor. Besides a collegiate-church, here is also a parish-church, an hospital, and two convents. The neighbourhood produces excellent wine.

BEAUPORT, or PORTO-HERMOSO, a fort and harbour of St. Domingo, one of the Caribbee islands; it stands on the S. side, and to the W. of the town of St. Domingo.

BEAUPREAU, a little town belonging to the government of Anjou, in France. It is situated on the Ilere, with two parish-churches, and a collegiate one.

BEAUQUESNES, a borough and royal prevoté, belonging to the county of St. Paul, and that of Artois, in the government of the latter name, and of Picardy, in France.

BEAUREGARD, a castleward belonging to the sovereign principality of Dombes, which lies round the government of Burgundy in France, but independent of that government. In it is a small place bearing the same name, and situated on the Soane, which was formerly the capital of the country, and seat of the parliament. It has also a strong castle. In the year 1377 it was so laid waste by the Savoyards, that it never recovered itself after.

BEAUREPAIRE, a borough or large village of Viennois, a territory belonging to the government of Dauphiny, in France.

BEAUREVOIR, a borough belonging to a little territory in the sub-stadtholdership of Tierache and Vermandois, belonging to the government of Picardy and Artois, in France. Near it rises the river Scheld.

BEAUSENT,

B E

BEAUSENT, a place belonging to the viscounty of Thal Lovedan, in the government of Guyenne and Gascony, in France.

BEAUSSE (Proper), BAUCE, or CHARTRAIN, a small territory belonging to the government of Orleans, in France: in Latin Bellia, or Bella. It generally includes Chartrain, Dunois, Vendomois, Martois, and Hurepois; though it never forms a proper territory or lordship of itself. The two last belong to the government of the Isle of France.

BEAUVAIS, a town of France, in Upper Languedoc, seated on the river Tescou, 8 miles E. of Montauban. Lon. 1, 43, E. Lat. 44, 2, N.

BEAUVAIS, in Latin Bellovacum, and by Cæsar called Cæsaromagus, a town of Beauvais, and its capital, in the third sub-stadtholdership, belonging to the government of the Isle of France. It is situated on the river Terain, is the seat of a preboste, a bailiwick (which, as well as that of the forest, belongs to the bishop of Beauvais) a provincial court of justice, salt-magazine, and marshalsea. Besides the cathedral of St. Peter, it contains six collegiate-churches, 13 parish-churches, and three abbeys; a general hospital founded by one of its bishops; and a hotel Dieu; both which have an annual income of 12,000 livres. The bishop, who is spiritual and temporal lord of the city, is a suffragan to the metropolitan of Rheims, and a count and peer of France. His diocese contains 12 chapters, 14 abbeys, 48 priories, 442 parishes, and 300 chapels. His yearly revenue amounts to 55,000 livres. His tax to the court of Rome is assessed at 4600 florins. Here has been erected since the year 1664, a considerable manufactory of tapestry, said to be as fine and beautiful as that of Flanders; but the wars have interrupted it greatly: and they make also here large quantities of serges and woollen cloths, which they send into other provinces of the kingdom, and into foreign countries, particularly Savoy and Italy. This trade is pretty considerable, as well as that of the linen cloths, in the neighbouring villages; particularly the half-hollands made at Bulles, four leagues off, which are manufactured from very fine flax, growing in the neighbourhood. The town would be very strong were it not surrounded almost on every side with the neighbouring mountains. However, it happily stood out a siege in the years 1443 and 1472; in the last of which the women defended the town, and repulsed the assailants; and for that reason they have the precedence of the men, in a solemn procession that is holden every year on the 10th of July. It lies 32 miles S. of Amiens, and 43 N. of Paris. Lat. 49, 26, N. Long. 2, 10, E.

BEAUVAISIS, in Latin Ager Bellovacensis, was formerly a part of Picardy; but has been long separated from it. It is now a subdivision of the third under-government, in the Isle of France; and is bounded on the N. by Picardy; on the W. by Vexin Normand, from which it is divided by the river Epte; on the S. by Vexin François; and on the E. by the bailiwick and county of Senlis, from which the Oise parts it.

BEAUVIN, a city of Burgundy in France, in E. Long. 4, 50. N. Lat. 47.

BEAUVOIR, (sur Mer), a maritime town of Poitou, in France, with the title of marquisate. W. Long. 1, 5, N. Lat. 46, 45.

BEAUVOIR, an inconsiderable place of Les Royanez, a small territory belonging to the Upper Delphinat, and government of Dauphiny, in France. It lies 25 miles S. W. of Nantz. Lat. 47, 2, N. Long. 2, 5, W.

BEAUVOISIN, (Pont), an open little town of Viennois, belonging to the Lower Delphinat, and government of Dauphiny, in France. It is divided by the river Guier into two parts, the eastern part of which belongs to Savoy, and the other to Dauphiny. This river forming the boundary between France and Savoy, is very rapid in its course, and for that reason called Vif; i. e. lively. The stone-bridge over it is defended both on the French and Savoy side with iron rails or grate-work; and each of them have a guard of invalids.

BEBELINGUIN, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Wirtemberg, seated on a lake from which proceeds the river Worm. E. Long. 9, 8, N. Lat. 48, 45.

BEBRA, or NEBRA, a mine-town belonging to the circle of Ertzberg, in Upper Saxony. It lies 10 miles N. W. of Freyberg. The Swedes formerly burnt it for not furnishing their forage at the time appointed: and, upon the inhabitants flying to the church for security they were whipped out of it.

BEBRYCIA, an ancient name of Bithynia, so called from the Bebryces, its inhabitants. The Bebryces were afterwards driven out by the Thracians, viz. the Bithyni and Thyni; from whom, in process of time, the country took the name of Bithynia. See BITHYNIA.

BEC, a borough belonging to Le Roumois, a territory of Upper Normandy, in the government of the latter name. It lies close by the confluence of the Rille and Bec. Here is an abbey of Benedictines.

BEC DE RIOUX, a borough belonging to the diocese of Beziers, in Lower Languedoc, and government of the latter name, in France.

BECANER, the capital of Becan, a territory of India on the Ganges, in Asia. It lies 180 miles E. of Delli. Lat. 28, 5, N. Long. 83, 4, E.

BECCLES, a large and populous market-town of Suffolk. It is situated on the Waveney, navigable hither by barges from Yarmouth, and from hence to Bungay. The streets are well paved, though the buildings are but mean. It has a noble church church and steeple, with two free-schools, well endowed; one of which is a grammar-school, with 10 scholarships for Emanuel College, Cambridge. Here are the ruins of another church, called Ingate. The quarter-sessions for Blithing are generally held here; and a common of 1000 acres belongs to the town. It lies six miles from Leostoff, and 107 from London. Its weekly market is on Saturday; and annual fairs on Ascension-day, St. Peter, June 29, October 2, Wednesday after St. Swithin, and July 15.

BECÉDE, a little town belonging to the diocese of St. Papoul, in Upper Languedoc, and government of the last name, in France.

BECHHOFEN, a market-town on the river Wiesel, in the principality of Onolzbach or Aufback, with a small castle.

BECHIER, or BICHIER, 18 miles beyond Alexandria, up the Nile, in Egypt, (Gemelli tells us) is a small castle, provided with many pieces of cannon, and garrisoned by 200 Turks. About which are a few huts of Arabs, barbarous in manners, and hideous to behold. These, though miserably poor, are so vilely devoted to idleness that they will not work on any account. There is a plentiful fishery here, particularly of mullets, whereof for a farthing they sell a large one. The natives live on this plenty of fish, and fruit; no meat being sold here.

BECHIN, a town of Bohemia, in the Circle of the same name. It was taken and burnt by general Bequoj in 1619. It is seated on the river Lausnics, in E. long. 15, 12. N. lat. 49, 14.

BECKENRIEDT, a village belonging to Underwald, one of the Swiss Cantons. It lies on the side of the Lucern lake, towards the frontiers of Ury-canton, two short leagues from Stantz. Here the four cantons of the lake generally assemble, when affairs of public importance require it.

BECKLY, a village in Suffex, six miles north-west of Winchelsea, with two fairs, on Easter-Thursdays and December 26.

BECKLEY, in Oxfordshire, where are annual fairs on Easter-Thursdays and December 26.

BECKUM, a town of the bishopric of Munster, in Germany, seated at the source of the river Verfe, in E. long. 8, 18. N. lat. 51, 46.

BECSANGIL, anciently Bithynia, a province of Natolia in Asia; bounded on the north by the Black Sea; on the west by the sea of Marmora; on the south by Natolia Proper; and on the east by the province of Bolli. The principal town is Bursa.

BECTOLSHIEM, a market-town in Suabia, and belongs to four co-heirs; two of whom are Roman Catholics, and two Lutherans, viz. the Dalbergs and Ebersbergs.

B E

BEDAL, a market-town of Richmondshire, a part of the North-Riding of Yorkshire. It is situated on a rivulet, which runs into the Swale near Gatenby. Bedal is the thoroughfare of the Roman Causeway, leading through Richmond to Bernard-Castle, and for 20 miles together called Leeming-lane. They are reputed good graziers hereabouts, the country producing a large breed of oxen. It is eight miles south of Richmond, six from North-allerton, and 180 north of London. Its weekly market is on Tuesday; its annual fairs are on Easter Tuesday, Whitsun-Tuesday, July 5 and 6, October 10 and 11. It lies in Lat. 54. 20, N. Long. 1, 20, W.

BEDARIDES, a large village belonging to the jurisdiction of Carpentras, and county of Venaissin, in the government of Provence, in France.

BEDARIEUX, or BEC D'ARIEUX, a town of Languedoc in France seated on the river Obe, in E. Long. 3, 24. N. Lat. 43, 29.

BEDAS, a people of Asia, in the island of Ceylon, who inhabit a large forest near the sea, and in the N. E. part of the island. They are savages, but very skilful in shooting with a bow. They have neither towns nor villages, and live by hunting, and the honey they find in the forest.

BEDBURG, a small town on the Erfft, in the archbishopric of Cologne.

BEDER, a town of Asia, in the peninsula on this side the Ganges, and in the dominions of the Great Mogul, 92 miles north of Golconda, and 150 south of Aurengabad. Long. 77, 40, E. Lat. 16, 50, N.

BEDFORD, a town in the county of West-Chester, New-York; 35 miles north from New-York, and 10 miles east from the Topang sea; 12 north from Long-island sound, on a branch of Minimock river, near the Stamford river, from the head of which it is distant three miles N. W.

BEDFORD, a small town in Middlesex county, Massachusetts-bay, on the river Concord, six miles W. of Woburn, and seven north from Concord.

BEDFORD, a town in Long-island, New-York, six miles south from New-York, and the same distance north-east from Jamaica bay. Major-general Grey destroyed 70 vessels, besides whale-boats and 26 store-houses full of merchandizes of the Americans in Bedford-harbour, Sept. 5, 1778.

BEDFORD-LEVEL, is a tract of fens, consisting of 300,000 acres in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Huntingdon, Northampton, Lincoln, Cambridgeshire, and the Isle of Ely, which appear to have been dry land formerly, by the ruins of houses, large trees, &c. that have been found in several parts. After divers expensive attempts to drain these fens in the reign of Henry VI. and Charles I. William duke of Bedford, in 1649, undertook took and completed it, and in the reign of Charles II. a corporation was established for the government and preservation of this great level, in whom the act vested 83,000 acres to be held of the manor of east Greenwich, in free and common soccage, 10,000 were vested in the king, and 2000 in the earl of Portland. In these fens are several duck-coys, where incredible quantities of wild fowl are taken during the season, there being no less than 3000 couple a week generally sent up to London from one single duck-coy, not far from Ely, which lets for 500l. a year.

BEDFORD, the capital of a shire in England; of the same name. It is divided by the river Ouse, into two parts; is a large, populous, well-built, and pleasant mayor town. Here are five parish-churches; the principal of which is St. Paul's; a very fine stone bridge over the river; and its high-street, particularly, is very handsome and well-built, with a good market-place, and much improved of late in new buildings. The Ouse has also been made navigable; and it is the only market-town of the county, north of that river. Here was formerly a strong castle, upon the site of which there is now one of the finest howling-greens in the kingdom. It has two hospitals; namely, St. John's and St. Leonard's, both for lepers or lazars; and another for eight poor people. Here is a well-endowed free-school for forty children. A great estate, supposed to be near 8000l. per annum, fell in 1762, to the corporation of Bedford, originally devised by Sir William Harper, knt. alderman, and sometime lord-mayor of London, in 5 Elizabeth. The leases expiring in 1760, caused this great increase of an estate, the ground-rent of which, before, did not yield 150l. per annum. It lies in Bedford-street, Bedford-row, Prince's-street, Theobald's-row, &c. near Holborn, in London.

Though Bedford is not upon any of the great roads in England, yet it is full of very good inns; here being greater plenty of all sorts of provisions than in many parts of this country, the higlers, or carriers, buying up great quantities for the use of the London markets. At Bedford is also a very good trade down the river to Lynn. And here is a great corn market, vast quantities of grain, particularly barley, being carried by barges to the last mentioned town, where it is shipped for Holland. The soil in the neighbourhood of Bedford is extremely rich, particularly producing great quantities of the best wheat, which is carried by waggon from hence, and the north parts of the county, to Hitchin and Hartford, where it is ground, and the flour is brought by land to London. It sends two members to Parliament. The weekly markets in this town are Saturdays, on the north side; and Tuesdays on the south side. Its yearly fairs are the first Tuesday in Lent, April 21, July 5, August 21, October 11, and December 19. It lies 22 miles south-east of Cambridge, and 44 north-west of London. Lat. 52, 8, N. Long. 0, 30, W.

BEDFORDSHIRE, one of the counties of England. It is bounded on the south and south-east by Hertfordshire; on the north and north-east by the shires of Huntingdon and Cambridge; on the north-west by Northamptonshire; and on the west by Buckinghamshire. It is 22 miles long, not quite 15 broad. It contains 323 square miles, nine hundreds, ten market towns, and 124 parishes, all in the diocese of Lincoln. The air of this country is mild and salubrious; the soil is a deep clay, and abounds in corn and pasture in the northern parts, but sandy in the middle, especially from Woburn to Potton, with a ridge of hills covered with woods. Its rivers are the Ouse and the Ivel. After the former has entered the country, between Bradfield and Turvey from Bucks, its course is so winding, that before it comes to St. Neot's, in Huntingdonshire, but eight miles distant, it runs upwards of 30 miles. It divides the county into two unequal parts; the northern, which is the smallest, is most woody; but the southern has wide fields, yielding plenty of white and strong barley, which, made into malt, is sent to London or Hertfordshire, besides vast quantities of wheat. In this county are very few manufactures, except those of straw-hats and bone-lace. Its forests and parks are well stocked with deer and other game. Its fat pastures abounding with cattle, produce great quantities of butter and cheese. Here is fullers earth, with woad for dying, and plenty of poultry. This county contains 260,000 acres, 67350 inhabitants, and sends four members to Parliament.

BEDGELEERT, a place in Carnarvonshire, North Wales; where are kept two annual fairs; on August 18, and September 22, for cattle.

BEDIFORD. See BIDDIFORD.

BEDKA, a town belonging to the sangiacate of Belgrade, and province of Servia, in European Turkey, or Turkish Illyria. It stands on the river Kolubra.

BEDOUI, or BEDUINS, a vagrant tribe of Arabs like Gypsies. See ARABIA. They lie in tents, and are dispersed over Egypt, Arabia, and the northern parts of Africa; but are governed by their own chiefs and laws. Their principal employment is feeding of cattle. Of this tribe are likewise some of the inhabitants in Socotora, an African island.

BEDOUIN, a borough belonging to the district of Carpentras, and county of Venaissin, in the government of Provence, in France. It is situated on the river Ouvèze.

BEDRIACUM, a village of Italy, situated, according to Tacitus, between Verona and Cremona, but nearer the latter than the former. From the account given by that historian, Cluverus conjectures tures that the ancient Bedriacum stood in the place where the city of Caneto now stands. This village was remarkable for the defeat of the emperor Galba by Otho, and afterwards of Otho by Vitellius.

BEDWIN-MAGNA, a village 5 miles south of Hungerford in Berkshire, in England. It has neither market nor fair; but is a borough by prescription, and sends two members to parliament. It is said to have been a considerable place in the time of the Saxons, and that the traces of its fortifications are still extant, says a late publication; but BEDWIN, (Great), is a market-town and portree-borough, in the S. E. part of Wiltshire, towards Berks, supposed by Dr. Stukely to be the Leucomagus of Ravennas. Its church is spacious, and built of flints, with a cement as hard as stone, of a crucial form, with a high tower, and ring of six bells. And among the ancient monuments here is one of Sir John Seymour, the Protector's father. Its weekly market is held on Tuesday, its annual fairs April 23 and July 15. It lies 18 miles N. W. of Salisbury, and 72 W. of London. It sends two members to parliament. Lat. 51, 25, N. Long. 1, 40, W.

BEDWINS, a sort of wandering Arabs that inhabit the deserts of Arabia. There are also some of the same stock in the deserts of Africa: they live in tents in both places, and frequently shift their abodes in search of grafs and water. They frequently rob caravans, when they happen to be the stronger party. The principal men are called Emirs and Sheiks.

BEEF-ISLAND, one of the smaller Virgin Islands, in the West Indies, situated between Dog Island W. and Tortula E. of it. It is about 5 miles long E. W. and near 1 broad N. S. in Sir Francis Drake's bay. Long. 63, 2. Lat. 18, 23.

BEER, a place of encampment of the Israelites, on their march, from the foot of Mount Pisgah, to the Promised Land. It was so called from the wells which the chiefs of the Israelites (they being streightened for water) dug there by God's direction, Numb. xxi. 16: and this gave birth to that song of Moses which was sung by the Israelites, the burthen of which begins with the words, "Spring up, O well, sing ye unto it!" Numb. xxi. 17, &c.

BEER, mentioned Judges ix. 21. as are the Berites II. Sam. xx. 14. in the former of which we read, that Jotham, one of the sons of Gideon, dwelt at Beer, for fear of Abimelech his brother. This Beer, according to Eusebius and Jerom, was seated 8 miles from Eleutheropolis to the N. and so must lie in the tribe of Judah. Others make it the same with Beeroth; which article see.

BEERING'S-ISLE, situated in Beering's Strait, which lies between the eastern part of Asia and the western part of America. This island and the strait derived their name from captain Beering, who discovered them in 1741, for Russia. His vessel was wrecked on the island in December of the same year, when he died: but the crew returned to Kamptschatka, in Ischirikoff's vessel, who accompanied Beering on this expedition. Sea otters, and many other animals whose furs are valuable, are caught upon this island by the inhabitants of Kamptschatka. It lies in latitude 55, N. Long. 165, W.

BEER-LAHAI-ROI. In Gen. xvi. Moses acquaints us, how Hagar, (being dealt with hardly by her mistress Sarah, for that she despised her mistress on account of her being barren) fled into the Wilderness, and there was found by the angel of the Lord, at a fountain in the way to Shur; which fountain, or well, was therefore called Beer-lahai-roi, i. e. the well of him that lives and sees me, and was situated between Kadesch and Bered.

BEEROTH lay, as we are told by Eusebius and Jerom, under the hill Gibeon, i. e. under the hill whereon Gibeon stood; being a town or village in their days, lying in the road from Ælia (or Jerusalem) to Neopolis (or Sichem) 7 miles distant from Jerusalem. They were of this town that killed Ishbosheth the son of Saul; and, cutting off his head, brought it to David at Hebron, who ordered the murderers themselves to be put to death. II. Sam. iv.

BEER-SHEBAH. In Gen. xxi. we learn, that Abraham, having entered into a solemn league of friendship with Abimelech, king of the Philistines, to secure his property in a well he had dug, to guard against the outrage of the Philistines, who had taken several wells from him before, and to ratify the aforesaid alliance, he presented the king with oxen, sheep, &c. From this Beer or Well the city, or considerable town, in process of time built near it, was called also Beer-sheba, which was the utmost bound of the Land of Promise on the S. as Dan was towards the N. whence came the proverb, "From Dan to Beer-sheba." This city was one of those which fell to the lot of the tribe of Simeon. Josh. xix.

BEES, (St.), so called from St. Bega, an Irish female saint, a little town of Cumberland, situated near a promontory of the same name; which last is not a mile from Egremont-castle. Here is a good grammar-school and library. From hence to the S. W. the shore draws in gradually, and appears from several ruins to have been fortified by the Romans at all convenient landing-places, against the inundations of the Irish Scots. Morelby is thought to have been one of these forts. It lies 2 miles from Whitehaven.

BEFORT, or BETFORT, a fortified town belonging to a bailiwick of the same name, in the Sundgaw, a subdivision of the government of Alsace, but in the circle of the Lower Rhine, Germany. It lies on the Hall, a rivulet which runs into the Dou. In its neighbourhood are excellent iron iron mines. Close by is an old castle upon a rock, and on one side is a fort in a rock dug out for the purpose, between both which the way leads into the town, and consequently is the key to Alsace. Besides, it is situated on the foot of Mount de Vauge, which separates Alsace from Lorraine, and the Sundgau from Franche Comte. By the peace of Munster in 1648, it was yielded to France, and Lewis XIV. added several works to it, as it covered also the two Burgundies. It lies 15 miles N. of Basil. Lat. 47, 35, N. Long. 7, 2, E.

BEGGAR'S-BUSH, Middlesex, 10 miles from London. Has a fair Sept. 12.

BEHSY, a small town in the Isle of France.

BEJA, an audience belonging to Alentejo, a province of Portugal; it contains a city and three towns.

BEJA, a city in the last-mentioned audience. It stands somewhat high on the Guadiana, and is surrounded with fruitful fields. It was anciently called Pax Julia, also Pax Augusta. It is surrounded with walls, in which are several towers, and has a stout castle. Three of the gates remain, which are of Roman architecture. It contains 6200 inhabitants, who are divided into four parishes; has a casa de misericordia, an hospital, and seven convents, and is the seat of the comarca, an auditor, proveditor, and a juiz de fora. It was formerly a bishop's see, and to its district belong 21 parishes. It lies 40 miles S. of Evora. Lat. 37, 55, N. Long. 8, 40, W.

BEJAR, a small town of Spanish Estremadura: it lies in a delightful valley, and in the middle between high mountains, whose tops are continually covered with snow. Among the fine springs here is one very cold, and another very hot. Both are good for several disorders, the one by drinking its waters; and the other by bathing in them. In the neighbourhood of the town is a peculiar kind of lake, which, when any bad weather is impending, becomes very tempestuous. It contains 700 houses.

BEICHLINGEN, a city of Thuringia, and circle of Upper Saxony, in Germany. It is the capital of a county bearing its name, and lies 15 miles N. of Weymar. Lat. 51, 26, N. Long. 11, 25, E.

BE/LA, or BELA, in Latin Bugella, the capital of the Biellese, a territory belonging to the lordship of Vercelli, in Piemont, a subdivision of Upper Italy. It is famous for an image of the Virgin. This place stands at the foot of the mountains, not far from the river Cerva, 32 miles N. of Turin. Lat. 45, 2, N. Long. 7, 45, E.

BEILSTEIN, a town belonging to the landgrate of Hesse in Germany, with a citadel. It lies 20 miles S. of Dillenburg. Lat. 50, 30, N. Long. 8, 5, E.

BEINA, a river of Walders, one of the bailiwicks belonging to the diocese of Christiana, in Norway. It falls into the lake Sperdillen.

BEINHEIM, a fort of Alsace in France, seated on the river Sur, near its confluence with the Rhine, in E. long. 8, 12. N. lat. 45, 2.

BEIRA, or BAIRA, a province of Portugal, and the largest of that kingdom. It is almost square, extending about 90 miles every way, except in some points that run into the Portuguese Estremadura, and Alentejo. It is bounded on the N. by Entre Douro e Minho, and Traz los Montes; from the former of which provinces the Douro divides it, on the E. by Spain; on the S. by Estremadura and Alentejo; and by the Mediterranean on the W. Its extent is from lat. 40 to 41 and a half, N. and from long 6 to 7 and a half, W. Their countryman, Emanuel de Faria gives the following character of its inhabitants.

"The people here are mostly poor; the gentry few, and inconsiderable; the garb and conversation mean; and the language hardly intelligible. The so much celebrated parsimony of the Lusitanians may be found in this province, where they have no other bed at night than the clothes they wear in the day. This however is so far from proceeding from parsimony, that their wants are entirely owing to their laziness. For though their land is capable of producing all sorts of grain, wines, fruits, &c. yet the natives are so addicted to begging, that even those who are worth something will follow the begging-trade, as well as those who are worth nothing. At a certain season of the year Spain swarms with these people, who, having ploughed and sown their fields, go abroad begging till harvest-time. Then they who sometime before begged your charity with doleful voices and sorrowful countenances, return to their homes and view their crops with pleasure."

But the true cause of all this will be found owing to the defect of the Portuguese constitution, the pride and harshness of the nobility, their excessive contempt of the poor, and thereby discouraging all industry among them. Besides, most of the lands are in the possession either of the nobility and gentry, or clergy. That the disease is not universal, plainly appears from the number of cities and noted towns, in which are still flourishing several manufactures, though these are not carried on so considerably as heretofore. The country is well fitted for inland productions, being less mountainous than some parts towards the N. and likewise better watered than some others. Its principal rivers are the Lomba, Arda, Paiva, Tevora, Tourones, and Coa, all which fall into the Douro; those of Zezar, Penful, Aravil, and Elia, discharge themselves into the Tagus; and lastly, the Mondego and Vouga, which, after receiving several considerable streams in their course, at length fall into the Mediterranean. Beira is commonly divided into the Upper and Lower Beira (Baira Alta and Baixa). The upper part is that which lies to the N. and on the sea-coast; coast; the lower towards the Spanish and Portuguese Estremadura. The soil produces wheat, rye, and millet. Some parts yield such excellent wine and oil that they export considerable quantities of these commodities. Mount Estrella, by the Romans called Mons Herminius, which lies in the district of Guarda, is very much celebrated. From the town of St. Roma, which lies at the foot of it, about two hours and a half are usually taken up in going to the top. In ascending, it is observed in several places, that the mountain is hollow, from the rumbling noise which is heard, of a stream running underneath. Farther one meets with a quarry of excellent alabaster, and on the top of the mountain are pastures uncommonly beautiful; together with several little streams which yield a very clear and well-tasted water. But the most remarkable thing on the mountain, is a lake which is surrounded with high rocks. Its water spouts out of the ground, is very clear, moderately warm, and in the middle seems to have a quivering motion, and little bubbles rising up from time to time upon it. As in one place it draws every thing towards itself, probably here is an opening, through which it runs out again, and is the spring of another lake lying something lower, that proceeds from the larger brooks, which forms a river running at the foot of the mountain. Lisbon is supplied all summer with snow-water, taken from a deep valley in this mountain, though the distance be upwards of 60 Spanish miles between both places. The Portuguese have frightful notions about the above-mentioned mountain and lake.

This province contains four episcopal cities, viz. Coimbra, Lamega, Viseu, and Guarda; 234 towns, the principal of which are Aveiro, Castel, Roderigo, Pinhel, Almayda, Cavillano, and Montamar; and 55 smaller privileged districts, called concelhos and contos. It consists of eight jurisdictions, six of which are correicaves; namely, Coimbra, Viseu, Lamego, Pinhel, Guarda, and Castello Branco; the other two are audiences, as Ouidoria Montemor, O Velho and Feira. According to the list given in by Luiz Caetano, this province, in the year 1732, contained 1094 parishes, in which were 551,686 souls. It has 10,000 settled militia.

BEKES, a county belonging to the Circle beyond the Theifs, in Upper Hungary. It includes a large heath or waste, through which runs the river Koros, and only some few towns. It is inhabited by Hungarian and Bohemian slaves, the latter of which follow the manners of the Hungarians. Of the same name with the county is a place, which was formerly a borough, but is now a town on the river Koros.

BEKETFALVA, a castle or seat of Count Eszterhazy, belonging to the lower district of the island of Schutt, in the county of Presburg; and

Circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary.

BEKIO, BEQUOI, or BIFECHE, an island, situated between the main stream of the river Niger or Senegal, and that branch bearing its own name, otherwise called Corow river, in Africa. It is about thirty-five leagues in length, and in some parts twelve or fifteen broad; and is also intersected by several smaller streams and canals, which resemble a groupe of little islands, covered with palm and other fruit trees, besides many towns and villages, that carry on a good trade. Bekio reaches almost to the mouth of the Niger, or Great river.

BEKIO, or BOQUIA, an island belonging to the Caribbees, in the Atlantic ocean. It is about 12 leagues in circuit, lying about 65 leagues due west from Barbadoes, and 55 north-west from Grenada. Its harbour is secured from all winds; but here is no fresh water: it is therefore frequented only by the Caribbeans of St. Vincent, who come hither to fish for turtle, &c. and to see the planters fragrant flower-plots. The soil produces wild-cotton-trees, and abundance of water-melons.

BELA, which was Zoar (Gen. xiv. 2.). In the vale of Siddim, (so called before the destruction of these parts by fire from heaven) it is pretty plain, lay the five cities, viz. Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Bela. From the number of these five cities this country is sometimes denoted by the name of Pentapolis, i. e. the country of five cities. Of these, four were destroyed by fire from Heaven. The fifth was preserved at the intreaty of Lot, who fled thither from Sodom.

BELA, one of the towns mortgaged to the crown of Poland, in the county of Zips, and Circle on this side the Thefs, in Upper Hungary. It is pretty spacious, and situated in a delightful plain, not far from the river Popper. It has suffered greatly by several fires.

BELA-BANYA, i. e. a white mine, anciently Fejer-Banya, a little town, indifferently situated and built; yet one of the royal and free-mine towns belonging to Schemnitz district, and county of Hont, in the Circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary. Its mines being discontinued, the inhabitants apply themselves to agriculture; but which becomes a laborious employment to them.

BELAC, or BELLAC, the capital of the Lower Marche, a subdivision of the government of the latter name, in France. It is the seat of a provincial bailiwick and jurisdiction; and has its name from an old strong castle which stood here. It lies on the Gartemp, 23 miles north-east of Limoges, and 160 south of Paris. Lat. 46, 18, N. Long. 1, 15, E.

BELAN,

B E

BELAN, or BELOW, a river in Westmoreland, which runs into the Eden near Great Musgrave.

BELBEUF, a marquisate of Le Vexin Normand, in Upper Normandy, and government of the last name, in France.

BELBROUGHTON, a village in Worcestershire, three miles north-west of Broomsgrove; with two fairs, on the first Monday in April, and on Monday before October 18, for horned-cattle, horses, and sheep.

BELCASTRO, anciently Petilia, a small city, the see of a bishop, suffragan to St. Severino, in the Further Calabria, a province belonging to the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy. It is the most southern part of Italy, near the gulph of Squillaci, and upon the river Nasaro, lying between Catanzaro and St. Severino, about five miles south of the latter, in Lat. 39, 15, N. Long. 17, 15, E.

BELCH, (Mount) one of the highest peaks of the Wasgaw mountains, in the government of Alface; which see.

BELCHAM-WATER, and PAUL's, Essex, two villages on the borders of Suffolk, near Clare. Fair November 30.

BELCHITE, a town of Spain, in the kingdom of Aragon; seated on the river Almonazir, in W. Long. 0, 30. N. Lat. 41, 19.

BELCOE, a town belonging to the county of Farmanagh, and province of Ulster, in Ireland. It is situated on Lough-Nilly, 18 miles south-east of Ballyshannon. Lat. 14, 2, N. Long. 8, 6, W.

BELEM, a strong tower on the north side of the river Tagus, about two miles from St. Julian, and one mile from Lisbon, the capital of Portugal. It defends the entrance into that city: and here all vessels that sail up to Lisbon, must come to.

In its large and costly church, called Nossa Senhora da Adjuda, and in the possession of monks of St. Jerom, founded by king Emanuel, are buried several kings and princes of the royal blood; and close by it is a village of the same name. Here is a public settlement for the maintenance of such gentlemen as have become poor and infirm in the king's service.

BELEM, or BETHLEM, the name given by Christopher Columbus to a river in the West-Indies, (which the natives call Yebra) because he came to that place on the feast of the three kings. He here planted a colony.

BELEME, or BELLESME, in Latin Belesmum, a little town of Great Perche, a sub-division of the territory of the latter name, in the government of Maine and Perche. It disputes the right of being the capital of the country with Mortagne. It is the seat of a royal viscounty, forest-court, salt magazine, and bailiwick, belonging to the jurisdiction of Chartres. In the neighbouring forest, and on the road between this town and Mortagne, is the mineral spring of Herse, the waters of which are reckoned salutary. It has an old castle, but much neglected. Its suburbs are large.

BELEME, a strong fort and oblong quadrangle belonging to the house of Austria. It is fortified with towers, commanding the roads at the foot of the mountain, between the cities of Trent and Roveredo, in the Circle of Austria, in Germany. The rocks which surround it are quite inaccessible. It lies beyond the torrent Persenna, which runs into the Adige, more than a league above Trent.

BELERIUM, (the Promontory of), as called by Diodorus, or Bolerium as by Ptolemy, who calls it also Antivestrum, is the most western point of Britain, now known by the name of the Land's-End.

BELEZERO, the capital of a province of the same name, in Russia. It is situated on the east shore of the White Sea, 100 miles N. E. of Novogorod. Lat. 61, 50, N. Long. 36, 10, E.

BELFAST, a handsome populous town belonging to the county of Antrim, and province of Ulster, in the N. of Ireland. It lies at the mouth of Logganwater, and bottom of Carrickfergus-bay. It is the principal port of all this part of the kingdom for trade, shipping, and wealth. Over the river it has a good stone-bridge, and vessels come up to Cormoyle road, a safe commodious harbour below the town, with a good depth of water. A considerable trade is carried on from this port to Scotland, particularly Glasgow. From Port Patrick in Scotland is the ferry for the packet-boat, which comes to this and other ports in Ireland. This place, and most of the adjacent country, being inhabited by Scots people, have their kirk-sessions, presbyteries, and regular judicatures, as in Scotland, though not with equal authority. It sends two members to parliament, and lies 9 miles S. W. of Carrickfergus. Lat. 54, 38, N. Long. 6, 15, W.

BELFORD, a small thoroughfare post-town of Northumberland, 12 miles from Alnwick, and in the road to Berwick, which runs all along the sands or sea shore. That town is in full view from thence for 10 or 12 miles together. At Belford are annual fairs on Tuesday before Whit-Sunday and August 23.

BELFORTE, a castle belonging to the marquisate of Ancona, one of the provinces of the Ecclesiastical State, in the Middle Division of Italy.

BELGALD, or BELGARDEN, a town belonging to the duchy of Cassubia, a subdivision of Lower Pomerania, and in the eastern part of it, in Germany. E. Long. 16, 5. Lat. 54. In some public acts it is called Belgrad and Belgradia. It is a very ancient town; but we find no certain account of it till the 11th century. It was heretofore very considerable both for number and valour of its inhabitants, but has been a great sufferer by wars and conflagrations, conflagrations. In 1506 it was burnt quite to the ground. The houses were soon rebuilt, but not with their former grandeur; and no sooner was the tower of the re-edified church up than it was thrown down by lightning. The like was its fate in 1562 and 1564. And after the treaty of Westphalia, when the town began to recover from all its disasters, one third of it was consumed by a fire, and the other two thirds were burnt down the year following.

BELGERN, one of the oldest towns in all Meissen, seated on the Elbe, and, though but small, holds both seat and voice at the land diets. Belgern formerly belonged to the bishopric of Wurzburg.

BELGÆ. See BELGIC GAUL.

BELGIC GAUL, (Gallia Belgica, Belgia, or Belgium) comprehended that country which is bounded by the British ocean on one side and the river Seine on the other: that is to say, the Low Countries or Netherlands. The original Belgæ, one of the fiercest and most warlike nations of Germany, having passed the Rhine, and driven the Gauls out of a canton of it, seated themselves so firmly in it, that neither their neighbours whom they perpetually annoyed, nor any other nation, could ever drive them out of it. Cæsar tells us, that they were not a little proud of this their settlement, and that they assumed a high hand over all their neighbours. [Comment. l. ii. c. 4.] and they were probably called Belgæ, that word in the old Teutonic (or German) signifying fierce and quarrelsome; and which is the character Cæsar gives them, who attributes this roughness of theirs to their living at a distance from the more civilized provinces of Gaul, and having few or no foreign merchants to trade with them, and bring them such commodities as serve to effeminate mankind. [Comment. l. i. c. 1.] These Belgæ afterwards peopled the coasts of Britain, and drove the natives into the inland parts, and waged continual wars with the Germans. The British Belgæ were at length settled to the N. and E. of the country of the Durotriges (or people of Dorsetshire) who possessed Somersetshire, Wiltshire, and Hampshire. In this country Ptolemy and Antoninus mention, on the coast, Magnus Portus (now Portsmouth) and Trifantonis Portus, (now Southampton), so called from the river Trifano (now Hampton) on which it stands. In the inland country stood Venta Belgarum, (now Winchester) a place of great note in ancient times; Aquæcalidæ or Aquæsolis, so called from its hot waters (now Bath), Iſcalis or Iſchalis (now Ilchester).

BELGOROD, or BIELOGOROD, one of the governments belonging to the European division of Russia. It is also a part of Little Russia, and inhabited by Kossacs. It comprehends the eight following territories; namely, the districts of Izuim, Charkow, Sumin, Kurski, the circles of Biologorod, Maluiki, and Siewski, with the province of Orel.

BELGOROD, or BIELGOROD, the capital of the last mentioned government. It is situated almost in the middle of Kussia, on the river Donez. It was built by the great duke Wladimir, in the year 990. About a quarter of a mile from the town lies a large chalk-hill, upon which it formerly stood, and from which it has also had the name of the White town; but afterwards it was removed to a valley between two mountains. It is divided into the Old and New town, and has three large suburbs. The old town is surrounded with a rampart and ditch; but the other only with pallisades. Here an archbishop resides. It was anciently called Sarkel, which is of the same import with its present Russian name. From Belgorod to the little town of Staroi Oskoi an intrenchment is thrown up, and another also between those of Nowoi, Oskol, and Werchosofnoizy, the latter small town lying in the government of Woronesch.

BELGRAD, one of the four sangiacates of Serbia, belonging to Turkish Illyrium, in Europe. It lies between the rivers Drino, Save, and Danube.

BELGRAD, the capital of the last-mentioned sangiacate of the same name, in Latin Alba Græca, or Taurinum: it is called by the Germans Griechisch-Weissenburg, and by the Turks Belgrad and Nandor-Fejervar, or Nandor-Alba. This is a considerable town and fortress, situated near the confluence of the Save and Danube. It consists of the Upper castle, the Town properly so called, the Water-town, and the Raschian-town; and formerly it was looked upon as the bulwark and key of Hungary. This is a large and populous place, with considerable trade; is built on a hill, and surrounded with a double wall, flanked with several towers. The suburbs are very extensive, and greatly resorted to by Turkish, Jewish, Greek, Hungarian and Sclavonian merchants. The streets, where the greatest trade is carried on, are covered with timber, and the goods generally sold to the customers out at the windows of their small shops. The rivers Tibiscus and Drave to the E. and Morawa to the W. being not far off, render the situation of Belgrad very commodious for commerce. And accordingly it is the principal staple-town in these parts; and to it trade the Ragusans, and the merchants of Vienna, who have factories here; also the Armenians and Jews, the former of which have a church; and the latter, being very numerous, a synagogue, in this town.

Here are two large bazars built cross-wise, with rich merchandise, and walks in the inside, and two exchanges of stone, built with two rows of pillars over one another. They have also here a stately caravanſera or public inn, and a college for young students.

B E

Students. It is the see of a bishop, who was formerly a suffragan to Buda. The emperor Sigismund annexed it to Hungary. The Turks attempted it thrice without success, till Solymán the Magnificent took it in 1521, which the Turks kept till 1688; when the Hungarians, under the duke of Bavaria took it by storm. In 1690 it fell again into the hands of the Turks, who, with an army of 60,000 men under the grand vizier, entering it sword-in-hand through a breach made by a bomb, cut off all the garrison, which was about 6000 strong, except the governor and 300 who made their escape. After this they fortified it very strongly; and though the Imperialists could not take it in the year 1693, yet they recovered it in August 1717, under prince Eugene, and kept possession of it till 1739, when the Hungarians were obliged to yield the place up to the Turks, after having first demolished its outer works, and left nothing standing but the old walls inseparably united to the city: so that now the Turks are possessed of Belgrad, the whole province of Servia, and all the country lying south of the Danube and Save, from the Black Sea to the river Unna. It was greatly damaged by an earthquake in June, 1763. Belgrad is situated sixty miles south of Temesvár. Lat. 46, 18, N. Long. 22, 30, E.

BELGRADE, a Greek village of Romania, in European Turkey, not far from Constantinople. It is situated in a wood, on the straits where the Grand Signor has kiosks, or small seats, where he sometimes resides; and foreign ambassadors have seats here also.

BELGRADO, a borough of Friuli, which is a territory belonging to the republic of Venice, and in the Upper Division of Italy.

BELHAVEN, a village on the south side of the frith of Forth, and shire of East Lothian, in Scotland. It lies on the coast not far from Dunbar.

BELHAVEN, or ALEXANDRIA, a town in Fairfax county, Virginia, on the west side of Patowmack river, 14 miles north-east of Colchester, 86 miles south-east of Winchester, and 30 miles west of Annapolis.

BELIA. See BELCHITE.

BELICIS, one of the principal rivers in the kingdom of Sicily, and Lower Division of Italy.

BELINGATE, a town and point of land in Barnstable county, in Plymouth colony, New-England, situated on the west side of the peninsula, in Cape Cod Bay, five miles north of Silver Springs, and ten south from Cape-Cod Harbour.

BELISNA, a river of Staradub-circle, which is a subdivision of the government of Kiew, in Russia, in Europe.

BELITZ, a town in the Circle of Zauch, on the river Niepelitz, and which flourished by means of the pilgrimages made there; but in 1526, and 1563, and 1700 it was burnt down.

B E

BELLA, a borough, and almost the largest in the whole district of Blatnitz, and county of Thurotz, in the Circle on this side the Danube, belonging to Lower Hungary.

BELLA, a small place of the Basilicate, one of the provinces belonging to the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy.

BELLAC. See BELAC.

BELLANTE, a small place belonging to the Further Abruzzo, one of the provinces of the kingdom of Naples, in the Lower Division of Italy.

BELLARGAN, an inland town of the Peninsula intra Gangem, in Asia; where, it is said, a great market for diamonds, rubies, and other precious stones is kept.

BELLAS, a little town of Torres Vedras, a district of Portuguese Estremadura. It contains 1240 inhabitants.

BELLCLARE, or rather BELACLOW, a town belonging to the county of Sligo, and province of Connaught, in Ireland. It lies 23 miles south-east of Sligo town. Lat. 53, 55, N. Long. 9, 5, W.

BELLE, a town of French Flanders. It lies nine miles south-west of Ypres, in Lat. 50, 45, N. Long. 2, 40, E.

BELLEGARDE, a strong place belonging to the small territory of Franc Alleu, a subdivision of the government of La Marche, in France.

BELLEGARDE, a little town belonging to the viguery of Perpignan, in the county and government of Roussillon in France. It is situated on a mountain, and consists of five regular bastions, besides a fort lying somewhat lower. Here are no other inhabitants than soldiers. This place serves for a defence to the difficult road or pass out of Roussillon into Catalonia, which is called Col de Pertuis.

BELLE-ISLE, anciently Colonesus, an island on the coast of Brittany, and in the diocese of Vannes, in Lower Brittany, and government of this last name in France. It lies about six leagues from the main-land. It is the largest of all the European islands belonging to the French king, being between 12 and 13 leagues in circumference. It is a mixture of craggy rocks and fertile soil; but the inhabitants are very poor, and the only trade carried on in it is the curing of pilchards. There are three harbours in the island, viz. Palais, Sauzon, and Goulford; every one of which labours under some capital defect, either in being exposed, shallow, or dangerous in the entrance. It contains only one little city called Le Palais, three county towns, 103 villages and about 5000 inhabitants. The island originally belonged to the earl of Cornouaille; but was afterwards yielded to the king, who in 1742, erected it into a duchy in favour of marshal Belleisle.

Belleisle. The town of Palais takes its name from a castle belonging to the duke de Belleisle, which stood in its neighbourhood; but was afterwards converted into a citadel fronting the sea, and strongly fortified. Its fortifications are composed principally of hornworks; and it is provided with two dry ditches, the one next the counterescarp, and the other so contrived as to secure the interior fortifications. This citadel is divided from the largest part of the town by an inlet of the sea, over which there is a bridge of communication. From the other part of the town, and which is most inhabited, it is only divided by its own fortifications and a glacis. In this state was the island in 1761, when an expedition was undertaken against it by a British fleet under the command of commodore Keppel, having on board a considerable land force commanded by general Hodgson. The fleet sailed from Spithead on the 20th of March, and arrived before Belleisle on the 7th of April. The next day it was agreed to attempt a landing on the south-east part of the island, in a sandy bay, near Lochmana point. Here the enemy were in possession of a little fort; they had moreover entrenched themselves on a hill excessively steep, the foot of which they had scarped away. The attempt was made in three places with great resolution, but the British were at last repulsed with the loss of 500 men. It was not before the 25th of April that the weather allowed a second attempt. This was made on a very strong place, where the enemy were rather less attentive, on account of the excessive steepness and difficulty of climbing up the rocks. Besides the principal attack, two feints were made at the same time to distract the enemy, whilst the men of war directed their fire with great success on the hills. These manœuvres gave brigadier-general Lambert with an handful of men, an opportunity of climbing up a very steep rock without molestation. This little body formed themselves in good order without delay, and were immediately attacked by 300 French. The British however, sustained this attack until the whole corps of brigadier-general Lambert, which had now likewise ascended, came to their assistance, with whose help they repulsed the enemy. The landing of all the forces being soon after made good, the French were driven into the town of Palais. Here the Chevalier de St. Croix, who commanded them, a brave and experience officer, resolved to hold out to the last extremity; and it was not till the 7th of June that he capitulated, and the garrison marched out with the honours of war. The island, however, was restored to the French by the treaty concluded in 1763. Belle-isle lies in Lat. 47, 21, N. Long. 3, 15, W.

BELLE-ISLE, (Straits) between the main-land of New-Britain, in North-America, and Newfoundland, about seven leagues broad, which the Indians called Esquimaux, make nothing of passing over, from an island on the east coast of New-Britain or Eskimaux. Lat. 52, 10, N. Long. 58, 5, W.

BELLENTZ, a city of Switzerland, near the N. extremity of the lake Lugano, bordering on the territory of the Grisons, and subject to the Swiss Cantons. In this place are three castles fortified in the ancient manner and has cannon; also a collegiate church, and in the suburbs are two convents and a nunnery, and a college for the instruction of youth in moral theology. It lies in a Lordship of the same name. Lat. 46, 10, N. Long. 9, 25, E.

BELLERICAY, only a hamlet of Essex, belonging to the parish of Great Burstead, and situated on a hill: but has a considerable market for corn, &c. which is on Tuesday, and its annual fair July 21. It lies four miles from Brentwood, and 23 from London.

BELLESME. See BELEME, a town of La Perche, and government of this latter name, in France. It lies 27 miles south-east of Alençon. Lat. 48, 22, N. Long. 39, E.

BELLESTAT, a small place belonging to the diocese of Mirepoix, in Upper Languedoc, and government of the latter name, in France. In its neighbourhood, on the river Lers, is the celebrated spring Fontestorbe, that is, the intermitting spring, issuing out of a cavity under the rocky mountain, but ceasing in hot weather. This interruption happens commonly in the months of June, July, August and September. But when it rains much for some time, it flows for about ten or twelve days successively, and in a very rainy summer it never ceases flowing. Its water is discharged into the Lers. The reason of which phenomenon is, that in the mountain are two reservoirs, the one lower than the other, communicating together by a proportionable canal, and some openings near the lowermost basin, through which the water runs, seem to account for the nature of this spring.

BELLEVILLE, a small town of Beaujolois, a subdivision of the government of Lyonnois, in France. Here is an abbey.

BELLEY, in Latin Bellica, the capital of Bugey, a sub-division belonging to the government of Burgundy, in France. It is situated between hills and small mountains, and about 2000 paces from the Rhone. It is the seat of a governor, election, royal bailiwick under the jurisdiction of Bourg in Bresse, a marsh-fee, and salt-granary. Its bishop is a suffragan to the metropolitan of Besançon, who styles himself a prince of the empire; his diocese consists of 221 parishes, and he has an annual income of 10,000 livres. The assessment he is rated at to the court of Rome is 330 florins. Besides the cathedral, there is only one parish-church, but four convents.

convents, and an abbey. It lies on the confines of Savoy, 16 miles N. W. of Chamberry. Lat. 45, 40. N. Long. 5, 20, E.

BELL, a town of S. Guinea, Africa, lies about 10 leagues up the country, W. of New Calabar town. It is goveened by a captain; but affords little trade to Europeans, except in some few slaves.

BELLINGHAM, in Suffolk-county, Massachusetts-bay, in the midway between Mendon and Wrentham, and 2 miles N. of Blackstone river, New England.

BELLINGHAM, a place of Northumberland; where an annual fair is kept on Saturday after Sept. 15. It suffered by a fire, August 25, 1780.

BELLINO, (St.), a church belonging to Polefine di Rovigo, a territory of the Venetian dominions, famous for a resort of Pilgrims to it.

BELLINZONA, a town of Italy, in the Milanese; and one of the bailiwicks which the Swiss possess in that country. It is seated on the river Jesino, 5 miles above the place where it falls into the Lago Maggiore, and it is fortified with two strong castles formerly joined together by a wall flanked with towers; but the Swiss have demolished a part of the fortifications. E. Long. 9, 0. N. Lat. 46, 8.

BELLUNESE, or the territory of BELLUNO, a subdivision of Trevigiana, one of the provinces belonging to the republic of Venice, in Upper Italy. It is bounded on the N. by the Cadurino, on the S. by the Feltrino, on the E. by Friuli and Trevisano, and on the W. by Trentino and Tirol. It is a small territory, but mountainous, containing great quantities of iron. On its E. side is a forest called Bosco da Remi di St. Marco, which is reckoned 16 miles long.

BELLUNO, a small, but pleasant and well-peopled town, also the capital of the last-mentioned province. It is situated on the river Piave, and is the see of a bishop under Aquileia. It lies 40 miles N. of Padua, and the same N. W. of Aquileia. Lat. 46, 20, N. Long. 12, 40, E.

BELMONT, a little town belonging to Savoy Proper, a subdivision of the duchy bearing the former name, in Upper Italy.

BELMONT, a small town belonging to Rouergue, a subdivision of Guyenne Proper, in the government of the former name, and of Gascony, in France.

BELMONTE, a little town belonging to the district of Castello Brayco, and province of Beira, in Portugal. It has 1140 inhabitants, two parishes, with a district of two more.

BELMONTE, a mountain castle of the Hither Casabria, in the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy. It stands on the sea.

BELOZERO, or BILEJEZORA, a province of Muscovy: it is small, and almost circular, and takes its name from a lake called Biele-ozoro, which signifies the white lake. It is bounded on the E. by Jaroslaw, on the N. by Wologda, on the W. by Great Novogorod, and on the S. by the duchy of Twere. The lake in it is about 13 leagues in length, and 6 in breadth where broadest, but much narrower in other parts. It abounds with variety of fish. The rest of this province is so full of woods, lakes, and fens, that the ways through it are impassable, except in winter, when they are frozen: yet some parts are well-inhabited, and produce corn and good pasture. This province formerly had its own princes.

BELOZERO, or OZERO, a large, populous, and very strong town, belonging to the last-mentioned province of the same name. It is situated on the Lake Ozero; and its castle, which is surrounded with the water of the lake, is reckoned impregnable. It contains about 500 dwellings, and 18 churches, and in the castle are two churches, the archbishop's palace, the woywode's house, and revenue offices. It lies about 60 miles E. of Novogorod Veliki, and 65 N. of Moscow. Lat. 59, 0, E. Long. 39, 0, E.

BELPUCH, a little town of Catalonia, in Spain, where is a celebrated monastery of Franciscans.

BELRAIN, or BEAURAIN, a borough, or large village, belonging to the German bailiwick, a subdivision of the duchy of Lorraine, in the government of the latter name and Bar, now subject to France. It is the principal place of a lordships.

BELSKOI, an inconsiderable place belonging to the circle and province of Irkutsk, in the Asiatic part of Russia, in Siberia.

BELT, the Great, a famous strait of Denmark, between the Island of Zeland and that of Funen, at the entrance of the Baltic Sea. This strait is not so commodious, nor so much frequented, as the Sound. In 1658 this strait was frozen over so hard that Charles Gustavus, king of Sweden, marched over it with a design to take Copenhagen.

BELT, (the Lesser), lies to the W. of the Great Belt, between the Island of Funen and the coast of Jutland. It is one of the passages from the German ocean to the Baltic, though not 3 miles in breadth, and very crooked.

BELTON, a place in Lincolnshire, which suffered much by a fire May 26, 1776. A yearly fair is kept on Sept. 25.

BELTURBET, a little town belonging to the county of Cavan, and province of Ulster, in the N. of Ireland. It has a harbour for boats on the river Ern; in which the Popish rebels, in 1641, drowned several of the Protestants. It lies 8 miles N. of Cavan. Lat. 54, 7, N. Long. 7, 35, W.

BELTZ, or BELZ, a woywodship or palitinate belonging to Little or Red Russia, in the Lesser Poland. Its name in Latin is Palatinus Belcensis. It

It comprehends three districts; namely, Busk, Horodia, and Hraboweic. Of the same name in this palatinate is a spacious town, with a woywod, castle-warden, starost, provincial-court, and diet. It lies 35 miles N. of Lemberg. Lat. 50, 5, N. Long. 25, 5, E.

BELVEDERA, one of the three divisions of the ancient Peloponnesus (those of Sacania and Brazzo di Maina being the two other) or present Morea, now part of the Turkish empire in Europe, has the Ionian Sea on the W. the Gulph of Patras N. Sacania, Brazzo di Maina, and the Gulph of Coron E. and the Mediterranean S. These three divisions containing ancient Achaia Proper, Elis, Sicyonia, and Messenia. The most remarkable towns are Patras, Chiarenza, Modon, Belvedera, Coron, Calamata, Navarino, Olympia.

BELVEDERA, capital of the province of its name, is the Elis of the ancients, and stands on the banks of the river Peneus, about 14 miles from the coast of the Ionian sea to the E. 12 from Tornese castle to N. E. and 40 from Patras to S. W. It was formerly famous for producing excellent horses, being by the Greeks called Caloscopium, which is the same with its Italian name Belvidera, from the pleasantness of its situation; but it is now, being subject to the Turks, much decayed. From hence are imported the raisins we call belvideras.

BELVEDERE, or Villa Aldobrandini, a fine seat at Fiescati, 12 miles from Rome, remarkable for its curious water-works, a noble cascade, fine wilderness, and fresco paintings.

BELVEDERE, a castle, or fine seat, with the title of a principality, belonging to the house of Caraffa. It is situated in the Hither Calabria, a province of the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy.

BELVENIE, or BAVENY, a district of Bamfshire, in Scotland.

BELVER, a little place of Portuguese Estremadura. It is situated on the Tagus.

BELVIS, a small town of Spanish Estremadura, with a strong castle, situated between mountains.

BELVOIR, or BEVER, a fine vale, which, about a mile beyond Grantham N. W. spreads itself into the counties of Lincoln, Leicester, and Nottingham.

BELVOIR-CASTLE, so called from its beautiful situation on a high precipice, in Lincolnshire, but on the edge of Leicestershire. From the hill is a prospect into the shires of Lincoln, Nottingham, Derby, and Leicester: and about it are 36 manors belonging to it, that contain immense subterranean treasure in lead-mines and coal-pits.

BELVOIR, a pleasant seat in the county of Down, and province of Ulster, in the N. of Ireland. It is very elegantly laid out in gardens; the best part of which lie over the Legan river, which is navigable to it. And but a little way from Belvoir is a very neat church.

BELUNUM, a town of Rhaetia, above Feltria, in the territory of the Veneti; now Belluno, capital of the Bellunese in the territory of Venice.

BELUS, a small river of Galilee, at the distance of two stadia from Ptolemais, running from the foot of Mount Carmel out of the lake Cendevia. Near this place, according to Josephus, was a round hollow or valley, where was a kind of sand fit for making glass; which, though exported in great quantities, was found to be inexhaustible. Strabo says, the whole of the coast from Tyre to Ptolemais has a sand fit for making glass; but that the sand of the rivulet Belus and its neighbourhood is a better sort; and here, according to Pliny, the making of glass was first discovered.

BELZIG, a town, under mediate vassalage in Saxony, with a seat and voice at the provincial diets. Here is a citadel and superintendancy; and in 1750 it suffered greatly by fire.

BEMBEA, a province of the kingdom of Angola in Africa. It is divided into Higher and Lower; and extends on one side along the sea, and on the other divides Angola from the foreign states on the south. The country is large, populous, and abounding with cattle; with the fat of which the inhabitants anoint their heads and bodies, and clothe themselves with their hides coarsely dressed. They are addicted to the same idolatrous superstitions with the rest of the natives, but speak a quite different language. The province is watered by a river called Lutano, or San Francisco, which abounds with crocodiles, sea-horses, and monstrous serpents, that do a great deal of mischief.

BEMISTER, a market-town of Dorsetshire, 12 miles N. W. of Dorchester, and 120 W. of London. Its two prebends, Bemista Prima and Bemista Secunda, are in the gift of the bishop of Salisbury. Lat. 50, 45, N. Long. 2, 50, W.

BEMPER, a chain of mountains, in Asia, which divides India from Tartary.

BEMPOSTA, a little place belonging to Miranda district, and province of Traz los Montes, in Portugal. In it is one parish, containing 400 souls. To its district belong four parishes. Of the same name is another small place, in the district of Castello-Branco, belonging to the province of Beira, in the same kingdom.

BEM-VIVER, a district of Porto, belonging to Entre Douro e Minho, a province of Portugal. It contains 16 parishes.

BENATCK, or BENATKY, a small town and citadel on the river Iser, in the Circle of Bunzlau. It belongs to the count of Klenau, and was the residence of the celebrated Tycho Brahe.

BENAVARRI, or BENHUABEI, a valley belonging to the earldom of Ribagorza, among the Pyrennees,

B E

Pyrennees, and province of Aragon, in Spain. Of the same name is a little town, the principal of all the rest, where is plenty of provisions, 26 miles N. of Belaguer, in Catalonia. Lat. 42, 5, N. Long. 0, 10, E.

BENAVENTO, a town belonging to the audience of Aviz, and province of Alentejo, in Portugal. It contains upwards of 2100 inhabitants, and has a district of two parishes. Another town of the same name belongs to Leon, in Spain. It lies on the river Elsa, 40 miles south of the city of Leon. Lat. 42, 10, N. Long. 6, 5, W.

BENAVILLA, a mean place belonging to the audience of Aviz, and province of Alentejo, in Portugal.

BENBECULA, one of the western islands of Scotland, two miles north of South-Uist, and between it and North-Uist. It is parted from both by sandy channels, which at ebb are not above knee-deep, but navigable by boats at time of flood. To the east of these channels lie several islands, dangerous to sea-faring people. Benbecula is three miles from north to south, and the same from east to west, and about ten miles in circuit. On its east side is a harbour or bay for small vessels that sometimes catch herrings. Here are several fresh-water loughs or lakes, well stocked with fish and fowl; and the ruins of ancient forts or castles. The east side is all arable land, though a thin and sandy soil. On the west side they take abundance of salmon. Here are many little chapels, and in the Romish times they had a nunnery in this island. The inhabitants are Papists, and mostly Macdonalds, the proprietor being of that name.

BENCOOLEN, a town and fort belonging to the English East-India company, on the south-west coast of the island of Sumatra, in Asia: whence large quantities of pepper, the produce of the neighbouring country, are imported into Europe. The first fort the English built here in 1690, about five years after their first settlement, they called York-fort, where is a convenient river on its north-west side, for bringing the pepper; only there is a dangerous bar at the mouth of the river. The road formed by Rat-island and the land-point of Sillebar, is inconvenient, ships in it being violently tossed during the south-west monsoons. This place, almost two miles in circuit, is known at sea by a high slender mountain which rises in the country 20 miles beyond it, called the Sugar-loaf. The town being unhealthy, as standing on a stinking morass, in 1719 the company built a fort three miles farther, on an eminence; a more salubrious and defensible spot, and called it Fort Marlborough. Through the ignorant pride and indiscretion of the governors generally sent thither, the natives have been so provoked, that several attempts have been made by them to drive the English factory from thence; particularly in the last-mentioned year, before the fort was quite finished, they set fire to it and the town, massacred a great part of the garrison, the governor and the remainder embarking for Batavia, and leaving every thing behind them. But in a year after matters being accommodated, the English factory were permitted to return and carry on their trade as before. About a quarter of a mile from the sea stands an Indian village, whose houses are small and low, and built on posts. The country about Bencoolen is mountainous and woody and the air unwholesome, the mountains being continually covered with thick heavy clouds that produce lightning, thunder and rain. There is no beef to be had, except that of buffaloes, which is not very palatable; and indeed provisions of all kinds, except fruit, are pretty scarce. The pepper brought hither comes from the territories of two Rajahs; the one residing at Single-demon, at the bottom of a bay 10 or 12 miles to the north; and the other at Busar, 10 miles to the east, but they have houses here. The English pay them half a dollar custom for every 560 pounds of pepper, as they do for every such quantity to the owner ten Spanish dollars, weighing each seventeen penny-weights and twelve grains. The natives of Bencoolen build their houses on bamboo-pillars; the Chinese, Portuguese, and English having separate quarters, after the manner of their respective countries; the last of these building them with timber, not for want of brick or stone, but by reason of the frequent earthquakes which happen here. Bencoolen lies in Lat. 4, 5, S. Long. 101, 5, E.

BENDER, a name given it by the Turks, which signifies a pass. It is a town of Bessarabia, or Budjack Tartary, in European Turkey, delivered up to them by a prince of Moldavia; and is a Turkish fortress or frontier, upon the Neister, and formerly called Tigine. Its commandant is a basha. To Bender Charles XII. of Sweden retreated, after his defeat at Pultowa, by the Russians, in 1709; and here he was subsisted several years by the Turks, till, refusing to quit their territories, they attacked him; and then being taken prisoner, he was removed to the neighbourhood of Adrianople, where he continued another year, till he returned to his own dominions. It lies 100 north-west of Bielgorod, and above 390 miles north of Constantinople. Lat. 46, 40, N. Long. 29, 0, E.

BENDER-BAKEL, is a sea-port town in the same province, &c. as the foregoing.

BENDERDELEM, or BANDAR-DILLON, a town of Faristan, one of the provinces of Persia, in Asia, it is a large place, on the sea-coast, with wide plains in its neighbourhood, which produce plenty of wheat and barley, besides good pasture.

BENDERICK, or BENDER-REGH, i. e. Sandy-port, a small town of the last-mentioned province, vince, upon the Persian gulph, where it runs into a long, narrow, and winding channel, but not deep. Most of the houses and the walls round them are made of mats; though some are of bricks baked in the sun. Most of its inhabitants are Arabs, who all speak Arabic and Persian. The soil around it is sandy, and the water they drink is fetched from a well a good way off. Here a great deal of corn from the adjacent valleys, is shipped for Bahara and Basora, whence they have their dates.

BENDERMASSEN, a town of the island of Borneo in Asia, and capital of a kingdom of the same name. It has a good harbour; and stands in E Long. 113, 50. S. Lat. 2, 40.

BENDORF, a borough seated at the conflux of the Sayn with the Rhine, in the county of Sayn, inhabited both by Catholics and Lutherans, who have the free exercise of their religion. Till 1744 the town was held in common with Sayn-Hachenberg.

BENE, a strong place in a district belonging to the city of Mondovi, and principality of Piedmont, in Upper Italy.

BENEDETTI, a villa near the Potta di S. Pancratio at Rome; the walls of which, both inside and out, are covered with proverbs and moral sentences, directed against the fair sex.

BENEDITTO, or BENDITTO, (St.) a town of the Mantuan, in Upper Italy, on the south side of the Po, where is a Benedictine abbey, inferior to no monastery in Italy for riches and splendour.

BENE-JAAKAN (mentioned Numb. xxxiii. 31, 32.) an encampment of the Israelites between Moseroth and Hor-hagiogad; which name signifies the Children of Jaakan. The word Beeroth (mentioned in Deuteronomy x. 6. but not in Numbers) denotes the particular place among the children of Jaakan where they encamped. The word is indeed rendered in all the old versions as well as ours as a proper name; but it may be taken appellatively to denote Wells; and so imports that the Israelites pitched by the Wells belonging to the children of Jaakan: and this is the more probable, if we consider of what value Wells or water were in those desert places.

BENENDEN, a vicarage of Kent, in the gift of the University of Oxford. At this place is also an annual fair on May 15, for horses and cattle.

BENESCHAU, an open town in the Prussian part of Troppau, belonging to baron Zuana, and formerly had a silver mine in its neighbourhood.

BENESSOW, a town belonging the count of Wittby, in the Circle of Kaurzim, holding fairs.

BENESSOW, BENSEN, or PANZEN, a small town belonging to the counts of Clary and Thun, in the Circle of Leutmaritz, and in which the best paper in all Bohemia is made.

BENESOEUF, a town of Egypt, seated on the western shore of the Nile, and remarkable for its hemp and flax. E. Long. 31, 0. N. Lat. 29, 10.

BENEVENTE, a town of the province of Leon in Spain, seated on the river Elsa, in W. Long. 5, 5. N. Lat. 42, 4.

BENEVENT, or BENEVENTO, a duchy in the Further Principate, belonging to the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy, erected in 571 by the Longobardi, in favour of their countryman Soto, and was at that time more considerable than the duchies of Spoleto and Friuli, reaching farther north than the kingdom of Naples. It was without interruption subject to the Frank and German emperors and kings, but mostly with dukes and regents of its own, till the year 1053, when the emperor Henry III. surnamed the Black, gave it up to Pope Leo IX. under certain limitations. Its capital of the same name is situated at the confluence of the rivers Sabato and Calore, here forming the Volturno, in a fruitful country. It is fortified, and the see of an archbishop. It was anciently called Maleventum; but upon the Romans sending a colony thither, it was called Beneventum. The duchy and town are still subject to the Pope. In the year 1688 it was almost destroyed by an earthquake; when the archbishop (afterwards Pope Benedict XIII.) was dug alive out of the ruins, having been providentially preserved by an incurvated beam which fell over him, and so kept off the ruins from crushing him to death. Upon his promotion to the papal chair, he rebuilt the city. It lies 34 miles north-east of Naples, and 130 south-east of Rome. Lat. 41, 15. N. Long. 15, 30, E.

BENEVENTUM, a town of the Samnites, formerly called Maleventum from the unwholesomeness of the wind, and under that appellation it is mentioned by Livy; but after a Roman colony was led thither in the 485th year of the city, it came to have the name of Beneventum, as a more auspicious title. It is mentioned by Horace as an ancient city, said to have been built by Diomedes before the Trojan war. Now Benevento.

BENFIELD, a little town belonging to a bailiwick of the same name, in Lower Alsace, and government of the latter name, now subject to France. It is situated on the Ill, and was once a fortified place, 15 miles south of Strasburgh. Lat. 48, 25. N. Long. 7, 30, E.

BENFLEET, a large village, in the marsh-lands of Essex. At South Benfleet a fair is kept annually on the 24th of August, for toys.

BENGAL, a vast country of Asia, bounded by the kingdom of Asham and Arracan on the east; by several provinces belonging to the Great Mogul, on the west; by frightful rocks on the north; and by the sea on the south. It extends on both sides

the Ganges, which rises from different sources in Thibet; and, after several windings through Caucasus, penetrates into India, across the mountains on its frontier. This river, after having formed in its course a great number of large, fertile, and well peopled islands, discharges itself into the sea, by several mouths, of which only two are known and frequented.

Towards the source of this river, was formerly a city called Pallibothra. Its antiquity was so great, that Diodorus Siculus makes no scruple of assuring us, that it was built by that Hercules to whom the Greeks ascribed all the great and surprising actions which had been performed in the world. In Pliny's time its opulence was celebrated through the whole universe; and it was looked upon as the general mart for the people inhabiting both sides of the river that washed its walls.

The history of the revolutions that have happened in Bengal is intermixed with so many fables that it does not deserve our attention. All we can discover is that the extent of this empire has been sometimes greater, and sometimes less; that it has had fortunate and unfortunate periods; and that it has alternately been formed into one single kingdom, or divided into several independent states. It was under the dominion of one master, when a more powerful tyrant, Akbar, grandfather of Aurenzebe, undertook the conquest of it; which was begun in 1590, and completed in 1595. Since this era Bengal has always acknowledged the Mogul for its sovereign. At first, the governor to whom the administration of it was intrusted, held his court at Rajah-Mahul, but afterwards removed it to Dacca. Ever since the year 1718, it has been fixed at Muxadavad, a large inland town two leagues distant from Cassimbuzar. There are several nabobs and rajahs subordinate to this viceroy, who is called subah.

This important post was occupied for a long time by the sons of the Great Mogul, but they so frequently misemployed the forces and treasure at their disposal, to raise disturbances in the empire, that it was thought proper to commit that province to men who had less influence, and were more dependent. True it is, the new governors gave no alarm to the court of Delhi; but they were far from being punctual in remitting the tribute they collected to the royal treasury. These abuses gained farther ground after the expedition of Kouli Kan; and matters were carried so far, that the emperor, who was unable to pay the Marattas what he owed them, authorised them, in 1740, to collect it in Bengal themselves. These banditti, to the number of 200,000, divided themselves into three armies, ravaged this fine country for ten years together, and did not leave it till they had extorted immense sums.

During all these commotions, despotic government, which unhappily prevails all over India, maintained its influence in Bengal; the small district of Bissenpour excepted, which had preserved, and still continues to preserve, its independence. See BISENPOUR.

Though the rest of Bengal is far from enjoying the same happiness, it is nevertheless the richest and most populous province in the whole empire. Besides its own consumption, which is necessarily considerable, its exports are immense. One part of its merchandize is carried into the inland country. Thibet takes off a quantity of its cottons, besides some iron, and cloths of European manufacture. The inhabitants of those mountains fetch them from Patna themselves, and give musk and rhubarb in exchange. But the trade of Thibet is nothing in comparison of that which Bengal carries on with Agra, Delhi, and the provinces adjacent to those superb capitals, in salt, sugar, opium, silk, silk-stuffs, and an infinite quantity of cottons, and particularly muslins. These articles, taken together, amounted formerly to more than 1,750,000*l.* a year. So considerable a sum was not conveyed to the banks of the Ganges; but it was the means of retaining one nearly equal, which must have issued from thence to pay the duties, or for other purposes. Since the viceroys of the mogul have made themselves nearly independent, and send him no revenues but such as they choose to allow him, the luxury of the court is greatly abated, and the trade we have been speaking of is no longer so considerable.

The maritime trade of Bengal, managed by the natives of the country, has not suffered the same diminution, nor was it ever so extensive as the other. It may be divided into two branches, of which Catek is in possession of the greater part.

Catek is a district of some extent, a little below the most western mouth of the Ganges. Balasore, situated upon a navigable river, serves it for a port. The navigation to the Maldives, which the English and French have been obliged to abandon on account of the climate, is carried on entirely from this road. Here they load their vessels with rice, coarse cottons, and some silk-stuffs, for these islands; and receive cowries in exchange, which are used for money in Bengal, and are sold to the Europeans.

The inhabitants of Catek, and some other people of the Lower Ganges, maintain a considerable correspondence with the country of Asham. This kingdom, which is thought to have formerly made a part of Bengal, and is only divided from it by a river that falls into the Ganges, deserves to be better known, if what is asserted here be true, that gun-powder has been discovered there, and that it was communicated from Asham to Pegu, and from Pegu Pegu to China. Its gold, silver, iron, and lead mines, would have added to its fame, if they had been properly worked. In the midst of these riches, which were of very little service to this kingdom, salt was an article of which the inhabitants were so much in want, that they were reduced to the expedient of procuring it from a decoction of certain plants.

In the beginning of the present century, some Bramins of Bengal carried their superstitions to Asham, where the people were so happy as to be guided solely by the dictates of natural religion. The priests persuaded them, that it would be more agreeable to Brama if they substituted the pure and wholesome salt of the sea to that which they used. The sovereign consented to this, on condition that the exclusive trade should be in his hands; that it should only be brought by the people of Bengal; and that the boats laden with it should stop at the frontiers of his dominions. Thus have all these false religions been introduced by the influence and for the advantage of the priests who teach, and of the kings who admit, them. Since this arrangement has taken place, 40 vessels from 500 to 600 tons-burden each are annually sent from the Ganges to Asham laden with salt, which yields 200 per cent. profit. They receive in payment a small quantity of gold and silver, ivory, musk, eagle-wood, gum-lac, and a large quantity of silk. Excepting these two branches of maritime trade, which, for particular reasons, have been confined to the natives of the country, all the rest of the vessels sent from the Ganges to the different sea-ports of India belong to the Europeans, and are built at Pegu.

A still more considerable branch of commerce, which the Europeans at Bengal carry on with the rest of India, is that of opium. Patna, situated on the Upper Ganges, is the most celebrated place in the world for the cultivation of opium. The fields are covered with it. Besides what is carried into the inland parts, there are annually 3000 or 4000 chests exported, each weighing 300 pounds. It sells upon the spot at the rate of between 24 and 25*l.* a chest on an average. This opium is not purified like that of Syria and Persia, which we make use of in Europe; it is only a paste that has undergone no preparation, and has not a tenth part of the virtue of purified opium.

The Dutch send rice and sugar from their settlements to the coast of Coromandel; for which they are paid in specie, unless they have the good fortune to meet with some foreign merchandise at a cheap rate. They send out one or two vessels laden with rice, cottons, and silk: the rice is sold in Ceylon, the cottons at Malabar, and the silk at Sarat; from whence they bring back cotton, which is usefully employed in the coarser manufactures of Bengal. Two or three ships laden with rice, gum-lac, and cotton stuffs, are sent to Bassora; and return with dried fruits, rose-water, and a quantity of gold. The rich merchandise carried to Arabia is paid for entirely in gold and silver. The trade of the Ganges with the other sea-ports of India brings 1,225,000*l.* annually into Bengal. Though this trade passes through the hands of the Europeans, and is carried on under their protection, it is not entirely on their own account. The Moguls, indeed, who are usually satisfied with the places they hold under the government, have seldom any concern in these expeditions; but the Armenians, who, since the revolutions in Persia, are settled upon the banks of the Ganges, to which they formerly only made voyages, readily throw their capitals into this trade. The Indians employ still larger sums in it. The impossibility of enjoying their fortunes under an oppressive government does not deter the natives of this country from labouring incessantly to increase them. As they would run too great a risk by engaging openly in trade, they are obliged to have recourse to clandestine methods. As soon as an European arrives, the Gentoos, who know mankind better than is commonly supposed, study his character; and, if they find him frugal, active, and well informed, offer to act as his brokers and cashiers, and lend or procure him money upon bottomry, or at interest. This interest, which is usually 9 per cent. at least, is higher when he is under a necessity of borrowing of the Cheyks.

These Cheyks are a powerful family of Indians, who have, time immemorial, inhabited the banks of the Ganges. Their riches have long ago procured them the management of the bank belonging to the court, the farming of the public revenue, and the direction of the money, which they coin afresh every year in order to receive annually the benefit arising from the mint. By uniting so many advantages, they are enabled to lend the government 1,750,000*l.* 2,625,000*l.* or even 4,375,000*l.* at a time. When the government finds it impossible to refund the money, they are allowed to indemnify themselves by oppressing the people. That so prodigious a capital should be preserved in the center of tyranny, and in the midst of revolutions, appears incredible. It is not possible to conceive how such a structure could be raised, much less how it could be supported for so long a time. To explain the mystery, it must be observed, that this family has always maintained a superior influence at the court of Delhi; that the nabobs and rājahs in Bengal are dependent upon it; that those who are about the person of the subah have constantly been its creatures; and that the subah himself has been maintained or dethroned by the intrigues of this family. To this we may add, that the different branches of it, and the wealth belonging to them, being dispersed, it has never been possible to ruin above one half of the family at a time, which would still have left them more resources than were necessary to enable them to pursue their revenge to the utmost. The Europeans who frequent the Ganges have not been sufficiently alarmed at this despotism, which ought to have prevented them from submitting to a dependence upon the Cheyks. They have fallen into the snare, by borrowing considerable sums of these avaritious financiers, apparently at 6, but in reality at 13 per cent. if we take into the account the difference between the money that is lent them, and that in which they are obliged to make their payments. The engagements entered into by the French and Dutch Companies have been kept within some bounds; but those of the English Company have been unlimited. In 1755 they were indebted to the Cheyks about 1,225,000l.

Such is the conduct of this considerable set of men, who are sole managers of the European trade at Bengal. The Portuguese, who first frequented this rich country, had the wisdom to establish themselves at Chatigan, a port situated upon the frontier of Arracan, not far from the most eastern branch of the Ganges. The Dutch, who, without incurring the resentment of an enemy at that time so formidable, were desirous of sharing in their good fortune, were engaged in searching for a port which, without obstructing their plan, would expose them the least to hostilities. In 1603 their attention was directed to Balasore; and all the companies, rather through imitation than in consequence of any well concerted schemes, followed their example. Experience taught them the propriety of fixing as near as possible to the markets from whence they had their merchandize; and they sailed up that branch of the Ganges which, separating itself from the main river at Mourcha above Cassimbuzar, falls into the sea near Balasore under the name of the river Hughly. The government of the country permitted them to erect warehouses wherever there were plenty of manufactures, and to fortify themselves upon this river.

The first town that is met with in passing up the river is Calcutta, the principal settlement of the English Company. See CALCUTTA.

Six leagues higher is situated Frederic Nagore, founded by the Danes in 1756, in order to supply the place of an ancient settlement where they could not maintain their ground. This new establishment has not yet acquired any importance, and there is all the reason imaginable to believe that it will never become considerable. Two leagues and an half higher, lies Chandernagore, a settlement belonging to the French. At the distance of a mile from Chandernagore, is Chinsura, better known by the name of Dougli, being near the suburbs of that anciently renowned city. The Dutch have no other possessions there, but merely their fort; the territory round it depending on the government of the country, which hath frequently made it feel its power by its extortions. Another inconvenience attending this settlement is a sand-bank that prevents ships from coming up to it: they proceed no farther than Tulta, which is 20 miles below Calcutta; and this of course occasions an additional expence to the government.

The Portuguese had formerly made Bandel, which is 80 leagues from the mouth of the Ganges, and a quarter of a league above the Hughly, the principal seat of their commerce. Their flag is still displayed, and there are a few unhappy wretches remaining there, who have forgotten their country after having been forgotten by it. This factory has no other employment than that of supplying the Moors and the Dutch with mistresses. The exports from Bengal to Europe consist of musk, gum-lac, nicaragua wood, pepper, cowries, and some other articles of less importance brought thither from other places. Those that are the immediate produce of the country are borax, salt-petre, silk-stuffs, muslins, and several different sorts of cottons.

It would be a tedious and useless task to enumerate all the places where ticken, and cottons, fit for table linen or intended to be worn, plain, painted, or printed, are manufactured. It will be sufficient to refer to Dacca, which may be looked upon as the general mart of Bengal, where the greatest variety of finest cottons are to be met with, and in the greatest abundance. See Dacca.

The sum total of the purchases made in Bengal by the European nations amounted, a few years ago, to no more than 870,000l. One third of this sum was paid in iron, lead, copper, woollens, and Dutch spices: the remainder was discharged in money. Since the English have made themselves masters of this rich country, its exports have been increased, and its imports diminished, because the conquerors have carried away a greater quantity of merchandize, and pay for it out of the revenues they receive from the country. There is reason to believe, that this revolution in the trade of Bengal has not arrived at its crisis, and that sooner or later it will be attended with more important consequences and effects.

The conquest of Bengal by the British, which we are now to relate, is an event scarce less remarkable for its splendour and importance than for the peculiarity of the circumstances that gave it birth; circumstances which, far from promising to open such a field of glory and power, seemed to threaten them with the most fatal reverse of fortune.

A pernicious custom had for some time prevailed in this part of Asia. The governors of all the European ropean settlements took upon them to grant an asylum to such of the natives of the country as were afraid of oppression or punishment. As they received very considerable sums in return for their protection, they overlooked the danger to which the interests of their principals were exposed by this proceeding. One of the chief officers of Bengal, who was apprised of this resource, took refuge among the English at Calcutta, to avoid the punishment due to his treachery. He was taken under their protection. The subah, justly irritated, put himself at the head of his army, attacked the place, and took it. He put the garrison into a close dungeon, where they were suffocated in the space of 12 hours. Three and twenty of them only remained alive. These wretched people offered large sums to the keeper of their prison, to prevail upon him to get their deplorable situation represented to the prince. Their cries and lamentations were sufficient informations to the people, who were touched with compassion; but no one would venture to address the despotic monarch upon the subject. The expiring English were told that he was asleep, and there was not, perhaps, a single person in Bengal who thought that the tyrant's slumbers should be interrupted for one moment, even to preserve the lives of 150 unfortunate men.

Admiral Watson, who was just arrived in India with his Squadron, and Colonel Clive who had so remarkably distinguished himself in the war of the Carnatic, did not delay to avenge the cause of their country. They got together the English who had been dispersed, and were flying from place to place; they went up the Ganges in the month of December 1756, retook Calcutta, made themselves masters of several other places, and gained a complete victory over the subah.

Such a rapid and extensive success becomes in a manner inconceivable, when we consider that it was only with a body of 500 men that the British were to stand against the whole force of Bengal. But if their superiority was partly owing to their better discipline, and to other evident advantages that the Europeans have in battle over the Indian powers; the ambition of eastern chiefs, the avarice of their ministers, and the nature of a government whose only springs are fear and present interest, were of still more effectual service to them: they had experience enough to take advantage of the concurrence of these several circumstances in their first as well as in every succeeding enterprize. The subah was detested by all his own people, as tyrants generally are; the principal officers sold their interest to the English; he was betrayed at the head of his army, the greatest part of which refused to engage; and he himself fell into the hands of his enemies, who caused him to be strangled in prison.

They disposed of the subahship in favour of Jassier Ally Khan, the ring-leader of the conspiracy; who ceded to the Company some provinces, with a grant of every privilege, exemption, and favour, to which they could have any pretension. But soon growing weary of the yoke he had brought upon himself, he was secretly looking out for means to get rid of it. His designs were discovered, and he was confined in the center of his own capital.

Cosim Ally Khan, his nephew, was proclaimed in his stead. He had purchased that usurpation with an immense sum of money. But he did not enjoy it long. Impatient of the yoke, as his predecessor had been, he gave some tokens of his disposition, and refused to submit to the laws the Company imposed upon him. Upon this the war broke out again. The same Jassier Ally Khan, whom the English kept in confinement, was again proclaimed subah of Bengal. They marched against Cosim Ally Khan. His general officers were corrupted: he was betrayed, and entirely defeated: too happy, that, whilst he lost his dignity, he still preserved the immense treasures he had amassed.

Notwithstanding this revolution, Cosim Ally did not drop his hopes of vengeance. Full of resentment, and loaded with treasure, he set out for the nabob of Bennares, chief vizier in the mogul's empire. He and all the neighbouring princes united in opposition to the common enemy, who threatened them all equally. But now the contest lay no longer between them and a handful of Europeans just arrived from the coast of Coromandel; they were to engage with the whole strength of Bengal, of which the British were masters. Elated with their successes, they did not wait to be attacked: they set out directly, and made head against so formidable a league; marching on with all the confidence which Clive could inspire, a leader whose name seemed to have become the pledge of conquest. However, Clive did not care to hazard any thing. Part of the campaign was spent in negotiations; but in time the treasures which the English had already drawn from Bengal, served to ensure them new conquests. The heads of the Indian army were corrupted; and when the nabob of Bennares was desirous of coming to action he was obliged to fly with his men without ever being able to engage.

By this victory, the country of Bennares fell into the hands of the British: and it seemed as if nothing could hinder them from annexing this sovereignty to that of Bengal: but, either from moderation, or prudence, they were content to levy 8,000,000*l.* by contribution: and they offered peace to the nabob on conditions which would render him incapable of doing them any hurt; but such as they were, he most readily agreed to them, that he might regain the the possession of his own provinces. In the midst of these calamities, Cossim Ally still found means to preserve part of his treasures, and retired to the Cheyks, a people situated in the neighbourhood of Delhi, from whence he made an attempt to procure some allies, and to raise up a body of enemies to oppose the British.

While matters were thus circumstanced in Bengal, the mogul having been driven out of Delhi by the Pattans, by whom his son had been set up in his room, was wandering from one province to another in search of a place of refuge in his own territories, and requesting succour from his own vassals, but without success. Abandoned by his subjects, betrayed by his allies, without support, and without any army, he was allured by the power of the English, and implored their protection: they promised to conduct him to Delhi, and re-establish him on his throne; but they insisted that he should previously cede to them the absolute sovereignty over Bengal. This cession was made by an authentic act, and attended with all the formalities usually practised throughout the Mogul empire.

The English, possessed of this title, which was to give a kind of legitimacy to their usurpation, at least in the eyes of the vulgar, soon forgot the promises they had made. They gave the mogul to understand, that particular circumstances would not suffer them to be concerned in such an enterprise; that some better opportunity was to be hoped for; and to make up for all his losses, they assigned him a pension of 262,500*l.* with the revenue of Illahabad, and Sha Ichuanabad or Delhi; upon which that unfortunate prince was reduced to subsist himself in one of the principal towns of the province of Bennesar, where he had taken up his residence. Thus the Mogul empire comes to be shared between two governing powers, one of which is acknowledged in the several districts of India where the English Company has any establishments and authority; the other in such provinces as border on Delhi, and in those parts to which the influence of that Company does not extend.

The British, thus become sovereigns of Bengal, have thought it incumbent on them to keep up the shadow of ancient forms, in a country where they have the lead, and, perhaps, the only power that is likely to be secure and lasting. They govern the kingdom still under the name of a subah, who is of their nomination and in their pay, and seems to give his own orders. It is from him that all public acts seem to proceed and issue, though the decrees are in fact the result of the deliberations of the council at Calcutta; so that the people, notwithstanding their change of masters, have for a considerable time been induced to believe that they still submitted but to the same yoke.

If we should wish to know the amount of the public revenues of Bengal, we shall find, that at the period of its conquest it was equal to 3,500,000*l.* The outgoings for the government of the province, were stated at the sum of 1,797,750*l.*; 262,500*l.* were agreed to be given to the Mogul, and 131,250*l.* to the nabob; so that the remainder to the Company was 1,312,500*l.* Their purchases in the different marts of India would absorb a great part of this sum; but still it has been thought there must after all remain a surplus of several millions to be carried into Great-Britain.

This new arrangement of matters, without having wrought any sensible change in the exterior form of the English company, has essentially changed their object. They are no longer a trading body; they are a territorial power, which farm out their revenues in aid of a commerce that formerly was their sole existence, and which, notwithstanding the extension it has received, is no more than an additional object in the various combinations of their present real grandeur. The arrangements intended to give stability to a situation so prosperous are, perhaps, the most reasonable that can be. Britain has at present in India an establishment to the amount of 9800 European troops, and 54,000 sipahis well armed and well disciplined. Three thousand of these Europeans and 25,000 sipahis are dispersed along the borders of the Ganges.

The most considerable body of these troops has been stationed in Bennesar, once the source of Indian science, and still the most famous academy of these rich countries, where European avarice pays no regard to any thing. This situation is chosen, because it appeared favourable for stopping the progress of those warlike people who might descend from the mountains of the north; and in case of attack, the maintaining of a war in a foreign territory would be less ruinous than in the countries of which the Company is to receive the revenues. On the south, as far as has been found practicable, they have occupied the narrow passes by which an enterprising and active adversary might attempt to penetrate into the province. Dacca, which is in the centre of it, has under its walls a considerable force always ready to march wherever their presence may be necessary. All the nabobs and rajahs who are dependent on the subah of Bengal are disarmed, surrounded by spies, in order to discover their conspiracies, and by troops to render them ineffectual.

The English company till these latter times had always held a conduct superior to that of the other settlements. Their agents, their factors, were well chosen. The most part of them were young men of good families, already instructed in the rudiments of commerce, and who were not afraid, when the service of their country called upon them, to cross those those immense seas which Britain considers but as a part of her empire. The Company had generally taken their commerce in a great point of view, and had always carried it on like an association of true politicians as well as a body of merchants. Upon the whole, their planters, merchants, and soldiers, had retained more honesty, more regularity, and more firmness, than those of the other nations.

Who would ever have imagined that this same Company, by a sudden alteration of conduct and change of system, could possibly make the people of Bengal regret the despotism of their ancient masters? that fatal revolution has been but too sudden and too real. A settled plan of tyranny has taken the place of authority occasionally exerted. The exactions are become general and fixed, the oppression continual and absolute. The destructive arts of monopolies are carried to perfection, and new ones have been invented. In a word, the Company have tainted and corrupted the public sources of confidence and happiness.

Under the government of the Mogul emperors, the subahs, who had the care of the revenues, were, from the nature of the business, obliged to leave the receipt of them to the nabobs, poligars, and Jemin-dars, who were a sort of under-secURITY to other Indians, and these still to others; so that the produce of the lands passed on, and was partly sunk amidst a multitude of intermediate hands, before it came into the coffers of the subah, who, on his part, delivered but a very small portion of it to the emperor. This administration, faulty in many respects, had in it one favourable circumstance for the people, that the farmers never being changed, the rent of the farms remained always the same; because the least increase, as it disturbed the whole chain of advantage which every one received in his turn, would infallibly have occasioned a revolt; a terrible resource, but the only one left in favour of humanity in countries groaning under the oppressions of despotic rulers.

It is probable that in the midst of these regulations there were many injuries and partial distresses. But, at least, as the receipt of the public monies was made upon a fixed and moderate assessment, emulation was not wholly extinguished. The cultivators of land, being sure of laying up the produce of their harvest after paying with exactness the rate of their farm, assisted the natural goodness of the soil with their labour; the weavers, masters of the price of their works, being at liberty to make choice of the buyer which best suited them, exerted themselves in extending and improving their manufactures. Both the one and the other, having no anxiety with regard to their subsistence, yielded with satisfaction to the most delightful inclinations of nature, or the prevailing propensity of these climates; and beheld in the increase of their family nothing more than the means of augmenting their riches. Such are evidently the reasons why industry, agriculture, and population, have been carried to such a height in the province of Bengal. One would think they might still be carried farther under the government of a free people, friends to humanity; but the thirst of money, the most tormenting, the most cruel of all passions, has given rise to a pernicious and destructive government.

The English, become sovereigns of Bengal, not content to receive the revenues on the same footing as the ancient subahs, have been desirous at once to augment the produce of the farms, and to appropriate to themselves the rents. To accomplish both these objects, they are become the farmers to their own subah, that is, to a slave on whom they have just conferred that empty title, the more securely to impose upon the people. The consequence of this new plan has been to pillage the farmers, in order to substitute in their room the Company's agents. They have also monopolized the sale of salt, tobacco, and betel, articles of immediate necessity in those countries; but they have done this under the name, and apparently on the account, of the subah. They have gone still farther, and have obliged the very same subah to establish in their favour an exclusive privilege for the sale of cotton brought from any other province, in order to raise it to an exorbitant price. They have augmented the duties, and to conclude all, have obtained an edict, which has been published, to forbid all Europeans, except the English, from trading freely in the interior parts of Bengal.

When we reflect on this cruel prohibition, it seems as if it had been contrived only to deprive of every power of mischief that unfortunate country, whose prosperity, for their own interest, ought to be the only object of the English company. Besides, it is easy to see, that the avarice of the members of the council at Calcutta has dictated that shameful law. Their design was to ensure to themselves the produce of all the manufactures, in order to compel the merchants of other nations, who chose to trade from one part of India to another, to purchase these articles of them at an exorbitant price, or to renounce their undertakings.

But still in the midst of this overbearing conduct, so contrary to the advantage of their constituents, these treacherous agents have attempted to disguise themselves under the mask of zeal. They have pretended that they were under the necessity of exporting to England a quantity of merchandise proportioned to the extent of her commerce, the competition of private traders was prejudicial to the purchases of the company.

Under the same pretence, and in order to extend this exclusion to the foreign settlements while they appear to respect their rights, they have of late years ordered more merchandise than Bengal could furnish. At the same time the weavers have been forbidden to work for other nations until the English orders were completed. Thus the workmen, not being any longer at liberty to choose among the several purchasers, have been forced to deliver the fruits of their labour at any price they could get for them.

If to the picture of public distresses we were to add that of private extortions, we should find the agents of the Company, almost every where exacting their tribute with extreme rigour, and raising contributions for them with the utmost cruelty. We should see them carrying a kind of inquisition into every family, and sitting in judgment upon every fortune; robbing indiscriminately the artisan and the labourer; imputing it as a crime that he is not sufficiently rich, and punishing him accordingly. We should view them selling their favour and their credit, as well to oppress the innocent as to screen the guilty. We should find, in consequence of these irregularities, despair seizing every heart, and an universal dejection getting the better of every mind, and uniting to put a stop to the progress and activity of commerce, agriculture, and population.

It will be thought, without doubt, after these details, it was impossible that Bengal should have fresh evils to dread. But, however, as if the elements, in league with mankind, had intended to bring all at once upon the same people, every calamity that by turns lays waste the universe, a drought, of which there had never been an instance in those climates, came upon them, and prepared the way for a most dreadful famine in a country of all the most fertile.

In Bengal they have two harvests; one in April, the other in October. The first called the little harvest, consists of the smaller grain; the second, styled the grand harvest, is singly of rice. The rains which commence regularly in the month of August, and end in the middle of October, are the occasion of these different productions; and it was by a drought which happened in 1769, at the season when the rains are expected, that there was a failure in the great harvest of 1769, and the less harvest of 1770. It is true, that the rice on the higher grounds did not suffer greatly by this disturbance of the seasons; but there was far from a sufficient quantity for the nourishment of the inhabitants of the country: add to which, the English, who were engaged before-hand to take proper care of their subsistence, as well as of the sipahis belonging to them, did not fail to keep locked up in their magazines a part of the grain, though the harvest was insufficient.

They have been accused of having made a very bad use of that necessary foresight, in order to carry on the most odious and criminal of all monopolies. It may be true, that such an infamous method of acquiring riches may have tempted some individuals; but that the chief agents of the Company, that the council of Calcutta, could have adopted and ordered such a destructive scheme; that, to gain a few millions of rupees, the council should coolly have devoted to destruction several millions of their fellow-creatures, and by the most cruel means; this is a circumstance we never can give credit to. We even venture to pronounce it impossible; because such wickedness could never enter at once into the minds and hearts of a set of men, whose business it is to deliberate and act for the good of others.

But still this scourge did not fail to make itself felt throughout the extent of Bengal. Rice, which is commonly sold at $\frac{1}{2}$ d. for three pounds, was gradually raised till it came so high as to be sold at 2d. per pound, and it was even up to about 3d.; neither indeed was there any to be found, except in such places where the Europeans had taken care to collect it for their own use.

The unhappy Indians were every day perishing by thousands under this want of sustenance, without any means of help, and without any resource, not being able to procure themselves the least nourishment. They were to be seen in their villages, along the public ways, in the midst of our European colonies, pale, meagre, fainting, emaciated, consumed by famine; some stretched on the ground in expectation of dying, others scarce able to drag themselves on to seek for any nutriment, and throwing themselves at the feet of the Europeans, entreating them to take them in as their slaves.

To this description, which makes humanity shudder, let us add other objects equally shocking; let imagination enlarge upon them, if possible; let us represent to ourselves infants deserted, some expiring on the breast of their mothers; every where the dying and the dead mingled together; on all sides the groans of sorrow and the tears of despair; and we shall then have some faint idea of the horrible spectacle Bengal presented for the space of six weeks.

During this whole time the Ganges was covered with carcases; the fields and highways were choked up with them; infectious vapours filled the air, and diseases multiplied; and one evil succeeding another, it was likely to happen, that the plague might have carried off the remainder of the inhabitants of that unfortunate kingdom. It appears, by calculations pretty generally acknowledged, that the famine carried off a fourth part, that is to say, about 3,000,000.

But it is still more remarkable, and serves to characterize the gentleness, or rather the indolence as well moral as natural, of the natives, that amidst this terrible distress, such a multitude of human creatures, creatures, pressed by the most urgent of all necessities, remained in an absolute inactivity, and made no attempts whatever for their self-preservation. All the Europeans, especially the English, were possessed of magazines, and even these were not touched; private houses were so too; no revolt, no massacre, nor the least violence prevailed. The unhappy Indians, resigned to despair, confined themselves to the request of succour they did not obtain, and peaceably waited the relief of death.

Let us now represent to ourselves any part of Europe afflicted by a similar calamity. What disorder! what fury! what atrocious acts! what crimes would ensue! How should we have seen, among us Europeans, some contending for their food with their dagger in hand, some pursuing, some flying, and without remorse massacring one another! how should we have seen men at last turn their rage on themselves, tearing and devouring their own limbs, and, in the blindness of despair, trampling under foot all authority, as well as every sentiment of nature and reason!

Had it been the fate of the English to have had the like events to dread on the part of the people of Bengal, perhaps the famine would have been less general and less destructive. For setting aside, as perhaps we ought, every charge of monopoly, no one will undertake to defend them against the reproach of negligence and insensibility. And in what crisis have they merited that reproach? in the very instant of time when the life or death of several millions of their fellow-creatures was in their power. One would think, that, in such an alternative, the very love of human-kind, that sentiment innate in all hearts, might have inspired them with resources. Certain it is, that by timely exertions much of the misery that ensued might have been prevented. The barrenness had been announced by a drought; and it is not to be doubted, that if, instead of having solely a regard to themselves, and remaining in an entire negligence of every thing else, they had from the first taken every precaution in their power, they might have accomplished the preservation of many lives that were lost.

We must allow that the corruption to which the English have given themselves up from the first beginning of their power, the oppression which has succeeded it, the abuses every day multiplying, the entire loss of all principle; all these circumstances together form a contrast totally inconsistent with their past conduct in India, and the real constitution of their government in Europe. But this sort of problem in morals will be easily solved, upon considering with attention the natural effect of circumstances and events. Being now become absolute rulers in an empire where they were but traders, it was very difficult for the English not to make a bad use of their power. At a distance from home, men are no longer restrained by the fear of being ashamed to see their countrymen. In a warm climate where the body loses its vigour, the mind must lose some of its strength. In a country where nature and custom lead to indulgence, men are apt to be seduced. In countries where they come for the purpose of growing rich, they easily forget to be just.

BENGO, a province of the kingdom of Angola, in Africa, having the sea on the west, and the province of Moseche on the east. It produces plenty of banana trees; but the Portuguese have grubbed up vast quantities of these, and cultivated the land, which now abounds with maize, and the manioc root, of which they make bread. The province is divided into a great number of districts, of which the chiefs are natives, but tributary to Portugal, and obliged to till the land belonging to the Portuguese. They are Christians, and have 8 churches.

BENGLEDI, a river in the kingdom of Congo, Africa, between the bay Seno delle Vacche and the river Songa, where a lord, subject to the king of Angola, doth chiefly command.

BENGUELA, a province of Africa: it is bounded by Angola on the N. the country of Jaga Cafanii on the E. the kingdom of Matapan on the S. and the Atlantic ocean on the W. The coast begins near the mouth of the river Coanza, or at Cape Ledo, and extends to Cape Negro; that is, from Lat. 9, 20, to 16, 30, S. about 430 miles. The most considerable countries along the coast, Libolo and Aio, Sova-Caria, Sova-Calemba grande, the country of the Sunbis, and that of the Quimbondos. The inland countries are but very little known. Along the coast are several places, among which are Old Benguela, or Benguelo Viella, Manikongo, Fort Cabuto, St. Philip de Benguela, Angra de Sancta Maria, Farfa-bay, Angra de Negris, and Great Wifler's-bay.

BENGUELA; (Old), the capital of the last-mentioned province bearing its name, on the W. coast of Africa. It lies on the river Benguela. The soil in its neighbourhood is very fruitful, and the land low. Here the Portuguese built a fort with paliisades, and a ditch round it; the whole surrounded with houses, and shaded with orange, lemon, banana, and other trees. Seven villages in the neighbourhood are under its jurisdiction. It lies 140 miles S. of the island of Loando, and 300 N. of Cape Negro. Lat. 11, 5, S. Long. 14, 5, E.

BENGUELA-BAY lies to the S. of the town last-mentioned, is about 2 leagues broad at the entrance, and a league and a half deep. Here is very good anchoring. Before the town is a sand-bank, which hinders ships from riding near it; and are obliged to cast anchor above a league from the coast, in 5 fathom water.

BENIARAX,

B E

BENIARAX, an ancient and considerable town in the kingdom of Algiers in Africa, seated in W. Long. 6, 30. N. Lat. 35, 0.

BENIKOVA, a remarkable rock, among those of Deminsalva, belonging to the county of Liptau, and Circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It ascends almost perpendicularly, and is about 5000 paces in height. See LIPTAU.

BENINGTON, a place in Hartfordshire; where a fair is annually kept on June 29.

BENIN, (Proper), a kingdom on the Guinea coast, in Africa. It has part of the gulph of Guinea and the Slave coast on the W. part of Gago and Biafara on the N. Mujac and Makoko on the E. and Congo on the S. where it reaches one degree beyond the equinoctial. Its extent from W. to E. is about 600 leagues; but how far it extends from S. to N. cannot be well ascertained. The land in general is low, woody, and in some parts has rivers and ponds; but in others there is a scarcity of water. At proper distances are jars set, full of clear water, by order of the king, for the use of travellers: but none may presume to drink without paying. The country abounds with wild beasts and game. The soil produces orange, lemon, and especially cotton trees, also pepper, but smaller, and not in such quantities, as in the East Indies. The king is very powerful, being able to raise, in a very short time, 80 or 100,000 men. And as this country is inhabited by several nations, and each have their own king, they are all, except the king of Awerri, slaves or vassals to the great king of Benin.

Their grain is Indian corn. They have plenty of yams, for their ordinary food, and serve in the room of bread; they have two sorts of beans, like horse-beans, but not near so good. The fruits are coconuts, cornantine apples, bananas, wild figs, &c. The negroes have several colours which might serve for painting, and a good sort of soap made with palm-oil and wood ashes; they have a great deal of cotton, which not only serves for their own use, but is exported to distant places. The river Rio or Benin has a great many arms; some of which are so large, that they deserve the name of rivers: it abounds with fish, which the inhabitants eat smoke-dried as well as fresh. The place of trade in this river is at Arebo, about 120 miles distant from its mouth; and to this place the ships may sail up. Those who take this voyage see the mouths of a great many rivers fall into the principal channel to the right and the left; but how far it ascends into the country is not known. A little higher up, the country is very low and marshy, and seems to be divided into islands; and yet there are trees of all sizes growing on the banks; this renders the country very unhealthy, as many of our British sailors have found to their costs; it is also incommoded with vast numbers of flies, called musquitoes, which sting terribly, and render the skin full of pustules. There are three principal villages, to which the negroes come from the inland countries to traffic. One is called Boodadou, and consists of about 50 houses, or rather huts, for they are made with reeds and covered with leaves. The second called Arebo, was mentioned above: this is much larger than the former, and pretty well stocked with inhabitants; and the houses have much more room, but they are built after the same manner. The third has the name of Agaton, and was built upon a hill. It was almost ruined by the wars; but the negroes lately rebuilt it, on account of its agreeable situation. Great Benin is the place of residence of the king.

The inhabitants of Benin are very exact in their trading, and will not recede from any of their old customs: this renders them very slow in their dealings, and backward to pay their debts, which sometimes obliges the traders to sail before they receive satisfaction; but then they are paid as soon as they return. Some of the merchants are appointed by the government, which demands a sort of custom; but it is very trifling. There are three sorts of officers under the king; the first are always near him, and none can address him but by their means: there are several of the second sort; one takes care of the slaves, another of the cattle, another of the fleets, another of war, and so on.

Children go almost naked till they are fourteen, and then they wrap a cotton cloth round their middles: the richer sort put on a sort of callico gowns when they go abroad, with a kind of drawers; but within they are contented with their usual cloth: the better sort of women wear their cotton clothes like petticoats, and have a covering round their shoulders but take care it shall be open before.

The richer sort of the inhabitants of Benin live upon beef, mutton, and poultry; their drink is water, and brandy when they can get it. The poorer sort live upon dried fish, bananas, and beans; their drink is water and palm-wine. Their chief handicraftsmen are smiths, carpenters, and curriers; but they perform all their work in a very bungling manner. The men have as many wives as they can keep, which they take without any ceremony, except treating their relations. The wives of the lower sort may go wherever they have a mind; but those of the rich are shut up: they allow their wives to be very familiar with the Europeans, and yet pretend to be very jealous of their own countrymen. When a woman is caught in adultery, she is turned away, and the goods of the man is forfeited to the husband; but if the relations of the woman are rich, they prevail with him to overlook the fault by dint of presents.

ven days after the children are born, at which time the father makes a feast for the relations; they have also customs, relating to uncleanness, resembling those of the Jews. Thieves are punished by making the party amends, if they can, otherwise they are bastinadoed; but murder is always punished with death. When a person is only suspected of a crime, they have several ways of putting him to a trial, like the fire ordeal, or the bitter water of the Jews; but they are of such a nature, that the innocent may be as often condemned as the guilty.

With regard to their religion, they believe in an Almighty and Invisible God; yet worship images in a human form, and in those of all sorts of animals, making them offerings, every one being his own priest: they look upon these lesser deities as mediators between him and man; some of these idols are in the house, and some in cabins by themselves. Every fifth day is holy; on which the rich kill cows, sheep and goats; and others dogs, cats, and fowls, which they distribute among their poor neighbours.

BENIN, the capital of a kingdom of the same name, is the residence of their kings, and is seated pretty far in the country: it stands in a plain, and is about four miles in compass. The streets are long and broad, and there are markets twice a-day, where they sell cows, cotton, elephants teeth, European merchandises, and whatever the country produces. The houses are large, with clay walls, and at a distance from each other; they are covered with reeds, straw, and leaves. The women in this place are the greatest slaves; for they go every day to market, manage the household affairs, take care of the children, cook the victuals, and till the ground. The king's palace makes great part of the town; and its great extent excepted, there is nothing worth taking notice of, it being only a confused heap of buildings, made with boards and clay, without regularity or neatness. In the middle, there is a wooden tower, about 70 feet high, made like a chimney, and on the top is a brazen serpent, hanging with his head downwards: this is pretty well made, and is the most curious thing in the town: there is a gallery of statues, but so wretchedly carved, that there is no knowing what they represent without being told: behind a curtain there are 11 brazen heads, with an elephant's tooth on each; these are the king's idols: his throne is made of ivory, on which he sits in a pavilion of India stuff. The king shews himself but once a-year, on the day of a certain festival; and then he is surrounded with his wives and a great number of his officers, who walk out in procession to begin the feast by sacrificing to their gods; this done, he bestows victuals and wine among the multitude, which is imitated by his officers. All the inhabitants of this town and country go under the denomination of the king's slaves; and some relations say, that none of them wear any habit till given them by the king; but this seems to be only a salvo to account for the great number of men and women that are daily seen naked in the streets; for if it be true, that the king of Benin can bring 100,000 fighting men into the field, his subjects must be very numerous; and probably his majesty is not rich enough to bestow garments upon them all. The Europeans resort hither to purchase slaves. E. long. 5, 4. N. lat. 7, 40.

BENI-RAZID, or BENI-ARAXID, a province of Africa; so called from its inhabitants, the Bereberes, of the tribe of Magaroas, and lineage of Beni Arachida. It is a dependency upon Algiers, lying very high, and about 16 leagues in length, and nine in breadth. The south part is a champagne country; but the north very mountainous, though interspersed with fertile valleys, which abound with corn, honey, and pasture-grounds. The whole province yields plenty of jujubes, figs, and other excellent fruit. One part of the inhabitants dwell in towns and villages on the mountains, and cultivate their corn-lands, vine-yards, and fruits: the other, which inhabit the plains, range about like the Arabs, and are richer in cattle, camels, horses, &c. Benirax, the capital, though not walled, is the most ancient and considerable place in the province, with upwards of 2000 houses, and several persons of quality and wealth residing in it. The other principal towns are Calaa, El Mohafcar, and Batha.

BENNET's, (St.) in Norfolk, to the south-east of Repeham, commonly called St. Bennet's in the Holme, i. e. a river island, had formerly a monastery built by the Danish king Canute, and so fortified by the monks, that it was more like a castle than a cloister, and held out so long against William the Conqueror, that he could not take it, till it was betrayed to him by one of the monks, on condition that he should be abbot; but he was hanged for his treachery. The soil of this island is very fenny.

BENNINGTON, a town of Albany, on Hudson's river, in the province of New-York, North-America; near which the British forces were defeated by the Americans in 1777.

BENSBERG, a strong fort and monastery of the Holy Ghost, in the duchy of Berg, and circle of Westphalia, in Germany. The castle or palace stands on a hill, in a forest. The apartments are large, well decorated with paintings, and have a vast prospect; namely, of Cologne, the Rhine, and all the flat country. The outside is so encumbered with ornaments, that M. Polnitz says, it is a noble fine house, full of imperfections. It is situated three leagues from the Rhine, between Cologne and Duitz.

BENSFORD, a small market-town of Wiltshire, lying north-west towards Bristol.

BENSHEIM, a town of the Palatinate, in Germany. It lies on the E. side of the Rhine, 10 miles E. of Worms; and subject to the elector of Mentz. Lat. 42, 42, N. Long. 8, 36, E.

BENSUEF, or EBEN-SUEF, a town of Upper Egypt, in Africa, to the half of which province it gives name; and is the residence of the bey or sangiac. It is about a mile in circuit; but ill-built of unburnt brick. It is principally remarkable for a manufacture of a narrow striped carpet, without a nap, made of wool and coarse thread. It is used mostly by the meaner sort, for covering the cushions of their sophas, or to make coats without sleeves for their children. Bensuef lies W. of the Nile, and about 100 miles from Grand Cairo.

BENTHAM, a place in Yorkshire, where a fair is kept annually on June 24, for cattle.

BENTHEIM, a county of Westphalia, in Germany. It is bounded by the United Provinces on the N. and W. and the bishopric of Munster on the E. Its extent S. E. and N. W. is about 30 miles, and 15 broad. It is mostly woody, except on the river Aa, where are pleasant fruitful valleys. Its capital of the same name, the ancient seat of its counts, lies on the S. borders of the country, is fortified, and has a castle; but is a place of no trade, as standing in woods and near no river; 25 miles N. of Munster. Lat. 52, 25, N. Long. 7, 5, E.

BENTIVOGLIO, a palace of the Bolognese, one of the territories belonging to the Ecclesiastical State, in the middle division of Italy. It is surrounded with strong works, 10 miles N. of the city of Bologna. Lat. 44, 30, N. Long. 12, 6, E.

Of this name is a fine palace in Bolognia, built since the total demolition of the former in 1507. Also another of Ferrara.

BENTLEY, in Essex, where a fair is kept annually on Monday after St. Swithin's day, July 15; for toys.

BENTLEY, Warwickshire, between Kingsbury and Shifstock, in the parish of which it lies, though 2 miles to the N. of it. Fair July 20.

BENTO, (River), or Rio de Bento, on the coast of S. Guinea, runs into the sea between Rio de Campo, 10 leagues S. by W.

BENUELAG, a territory of Angola, in Africa, whose principal town is of the same name, and under the dominion of the Portuguese. The town is 300 miles N. of Cape Negro, and 120 S. of the island of Loando. Long. 11, 5, E. Lat. 11, 0, S.

BENYE, a town belonging to Zemplin county, in the circle on this side the Theiss, in Upper Hungary. It is situated on the rivers Bodrog and Theiss. It is famous for its costly wine, which equals that of Tokai in goodness.

BER, or BERRE, a considerable river of Upper Alsace; which, rising in the Wasgaw mountains, runs into the Rhine.

B E

BERACHAH, a valley in the wilderness of Tekoa, mentioned II. Chron. xx. 26. because of the miraculous rout of the Moabites, Ammonites, and the Edomites, or inhabitants of Mount Seir, in their war combined against Jehoshaphat.

BERAR, a province belonging to the S. division of Indostan, in Asia, and subject to the mogul. It is bounded on the E. by those of Orisa and Bengal, being divided from the former by the Ganga; by Malvay on the N. Candish on the W. and Golconda on the S. It is 240 miles from E. to W. and 120 from N. to S. It is one of the most fruitful of the mogul's provinces, in corn, rice, pulse, and poppy. Here sugar-canes are said to thrive almost without cultivation. Its quota of militia is 7000 horse, and 14,000 foot, and its revenue is near two millions sterling.

BERAUM, a royal city of Bohemia, and capital of a circle of the same name. E. Long. 14, 25, N. Lat. 50, 2.

BEREBERES, a people of Africa, who live in tents in the manner of the wild Arabs, in different parts of Barbary, particularly to the south of the kingdoms of Tunis and Tripoly. Their principal riches consist in cattle.

BEREFIORDUR, a place for trade, and a harbour for flesh-meat in the eastern quarter of Iceland, belonging to Norway, and subject to the king of Denmark.

BEREGH, a county belonging to the circle on the Farther Side of the Theiss, in Upper Hungary. It is inhabited by Hungarians and Russians.

BEREGH-SZASZ, was at first a strong borough, from which the county of Beregh last-mentioned took its name; it afterwards became a considerable town, and had its denomination Szasz, from a Saxon colony settled there; but its present inhabitants are Hungarians.

BERENICE, (the Hesperia of Mela, by Marmol called Berniche) was a maritime city of Cyrenaica, once an archbishopric, and one of the five cities from which the region had the appellation Pentapolis, situated between the promontory Boireum towards the greater Syrtis, and the city Arfinoe to the east, from whence it was distant 47 miles. It had its name from queen Berenice, wife of Ptolemy III. as says Solinus. Here were the gardens of the Hesperides, so celebrated by the ancients, as also the famous sacred grove. Selden's Ptol. MS. has it Beronike. There was another Berenice, in like manner so named by Ptolemy, (who built them both in honour of his queen) a city of Egypt, near the Arabian Gulph, on the border of Ethiopia.

BERENTSH, an old ruinous mountain-castle of Szakoltz circle, and county of Neutra, in the circle lying on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary.

BEREZA, a small place in the district of Berezesk, and Lithuanian Russia, a subdivision of the great duchy of Lithuania. Here is a charterhouse.

BEREZOW, or BERESOW, a division of the province of Tobolskoi in Siberia. It is bounded on the north by the straits of Waigatz, on the east by a large bay of the Frozen ocean which runs into the land towards the south, and at the 65th degree of latitude separates into two arms, one of which is called the Obskaia-Guba, or Oby-bay; and the other Tazowskaia-Guba, or the bay of Tazow. The river Oby empties itself into the former, and the Taz into the latter. This district was under the Russian dominion long before the other parts of Siberia were conquered, being reduced by the Czar Gabriel so early as the year 1530.

BEREZOW, a place belonging to the last-mentioned circle of the same name. It is situated on the river Oby, and fortified with pallisadoes. Here the famous prince Menschikof died an exile in the year 1731.

BERG, S. WINOX. See WINNOXBERG.

BERG, a duchy of Westphalia, so called from its being full of mountains. It is situated on the east side of the Rhine, opposite to the electorate of Cologne; has part of that electorate on the south, which separates it from Juliers; the county of Mark on the north; and the duchy of Westphalia on the east. It is about 50 miles long, and 20 broad. It belongs to the house of Newburg, now elector Palatine, but his right is disputed by Prussia and Saxony. Here are coal-mines, and the country abounds with corn; though not so fruitful as Juliers, being mountainous and woody in the eastern parts, but more level towards the Rhine. Its principal rivers are the Roer, Wipper, Agger, and Seig, which all fall into the Rhine. The inhabitants are much addicted to trade. The capital and residence of the elector Palatine is Dusseldorf.

BERGA, anciently Berginium, a small town of Catalonia, in Spain.

BERGAMESCO, or BERGAMESE, in Latin, Ager Bergamensis, anciently a part of Gallia Cispaduana, and a portion of Lombardy, in Upper Italy. It has been possessed by the Venetians ever since the year 1428; but before by the duke of Milan. It is bounded on the north by the Valteline; on the east by the Bresciano; and on the west and south by the Milanese. This territory is very well watered by several rivers which come down from the Alps, and which the inhabitants cut into many more channels, for fertilizing every part of it. Some spots however, are naturally barren, but that defect is supplied by the industry of the inhabitants, who who breed great numbers of cattle, especially sheep, and make the most of their wool. And in other parts, particularly some vallies, they cultivate such vines as produce excellent wine; and they have oil, iron-mines, and quarries of mill-stones, which they also trade in. The people are ingenious; whence their capital, Bergamo, is stiled La Sottile; but their language is a coarse Italian; and both the men and women have goitres or wens in their throats, sometimes as large as their heads. See SAVOY. The country towards the north is mountainous and rough; but fertile about Bergamo.

BERGAMAZKAJA, a pallisadoed borough in the circle of Tobolskoi, and province of the latter name, in Siberia. It is situated on the river Taxa. It has 52 houses, and a fortress made of beams lying on one another, and surrounded with a deep ditch.

BERGAMO, the capital of the last-mentioned Bergamesco, in the Venetian territories, at the foot of the Alps. It is a well fortified place, standing upon several hills, between which are four or five suburbs; and in one of them is kept a fair at St. Bartholomew tide, to which there is a great resort of merchants and tradesmen from Italy, Germany, and Switzerland. It is a place of considerable traffic, and well supplied with necessaries for life or delight. Between the town and a strong castle, upon the highest mountain, is a covered way or gallery. The fruits of its territory are delicious. The bishop is a suffragan to the metropolitan of Milan. In the cathedral, which is a handsome structure, are 25 bodies of saints kept and venerated. The place is famous for its twisted silk, and lies between the Serio on the east, and the Brembo on the west, 20 miles north-west of Brescia, in lat. 45, 43, N. long. 9, 45, E.

BERGARAC. See BERGERAC.

BERGASE, or BURGAS, a celebrated market-town of Rumania, a province of European Turkey; where is a caravanserai or public inn, in which travellers have lodging and board gratis.

BERGBIETHEM, a large borough of Dachstein district, in Lower Alsace, and government of the latter name; now subject to France.

BERGEN, a diocese of Norway, not above 40 or 50 miles long, and only includes the jurisdiction of Bergenhuus, to which seven bailiwicks, and as many priories, belong; but it is populous. At present here are seven marble quarries, which are all worked. The bailiwicks are Hardanger, Sundhord-lehn, Norhord-lehn, Sogn, Sundfiord, Nordfiord, and Sundmor. It is the most southerly and the most westerly part of Norway, and is surrounded by the sea on the S. S. W. W. and N. It is bounded by Drontheim on the N. E. and Aggerhuus on the E.

BERGEN, in Latin Berga, anciently Biorginn, or Biorgvin, in the diocese of the same name last-mentioned. It is the largest and most considerable trading-place in all Norway. It is situated on the main-land, in the middle of a valley, and the form of a semi-circle or horse-shoe, round the shore of the bay, which the natives call Waag. On the land-side the town is defended by high mountains; so that no enemy can approach it. On the sea-side the harbour is sufficiently guarded by fortifications. The harbour is strongly defended on the north side by the citadel of Christiansholm, also by Rothouzen, Sverresborg, the Commun and castle, and on the left-side by some batteries erected upon Nordnas and Fredericksberg, which last is reckoned among the most considerable fortifications about Bergen. Besides, on Syndnas is a blockhouse, and a particular round citadel called Christiansberg. All the churches and public buildings, as also most of the burghers houses on the shore, are of stone. Formerly here were thirty churches and convents; but at present in Bergen are only four parish-churches, three of which are Danish, and one German; and besides these is a church in the great hospital of St. Jurgen, and a little church in St. James's church-yard. The castle is a considerable building. The large cathedral or high-school, was built in 1554 by bishop Petri, and endowed by him; the revenues of which have been since augmented: so that 12 scholars are annually maintained in it. The school for navigation was formerly very numerous, but is has much declined. The Frederiek-seminary is also worth notice. The town carries on a large trade in all kinds of fish, coarse goods, hides, fine furs, tallow, fir-timber, and wooden-wares. These commodities are brought hither from the northern countries, and exported abroad; in exchange for which, corn and other goods are returned. The Hanse towns erected a factory or counting-house here; in which the towns of Lubeck, Hamburg, Rostock, Deventer, Embden, and Bremen have the greatest share. In the seventeen edifices with warehouses, are 42 burghers shops, and 17 factories with shops also; of which the Lubeckers have one, the Hamburgers one, and the Bremeners the other 15. They have altogether eight halls for the merchants to assemble and feast in. Three several councils have been holden here; and the place has been five times burnt down; particularly in 1248, when 11 parish-churches were burnt; and in 1756, when 1660 families were deprived of their dwellings. The number of its inhabitants amounts to about 30,000; and besides the magistracy, Bergen has a town-bailiwick. It is the see of a bishop, under the archbishop of Drontheim; and lies 200 miles north-west of Gottenburg, and 340 of Copenhagen. It is subject to the king of Denmark. Lat. 61, 10, N. Long. 8, 5, E.

BERGEN, an open town in the middle of the isle of Rugen, and its capital, in Pomerania, in Germany.

Germany. Though it consists only of about 400 houses, to its synod 27 parishes are subordinate. North-west of it are hills and woods; and beyond there is a lake from which the brook Duven issues. It is subject to Sweden. Lat. 54, 15, N. Long. 14, 2, E.

BERGEN, a county of New Jersey, in North America. It lies on Hudson's river, and opposite to New York. It is extremely well watered. The number of its inhabitants does not exceed that of its only town of the same name, which has about 350; and most of them Dutch. The town stands on the west point of a neck of land, which, with Staten-island, forms a bound. In its precincts are 10,000 acres of land, as are the like number in the county.

BERGEN-AN-DER-DUMME, a town of Lunenburg Zell, once belonging to the county of Wartheck.

BERGENHUUS. See BERGEN, in Norway.

BERGEN-OP-ZOOM, a town of the Low Countries, in Dutch Brabant, and in the marquisate of the same name, both belonging to the elector Palatine, as pfallgrave of Sulzbach. This country being under the sovereignty of the States General of Holland, they garrison the town; and the marquis is accordingly invested by the council of Brabant. The town was first walled in 1287, and is seated on an eminence, in the middle of a morass, about a mile and a half from the eastern branch of the Scheld, with which it has a communication by a navigable canal. The houses are well built, and the market-places and squares handsome and spacious. The church, before the last siege, was reckoned a good building, and so was the marquis's palace, which is now called the Hof, and is the chamber of accounts, and the place where the feudal court is held. Another church that is here, is divided for the Calvinist French and the Lutherans, and here is also a chapel for the Papists. It has a good track of land under its jurisdiction, with several villages, and some islands in the Scheld. It has a very advantageous situation on the confines of Brabant, Holland, Zealand, and Flanders. It is strong by nature as well as by art, being so secured by the morasses about it, which are formed by the river Zoom, that it was reckoned impregnable. It was, however, taken in 1747 by the French, but it is thought not without the help of treachery. The fortifications are allowed to be the master-piece of that great engineer Cohorn. It had been twice besieged before, viz. in 1588 and 1622, but without success. The marquis of Spinola, the last, was forced to raise the siege with the loss of 10,000 men. E. Long. 4, 15. N. Lat. 51, 30.

BERGERAC, anciently BRAIERAC, a town of Upper Perigord, belonging to Guyenne Proper, in the government of this name, and Gascony, in France.

Vol. I.—No. 22.

B E

It is situated in a delightful plain, on the Dordogne, and consists of two small towns; namely, St. Martin de Bergerac, and Madelain. Here is a provincial bailiwick. The Protestants had formerly fortified this place very strongly; but Lewis XIII. making himself master of it in 1621, had it dismantled. It once drove a considerable trade, the Reformed having been very numerous here and in the neighbourhood; and it is now the staple-town between Lyons and Auvergne. It lies 40 miles from Bourdeaux. Lat. 44, 45, N. Long. 0, 20, E.

BERGERDORF, a small town and bailiwick, belonging to the duchy of Lawenburg, in Lower Saxony, Germany. It has a castle on the Bille, which river falls into the Elbe about 8 miles from Hamburg. It is subject to Lubeck and Hamburg, which cities put in a bailiff alternately, and garrison the castle with an equal number of soldiers each.

BERGGIESZHUBEL, a small mine-town in the Circle of Meissen, under immediate vassalage; and has a seat and voice at the provincial diets, with a mine office. Here is an acid spring called the Friderichshrunn, and a warm bath called the John George bath.

BERGHOLT, a place in Suffolk, where a fair is kept on Wednesday after St. Swithin's day, July 15, for toys.

BERGUES, or BERG, with the addition of St. Vincox, or Wypoxberg; a meanly built, but well fortified town of Freylandes, in French Flanders, with the two forts Lapin and Suisse, on the river Colme. The neighbouring country can be laid under water from Fort Suisse, as far as the canal of Dunkirk. It is the seat of a bailiwick, viscounty, and collection, with an abbey and college. It lies about a mile from Fort St. Francois, 8 miles S. of Dunkirk. Lat. 40, 58, N. Long. 2, 31, E.

BERGZABERN, a town of Lower Alsace, in Germany, 5 miles S. of Landau. Lat. 49, 5, N. Long. 8, 5, E.

BERIDEN, a river in Norfolk, which runs into the Yar, below Norwich.

BERINGEL, a little town belonging to the audience of Beja, and province of Alentejo, in Portugal. It contains 1200 inhabitants, and is the property of the marquis of Minas.

BERIN-SHELL is a rocky island, and the Julia Cæsarea of the ancients, on the coast of the Algerine territory, Barbary. In a late revolt of the people called Beni Menassar, this place, till they were afterwards attacked by sea, served such of them who could swim over to it as a sanctuary from the fury of the Algerines.

BERKA, a small town on the Ilm, in the principality of Weimer, and in a bailiwick of its own name. In 1431, and 1674, it suffered much by fire.

BERKA,

B E

BERKA, a small town on the Werra, in the principality of Eisenach, belonging in common to the duke of Weimar and the landgrave of Hesse Cassel.

BERKESZ, a midling town of Kovar district, belonging to the circle on the Farther Side of the Theils, in Upper Hungary. Here several gentry reside, not far from the foot of the castle of Kovar.

BERKHAMPSTEAD, in Hartfordshire, with fairs on Shrove-Monday, Whitfun-Monday, and St. James's day, July 25.

BERKHEIM, a bailiwick belonging to the county of Kappolstein, in Upper Alsace, and government of the latter name, now subject to France. Of the same name is a small town, from which, as far as Gemar, a dry ditch is thrown up, dividing Upper and Lower Alsacia.

BERKLEY, or BARKLEY, a borough of Gloucestershire, and the largest parish in it; besides having 30 parishes dependent on this manor. Near this place is the castle of Berkley, belonging to the earl of this name, where king Edward II. was kept prisoner. It is rather ancient than healthy, lying low, and near the Severn. The church is a spacious building, with a chapel, which is the burying-place of the Berkley family, and a high tower. The vicarage is in the gift of the earl. Its weekly market is on Tuesday; and annual fairs are kept here on May 3, and July 20. It lies 15 miles from Gloucester, and 111 from London.

BERKLEY, the name both of a town and county in South Carolina, lying to the N. of Colleton county, near Cowper and Ashley rivers. On the N. is a little river called Bowall-river, which with a creek forms an island; and off the coast are several islands called Hunting-islands, and Sillwent's-island. Between the latter and Bowall river is a ridge of hills, called the Sand Hills. The river Wando waters the N. W. parts of this county, and runs into Cowper river, both uniting their streams with Ashley river at Charles-town.

BERKSHIRE, is bounded on the north by the Thames, which divides it from Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire; on the east by Middlesex and Surry; on the south by Hampshire; and on the west by Wiltshire and Gloucestershire. It is 39 miles in length, 29 in breadth, and 120 in circumference; containing about 17,000 houses, 85,000 inhabitants, 62 vicarages, 140 parishes, 671 villages, and 12 market-towns. The whole county is divided into 20 hundreds, and sends 9 members to parliament, viz. 2 for the county, 2 for New Windsor, 2 for Reading, 2 for Wallingford, and 1 for Abingdon. The air is generally exceeding healthy; the soil very fertile, where cultivated; and the whole county, which is one of the most pleasant in England, is well stocked with cattle and timber, particularly with oak and beech in the western parts, and in Windsor forest, which also abounds with wild-fowl and other game. The western part is the most fruitful, especially what is called the Vale of White-horse, so named from the bare side of a chalky hill, made to represent that animal, which left it should lose its shape, the neighbouring inhabitants once a year take some pains in trimming it, and then conclude the day with merriment. The chief produce of the county is corn of all kinds, particularly barley, they having great crops in the above vale, of which they make considerable quantities of malt. The rivers Thames and Kennet, the one on the north, and the other on the south sides of the county, supply it with fish, especially fine large trout and cray-fish. It is said that land in this county bears a better price than in any other at a small distance from London. Its principal manufactures consist of woollen cloth, sail-cloth, and malt.

The rivers of Berkshire are the Thames, which is of great service in conveying its produce to London; the Kennet, which at Reading receives barges of 110 tons burthen, and is navigable as high as Newbury; and the Lamburn, which indeed is very small, but, contrary to the other rivers of this island, is always highest in summer, and gradually decreases as the winter approaches, till at last it is entirely dry. Besides these rivers there are the Ocke and the Lodden.

BERKSHIRE, a county in Pennsylvania, whose length is very great, bounded on the S. E. by Philadelphia and Chester counties, N. E. by Northampton county, and S. W. by Cumberland and Lancaster counties.

BERLEBURG, a small town on the river Berlen, in the county of Witgenstein; with a fine palace and two other houses belonging to the count.

BERKWAY. See BARKWAY.

BERLANGA, or VERLANGA, the principal place of a marquifate belonging to Old Castile in Spain.

BERLIN, the capital of the marquifate of Brandenburg, in Germany, and the usual residence of the elector, now king of Prussia. Long. E. 13, 31. Lat. N. 52, 53. It stands on the banks of the Spree, in a sandy soil, amidst woods and marshes; yet it is encompassed with fruitful gardens and vineyards. The canals from Berlin to the Havel, the Oder on the E. and from thence to the Elbe on the W. not only stock it with fish, but make it a good trading town; for these open a communication, by small vessels, from Silesia to the mouth of the Elbe, and with the Baltic sea and German ocean. It is a large well-built city, the streets are spacious and neat. The town is divided into 5 wards, exclusive of large suburbs. The wards are separated by canals, with draw-bridges over them. To the aggrandisement of

of this city, the French refugees have not a little contributed, by introducing the arts, and all kinds of manufactories. Here is a work-house, called the royal manufactory, with lodgings for several woollen manufacturers; also contiguous to it are other public work-houses. Near the Jews-street, crossing the Street-royal, is a manufactory of gold and silver lace. Facing the castle or king's palace is the quay.

Berlin is divided into five parts, without reckoning the suburbs, as before mentioned. The houses in these last are almost all of wood; but so well plastered, that they seem to be of stone. In the suburb called Spandau is a house belonging to the royal family, with well contrived apartments, and furnished in a very fine taste. In the suburb of Stralau is a house and garden belonging to the king. The royal gate of the city is defended by a half-moon, and two bastions, covered with brick; it fronts the royal street, which is one of the longest and most frequented in the city. It contains very handsome houses, particularly those belonging to some of the ministers of state.

The royal street is crossed by five others, which are large and fine. On the new bridge, which is of stone, over the Spree, is an equestrian statue of William the Great, which is esteemed an exquisite piece of workmanship. The elector is represented in a Roman habit, and his horse stands on a pedestal of white marble adorned with basso relievos, and four slaves bound to the base. After this bridge is past, the king's palace appears, which is a grand and superb edifice; it is four stories high, and the apartments are extremely magnificent. No place in Europe has such a great quantity of silver tables, stands, lustres, branched candlesticks, &c. In the knights hall there is a beaufet, which takes up all one side, where there are basons and cisterns of gilt silver, of an extraordinary magnitude. The furniture of the great apartment is extremely rich; and there is a very handsome gallery adorned with paintings, representing the principal actions of Frederick I. Formerly there were fine gardens to the palace, but they are now turned into a place for arms. The king's stables are large, stand near the palace, and front the great street. Externally they make a Gothic appearance, but within they are very magnificent. The mangers are of stone, and the pillars that divide the stalls are of iron, adorned with the king's cypher, gilt. Over the racks are pictures representing the finest horses which the king's stud had produced. Over the stables there are large rooms, containing all sorts of horse furniture, particularly the horse-equipage of Frederick I. all the metallic part of which is gold, set with diamonds. Besides these, there are handsome lodgings for the officers of the stables. Over the riding-house is a theatre, where plays have been acted, and balls have been made for the entertainment of the court.

The arsenal consists of four grand buildings, that form a court in the middle, like a college: each front has three large porticos. On the principal gate is a medallion of the late king, in bronze; and the four cardinal virtues, of a colossal stature, placed on pedestals on each side of the portico, seem to look at the portrait of the king, which is supported by Fame and Victory. The Corinthian order is prevalent in the first stage, and is managed with a great deal of art. The whole edifice is surrounded in the upper part with a ballustrade, adorned with trophies and statues, among which is Mars seated on a heap of several sorts of arms. This altogether forms a noble and majestic decoration. It is bounded with iron in the shape of cannon, which are placed at proper distances, and support iron chains, that hang like festoons, to prevent passengers from approaching the windows below. The lower rooms are filled with a great number of brass cannon; the walls and pillars which sustain the floor are set off with cuirasses and helmets. The upper story contains several rooms filled with arms, which are disposed in a curious order. Behind the arsenal is the house of the general of the artillery, which includes the foundery, where they are continually at work. Besides this there are other places where they keep the train of artillery.

The opera-house is an elegant modern edifice. The front has a noble portico supported by Corinthian columns, and a pediment adorned with basso relievos and statues. The columns that support the roof throw the whole into a grand saloon. It has three galleries, and is said to be capable of containing 2000 persons.

A rampart and fosse separate Worder from Dorothea Stadt, or the New Town, inhabited chiefly by French. There are seven great alleys or walks, which divide this quarter into two parts. The middle walk is broader than the rest, and is surrounded with ballustrades, having a grass-plot in the middle: this is for persons that take the air on foot. The alleys on each side are paved, and serve for those that come abroad in coaches. These alleys, which are about three miles in length, are terminated with a bar, that leads towards the park. The alleys with trees are bounded by rows of houses. In one of these is a building, formerly called the Lesser Stables, and now made into lodgings for the guards. The apartments above these are occupied by the Academy of Painting, and the Academy of Arts and Sciences. Behind these is the observatory, where there is a great number of astronomical and mathematical instruments. There are other things worthy of observation, such as the cabinet of medals, and the antiquities belonging to the king; that of natural curiosities; the chemical laboratory, laboratory, and its furnaces and medals, of a new invention; the theatre for anatomical demonstrations; the royal library, which is one of the completest in Germany, and has many scarce books and manuscripts.

The city was taken in 1760 by an army of Russians, Austrians, Saxons, &c. who entered on the 9th of October. They totally destroyed the magazines, arsenals, and founderies, seized an immense quantity of military stores, and a number of cannon and arms; called first for the immediate payment of 800,000 guilders, and then laid on a contribution of 1,900,000 German crowns: not satisfied with this, many irregularities were committed by the soldiery; but on the whole, though some shocking actions were committed, a far more exact discipline was observed than from such troops could have been expected upon such an occasion, where there was every incentive which could work upon the licence of a conquering army. The officers no doubt with great difficulty preserved even that degree of order.

But though their behaviour was tolerable with regard to the private inhabitants, there was something shocking and ungenerous in their treatment of the king's palaces. The apartments of the royal castle of Charlottenburg were entirely plundered, the precious furniture spoiled, the pictures defaced, without even sparing the antique statues collected by cardinal Polignac, which had been purchased by the house of Brandenburg. The castle of Schönhausen, belonging to the queen, and that of Frederick'sfeld, belonging to the margrave Charles, were also plundered.

The palace of Potsdam, the famous Sans souci, had a better fate; prince Esterhazy commanded there, and it was preserved from the smallest violation. The prince, on viewing the palace, only asked which picture of the king resembled him most, and being informed, desired that he might have leave to take it, together with two German flutes which the king used, to keep them, he said, in memory of his majesty. This was a sort of taking very different from pillage. They staid in the city four days: but hearing that the king, apprehensive of this stroke, was moving to the relief of his capital, they quitted it on the 13th of October; having wasted the whole country round for a vast extent, and driven away all the cattle and horses they could find.

BERMEO, or VERMEJO, a small place of Biscay Proper, a subdivision of the province of the former name, in Spain. It has a good harbour on the Mediterranean.

BERMUDAS, or SUMMER-ISLANDS, a cluster of small islands in the Atlantic ocean, lying almost in the form of a shepherd's crook, in W. Long 64, N. Lat. 32, 30, between 200 and 300 leagues distant from the nearest place of the continent of America, or any of the other West-India islands. The whole number of the Bermudas islands is said to be about 400, but very few of them are habitable. The principal is St. George's, which is not above 16 miles long, and three at most in breadth. It is universally agreed, that the nature of this, and the other Bermudas islands has undergone a surprising alteration for the worse since they were first discovered; the air being much more inclement, and the soil much more barren, than formerly. This is ascribed to the cutting down those fine spreading cedar-trees for which the islands were famous, and which sheltered them from the blasts of the north-wind, at the same time that it protected the undergrowth of the delicate plants and herbs. In short, the Summer-islands are now far from being desirable spots; and their natural productions are but just sufficient for the support of the inhabitants, who, chiefly for that reason, perhaps, are temperate and lively, even to a proverb. At first tobacco was raised upon these islands; but being of a worse quality than that growing on the continent, the trade is now almost at an end. Large quantities of ambergris were also originally found upon the coasts, and afforded a valuable commerce; but that trade is also reduced, as likewise their whale trade, though the perquisites upon the latter form part of the governor's revenue, he having 10l. for every whale that is caught. The Bermudas islands, however, might still produce some valuable commodities, were they properly cultivated. There is here found, about three or four feet below the surface, a white chalk stone which is easily chiseled, and is exported for building gentlemen's houses in the West Indies. Their palmetto leaves, if properly manufactured, might turn to excellent account in making women's hats; and their oranges are still valuable. Their soil is also said to be excellent for the cultivation of vines, and it has been thought that silk and cochineal might be produced; but none of these things have yet been attempted.

The chief resource of the inhabitants for subsistence is in the remains of their cedar-wood, of which they fabricate small sloops, with the assistance of the New England pine, and sell many of them to the American colonies, where they are much admired. Their turtle-catching trade is also of service; and they are still able to rear great variety of tame-fowl, and have wild ones abounding in vast plenty. All the attempts to establish a regular whale-fishery on these islands have hitherto proved unsuccessful; they have no cattle; and even the black hog breed, which was probably left by the Spaniards, is greatly decreased. The water on the islands, except that which falls from the clouds, is brackish; brackish; and at present the same diseases reign there as in the Carribbee islands. They have seldom any snow, or even much rain; but when it does fall, it is generally with great violence, and the north or north-east wind renders the air very cold. The storms generally come with the new moon; and if there is a halo or circle about it, it is a sure sign of a tempest, which is generally attended with dreadful thunder and lightning. The inhabited parts of the Bermudas islands are divided into nine districts called tribes. 1. St. George. 2. Hamilton. 3. Ireland. 4. Devonshire. 5. Pembroke. 6. Pagets. 7. Warwick. 8. Southampton. 9. Sandys. There are but two places on the large island where a ship can safely come near the shore, and these are so well covered with high rocks that few will choose to enter in without a pilot; and they are so well defended by forts, that they have no occasion to dread an enemy. St. George's town is at the bottom of the principal haven; and is defended by nine forts, on which are mounted 70 pieces of cannon that command the entrance. The town has a handsome church, a fine library, and a noble town-house, where the governor, council, &c. assemble. Besides these there are about 1000 houses well built. The tribes of Southampton and Devonshire have each a parish-church and library, and the former has a harbour of the same name; there are also scattered houses and hamlets over many of the islands, where particular plantations require them. The inhabitants are clothed chiefly with British manufactures, and all the implements for tilling the ground and, building are made in Britain.

It is uncertain who were the first discoverers of the Bermudas islands. John Bermudas, a Spaniard, is commonly said to have discovered them in 1527, but this is disputed, and the discovery attributed to Henry May, an Englishman. As the islands were without the reach of the Indian navigation, the Bermudas were absolutely uninhabited when first discovered by the Europeans. May, abovementioned was shipwrecked upon St. George's; and with the cedar which they felled there, assisted by the wreck of their own ship, he and his companions built another which carried them to Europe, where they published their accounts of the islands. When lord Delawar was governor of Virginia, Sir Thomas Gates, Sir George Sommers, and captain Newport, were appointed to be his deputy-governors; but their ship being separated by a storm from the rest of the squadron, was in the year 1609 wrecked on the Bermudas, and the governors disagreeing among themselves, built each of them a new ship of the cedar they found there, in which they severally sailed to Virginia. On their arrival there, the colony was in such distress, that the Lord Delawar, upon the report which his deputy-governors made him of the plenty which they found at the Bermudas, dispatched Sir George Sommers to bring provisions from thence to Virginia in the same ship which brought him from Bermudas, and which had not an ounce of iron about it, except one bolt in the keel. Sir George, after a tedious voyage, at last reached the place of his destination, where, soon after his arrival, he died, leaving his name to the islands, and his orders to the crew to return with black hogs to the colony of Virginia. This part of his will, however, the sailors did not choose to execute; but setting sail in their cedar ship for England, landed safely at Whitchurch in Dorsetshire.

Notwithstanding this dereliction of the island, however, it was not without English inhabitants. Two sailors, Carter and Waters, being apprehensive of punishment for their crimes, had secreted themselves from their fellows when Sir George was wrecked upon the island, and had ever since lived upon the natural productions of the soil. Upon the second arrival of Sir George they enticed one Chard to remain with them; but differing about the sovereignty of the island, Chard and Waters were on the point of cutting one another's throats, when they were prevented by the prudence of Carter. Soon after they had the good fortune to find a great piece of ambergris weighing about 80 pounds, besides other pieces, which in those days were sufficient, if properly disposed of, to have made each of them master of a large estate. Where they were, this ambergris was useless; and therefore they came to the desperate resolution of carrying themselves and it in an open boat to Virginia or to Newfoundland, where they hoped to dispose of their treasure to advantage. In the mean time, however, the Virginia company claimed the property of the Bermudas islands; and accordingly sold it to 120 persons of their own society, who obtained a charter from king James for their possessing it. This new Bermudas company, as it was called, fitted out a ship with 60 planters on board to settle on the Bermudas, under the command of one Mr. Richard Moor, by profession a carpenter. The new colony arrived upon the island just at the time the three sailors were about to depart with their ambergris; which Moor having discovered, he immediately seized and disposed of it for the benefit of the company. So valuable a booty gave vast spirit to the new company; and the adventurers settled themselves upon St. George's island, where they raised cabins. As to Mr. Moor, he was indefatigable in his duty, and carried on the fortifying and planting the island with incredible diligence; for we are told, that he not only built eight or nine forts or rather block-houses, but inured the settlers to martial discipline. Before the first year of his government was expired, Mr. Moor received a supply of provisions vifions and planters from England; and he planned out the town of St. George as it now stands. The fame of this fettlement soon awakened the jealousy of the Spaniards, who appeared off St. George's with fome vessels; but being fired upon from the forts, they sheered off, though the English at that time were fo ill provided for a defence, that they had scarce a fingle barrel of gunpowder on the ifland. During Moor's government the Bermudas were plagued with rats, which had been imported into them by the English fhips. This vermin multiplied fo faft in St. George's ifland, that they even covered the ground, and had nefts in the trees. They destroyed all the fruits and corn within doors; nay, they increafed to fuch a degree, that St. George's ifland was at laft unable to maintain them, and they fwam over to the neighbouring iflands, where they made as great havock. This calamity lafted five years, though probably not in the fame degree, and at laft it ceafed all of a fudden.

On the expiration of Moor's government, he was fucceeded by captain Daniel Tucker, who improved all his predecessor's fchemes for the benefit of the ifland, and particularly encouraged the culture of tobacco.

In 1619, captain Tucker refigned his government to captain Butler. By this time the high character which the Sommer iflands bore in England, rendered it fashionable for men of the higheft rank to encourage their fettlement; and feveral of the firft nobility of England had purchafed plantations among them. Captain Butler brought over with him 500 paffengers, who became planters on the iflands, and raifed a monument to the memory of Sir George Sommers. The ifland was now fo populous, (for it contained about 1000 whites,) that captain Butler applied himfelf to give it a new conftitution of government by introducing an afsembly, the government till this time being adminiftered only in the name of the governor and council. A body of laws was likewife drawn up, as agreeable to the laws of England as the fituation of the ifland would admit of. One Mr. Barnard fucceeded captain Butler as governor, but died fix weeks after his arrival on the ifland; upon which the council made choice of Mr. Harrison to be governor, till a new one fhould be appointed. No fewer than 3000 English were now fettled in the Bermudas, and feveral perfons of diftinction had curiofity enough to vifit it from England. Among thefe was Mr. Waller, the poet, a man of fortune, who being embroiled with the parliament and common-wealth of England, fpent fome months in the Sommer iflands; which he has celebrated in one of his poems as the moft delightful place in the world. The dangers attending the navigation, and the untowardly fituation of thefe iflands, through their diftance from the American continent, feem to be the reasons why the Bermudas did not now become the beft peopled iflands belonging to England; as we are told that fome time ago, they were inhabited by no fewer than 10,000 whites. The inhabitants however, never fhewed any great fpirit for commerce, and thus they never could become rich. This, together with the gradual alteration of the foil and climate already taken notice of, foon caufed them to dwindle in their population; and it is computed that they do not now contain above half the number of inhabitants they once did, and even thefe feem much more inclined to remove to fome other place than to ftay where they are; fo that, unlefs fome beneficial branch of commerce be found out, or fome ufeful manufacture eftablifhed, the ftate of the Bermudas muft daily grow worfe and worfe.

BERN, one of the cantons of Swifferland, which holds the fecond in rank among the 13, but as it is by much the largeft in extent, it feems juftly intitled to the firft. It is bounded on the north by the cantons of Bafil and Solothurn, and the Auftrian foreft towns; on the fouth by the lake of Geneva, the Valais, and the duchy of Savoy; on the eaft by Uri, Unterwald, Lucern, and the county of Baden; and to the weft by Solothurn, Neufchatel, Franche-Comte, the diftrict of Biel, and the land of Gex. Its length is about 60 leagues, and where broadeft about 40, and is the moft fruitful and the richeft of all the cantons; yielding not only plenty of grain, fruit, and paffure, but alfo good wine, a variety of coloured earths, and clays, fand-ftone, mundick, gypfum, pit-coal, fulphur, and iron-ore. Here likewife are large herds of cattle, and confequently great quantities of milk, butter, and cheefe. The rivers that water this canton, are the Aar, Ruz, Limmat, Emmat, Wigger, Aaa, Sanen, Senfen, and the Kandal. The principal lake is that of Geneva, which the Rhone enters at the eaft end near Bouveret, and iffues out at the weft near Geneva. (This lake as well as the many others in this canton, will be mentioned more particularly under their proper names.)

Along the whole weft and north-weft fides of this canton runs that chain of mountains called by the general name of Jura; but the feveral mountains of which it is compofed have all their particular names. This canton is well-cultivated, and very populous, the number of its fubjects being computed at 400,000. German is the prevailing language, but almoft all the people of fafhion fpeak either French or Italian; even the common people in the Pais de Vaud, and other places that lie towards France and Italy, fpeak a corrupt French or Italian, or a jargon compofed of both. The eftablifhed religion here, and the other Proteftant cantons, is Calvinifm, the fame both in doctrine and difcipline as in Holland; nor is any other tolerated, except in the common bailiages, and the vale of Frick. The ministers are divided into deaneries and classes, and hold yearly chapters or synods. They are kept in a greater dependence on the civil power here, than in the other cantons, and not suffered to interfere with matters of state. The city of Bern first joined the confederacy in the year 1353. Towards the defence thereof the canton now furnishes 2000 men. Every male, from 16 to 60, is enrolled in the militia, and about a third of them regimented. There are officers for every district, whose province it is to see that the men be regularly exercised; that their arms, ammunition, and clothing, be in good condition; and that they be kept in a constant readiness to march. Once a-year they are drawn out to a general review. The same attention is paid to those that belong to the train of artillery. Some regiments consist of married, and some of unmarried men; some of foot, others of dragoons. There is also one regiment and a troop of cuirassiers. The latter consists entirely of burghers of Bern. Both the horsemen and footmen find their horses, arms, and accoutrements. Besides the arms and artillery in the arsenal at Bern, all the castles, where the country governors or bailiffs reside, are well furnished with them. At Bern is a constant guard or garrison of 200 men, and a small garrison at fort Arburg. In the same city is also an office, which grants licences for levies to foreign powers, and where the recruits make their appearance, and are registered. The bailiffs have the chief direction of affairs in their several districts, being generals of the militia, and presiding in the courts of justice, but, in civil causes, above a certain value, an appeal lies from them to Bern; and, in capital cases, their sentence must be confirmed by the great council before it can be executed. When any bailiwick is to be disposed of, as many balls as there are competitors are put into a bag, whereof one is gilt, and he that draws that has the bailiwick.

The wealthiest peasants in Switzerland are those of Bern, it being difficult to find a village without one, at least, who is worth between 20,000 and 30,000 guilders, and sometimes even 60,000. The common people of both sexes wear straw-hats, and the womens petticoats are tied up so near their arm-pits, that hardly an hand's breadth is left for their shape. The inns, not only in this canton, but throughout Switzerland, are in general very good. Drinking is so common, and produces so many quarrels and disorders, that the bailiffs not only subsid by the fines payable for them, but often get estates, carrying, perhaps, 20,000 crowns at the end of five years to Bern. Their law is short and clear, insomuch that the most intricate suit is ended after two or perhaps three hearings, either in the first instance, before the bailiff, or in the second, at Bern. The peasants are generally clothed in a coarse kind of canvas, the manufacture of the country, and their holiday clothes go from father to son; so that it is not uncommon to see a countryman in his great-grandfather's doublet and breeches; but the manners and way of living of the Swiss in general are greatly altered, and like the greater states of Europe have their wants in the superfluities and luxuries of life. The subjects of the state are rich, the public is poor; and though they could oppose a sudden invasion, yet that their unkindly soil requires such a number of hands to cultivate it, that they could not spare the reinforcements and recruits that would be necessary in a long war. Upon extraordinary occasions, however, they boast that they could raise 80,000 men in 24 hours. This canton is divided into the German country, that is, that part of the canton in which the German tongue is spoken, and which is also called the ancient canton, extending from Morat to the county of Baden; and the Roman, called also the Waal, and Pais de Vaud. The former of these contains 35 bailiwicks, and about 300 parishes.

BERN, a city of Switzerland, and capital of the canton of that name, is situated in E. long. 7, 40. lat. 40, 0. It is said that the taking of a bear on the day on which the foundation of this city was laid, gave occasion to its name; hence it is so often in Latin called Arctopolis, i. e. the city of the bear, and has a bear for its coat of arms. It is almost surrounded by the river Aar. The houses are mostly built of white free-stone, and, in the principal streets, have piazzas or arches under them, for the conveyency of walking dry in wet weather. Most of the streets are paved with flints, and traversed by a canal lined with free-stone, which is brought from a considerable distance, and is very useful in carrying off the filth of the city, extinguishing fires, and other purposes. The city is large, standing almost in the middle of the canton, and containing several churches, of which one is called the Great Church, and the first minister thereof the dean, who is the head of the city-clergy. From an inscription near the great door of this church, it appears, that the first stone of it was laid in 1421. Over the same door is a representation of the last judgment, in which the sculptor hath placed the pope among the damned. In this city is also a college with eight professors, a large public library, and a museum; a stately granary, in which a great quantity of corn is always kept; a guildhall; a well stored arsenal; and several hospitals. In the arsenal is a wooden statue of the famous Tell, which represents him as taking aim at the apple placed on the head of his son. There is also the statue of Berch told von Zahringen, the founder of the city; and two large horns of buffaloes or wild bulls, called called in Latin Uri, such as are used in war by the canton of Uri instead of trumpets, and taken from it in the year 1712. Hard by also hang the grotesque dresses of those who blew them. The inhabitants of Uri, who boast their descent from the old Tau, bear a buffalo's head in their rischi, coat of arms; and the person who blows the great horn in time of war, is called the bull of Uri. In the Dominican church, a hole in the wall is always shewn to strangers, by means of which, it having a communication with the cell of a monk in an adjoining monastery, the pious fraud of making an image of the Virgin appear to speak was once carried on, which for a while answered the purposes of the monks very well; but they were at last detected and punished. This city, though larger, is not so populous nor so well built as that of Zurich. On the east side of it is a handsome stone bridge; and near the great church is a very fine platform some hundred feet in height, which makes a most delightful walk, being planted with limes, and commanding a charming prospect, particularly of the mountains of the Grisons, covered with snow in the midst of summer.

In the upper part of the city are always kept a number of bears in two inclosures, with fir-trees for them to clamber and play upon. Of the burghers of Bern, only those are qualified for the government and magistracy of the city who are the descendants of such as were made burghers before the year 1635. Other qualifications are also necessary; in particular, they must not be under 30 years of age, and must be enrolled in one of the 12 companies. To obtain a country government, or to hold any considerable employment, the candidate also must be married. The great council, in which the sovereignty of the canton is vested, consists, when full, of 229; but is generally much short of that number, 80 or more often dying before their places are filled up. The lesser council senate, or as it is called, the daily council, because it meets every day, Sundays and holidays excepted, consists of 27 members, including the two prætors or advoyers, the four tribunes of the people, the two treasurers, and the two heimlichers or secrecy-men, so called because to them all secrets relating to the state are discovered. The members of the great and little councils mutually fill up the vacancies that happen in these two colleges. How the bailiffs are chosen we have already taken notice. Our limits will not permit us to enter into any farther detail with respect of the government: only it is to be observed in general, that all the officers of any note are chosen out of the great or little councils; and that all the bailiffs and castellans of the canton, continue six years in office. The trade of the city is not very great, but was less before the French refugees settled therein; some, however, doubt whether it has been a gainer by them; as by their introduction of French modes and luxury, they have helped to banish the ancient Helvetic simplicity and frugality. The territory immediately under its jurisdiction is divided into four governments, with which the four venners, or standard-bearers, are invested. It declared for the reformation in 1528, after a solemn disputation. Here the British envoy to the cantons resides.

BERN, (New) a small town in the county of Craven, in South-Carolina, lying on the southern bank of the river Pamlico, or Pantego. Lat. 35, 15. Long. 77, 30.

BERN, a town of Bohemia, subject to the house of Austria, and 15 miles west of Prague. Lat. 50, 2, N. Long. 14, 5, E.

BERNARD, a town of Germany, in the electorate of Brandenburg, five miles from Berlin; noted for excellent beer.

BERNARD, (St.) the capital of Cominges, and in the Upper Division of it, belonging to Lower Armagnac, in the government of Guyenne and Gascony, in France. It is but a small place, lying high on the Garonne. Its bishop is under the metropolitan of Auch, has a diocese of 200 parishes, part of which is in the province of Languedoc; for which reason this prelate is one of its states. His revenue is 28,000 livres per annum; and he pays a tax of 5000 florins to the court of Rome. In this neighbourhood formerly lay the city of Lugdunum Convenarum.

BERNARD-CASTLE, commonly BARNEY-CASTLE, a market-town in the bishopric of Durham. See BARNARD'S-CASTLE.

BERNARD, (the great saint.) a mountain of Switzerland and Savoy, between Valais and Val-d'Aost, at the source of the rivers Drance and Doris. The top of it is always covered with snow; and there is a large convent, where monks entertain all strangers gratis for three days, without any distinction of religion.

BERNAU, a small town on the Nab, in the Upper Palatinate, and which the emperor Charles VI. purchased for Bohemia of the convent of Waldsassen.

BERNAY, in Latin Bernacum, a town belonging to the territory of Ouche and Upper Normandy, in the government of the latter name, in France. It is situated on the river Charentonne, is the principal place of an election, the seat of a viscounty, and salt magazine. Here are two parishes, a college, and a rich Benedictine abbey with several convents.

BERNBURG, a fortified town of Anhalt, belonging to the circle of Upper Saxony, in Germany. It is situated on the Sala, 20 miles north-east of Mansfield. Lat. 51, 5, N. Long. 12, 20, E.

BERNCASTLE

B E

BERNCASTLE, a populous town of Triers, belonging to the Lower Rhine, in Germany. It lies on the Moselle, and is enriched by making wine. Here is a strong citadel and a Capuchins cloister.

BERNDT, a bailiwick in Struxdorfshede, belonging to the jurisdiction of the chapter of Sleswick, in Denmark.

BERNERA, one of the western isles of Scotland, lying about two leagues to the southward of Harries. It is about five miles in circumference; the soil is sandy, but, when manured with the alga marina, extremely fertile, producing an increase of 30 fold of barley; nay one grain has been known to produce 14 ears when the season was remarkably favourable. The face of the island is extremely agreeable in summer, exhibiting a pleasing variety of corn-fields and clover pasture. Here is a fresh-water lake, called Lochbruis, diversified with small islands, and abounding with eels, which the natives, by the help of lights, catch in the night-time, as they fall down a rivulet towards the sea in heaps twisted together. There are two chapels in this island dedicated to St. Afaph and St. Columbus; and near the former is a stone standing about eight feet above the ground. At the east end of this island there is a strange reciprocation of the flux and reflux of the sea, and another no less remarkable upon the west side of the long island. The tides from the south-west run along northward; so that during the ordinary course of the tides the flood runs east in the frith where Bernera lies, and the ebb runs west: thus the sea ebbs and flows regularly for four days before, and as long after, the full and change of the moon; the spring-tides generally rising 14 feet perpendicular, and the others proportionably: but for four days before, and as many after, the quarter moons, there is a singular variation; at that time a southerly moon making high water, the course of the tide being eastward, it begins to flow at half an hour after nine in the morning, and continues to flow till half an hour after three in the afternoon, when it is high water; but when it begins to ebb, the current still runs eastward, until it is low water; so that the tide runs eastward 12 hours together; that is, from half past nine in the morning, till half past nine at night; yet when the night tide begins to flow, the current turns and runs westward all night for 12 hours, during both flood and ebb: thus the reciprocations continue, one flood and ebb running eastward, and another westward, till within four days of the full and change of the moon; then they resume their ordinary course, running east during the six hours of flood, and west during the six hours of ebb. There is another phenomenon in these tides no less remarkable than that just now mentioned. Between the vernal and autumnal equinox, that is, during one half of the year, the tides about the quarter moon run all day eastward, and all night westward; and during the other six months their course is reversed, being westward in the day, and eastward in the night. In popish times Bernera was a sanctuary; and on it is a noble wood of yew.

BERNERIE, a borough and small sea-port, on the English channel, in the bishopric of Nantes and Upper Brittany, belonging to the government of the latter name, in France. The inhabitants live principally by catching fish.

BERNICIA, that part of the kingdom of the Northumbrians extending from the river Tine to Edinburgh Frith. The other half lying S. of the Tine, was called Deira.

BERNSTADT, or BERNSTADEL, a small town in the circle of Budizin, which was miserably laid waste by the Hussites in 1429, and greatly damaged by fire in 1686.

BERNSTEIN, a small town in a government of the same name, in the New Mark.

BEROEA, a noble city of Macedonia, to the S. of Edeffa, or Egæ, and S. E. of Cyrtus. The people here are commended in Scripture for their reception of the Gospel on a fair and impartial examination; now supposed to be Aleppo. See that article.

BEROLZHIEM, a market-town in the principality of Onolzbach, near the Altmuhl.

BEROOT, a town of Phœnicia, a province of Syria, in Turkey in Asia. It is the ancient Berytus; but there are now no remains of its former beauty, except its situation, which is very agreeable, and in a fertile soil. It is just far enough from the sea to prevent the inconveniences of an inundation. There are very fine streams of water which flow from the mountains, and are dispersed into beautiful fountains through several parts of the town. The great Christian church is turned into a mosque, and there is a poor old one for the use of the Greeks. It is adorned with several old pictures, particularly that of St. Nicephorus, with a beard down to his feet. The wall on the south side of the town is yet intire, and seems to have been built out of the ruins of the old city. At a little distance from the city there are pillars of granite, and the ruins of floors of Mosaic work. On the sea-shore is an old ruined castle, and the remains of a mole. Its principal commerce, which is still very considerable, consists in fine tapestry, silks, camblets, cinnamon, nutmegs, ginger, pepper, cassia, rhubarb, and cochineal. The sea-banks abound with mulberry, pine, lime, and other trees; also gourds, and vast quantities of colocynth. This place was the residence of the emirs, the princes of the Old Drusians, who, to avoid the Turkish yoke, fled into the mountains, where their posterity still reside.

It lies about 18 miles from Seyd, the old Sidon. E. Long. 35. 38. N. Lat. 34. 18.

BERRE, a town belonging to the provincial bailiwick of Aix and Lower Provence, in the government of the latter name, in France. It is situated on a salt lake, communicating with the sea; which is about 5 miles long, 3 broad, from 4 to 14 fathoms deep, and navigable throughout. Here they make fine salt, and in large quantities; but the air is unhealthy.

BERRY, a province of France, with the title of a duchy. It is bounded on the north by Salome, on the south by Marche, on the east by Nivernois and Bourbonnois, and on the west by Touraine. It is 90 miles in length from north to south, and 73 in breadth from east to west. The air is very temperate; and the soil produces wheat, rye, and wine little inferior to Burgundy; that of Sancerre, St. Satur, and Lavernulle, is the best. The pastures are proper to fatten sheep. This country produces also a good deal of hemp and flax. There are mines of iron and silver, but they are neglected. The stone quarries, within half a league of Bourges, are very serviceable. In the parish of St. Hilaire there is a mine of oker, made use of in melting metals, and for painting. Near Bourges there is a cold mineral spring, which has a clammy fat pellicle over it every morning, of different colours. It lets fall a fine black smooth sediment, which has the same smell, and almost the same taste, as gunpowder; which makes some conclude it partakes of sulphur, vitriol, and oker. The pellicle is as thick as a crown-piece; and when put on a red hot fire-shovel will bounce and sparkle, as will also the sediment. It is certain there is salt-petre in these waters, though vitriol seems to be the most predominant. These waters, drank on the spot, temperate the heat of the blood and humours, open obstructions, and strengthen the fibres.

Berry is watered by several rivers, the principal of which are the Loire, the Creuse, the Cher, the Indre, the Orron, the Evre, the Aurette, the Maulon, the great and little Saudre, the Nerre, &c. Near Limiers there is a lake 20 miles round. Berry is divided into the Upper and the Lower, and Bourges is the capital city. The inhabitants of Bourges carry on a small trade with corn down the Loire; but that of the wine above-mentioned is much more considerable, it being transported to Paris by means of that river and the canal of Briare. But the principal commerce consists in the fat cattle, which they send to Paris, and the great number of sheep; these last bear fine wool, which is used in the manufactures of this province, and other parts of the kingdom. There are two sorts of manufactures in Berry, the one for cloths and serges, and the other for knit and wove stockings. This country had formerly its own counts, who stiled themselves counts of Bourges, afterwards viscounts; but in time it became annexed to the crown, so that the use and profits, only of this province, have several times since been granted to princes and princesses of the blood royal, with the title of a duchy, but never totally alienated. It is subject to the parliament of Paris, but under its own laws. It has a governor, a lieutenant-general, and two deputy-governors, though there is but one archbishopric, and no episcopal see, yet in the diocese are 34 collegiate churches, 9 archdeaconries, 20 archpriesthoods, about 900 parishes, and 35 abbies. Berry is subdivided into Upper and Lower: the former lies towards the N. E. from Cher to the Loire; and the latter between the Cher and the Creuse, towards the S. W.

BERRY-ISLANDS, a small cluster of islands, on the N. W. point of the Great Bahama bank, in the Channel of Providence. Long. 75. 40. Lat. 25. 50.

BERRY-POINT, a cape at the entrance of Torbay, in Devonshire. Lat. 50. 37. Long. 3. 49. W.

BERSELLO, or BRESSELLO, anciently Brixillum, a colony of Gallia Cispadana; a small city of Reggio, a subdivision of the Modenese, in Upper Italy. It stands near the Po, and is defended by a good citadel. In 1702 prince Eugene took it, and the year following it was retaken by the duke of Vendosme; but restored by the peace of Utrecht to the duke of Mantua, who held it as a fief. It is now subject to Modena, and lies 14 miles N. E. of Parma. Lat. 44. 40. N. Long. 11. 6. E.

BERSCH, or BARSCH, (county of), a subdivision of the circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It is about 7 miles long, and between 2 and 3 broad. Among its mountains, those of Cremnitz are rich in gold. Its capital rivers are the Gran, Nitra, and Sitva or Zitawa. It not only affords mineral springs, as those of Bukovi and Ebedetz, but also warm baths, the most celebrated in all Hungary; namely the Glasnut or Sklenni bath, and that of Eisenbach or Wihni. This county produces excellent wine and good corn in the plains. The gold mines of Cremnitz and Konigsberg have not for some time past yielded so much as formerly. The cattle in the mountainous parts are poor and small, though they breed great numbers of sheep; yet in the plains these are not considerable. The inhabitants are Hungarians, Bohemians, Slavi and Germans. This county includes the following districts, Ofzlani, Levi, Kis-topolt-san, and Verebely.

BERSENBURG, O-BARSCH, or TEKOV, a quite inconsiderable town of the last-mentioned county, in Hungary, so denominated from the second name. It stands on the river Gran, which frequently lays the adjacent plains under water.

BERSCHETZ,

B E

BERSCHETZ, or BERSCHESZH, a small town seated on a high rock on the Adriatic sea, in Carniola. It has a small harbour, and produces a thick and very sweet wine of the colour of red port.

BERSTADT, a small town in the Circle of Olmutz.

BERSUIRE, a town of France, in Lower Poitou. Long. W. 0, 27. Lat. N. 16, 52.

BERT, a river in Dorsetshire, which runs into the British channel near Bridport.

BERTELSGADEN, or BERCHTOLSGADEN, an abbey in the very heart of the archbishopric of Saltzburg, in the circle of Bavaria, in Germany. Its abbot or provost is a prince of the empire, whose territory is 14 miles long, and as many broad. His revenue is reckoned to be 10,000 crowns a year. The town of the same name belonging to him lies 15 miles S. of Saltzburg, and furnishes the neighbourhood with store of salt.

BERTIE, a maritime county in North Carolina, in the district of Edenton, with the Roanoke its S. boundary, and Albemarle sound on the E. In it is situated the Indian tower of Tuscaroraw.

BERTINORO, or BRITTONORO, in Latin Forum Trutarinorum, a small city of Romagna, in the Ecclesiastical State, and Middle Division of Italy. It stands on a hill surrounded with vines, and near the little river Bedefa. It has a stout castle. Its bishop is under the metropolitan of Ravenna. It abounds in oil of olives, wine, and water, enjoying a clear air, as well as a prospect of the Adriatic, the coasts of Dalmatia and Croatia, the territories of Venice, and of this province. It belongs to the pope, and lies 5 miles E. of Forli, and 7 W. of Cesena.

BERTRAND, a city of Gascony in France. It is situated on the Salat, a river that falls into the Garonne, 35 miles S. of Auch. Lat. 43, 15, N. Long. 30, E.

BERVEY, or INNERBERVEY, a royal burgh, made so by king Alexander III. It lies on the coast and German ocean, upon the river Don, in the shire of Kincardin or Mearns, in Scotland. It is one of the district of boroughs, which, alternately with Montrose, Aberdeen, Brechin, and Aberbrothock, sends a member to the British parliament. It is indeed decayed, and situated 22 miles S. W. of Aberdeen, and 57 N. E. of Edinburgh.

BERUM, or BARUM, (Ost and West), a district of Aggers-herred, in the diocese of Christiana or Aggerhuus, in Norway. Of the same name in this district is a very old and excellent iron-mine, which is in good condition.

BERWALD, a small town belonging to the duchy of Zator, in the palatinate of Cracow, in Little Poland.

B E

BERNECK, a small town, and the seat of a prefecture, in the principality of Culmbach.

BERWICK, a town in York-county, Pennsylvania, about 7 miles N. of Hanover, and 16 W. of York.

BERWICK, or BARWICK, (upon Tweed), an old frontier-town, being a county and town of itself, as in all royal proclamations, &c. it is distinctly mentioned after England and Wales. Though on the N. side of the Tweed, it is generally included in Northumberland. It was long the bone of contention between England and Scotland, and often possessed alternately by each; till Thomas Stanley, with great loss, reduced it to the obedience of Edward IV. from which time it has been possessed by the English. It is pleasantly situated on an easy declivity, almost close to the sea. It has a ditch on the north and east; but on the south and west it has high walls, regularly fortified, and planted with cannon, to which the river serves as a moat. The houses are generally well built; and the town-house is a handsome structure, with a lofty turret, in which are 8 bells, and a fine clock, which tells the quarters, with four dials, one on each side the square. The church is a neat building, but has no bells. The bridge is 947 feet long, and is supported by 15 arches. The barracks form a large regular square, and will hold two regiments of foot very conveniently.

The town is governed by a mayor, recorder, town-clerk, and four bailiffs; and has a coroner, a treasurer, four serjeants at mace, and a water-bailiff. It had a strong castle, which now lies quite in ruins. It has a market on Saturdays, extremely well supplied; and a fair on Friday in Trinity-week for black cattle and horses. Corn and eggs are shipped from hence for London and other ports; but the principal trade is the salmon which are caught in the Tweed, and reckoned to be as good as any in the kingdom. Some are sent alive, and some pickled in kits by persons who subsist on that employment, and are called salmon coopers. In June and July salmon is sold for a penny a pound.

The harbour of Berwick is but mean, and the navigation cannot be carried far up, the bridge being within a mile and a half of a bar at the river's mouth, though the tide flows 4 miles above the town. The bar is likewise so high as to admit no ships that draw above 12 feet water; nor is there any good riding in the offing near the bar: for the shore is steep and rocky, and the cliffs high; so that if a ship riding before Berwick should be driven from her anchors, her only refuge is, if the wind be at S. to make for the Edinburgh-frith, but if from the N. to run into Holy-island. It sends two members members to parliament, and lies 52 miles N. W. of Newcastle upon Tyne, and 300 N. of London. Lat. 55, 40, N. Long. 1, 40, W.

BERWICK, (North), a small market-town of Haddingtonshire, or East Lothian, in Scotland. It is a district of royal burghs, which, alternately with Jedburgh, Haddington, Dunbar, and Lauder, sends a member to the British parliament. It has a harbour, mole, or pier, at the entrance of the frith of Forth, for securing such vessels as come hither to load salt and other goods. It is noted for good malt-liquor, according to the rate of this country, and lies 17 miles E. of Edinburgh. Lat. 56, 5, N. Long. 2, 27, W.

BERWICKSHIRE, one of the counties of Scotland, and, as bordering on England, called the Merse or March. See MERSE.

BERYTUS. See BEROOT.

BERZETIN, a borough belonging to the county of Gomar, in the Circle on this side the Theiss, in Upper Hungary. It is situated not far from Rosenau, and upon the river Sajó, and is noted for the seats of the free barons which are here.

BESANCON, a city of France, capital of the Franche-Compte, and one of the most ancient cities of Europe. It is the see of an archbishop, and has a parliament, as well as a university. It is seated on the river Dreux, which divides it into two parts, the greatest of which is a peninsula. The entrance is shut up by a mountain, on which they have built a large citadel, which commands all the city. There are many names of places in and about the city, that are plainly corruptions of the Latin, and are marks of its antiquity, as Chamars, Campus Martis, Chamuse, Campus Musarum, Chandane, Campus Diana, &c. The metropolitan church is built at the bottom of St. Stephen's hill; and is a very handsome structure, with a high tower steeple. The great altar is placed in the middle choir, where on high days they expose reliques in silver shrines, enriched with gold and jewels. There are several tombs and other things remarkable in the churches; and after you have passed the church of Notre Dame, and the square that it looks into, you come to a triumphal arch, erected in honour of the emperor Aurelian, on which are several figures of men and animals, pretty entire. It serves as a gate to the cloister of St. John the Great. The great hospital of the order of the Holy Ghost is a structure worth seeing. The streets are wide and handsome; and the houses are well built with free-stone, and covered with slate, chiefly about the square called Battan, which is adorned with a fountain, the water of which proceeds from a statue of Bacchus.

The river Dreux is passed over on a stone bridge, in going from one part of Besancon into the other. The market-place is at the entrance; and on the left is another square, adorned with a fountain, where the great street begins, which traverses all this part, from the bridge to St. John the Great. The new square is not far from this street, from whence you go to the town-house, which is a large structure, with four wings, before the front of which is the statue of Charles V. in bronze, with a globe in one hand, and a sword in the other. The Imperial eagle is raised over a large basin, and spouts out water by both his beaks. The governor's palace is the most magnificent in the province, and there is a fountain a little farther, adorned with the figure of a naked woman, with water springing out at her nipples. E. Long. 6, 10. N. Lat. 47, 26.

BESBRE, a river in the government of Nivernois, in France.

BESC, a small river of Dauphiny, in France, which falls into the Drome.

BESIERS, a diocese and subdivision of Lower Languedoc, in the government of the latter name, in France. It is the most fruitful part of the province; has the district of Narbonne on the W. Rouergue on the N. that of Nismes on the E. and the sea on the S. Of the same name is a very ancient city belonging to it, anciently called in Latin Bliterra, or Biterra, a pretty large place, upon a hill on the river Orbe, and on the royal canal. It is the see of a bishop, the seat of a collection, provincial bailiwick, and provincial court. The bishop is under the metropolitan of Narbonne; his diocese comprehends 106 parishes, has a revenue of 30,000 livres per annum, and pays a tax of 2008 florins to the court of Rome. Besides the cathedral, here are three abbeys, one of which is secularized, and a college. Over the river is a bridge. The number of inhabitants is but 3133 families. Though commodiously situated for manufacture, the genius of the people does not lie this way. The country lying round this place, though partly mountainous and partly level, has hardly its equal for pleasantness in all France. It produces excellent wines; much more corn than is wanted for home consumption, with great quantities of oil.

At Bedarieux and in the neighbourhood are made fine druggets, which are sent into Germany; and in the district of Graiffesay, all the inhabitants apply themselves to the nail trade. In this diocese are marble-quarries, and a variety of springs. The city of Besiers lies 2 miles N. of the Mediterranean, and 15 N. E. of Narbonne. Lat. 43, 20, N. Long. 3, 17, E.

BESIGHIEM, a town situated near the conflux of the Enze, and Neckar, in a district of the same name, Wurtemberg. The town has had many masters, and the country round produces good wine.

BESIKTASCH, a summer seat of the grand signior, near Constantinople, to the westward, with a seraglio.

BESIGNANO,

B E

BESIGNANO, in Latin Besidia, a small city of the Hither Calabria, in the kingdom of Naples, and Lower Division of Italy. It has the title of a principality, which is in the house of San Severino. Its bishop is immediately dependent on the pope. It stands high, on the little river Cotilo, not far above its junction with the Grati. The place is pretty well peopled, and defended by a citadel; but commanded on all sides by the mountains. It lies about 15 miles W. of Rossano, and the same from the Tuscan sea. Lat. 39, 38, N. Long. 17, 5, E.

BESOS, the ancient Betulus, a river of Catalonia, in Spain, which falls into the Mediterranean, not far from Barcelona.

BESSARABIA, a territory of Turkey in Europe, lying between Moldavia, the Danube, the Black Sea, and little Tartary. It is inhabited by independent Tartars, who maintain themselves by their cattle, husbandry, and by robbery. Their religion, manners, and customs, are the same with those of the Crim Tartars. When there are any forces sent against them, they retire among the mountains near the Black-sea, where it is impossible to come at them on account of the morasses and defiles.

BESSASTADER, the seat of the royal bailiff, belonging to Gullbringu-Syffel, a subdivision of the S. quarter of Iceland, in Norway. Here is an iron manufactory, and a fulling-mill. Its Lat. is 64, 6, N.

BESSICA, a district of Thrace towards Mount Hæmus to the south of the Hebrus. It was inhabited by a fierce and barbarous people, noted for their robberies. Their chief city Uicudama is now known by the name of Adrianople. They lived under their own kings till the consulate of M. Licinius Lucullus and C. Cassius Varus; when the consul Lucullus invaded their country, and having gained a great victory over them, took their metropolis, and subjected the whole nation to the Roman laws. The Romans, notwithstanding they had subdued them by force of arms, still suffered them to live under their own kings; for Piso, while he governed Macedon in quality of pro-consul, having treacherously seized Rabocentus, whom Suetonius calls Prince of the Bessi, caused him to be publicly beheaded. This affront so exasperated the whole nation, that they revolted; but were overthrown in a great battle by Octavius, the father of Augustus. During the civil wars of Rome they attempted anew to recover their liberty, but were again defeated by the famous M. Brutus. In the reign of Augustus, one Vologeses, a native of the country, and priest of Bacchus, having, under pretence of religion, drawn together great crowds of people, made himself master of the whole country, and, entering the Chersonesus, committed there the most dreadful ravages. He was at last, however, overcome by L. Piso; who obliged the savage inhabitants to lay down their arms, and submit to such conditions as he was pleased to impose upon them. From this time the Bessi continued subject to the Romans without attempting any more to regain their liberty.

BESSIN, a territory of Lower Normandy, in the government of the latter name, in France. It is planted with vast numbers of apple-trees, and by the industrious inhabitants rendered fruitful and profitable. Its principal town is Bayeux.

BESTERTZE, or BISTRITZ, also BESTRICIA, or NOSENSTADT, a royal free-town of Nofnerland, a district belonging to that called the royal territory of the Saxons, in Transylvania, and kingdom of Hungary. It was built in 1206, and is the capital of the district, being surrounded with walls, towers, and ditches, where the Patres Piarum Scholarum and the Reformed have also a gymnasium or academy. It is situated on the little river Bisritz, in a very wide and even valley; but has neither a healthy air, nor good water. The hills round the valley produce wine. The Imperialists took the town in 1602. It is 85 miles N. W. of Hermanstadt, and very remarkable for the gold mines in its neighbourhood. Lat. 48, 5, N. Long. 22, 5, E.

BESTEYROS, a little district of Viseu, belonging to the province of Beira in Portugal. It contains 15 parishes.

BESTRICIA, a town of Transylvania, remarkable for the gold-mines near it, and 90 E. of Tocka. Long. 22, 5, E. Lat. 48, 5, N. See BESTERTZE.

BETANZOS, a city of Galicia, a province of Spain. It is a sea-port upon the river Maudeo, which makes a good harbour. It is walled, containing two parishes, one monastery, a nunnery, three hospitals, and ten chapels. It is supposed to be the Flavium Brigantium, where Julius Cæsar landed. It lies 20 miles S. of Ferrol. Lat. 43, 15, N. Long. 8, 50, W.

BETAW, or BETUWE, the general name of the quarter of Nimeguen, in the province of Guelderland, in the United Netherlands. This is the ancient Batavia, and the seat of the Batavi. Part of the Catti, who, quitting their native country, settled first here, and afterwards extended their limits between the Waal and the Maes. See BATENBURG.

Their territories extended from Rhineberg in Cleves, to Catwyck on the sea in Holland; which village seems to have some affinity to the Catti in its name. The present Betuwe reaches from Scherkenschan on the E. to Worcum on the W. about 49 miles; and its greatest breadth, between Grave on the Maes and Arnhem on the Rhine, is 16 miles.

BETEL, a small rocky island, about a league in compass, on the coast of Cambaja, in the East In-

BIES, and separated from the continent only by a narrow strait, about 80 leagues from Diu. When the Portuguese general, Nonnius, invaded this little island, most of the garrison of 2000 men, rather than submit to his terms, burnt themselves, with their wives and effects; and the rest, about 700, were either cut to pieces, made slaves of, or drowned themselves in the sea.

BETELFAGUI, a town of Asia, in Arabia Felix, famous for the vast quantity of coffee bought and sold there; being the mart where the country-people bring their coffee to sell; and where the Europeans come, or send their factors or brokers to purchase it. E. Long. 37, 20. N. Lat. 15, 40.

BETELHA, a town in the province of Estremadura, Spain; containing near 2000 inhabitants.

BETHAM, noted for a cataract near it, on the river Ken, southward of the village of Levens, and not far from Kendal in Westmoreland, as there is another water-fall at that village. From the latter, which is more northward, sounding clear, the inhabitants promise themselves fair weather: but from the former doing so, they expect rain or mist. Both fall with a hideous noise.

BETHANY. In John xi. 1, we read, "a certain man was sick, named Lazarus, of Bethany, the town of Mary and her sister Martha;" and ver. the 18th, that "Bethany was nigh unto Jerusalem;" and by Mark xi. 1. it is plain it was situate at the Mount of Olives. It appears from all the Evangelists that this was a place very often visited by our Saviour; and here it was that he raised Lazarus from the dead.

BETHESDA, a famous pool or reservoir in Jerusalem, recorded in John v. 12. wonderful in curing whatsoever disease, and to have been adorned with five porches or piazzas; for its water, being at some particular seasons miraculously stirred, had the virtue of curing the first person that jumped into it.

BETH-JESIMOTH is mentioned in Numb. xxxiii. 49. being the place to which the last encampment of the Israelites, in the time of Moses, extended on one side, Abel-Shittim being on the other; it being a city of those parts given afterwards to the tribe of Reuben. It is mentioned again Josh. xii. 3.

BETHLEHEM, or BETHLEM, once a famous city of Judaea, in Asiatic Turkey; but now reduced to a village. It is situated on a hill, in a pleasant and fertile plain, about 6 miles S. of Jerusalem. It is still much resorted to by Pilgrims, as being the place of our Saviour's birth; where is a stately temple erected by St. Helena, over the manger where the Holy Babe lay; the roof of which is cedar, supported by four rows of white marble pillars, 10 in each row, and the wall faced with the same stone. Here also is the chapel of St. Joseph, our Lord's supposed father, with another of the Holy Innocents. Lat. 31, 30, N. Long. 36, 7, E.

BETHLEHEM, or BETHLEM, a town of Brabant, in the Austrian Netherlands, where the duke of Bavaria and M. Villeroy encamped, after the forcing of the French lines by the duke of Marlborough; who also encamped here in 1706, after the surrender of Louvain, being two miles N. of the last-mentioned city. Lat. 51, 5, N. Long. 4, 35, E.

BETHLEHEM, an episcopal see of Nivernois, a government of France. Its origin was thus: upon the expulsion of the Christians out of the Holy Land, Renier, bishop of Bethlehem of Palestine, followed Guy, Count of Nevers, into France in 1180, who gave him the borough of Pentenor, near Clamecy, beyond the river Yonne, with the manor of Cambeuf or Sembert, and some other places; which ever since have been called the bishopric of Bethlehem. See CLAMECY.

BETHLEHEM, a village in the county of Orange, in the province of New York; very fruitful in pasture, and makes large quantities of excellent butter.

BETHLEHEM, a town in Northampton-county, Pennsylvania, 5 miles E. of Northampton, and 10 S. W. of Easton, and stands on a branch of the Delaware river.

BETHLEHEM-FALVA, a place belonging to that called the seat of the ten lance-men, in the circle on this side the Theiss, in Hungary. It was formerly one of the titles of the Turzon family.

BETHLEN, a castle on the Great Szamos, in the inner county of Zolnock, a subdivision of the seven counties of Transylvania, and kingdom of Hungary. It is fortified with a rampart and towers.

BETH-REHOB, or simply REHOB. We are told, II. Sam. x. 6. that "the children of Ammon sent and hired the Syrians of Beth-rehob;" and ver. 9, "that the Syrians of Rehob, &c. were by themselves in the field." So that it is not to be doubted but that Rehob and Beth-Rehob were one and the same country or kingdom, so named from its principal city Rehob: for Josh. xix. 28. we find a city of this name allotted to the tribe of Asher; and Judg. i. 31. we read that the said Rehob was one of the cities out of which Asher did not drive its inhabitants.

BETHSAIDA is often mentioned in the New Testament. St. John i. 4. expressly tells us, that three of the apostles, Peter, Andrew, and Philip, were of this city. Bethsaida in Hebrew imports a place of fishing, or else of hunting; and both senses agree well with the situation of the city; for it lay on the Lake of Genesareth at the N. end, just at the influx of the river Jordan into the said lake, and so lay very convenient for fishing; and accordingly we find two of the three townsmen just mentioned, viz. Peter and Andrew, were fishermen. And it is conveniently situated for hunting likewise.

wife, as lying in the tribe of Naphtali, a country well stored with deer.

BETHSAN, or BETHSHAN, is a city belonging to the half tribe of Manasseh; on the W. of Jordan, and the S. coast of the sea of Galilee, and was considerable in the time of Eusebius and Jerom.

BETHSHEMESH, a town belonging to the tribe of Judah, situated in the N. border thereof, as appears from Josh. xv. 10. not far W. from Kirjath-jearim.

BETHSORA, or BETHZOR, so called from its being situated on a rock, a very strong fortress of Palestine, about six or seven miles S. of Jerusalem. King Rehoboam and the Maccabees improved its fortifications much; so that in their time the place was impregnable. It stood opposite to the southern Idumea; and was a kind of key to Judah on that side. The village on the top of the hill, where stood Bethsora, is now called St. Philip. Though the adjacent parts be called a wilderness, yet they still produce plenty of corn, wine, and olive-trees.

BETHULIA, recorded the remarkable town or city wherein lived Judith, when it was besieged by Holofernes, general of the Assyrian army. That this place was situated not far from Dothaim is evident from several texts, especially Judith vii. 3. where it is said the Assyrian army encamped in the valley near unto Bethulia, and spread over Dothaim.

BETHUNE, a fort of district called Advocatie, belonging to Artois, in the government of the latter name and Picardy, in France. Of the same denomination is the seat of the last-mentioned district, and a fortified town on the little river Bietre, which is the third city of this county. In it is a strong castle. The houses are meanly built, and the streets as meanly paved: but the market-place is a large and fine square. Here is made an excellent sort of cheese, which is sold in all the neighbouring countries. It is a place of some trade, and has two annual fairs. Besides a collegiate church, here are two parish churches, two priories, a college, six convents, and an hospital. This fortress was taken by the allies in 1710; but by the treaty of Utrecht delivered up again. It lies 13 miles north of Arras. Lat. 50, 32; N. Long. 2, 43, E.

BETISH, or BETISY, a borough in Le Valois, a subdivision of the two under-stadtholderhips, belonging to the government of the Ile of France.

BETLEY, a small market-town of Staffordshire, lying north-west of Newcastle-under-line, and on the borders of Cheshire. It has an annual fair on July 20.

BETLIS, or BETILIS, the capital of Assyria, now Curdistan, in Asiatic Turkey. It is the residence of a Bey or Prince of the Curds; who is the most considerable of them all, being neither subject to the Turks nor Persians, as the rest in some measure are to the one or the other. This city is built between two mountains, about a cannon shot asunder. The castle is built on a third hill steep, cragged, and difficult, to which there is a winding path cut through the rock. When come to the top, one must cross three draw-bridges before he arrives at the castle, and then pass three courts to the Bey's palace. The city extends itself on each side of the two mountains, from the bottom almost to the top; and in it are two caravanseras, one at the foot of the hill on which the castle stands, and the other at the further end of the town, situated higher; whereas the other is so low as sometimes to be filled with water which pours down from the neighbouring hills, and runs a-cross the town. Both city and castle are accessible only through a narrow pass, which may be defended by two men against 1000. The Bey can raise 25,000 horse, besides foot; which latter principally consist of shepherds that live among these mountains, and are trained to war in case of need. So that though his territory is surrounded by the Turks and Persians, yet both are obliged to keep fair with him, as he can stop the caravans which go between Aleppo and Tauris, the road from the former being within a day's journey of this city, and cut in several places out of the rock, and only broad enough for a camel. Betlis is an asylum for the subjects of the neighbouring states, and lies about 20 miles from lake Wan, near the northern frontiers of the province. Lat. 37, 30, N. Long. 45, 6, E.

BETSE, a military town, in the county of Bedford, and circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It is situated not far from the Theiss near its influx into the Danube, and inhabited by Rascians. Of the same name is another town in the county of Turuntal, and circle on the Further Side of the Theiss, upon the latter, and in Upper Hungary; which some include in the banat of Temeswar.

BETSTADT, a market-borough and large fishing place of Christianstadt territory, and province of Scania, in South-Gothland, Sweden. It is situated on a bay of the West Sea. It is like a little town; and had formerly the privileges of one.

BETTUS, a place in Merionethshire, in North Wales, where annual fairs are held on March 16, June 21, August 12, September 16, and December 12.

BETUWE. See BETAW, the ancient Batavia.

BETIWYS, a place of Carnarvonshire, in North Wales, where fairs are kept annually on May 15, and December 3.

BETZENDORF, a small town with a citadel, and two noble seats in the Old Mark.

BETZKOW, a populous town belonging to the

the county of Trentschin, and circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It is situated on the Waag, and is the property of several lords. Its castle had formerly the name of Bolondotz.

BEVAGNA, anciently Mevania, a small and almost ruined town of Spoleto, one of the provinces of the Ecclesiastical State, in the Middle Division of Italy. It stands on the river Tina or Timea, six miles west of Foligni, and 13 from the city of Spoleto.

BEVECUM, a town of Brabant, in the Austrian Netherlands, about seven miles south of Lovain, where the Duke of Marlborough encamped after having forced the French lines in 1705; and here he rested also his army after the victory of Ramillies, May 24, 1706. Lat 50, 45, E. Long. 4, 45, W.

BEVELAND, (North,) formerly but one island with South-Beveland, till separated by an inundation in 1532, caused by the waters of the sea and Scheld, which swallowed up several villages. It belongs to the province of Zealand, in the United Provinces; has now but one town called Cats, and a village called Colynsplaet. Great part of its north-east side has been recovered from the sea; but it fills very short of its pleasantness, when it was reckoned the Garden of Zealand.

BEVELAND, (South,) lies south of the former, and east of Walcheren, extending towards Brabant and Flanders. It was formerly above 60 miles in circuit; but is now so much diminished by inundations, that its greatest length is but 17 miles, and greatest breadth but eight. By the inundation mentioned under North Beveland, the town of Borselen, with the greatest part of its lordship, was swallowed up; and Rommerswael divided from the rest, and ruined by six inundations, and by fire. Both the Bevelands lie E. and W. of the Scheld.

BEVENSEN, or BAHMSSEN, a town seated on the Elmenau, in Lunenburg Zell.

BEVERGERN, a small town, in the bishopric of Munster, surrounded with morasses. In 1624 it was almost destroyed by fire, and in 1587 a salt spring was found at it.

BEVERLEY, the principal place in the East-Riding of Yorkshire. It is situated at the foot of the Wolds, about a mile from the river Hull. It is a large, populous, corporate and borough town, governed by a mayor, &c.

It had formerly a considerable trade, by means of a creek or cut, commonly called Beverley-beck, made from the town to the Hull, which falls into the Humber, for the passage of boats, keels, wherries, hoys, &c. to and from Beverley, with divers staiths or landing-places contiguous to the beck, for lading and unlading all sorts of goods. For the cleaning of which cut, and repairing the staiths, an act of parliament passed in the year 1727: so that the river is now navigable, and the town thereby kept clean.

Beverley has been of great note ever since the time of John de Beverley, or St. John, who was archbishop of York, first doctor of divinity in Oxford, and preceptor of the venerable Bede: here he built a monastery, where he resided four years, and died in it in 721. King Athelstan in 930. Henry I. and most of the succeeding princes of England, granted Beverley an exemption from all manner of toll throughout their dominions; from which, and the like privileges, Beverley keeps up its flourishing condition. The sessions of the riding are held here in a spacious hall called Hall-garth, where is a register for deeds and wills; the only place in England, besides Middlesex, which has such a thing. The town sends two members to parliament, has two weekly markets, the one on Wednesday for cattle, and the other on Saturday for corn. Its annual fairs are on Thursday before Valentine, February 14, Holy Thursday, July 5, and November 16, for horned cattle, horses, and sheep: one of these, namely the mart, is kept in a street leading to the Minster-street, called Londoners-street. Here is a large market-place, and beautiful cross, where was a stone-seat called freed-stoole, to which any criminal resorting had full protection, as a modern inscription here shews. In Beverley are seven alms-houses, and legacies for two more, besides a workhouse. It has a free-school, for the scholars of which are appropriated two fellowships at St. John's college in Cambridge, and nine exhibitions. Here were formerly four churches, now only two, namely the late collegiate church of St. John, still called the minster, and St. Mary's. The former has been repaired by the liberal contributions of Mr. Moyser, their member, Sir Michael Wharton, and others. By an old inscription dug out of a grave here in 1664, it appears that this church was burnt in 1188, and St. John's reliques found in 1197, and again deposited. Near the altar-place is the above-mentioned stool of one entire stone. Here are several monuments of the Percies, earls of Northumberland, &c. The principal trade of Beverley is in making of malt, oatmeal, and tanned leather: but the poor people maintain themselves by working bone-lace. Formerly the clothing trade was greatly in this town; yet it is said not to be inconsiderable now. About a mile east of Beverley is a kind of spaw, though without any mineral taste, which, when drank, is a great drier, and bathed in is good against all scorbutic and cutaneous eruptions. It lies about seven miles from Hull, 30 east of York, and 150 north of London. Lat 53, 50, N. Long. 12, W.

BEVERLEY, a maritime town in New England, in the province of Massachusetts-Bay, and county of Essex, situated on the south of Cape

Anne, and the north side of Burley Brook, two miles north of Salem.

BEVERN, a town on the Bever, in the principality of Brunswic Wolfenbottle, with a seat belonging to the late prince of Bevern.

BEVERUNGEN, a town of Germany, in the diocese of Paderborn, seated at the confluence of the rivers Beve and Weser, in E. long. 9, 30. N. lat. 51, 40. Here are some good salt springs.

BEVERWYKE, a town lordship on the Wykermeer, in Holland, which supplies Amsterdam with vegetables.

BEVERO di Terro Nova, II, i. e. The lake of the New Land. It is situated in the Val di Noto, belonging to the kingdom of Sicily, in Lower Italy. It is a salt-water lake, longer by much than it is broad, and said to be upwards of three Italian miles in circuit, and six from the town of Terra Nova. It must yield rich profits of salt, since the inhabitants of the last-mentioned place to which it belongs, know not how to draw any better advantage from it. This lake so abounds with fish, that in summer one may kill them with a stick from the very shore: but to prevent this two men continually keep watch in a tower adjacent. Into it comes only some fresh water, which the town has conveyed from the river Drillo, by means of a channel they have cut through a mountain towards the east, and what falls from the clouds. On fast days they not only supply the above-mentioned town, but also the other neighbouring parts with fish from hence. When the lake is something dried up by the summer-heats, its shores are covered with salt: for which reason some take this to be the Lacus Cocanicus mentioned by Pliny. One species of the fish found in this lake is called Molletti, and is much esteemed; the salting and exporting of which makes a considerable branch of commerce at Leontini.

BEAVERAY, a small place of Autunois, one of the subdivisions belonging to the government of Burgundy, in France. It is situated at the foot of a mountain, which some take to be the ancient Bibraete.

BEWALD, properly BIENWALD, i. e. Beeforest, in the government of Alsace, in France. It is 15 miles long and 12 broad; it is situated upon the borders of Lower Alsacia, and belongs to the bishop of Spire. It abounds with all sorts of four-footed game and wild fowl.

BEWDLEY, i. e. a fine place, being delightfully situated on the declivity of a hill, on the west bank of the Severn, over which it has a large stone-bridge. It is a small borough and market-town of Worcestershire, governed by a bailiff and recorder, &c. It is well supplied with corn, malt, leather, and caps called Monmouth caps. It was anciently noted for the forest of Wyre in its neighbourhood, where stood very tall trees, 1000 of which about three centuries ago were blown down by one tempest. By means of the Severn great quantities of salt, iron-ware, glass, Manchester-goods, &c. are put on board barges here and at Gloucester, aboard troughs for Bristol, Bridgewater, and other parts; which renders this a thriving place. It has a market for hops every Saturday. Its annual fairs are on May 4, December 10, and December 11. Bewdley sends but one member to parliament; lies 12 miles north of Worcester, and 100 north-west of London. Lat. 52, 25, N. Long. 2, 20, W.

BEWDSEY. See BAWDSEY.

BEWLEY, Hampshire, about 4 miles to the E. of Lymington; is a tide-harbour for small vessels, but little frequented.

BEYHE, or BEG, a river belonging to the banat of Temeswaer, in the circle on the Farther Side of the Theiss, in Upper Hungary. It unites itself with the Temes.

BEZEK is mentioned Judg. i. 5. as where the men of Judah and Simeon slew 10,000 Canaanites and Perizites, and wherein the proud and cruel Adonibezek had his residence.

BEZETHA, the name given by king Agrippa to a new quarter, which, at immense charge, he had built, and would have beautified, and fortified, on the north side of the city of Jerusalem, the name importing, the New City. He endeavoured to procure the emperor's leave for surrounding it with a strong wall; which if he had obtained, it would have rendered that metropolis absolutely impregnable. But Vivius Marfus, who A. C. 42 or 45, succeeded Petronius in the government of Syria, represented the danger of such a design (which had already been carried on to some forwardness) in such lively colours, that Claudius immediately sent him an order to desist.

BEZIERS. See BESIERS.

BEZOUART, a large town of Bishnagar, belonging to the Mogul empire, in Asia. It is full of pagods; and in particular one very large, with 120 pillars, and frightful figures embossed. Also another with the like figures, the idol in which sits cross-legged, with a triple crown, and four horns on his head. This they besmear with oil and paint, and offer it eatables, which maintain several priests and their families, who take them away by night. Pilgrims who resort to it for cure, bring an offering in the form of the part affected, in gold, silver or copper. Others repair to it for responses in several cases; which the priests frame as they list, from holes behind, and cannot be perceived, the pagods being always kept dark.

BI, one of the names of the great river Obi, in Asiatic Russia. See OB or OBI.

BIAFAR,

B E

BIAPAR, or BIAFRA, a kingdom of Africa, situated to the east of Benin, and the west of Medra, from which it is divided by a chain of mountains, and extending southward to the fourth degree of north latitude. The natives are the most of all negroes addicted to, and infatuated with magic; imagining themselves capable of causing rain, thunder, and lightning: therefore they worship the devil with great zeal, and even sacrifice their children to him.

BIAFARA, a town, capital of a kingdom of the same name.

BIALA, a little place belonging to the general district or bailiwick of Johanneburg, and circle of Oletzko, in the kingdom of Prussia. In 1722 it had the privileges of a town given it; where is a palace of prince Radzivil's, now an academy for the instructing of youth. It lies 20 miles south-west of the town of Breschk.

Of the same name or Bialla, is a little town in the district of Breschk and Polessia, in Lithuanian Russia, and great duchy of the former name.

BIALACERKIEW, a town in the palatinate of Kiow, a subdivision of Little Poland, in the kingdom of the latter name. Here the Tartars sustained a great defeat in the year 1626. It lies about 40 miles south of Kiow.

BIALLA. See BIALA.

BIALYKAMIEN, a small place of Lemberg district, and palatinate of that name, belonging to Red Russia, in Little Poland. Here rises the river Bug.

BIALYSTOCK, a town of Podlachia, one of the subdivisions of Little Poland, in the kingdom of the latter name. It is divided into the old and new town. It was almost entirely burnt down in 1753.

BIANA, a town of Agra or Indostan Proper, and empire of the Mogul, in Asia. Near it is a royal palace with fine gardens, in the road to Agra, divers seraglios, and a long market-place, but ill-peopled.

Before King Eckbar ruined it, this was a large city, the capital of the pagan kings; and still it gives name to the neighbouring parts for 50 miles. Here is found the best indigo in the country, and at Scanderbad, about 30 miles eastward.

BIANCO, a little place of the Riviera di Ponente, or western parts of the Genoese dominions on the continent, and Upper Division of Italy.

BIAR, a small town of Valencia in Spain, where are considerable quantities of very fine honey.

BIARNAFLAG, one of three mountains in the district of Thuing, and northern quarter of Iceland, belonging to Norway. It was on fire the 19th of April 1725.

B E

BIBEN, in Latin Pedena, a town seated on a high fertile mountain in Carniola, and the see of a bishop.

BIBERAC, or BIBRACH, i. e. the river of others, from the multitude of those animals near it; is an imperial walled town of Suabia in Germany, governed by its own magistrates, half Protestants and half Papists. It stands in a fruitful valley, surrounded with hills, pleasant fields, gardens, and meadows. Here the states of the circle meet. It has plenty of timber from the neighbouring woods, and fish from the Rufs, on which it stands. The bottom in the lower part of the town is so marshy, that they are obliged to build upon wooden piles. In this territory is a natural hot bath, which if drank warmed in spring, is reckoned good against cutaneous disorders. Here also is accommodation for bathing. The town has a considerable trade in fustians, the weavers being the most numerous of all the companies. Here is an hospital for decayed citizens, and some Latin schools. It suffered much in 1634, during the civil wars of Germany, having been taken by Gustavus Adolphus, and in 1702 by the duke of Bavaria, who soon quitted it. Here marshal Tallard joined the elector with the French reinforcement but nine days before the memorable battle of Hockstadt. It lies 20 miles south-west of Ulm. Lat. 48, 12, N. Long. 9, 30, E.

BIBERSBURG, one of the five fortresses near the five royal free-towns, in the county of Presburg, and circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It stands on a high hill of the Carpathian mountains, and belonged to count Palfi. To its jurisdiction belong a castle, four towns, and thirteen boroughs, or large villages. Near this place a bloody battle was fought between the Imperialists and Hungarian malcontents; 15 miles north of Presburg. Lat. 48, 35, N. Long. 17, 50, E.

BIBENA, a borough of the province of Florence, in the grand duchy of Tuscany, and middle division of Italy.

BIBERSTEIN, a small town in the canton of Bern.

BIBIGNE, a little place of Zara county, belonging to the continent of Venetian Dalmatia, in the Hungarian Illyria.

BIBLUS, supposed to have been the first built city in Phœnicia, the remains of which are situated on the coast, between Tripoly and Berytus. It is but small, with few inhabitants.

BIBRACH. See BIBERAC.

BIBRACTE, a citadel of the Edui, according to Strabo, but Cæsar describes it as a town well fortified, very large and populous, and of the greatest authority among that nation; now Beurect, or Bevray; a desolate place four miles to the north-west of Autun.

BIBROCI

BIBROCI, an ancient people of Britain, now the Hundred of Bray, in Berks.

BICANER, a city of Asia, on the river Ganges, belonging to the great mogul. E. Long. 87, 20. N. Lat. 28, 40.

BICHOR, a small, but fortified town, which some place in the county of Csongrad, and others in that of Kalo, in Upper Hungary. It has a bridge over the river Kalo, 6 miles N. of Great Waradin.

BICISTER, BISSETER, or BURCESTER, Oxfordshire, near a rivulet that runs into the Charwel at Islip, 52 miles from London. It is a long, straggling town, which once had a monastery, and is now much noted for its excellent malt-liquor. Here is a charity school for 30 boys. Market on Friday, and fairs August 5, and December 13. Besides the church here is a meeting-house, and the town, including two hamlets, contains about 400 families. On the adjacent plain are frequent horse races.

BIDACHE, a principality of Labourd, belonging to Gascony, in the government of the latter name, and Guyenne, in France.

BIDASSOA, or VIDASSO, a river near Fuent-Aravia, belonging to Biscay, in Spain. It is very broad, and is the boundary here between Spain and France. By virtue of a treaty concluded between Ferdinand the Catholic and Lewis XII. it belongs in common to both crowns, travellers paying the fare on this ferry to each on their respective sides.

BIDBURG, a little old town belonging to the duchy of Luxemburg, in the Austrian Netherlands, and Antoninus's Bedæ Vicus. It is situated on a small hill, in a fine and fruitful plain, and the chief place of a lordship, under whose jurisdiction are 33 villages. Here are two parish churches, with a nunnery. It lies on the borders of Luxemburg, and electorate of Treves, to which it is subject in spiritual matters.

BIDDENEN, a place in Kent, where an annual fair is kept October 28.

BIDEFORD, (i. e. by the ford), a clean well-built town of Devonshire, on the Towridge, governed by a mayor, and near Barnstable-bay. It is a sea-port, has a fine stone-bridge of 24 arches; with a very good quay and custom-house; near which is a populous street fronting the river, three quarters of a mile long, besides another spacious one, running N. W. and S. E. a pretty way, inhabited by wealthy merchants. Besides a spacious church, here is a very large meeting-house, much resorted to. The trade of this town being very much in fish, several ships go to Liverpool, and up the river Mersey to Warrington, for rock-salt, which here, and in the neighbouring town of Barnstable, is dissolved in the sea-water, and boiled into a new salt; and with this they cure their herrings. It lies south west from Barnstable. And they are both considerable and rival towns, having each a large share in the trade to Ireland, the herring-fishery, and to the American colonies. They are both established ports for landing wool from Ireland. Between 40 and 50 sail have been employed to fetch cod from Newfoundland. Its fairs are annually kept on February 14, July 18, and November 13, for cattle. It lies 30 miles from Exeter, and 197 from London. See BARNSTABLE.

BIDDEFORD, a town in the county of York, province of New Hampshire, in New England, near the mouth of Saco river and bay, 10 miles N. from Wells, and 20 S. from Brunswick.

BIDER, or BANDER, the capital of Telenga, a subdivision of Decan, in the Mogul empire and East Indies, in Asia. Thevenot says it belonged to Ballagate, when it had kings; but at other times to Decan. It is surrounded with brick walls, in which are battlements and towers; has a castle without the town, and in it a governor, with a garrison of 1500 horse and as many foot, besides 700 gunners, according to the same traveller. See BANDER.

BIDGOST, or BEDGOTZI, the Polish name of Blomberg; it is a walled town of Little Pomerania, in Polish Prussia, situated in a plain, and on the river Barde; by means of which goods are brought up to it from the Weiffel, particularly Uladislav, from which it is 24 miles. It is noted for a salmon trade. See BLOMBERG.

BIEDENKOPF, or BIEDENCAP, a small town standing on the Ahills in the Lower Part of Hesse, and famous for its iron-works. In 1635, and 1647, it suffered much by fire.

BIEEZ,

B E

BIEEZ, a town of Poland, in the palatinate of Cracovia, remarkable for its mines of vitriol. It is seated on the river Wefeloke, in E. Long. 2, 21. N. Lat. 49, 50.

BIECZ, a district in the palatinate of Krakow, in Little Poland.

BIESVERSKOW, a district belonging to the bailiwick of Tryggevelde, in the province of Seeland, in Denmark. To it belong 12 parish-churches. In that of Herfogle is an hospital for 20 aged persons and 10 young children, with a school-master to instruct them. It was founded by queen Anna Sophia.

BIEL, or BIENNE, the capital of a little territory in the bishopric of Basil, belonging to Suabia, in Germany. It is an ally of the Swiss cantons of Friburg, Bern, and Solothurn. The bishop of Basil has no spiritual jurisdiction here. He nominates one of their senators for mayors, and swears to maintain their privileges when they swear fealty to him. He has part of the fines, tithes, and other revenues; but the customs belong solely to the city. They furnish him in time of war with a number of soldiers at their own charge; but these are obliged to march no further than they can return at night, unless the bishop pays them. They are governed by a greater and lesser council, both chosen out of the six trading companies: and the mayor and senate determine in criminal causes; but in matters relating to the republic, the burgo-master, chosen by the two councils, presides; when the mayor, and other officers, dependent on the bishop, must withdraw. The inhabitants are Calvinists, and the common language is the German. It is the frontier-town of Bern canton, being situated in a plain, at the foot of a hill covered with vines; and at the N. extremity of a lake of its own name, which receives the Thur and Schuse. It lies 15 miles N. W. of Bern city. Lat. 47, 10, N. Long. 6, 7, E.

BIEL, a lake in the bishopric of Basil, near the town of the same name last-mentioned, N. E. of that of Neufchatel, with which it runs almost parallel from N. E. to S. W. having a communication with each other by the canal of Tiel, which separates the country of Neufchatel from the canton of Bern.

BIELA, or BUGUELLA, the capital of the territory of Biellese, belonging to the lordship of Vercelli, a subdivision of Piemont, in Upper Italy. It is situated at the foot of the mountains, not far from the river Cerva; is famous for an image of the Virgin, and lies 25 miles N. W. of Vercelli, and about 4 or 5 from Masserano.

BIELA, or BIELSKI, a territory of Western Muscovy, bounded on the N. and E. by that of Rzeva; by Lithuania and the palatinate of Witepetz on the W. and that of Simolensko on the S. Its capital of the same name, and also of a duchy formerly, when governed by its own princes, though subject to Lithuania, was a considerable place, till subdued by the czar Basilowitz; but now of little account otherwise. It is situated on the western side of the Osca or Opscha, at some distance S. of its fall into the Dwina, about 50 leagues from Moscow. Lat. 55, 34, N. Long. 34, 40, E.

BIELCZ, BIELSK, BYELSKO, or BELTZ, a palatinate of Little Poland, and otherwise termed Podlachia. This province having been taken from the Pagan Jaczvingi by the Poles, under Boleslaus V. was united to Poland in the year 1596. The Lithuanians have had frequent contests with the Poles about it. It is entirely subject to the bishop of Lucko in spiritual matters. It contains the three districts of Drogyczyn, Mielnik, and Bielsk. To it belongs a town of the same name, which is large, but wholly built of wood; as are the castle and fortifications, yet reckoned a pretty strong place. Here the Jews drive a considerable trade. It is situated on the little river Biala, which falls into the Narew, 62 miles S. of Gronod. Lat. 53, 10, N. Long. 24, 15, E.

BIELEFELD, the capital town of the county of Ravensberg, lying at the foot of a mountain and separated by the river Lutterbach. It contains about 800 dwelling-houses, two Lutheran churches, and one for the Calvinists, a Romish chapel, a Franciscan monastery with a chapel, an orphan house, with a stocking manufacture, an infirmary with a chapel, a Latin school, and a peculiar matrimonial court of its own, with a house of correction. The linen woven and bleached here is famous; also stuffs are wrought here, and the commerce carried on chiefly supports the town. The nobility hold their diets, and keep their archives here. In the town are 17 courts or squares, and it obtained its first privileges in 1287, and was a Hanse-town. It is defended by the impregnable fortresses of Sparenberg, and is now subject to Prussia.

BIELEW, a small town belonging to the province of Orel, in the government of Bielogorod, in European Russia.

BIELGOROD, Akerman, or Akkjaman, by the Moldavians called Tschetate Alba; all these signifying the white town in Bessarabia, or Budziack Tartary, in European Turkey. It is inhabited by Turks and Russians, and is an old town, situated at the influx of the Neister into the Black Sea.

BIELICA

B I

BIELICA, a small town belonging to the district of Lida, in Lithuania Proper. It is situated on the river Niemen.

BIELLAND, a place where there is a very surprising fishery, belonging to the district of Mandal and Lister, in the diocese of Christiansand, in Norway. It lies half a mile to the north of a hole or breach raised between two rocks, about 18 ells high above the water. Here the fishermen take the water near a cataract, and steer for the space of some fathoms against the stream, and under a rock covered with water, being high, and hollowed like a vault. Out of this hole they drive the salmon before them, and let themselves be carried down the stream upon a float; but should any piece of the wood happen to loosen from it, the people upon the float would inevitably perish.

BIELGOROD. See BELGOROD.

BIELOIJAR, a small town belonging to the circle of Sibirsk, and government of Casan, in Asiatic Russia. It lies on the Wolgaw.

BIELOJURSKAJA, a frontier fortress in the circle of Kufnetz, and province of Jeneseisk, belonging to Siberia, in Asiatic Russia.

capital of it. It is an old town among rocky hills; but has a castle and fair church. It lies mid-way between Coblentz, on the W. and Marburg on the E.

BIELUN, or WIELUN, (territory of,) in the Palatinate of Siradia, belonging to Great Poland Proper, in the kingdom of the latter name. In it is a town of the same denomination, built of bricks, with a high wall and deep ditch round it.

Bielun stands on the river Prosna. Here is a castle, with a castellany and starost. The provincial diet and country court are held in this place. Some of its buildings are stately. In 1656 it suffered much from the Swedes, but has since been repaired.

BIENNA, a town of Swisserland, seated on a lake of the same name. The inhabitants are Protestants, and in alliance with the cantons of Bern, Soleure, and Friburg, 17 miles north-west of Bern, 12 south-west of Soleure, and 17 north of Friburg. Long. 7, 14. E. Lat. 47, 11. N.

BIEQUE-ISLAND, or BORIQUEN, or CRABS ISLE, one of the Virgin isles, two leagues from Porto Rico, six leagues long, and two broad. The English settled there twice, and have been driven away by the Spaniards, whose interest it is to let it remain desolate. It has a rich soil, and a good road on the south side. Lat. 18, 2. Long. 64 30. See BORIQUEN.

BIERG, a district belonging to the bailiwick of Nyborg, and island of Funen, in the diocese of the latter name, in Denmark. It contains 12 country churches, 10 gentlemen's seats, with the barony of Scheelsborg, which was formerly called Enkielsborg, belonging to the baron of Brockdorf.

BIERGE, a district in the principality of Stierholm, belonging to the diocese of Aarhus, in North Jutland, in Denmark. It contains 17 churches.

BIERVLIT, in Dutch Flanders, which gives name to the little island on which it stands, is situated on the sea-coast, three miles from Isendyk, and ten from Sluys to north-east. This island was once pretty large, on the south side of the W. Scheld, or Hondt, of which another arm ran by Axel, and receiving some small rivers fell into the sea, on the west end of Cat's-land island; so that the towns of Cat's-land, Biervlit, and Axel, stood on the same island. But by the irruption of the sea it is now divided into four.

BIEROLIET, a town of the Netherlands in Dutch Flanders, where William Bruckfield, or Beukelings, who invented the method of pickling herrings, died in 1397. E. Long. 3, 42. N. Lat. 51, 25.

BIESENTHAL, a small town with a castle on the river Eino, in the government of the same name, in the Middle-Mark of Brandenburg.

in Suabia, and duchy of Wirtemberg. The country where it is seated produces excellent wine and fruits. It is near Besikheim, Strutgard, and the strong castle of Asperg, and is a superintendancy.

BIGA, or RIGA, a river in Montgomeryshire, which runs into the Severn above Llanidlor.

BIGHT. The Bight, or Gulph of Guinea (often mentioned), is a bending of the land a little to N. of the equinoctial line; and from thence the land stretches W. parallel with the line.

BIGLAND. Lancashire, on the N. W. side of Cartmel, has a fine fishpond on the very top of its ascent, large and deep enough to bear a man of war.

BIGLESWADE, or BIGGLESWORTH, in a hundred of the same name, is a town pleasantly situated on the Ivel, a river of Bedfordshire, which is here navigable by boats. Being a thorough-fare from London to York, it is well supplied with inns. It has a stone bridge; with two charity-schools for boys and girls. Its weekly market is on Tuesday. Its annual fairs are on February 13, Saturday in Easter-week, Whitfun-Monday, July 22, and St. Simon and Jude, October 28. It lies S. W. from Potten, 8 miles S. E. from Bedford town, and 41 N. of London. Lat. 52, 5. N. Long. 0, 20. W.

BIGORNO, a large village of Costera, a subdivision of the country on this side the mountains, or N. E. part of the island of Corsica, in Upper Italy.

BIGORRE, a territory or county of France, in the province of Gascony. It is bounded on the east by the valley of Aure, the viscounty of Neboussa, Rivierre Verdun, and Pardiac; by Bearn on the west; on the south by the vallies of Broton and Penticoufe, in Aragon; and on the north by the county of Rivierre-Bas, incorporated with Armagnac. It is 40 miles long from north to south, and 30 in breadth from east to west. It is divided into three parts, the mountains, the plains, and the Rustan. The mountains are inclosed between those of the valley of Aure on the east, those of Aragon on the South, and of Bearn on the west. This part contains two principal vallies, Lavedan and Barege. The valley of Bigorre is of an oval form, and has the hills of Rustan on the east. The remarkable towns are Tarbes the capital, Bagneres, Lour, &c. The mountains are a barrier between France and Spain, and there are four different passages which the inhabitants are obliged to guard. Bigorre yields marble, jasper, stone, and slate; there are also mines of several sorts, but they are not worked. The rivers are the Adour, the Elches, the Arroset, and the Gave of Lavedan; there are also three lakes.

BIHAEZ, a strong town of Croatia in Hungary, seated on an isle formed by the river Anna; in E. long. 16, 2. N. lat. 44, 35.

BIKER, an inlet of the Nile, and ruins of a town five leagues from Alexandria, supposed to be the ancient Canopus.

BIKHALVA, a town belonging to the jurisdiction of Sepse, and territory of the Sicilians, a subdivision of Transylvania, in the kingdom of Hungary. It is well known for the narrow pass called Buza, on the frontiers of Moldavia.

BILBAS, an island in the Niger or Senegal, a river of Africa: it is not far off from the Morphil island, from which it is separated only by a narrow channel; being about 30 leagues long, and five or six broad. It is well-peopled, and its negro inhabitants drive a good trade in ivory, gold-dust, and some small plates of that metal, of different shapes and sizes, which have been flatted by the hammer, and principally used by the women, for adorning their hair. These two adjacent islands belong to the Piratic or Fullis kingdom, whose prince and subjects are courteous to strangers. And besides the populousness and fertility of these islands, they have peculiar trees, herbs, and roots. The breed great variety of cattle, and other animals, have fowls in abundance, besides plenty of cotton, which they manufacture also.

BILBAO, or BILBOA, a corruption of Bellovado, i. e. a fine ford, lying near it. This, though not a city, is the capital of Biscay Proper, a subdivision of the province of that name, in Spain. It is situated in a plain, bounded by high mountains. The tide, which flows up here into the river Ybaicabal, the ancient Nervius, forms a secure harbour, which is very much resorted to; small vessels coming up to the mole, whilst those of greater bulk lie farther out in the road. The greatest export of this place is of their fine wool and excellent iron, most of the latter article in bars, though great quantities of it are wrought into swords, fire arms, horse-shoes, and other the like military implements, which are shipped off from hence, besides saffron and chesnuts. It is large and populous, containing 1200 houses, five parishes, the like number number of monasteries, seven nunneries, and has a bridge over the river. The trade of Bermeo, an old sea-port, and the Roman Flaviobriga, has been removed hither some centuries ago, by one of the lords of Biscay. Bilboa is in the site of the ancient Portus Amanus, and that a very delightful one. It has a good air, a fruitful country round it, and is well-built. Provisions are here very plentiful and cheap. It lies 6 miles from the sea, and 60 W. of St. Sebastian, in Lat. 43, 30, N. Long. 3, 18, W.

BILBILIS, a town of Hispania Citerior, the birth-place of Martial; now supposed to be Calatajud, in Arragon, on the Xalon.

BILSTON, Staffordshire, near Wolverhampton, and the road from London to Shrewsbury. Here is a deep orange-coloured sand, which is sent for by the artists far and near, to be used as a spaud to cast metals in; and it is also noted for a quarry of remarkable stones, lying horizontally one under another, in 12 beds deep, every bed thicker the lower they go; so that the lowermost is about a yard thick, and the inhabitants make cisterns, troughs, &c. of the stone. Some of it is curiously streaked with black. Here is a charity-school. By the late inland navigation, it has communication with the rivers Mersey, Dee, Ribble, Ouse, Trent, Darwent, Severn, Humber, Thames, Avon, &c. which navigation, including its windings, extends above 500 miles, in the counties of Lincoln, Nottingham, York, Lancaster, Westmorland, Chester, Warwick, Leicester, Oxford, Worcester, &c.

BILEDULGERID, or BELAD AIL JERID, (the Country of Dates) a kingdom of Africa. It is almost of a square form, extending itself more than 80 leagues every way, from 28, 30, to 32, 50, N. latitude, and from 6 to 12 degrees of W. longitude. It is bounded on the N. by the kingdom of Tunis, on the E. by a ridge of lofty mountains which divide it from Tripoli and part of Gadamis, on the W. by the countries of Zeb and Mezeb, and on the S. by the province of Verghela. The whole country is barren, sandy, and mountainous, producing little or nothing besides dates, which grow here in such profusion, that the face of half the kingdom is covered over with date-trees, and from hence the whole country takes its name. The climate is hot and unhealthy: the people lean, swarthy, and shrivelled in their complexions; with their eyes inflamed, owing to the reflection of the sun-beams from the white hard soil; and the showers of dust and sand driven by the high winds that blow here at certain seasons are frequently so violent as to bury men and cattle under them. Another inconvenience with which the inhabitants are afflicted, for which no other reason is given besides their constant living on dates, is, an inveterate scurvy in their gums, whence all their teeth drop out; though it frequently spreads over their whole bodies, and then they become the most unhappy and loathsome objects. They are almost entirely free from other diseases; so that when not afflicted with this, they live to a good old age; though it is observable that they discover a furrowed countenance, shrivelled skin, hoary locks, and other symptoms of old age, very early in life, and before decrepitude, infirmity, or any decay of their faculties, appear. The plague is not known in Biledulgerid, though so frequent in Barbary, and though a constant intercourse is kept up between the two countries, whence it would seem, that in certain cases this terrible distemper is not so infectious as it is usually thought to be. The same may be said of the small-pox, a disease little less contagious and fatal in hot countries than the plague itself.

The natives are represented as a lewd, treacherous, thievish, and savage people, who delight in murder and robbery. They are mostly a mixture of Africans and wild Arabs who mingled themselves with them. The former live with some regularity and civil order in a kind of villages composed of a number of little huts; the latter in tents, ranging from place to place in quest of food and plunder. The Arabs, who pride themselves in their superiority of birth and talents above the primitive inhabitants, are wholly independent and free, frequently hiring themselves in the service of the neighbouring princes at war; from which policy arise the most valuable branches of their public revenue, if any thing can be called common or public in a nation of lawless robbers. The rest pursue no other occupation besides hunting and plundering; the first of which is their common employment, especially hunting of ostriches, which are said to be of a prodigious stature in this country, and as high as a man mounted on a tall horse. The inhabitants eat the flesh of these animals; barter their feathers for corn, pulse, and other things they want; use their hearts in their necromantic and religious rites, their fat as a medicine of sovereign virtue, their talons for ear-pendants and other ornaments, and their skins they convert into pouches and knapsacks, so that not a part of the animal but is employed in some useful purpose. Besides dates and ostriches, the Arabs live likewise on the flesh of goats and camels; drinking either the liquor or broth in which that flesh is boiled, or the milk of their camels; for they seldom taste water, that element being more scarce in this country than milk itself. In the whole country there is scarce a town of any note, or even a stream of water that deserves notice, or that is not dried up half the year.

BILEVELT, or BIELFELDT, a town belonging to the county of Ravensberg, in the circle of Westphalia, in Germany. It is situated at the bottom of a large hill, and defended by the impregnable fort of Sparenberg, which made a gallant defence fence in former wars against the French, attacking it from an adjacent hill, with granadoes and fire-balls; the inhabitants having covered their houses with pieces of linen steeped in milk. The last-mentioned article is their principal manufacture; which while a-bleaching on the neighbouring hills, is watched by boys, who set up a hideous howl at the approach of travellers. It lies in the road between Munster and Minden, 7 miles S. E. of Ravensburg-city, and subject to the king of Prussia, in Lat. 52, 10, N. Long. 8, 15, E.

BILJARSK, a fortress of the circle of Casan, belonging to the government of the latter name, in Asiatic Russia. It stands on the river Maloi.

BILLERICAY, a town in Essex, with a large market on Tuesdays, and two fairs, on July 22, for horses; and on October 7, for cattle in general. It is seated on a hill, 9 miles S. by W. of Chelmsford, and 23 E. of London. Long. 0, 25, E. Lat. 51, 35, N.

BILLERIKA, a small town in Middlesex county, Massachusetts-bay, on the banks of the river Concord, about 6 miles W. of Wilmington, and 5 N. of Bedford.

BINCH, a small but fortified town of Hainault, in the Austrian Netherlands. It stands on the river Haine, which rises in the neighbourhood, in a fruitful country, abounding with all sorts of game, and the air very salubrious. The French became masters of Binch in 1668, but restored it to Spain by the treaty of Nimeguen; since which it has continued in the house of Austria. It is the principal place of a provostship, extending along the Scheld to the confines of Namur, and contains 51 boroughs or large villages, but no city. It lies 10 miles E. of Mons, in Lat. 50, 30, N. Long. 4, 20, E.

BINEGAR, a place in Somersetshire, where are fairs, on Whitfun-Monday and Tuesday.

BINES-GREEN, a place in Sussex, where a fair is held on June 12.

BINGAZI, a sea-port town of Africa, in the kingdom of Tripoli, 140 miles W. of Derna. Long. 19, 10, E. Lat. 32, 20, N.

BINGEN, in the electorate of Mentz, Germany, on the west side of the Rhine, 15 miles W. from Mentz; E. Long. 7, 20. Lat. 50. is a pleasant, neat, little town, and had a fort in the time of the Romans, and has a castle now on a hill which overlooks the town. It was once an Imperial city, but is now subject to the dean and chapter of Mentz. It has a stone bridge over the river Nahe, which runs through the town into the Rhine. The latter is twice as broad here as the Thames at London bridge. It stands in a district called Rhingaw, a territory of 20 miles extent along the Rhine, so populous that it looks like one entire town intermixed with gardens and vineyards. The rising grounds about it produce wines, preferred to those of Baccarach.

BINGER-LOCH, a cascade in the Rhine, a little below Mauffhurn, or the Mouse-tower. It is formed between two rocks, and is the most dangerous passage in all that river.

BINGHAM,

BINGHAM, a small market-town of Nottinghamshire, in the road to Newark. Its weekly market is on Thursday; and it has fairs on February 20 and 21, the first Tuesday in May, and November 8. It lies 108 miles from London.

BINGLEY, a place in Yorkshire, where are held two fairs annually, on January 25, and August 25, 26, 27.

BINGIUM, a village or town of the Vangiones, in Gallia Belgica, seated at the confluence of the Nave and Rhine. Now BINGEN; which see.

BINNENLAND, the south part of Bohus prefecture, a subdivision of West Gothland, in Sweden. It consists of four provincial districts.

BINTAN, an island of Asia, in the East-Indies, to the south of the peninsula of Malacca, situated in E. long. 103, 30. N. lat. 1. 0.

BINTS. See ALVINTZ, or ALVING.

BIOBIO, a river in Chili, the largest in that kingdom. It enters the South sea in lat. 37 south, running through veins of gold, and fields of Esparilla. It is the boundary between the Spaniards and several Indian nations their enemies, which obliges the former to keep strong garrisons there.

BIORKEDAL, a swamp or morass of Sundmor, a subdivision belonging to the diocese of Bergen, in Norway. Here is a part of a mountain consisting of amianthus or asbestus; the parts of which more, like wood than stone, have been looked upon as petrifications.

BIORKHOLM, a small island of Bleking, which is a subdivision of South Gothland, in Sweden. Upon it stands part of the town of Carlskroon.

BIORKO, an island belonging to the ten inland districts, in the territorial jurisdiction of Stockholm, in Upplandia, a province of Sweden Proper. It is situated on the Malar-lake, three miles from Stockholm. Upon it formerly stood the considerable market-town and royal seat of Birka or Biorko; commonly, though without any foundation, called a town.

BIORKKOHN, an island, with a church built of stone. It lies near the town of Tomea, belonging to Westrobothnia, a subdivision of Nordland, in Sweden. Here sermons are preached in the Finnic language for the use of the inhabitants of that town and the neighbourhood.

BIORNEBORG, a district or fief belonging to Finland Proper, in Sweden. It lies north, and is subdivided into Upper and Lower Satagunda.

BIORNEBORG, a town of the last-mentioned district of the same name, in Latin Beorniburgum or Arctopolis. It lies on the sea-coast, and is situated on a long strip of sand on the east shore of the Kumo-elf, or Bothnic gulph, which below the town is subdivided into several arms, and by that means forms many small islands for the space of half a mile. It is said at first to have been built in the parish of Kumo, but afterwards removed to Ulfsby or Wanhakyla, and in 1558, to its present site. From this place are sent annually great quantities of wooden ware, and abundance of fish, particularly salmon and large cod or white fish, not only to Stockholm, but also to other parts. Its loading-place is near Sandud, about a mile from the town. A general diet of the kingdom was held here in 1602; and it is ranked the 64th town in that national assembly. Close by is a royal demesne. It lies 80 miles north of Abo. Lat. 62, 7, N. Long. 21, 10, E.

BIORNO, an inconsiderable place of Finland Proper, in Sweden. It lies about 12 miles distant from Abo, to the N. W.

BIORNSHOLM, a considerable seat in the district of Slet, and bailiwick of Aalborguus, belonging to the diocese of Aalborg, in North Jutland, Denmark. Here was formerly a rich monastery of Bernardines, called Vitæ Scholo; and hence, by corruption in the language of the country, Vitskiol, with a stately church, which is said to have been one of the finest in all the North; but now a mere heap of rubbish. After its secularization king Frederic II. gave it in 1573, to his counsellor of state, Biorn Anderson, from whose first name it had that of Biornsholm.

BIR, a little borough-town of King's county, and province of Leinster, in Ireland. It is by much the best place in the county, and situated on the confines of Tipperary, on a river which discharges itself into the Shannon. It sends two members to the Irish parliament.

BIR, or AL-BIR, by the inhabitants called Berygeon, a town of Diarbeckr, or the ancient Mesopotamia, in Asia. It is situated on the side of a hill, upon the east side of the Euphrates, and defended by two old castles; the one upon the banks of the river, and the other upon a hill; in which a sangiac, 200 janizaries, and twice as many spahis, reside. On the opposite side of the river is a large caravansera, well guarded from the free-booters. Here the Euphrates is about a mile broad, and its current gentle enough for flat-bottomed boats to cross it, so that it is a kind of ferry from Syria. The caravans are not allowed to go into the city, but march by the side of it, in order to reach another caravansera on the top of a hill; where the officers come at night to receive the customs. The river-water is muddy, which they keep in pots till the sediment subsides. In the town is plenty of all kinds of provisions, as excellent bread, wine, and fish. The country round it is pleasant, and sown with corn; but farther east it is more hilly and barren. It lies 70 miles south-east of Aleppo, in lat. 35, 20, N. long. 40, 5, E.

BIRCHES, in Gloucestershire, between Colebroke-dale and Builders-bridge. A most remarkable ble incident happened here on Thursday morning, May 27, 1773, about four o'clock, when ten acres of a high bank that lay by the Severn split quite a-cross the river, and entirely stopt up the channel, and turned the course of the river over a meadow that lay on the other side. Where the river had ran, in the morning was found a high bank, with 20 lofty oaks standing upon it; and, where the ground divided, a chasm was left seven or eight yards wide, and five or six yards deep. As soon as the bank had stopt the river, the vessels below were all left dry at the bottom of the channel; but the stream soon cut itself a new course. About 40 yards from the river bank stood a house, where a family dwelt; the man got up about three o'clock, and heard a rumbling noise, and felt the ground shake under him, on which he called up his family. They perceived the ground begin to move, but knew not which way to run; however the people took to their heels, and just as they got to an adjacent wood, the ground they had left separated from that on which they stood. The house is still standing, but a barn that was near it was thrown down.

BIRD-ISLAND, one of the new discoveries in the Pacific ocean by Captain Cook, in 1769. It is about five miles in compass, and is very low, with a piece of water in its center, appeared to be well wooded and watered, but was not inhabited, and from its great number of birds flying about, received its name. Lat. 17, 48, S. Long. 143, 35, W.

BIRD-ISLANDS. See AVES.

BIRKENFELD, the capital of a principality, and duchy of the same name, in the palatinate of the Rhine, in Germany. It is a walled town, defended by a castle, lies towards the confines of the electorate of Treves, 20 miles east of the capital of the latter name. Lat. 49, 45, N. Long. 6, 40, E.

BIRKHAUSEN, anciently Bedacum, a strong town of Bavaria, in Germany, on the river Saltz. It is the principal place of a bailiwick, on the confines of the archbishopric of Saltzburg, seven miles from that city, in the road to Straubing, and 13 east from Munich.

BIRMINGHAM, or BROMICHAM, in Warwickshire, 109 miles from London, and 17 from Coventry. It is pleasantly situated on the side of a hill, forming nearly a half-moon. It is about two miles in length, (including the hamlets of Deritend and Bordley) nearly the same in breadth, and about six miles in circumference; contains 50,000 inhabitants, most of whom are employed in the manufacturing of gold, silver, steel, &c. in various forms, for use as well as ornament, which have by their exquisite workmanship excited the attention of the curious, and for cheapness they cannot be surpassed or perhaps equalled in any part of the universe. Such a spirit of industry reigns there in all ranks of people, that even the women and children earn their living by fabricating of toys, trinkets, &c. Here are near 8000 houses besides work-shops, ware-houses, &c. Here are two churches, viz. St. Martin's, an ancient building, with a lofty spire, and 12 good bells; St. Philip's, a grand modern structure, with a fine tower, ten bells, and a cupola above it, and stands in one of the finest church-yards in Europe. In each of the steeples is a set of musical chimes, which play every three hours, and a different tune every day in the week. Here are three chapels of ease. Here are also two meeting-houses for Presbyterians, one for Quakers, and three for other dissenters. Here are three free-schools, one of which, a noble structure, was founded by king Edward VI. for the grammar education of 130 boys. The two other schools are supported by the contributions of the inhabitants, in one are 50 boys and 30 girls, who are educated and maintained till they are 14 years old, when they are put out to different employs; the other school, which is a late institution, is supported by a voluntary subscription among the Protestant dissenters, in which 27 children are maintained and educated, and apprenticed out at proper ages. Markets on Thursdays. Fairs are Thursday in Whitsun week, and on September 29. It has no corporation, being governed only by two constables, two bailiffs, and a headborough, it is therefore free for any person to come and settle here, which perhaps not a little contributes to the increase of its trade, buildings, and inhabitants. A navigable canal was begun in April, 1768, and completed in November 1769, to the collieries of Wednesbury, from whence the inhabitants here are supplied with coals at a moderate price, which before sold at an exorbitant rate. In 1772 this canal was extended to Austerly, from whence a communication is opened through the Severn to Shrewsbury, Gloucester, &c. and through the Trent to Gainborough, and Hull; and it is also extended to Liverpool, &c. through the Mersey. Besides the manufactories carried on here, there are several established in the adjacent villages, of which that at the Soho merits attention: this place is situated in the parish of Handsworth, two miles from hence. The building consists of four quadrangles, with shops, ware-houses, &c. for 1000 workmen, in the several branches of fabrication of buttons, buckles, &c. in which no care or expence is spared. Their ornamental pieces in Or-Moulu are highly esteemed all over Europe. The site of this building, which, about 12 years since, was a barren uncultivated heath, now contains many houses, and wears the appearance appearance of a populous town. Lat. 52, 30, N. Long. 1, 50, W.

BIRSEN, a city of Lithuania, which was taken by Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden in 1625; and it was taken again by the Swedes in 1704, when its fortifications were destroyed.

BIRSE, one of the districts in Aberdeenshire, in Scotland.

BIRSENGEN, a small place belonging to the lordship of Lutzelstein, a subdivision of the government of Alsace, now subject to France.

BIRSTEIN, a town in the county of Upper Ysenburg, with the prince's palace in it, and very good iron-mines in its neighbourhood.

BIRTHIN, a river in Monmouthshire which runs into the Ufk, near Ufk.

BIRU, a town ten leagues from Truxillo, in the South Seas, inhabited by about 4000 Indians, Spaniards, Mulattoes, and Mestizos; it is very fertile in most of the necessaries of life. The country is watered by the means of canals cut from the river, and so conveyed to great distances, as at Truxillo. Lat. 9, 24, S. Long. 69, 17, W.

BIRVIESCA, a town of Spain, in Old Castile, and capital of the small territory of Bureva, 15 miles north of Burgos. Long. 2, 15, W. Lat. 56, 34, N.

BIRZA, a town of Samojitia, in Poland, 42 miles south-east of Mittau. Lat. 56, 35, N. Long. 25, 10, E.

BIRZE, a strong town in the district of Upitz, and palatinate of Trockie, in Lithuania Proper, belonging to the great duchy of the former name, a residence of prince Radzivil's.

BISSACCIA, an episcopal city, united to that of St. Angelo. It belongs to the Farther Principate, in the kingdom of Naples, and Lower Division of Italy. It stands on the Appennine mountains, about eight miles west of Cedogna, and 30 east of Benevento. Lat. 40, 56, N. Long. 16, 5, E.

BISAN, a large village belonging to the diocese of Narbonne, in Lower Languedoc, and government of the latter name, in France.

BISANTAGEN, an inland town of Cambaya, a province of the mogul empire and East-Indies, in Asia. It is situated in the center of the province, and considerable for pasture, and the fertility of its neighbouring soil for rice, wheat and cotton. Here are several large towers and temples, with a great pool in the middle for bathing. It lies a little to the right of the road leading from Patan to Amandabat, about 107 miles north-east from the former, and south-west from the latter.

BISCARA, a town of Africa, in the kingdom of Algiers, seated in the eastern or Levantine government, in E. long. 5, 50. N. lat. 35, 10. This city belonged to the province of Zeb in Numidia, which lies south of the kingdom of Labez; but the Algerines, in their annual inroads to carry off slaves, made themselves masters of Biscara, in order to facilitate their entrance into the southern provinces. It retains still some remains of the ancient city that gave name to this territory; and hath a garrison to keep the inhabitants in awe, and who usually bring lions, tigers, and other wild beasts for sale to strangers. The city of Algiers is never without a great number of Biscarans, who are employed in the hardest and lowest offices, as cleansing of streets, emptying of vaults, sweeping chimneys, &c. and when they have got about 10 or 12 crowns by this drudgery, they return to their country, where they are respected as worthy men on account of their money, the inhabitants of this province being almost entirely destitute of coin, and reckoned the most miserable of all the Arabian tribes.

BISCARI, a principality of the Val di Noto, a subdivision of the island of Sicily, in the Lower part of Italy.

BISCAY, BISCAYA, or VIZCAYA, in Latin Cantabria, one of the provinces belonging to Spain. It is bounded on the west by the principality of Asturias; on the north by the Mediterranean, which here is called the Biscayan or Cantabrian sea, the bay of Biscay, or simply by us the Bay; on the east by French Lower Navarre, and Spanish Navarre; and towards the south by Old Castile. Its extent from south to north is from 5 to 20 miles, and from west to east about 29.

The air here is fine and temperate, as in the other provinces of Spain. The soil is uneven and stony. In some places hardly any thing grows; but in others they have a little wine called chacolino, which is pleasant, and drank here as small-beer, and what grain is necessary for the subsistence of the inhabitants: but throughout the province great quantities of apples are produced, of which they make fine cider, that supplies the want of good wine.

The coast abounds in oranges and citrons, which may be bought very cheap. Its large forests supply them with excellent timber for ship-building: and its mountains yield mines of iron and lead. In its valleys is produced some flax. Its commodious situation on the sea, and in the neighbourhood of France, makes the trade here very flourishing: they especially export great quantities of iron-work, with all sorts of swords and fire-arms, which are very neatly finished; also a great deal of tar. Here they ship off large quantities of wool, but mostly brought from Old Castile; but their own produce in this article, which is not so fine, nor in such quantity, they manufacture wholly for home use. The natives of this province are of Celtic extraction, being, like their progenitors, generous, brave, hardy, men of few words, active, and choleric. They are reckoned the best soldiers and sailors in all Spain.

Spain. They once inhabited some of the finest parts in the ancient Bætica; but their natural love of liberty, and invincible aversion to a foreign yoke, made them retire into these mountainous countries, when invaded and overpowered in their ancient seats. They have a particular language of their own, called the Basque or Biscayan, which has no affinity with any of the European tongues; and there are few, but among the very meanest, who do not speak it readily: having preserved this, with their genius, ancient laws, government, and manners, without innovation, more than any other nation in Europe, except the Welsh.

Until the year 859 the Biscayans were governed by counts or governors, sent them by the kings of Oviedo and Leon. About which time they revolted, and chose themselves a lord: which they retained till Peter the Terrible reduced them, and united Biscay, under the title of a lordship, with Castile, which still continues. This province includes the three following subdivisions; namely, Biscay Proper, Guipuzcoa, and Alaba.

BISCAY (New), a province of North America, in the audience of Guadalajara. It has New Mexico on the north, Culiacan on the west, Zacatecas on the south, and Panua, with Florida, on the east. It is about 300 miles from east to west, and 360 from north to south. In general it is well watered, fruitful, moderately temperate, and abounds in all sorts of provisions, except the mountains of Topia, which are barren. The original inhabitants are not all brought under subjection, they having four large towns in the morasses, that are difficult of access; for this reason the Spaniards have built three small fortified towns, which are well inhabited, for the defence of their silver mines. The latitude is from 25 to 28 degrees.

BISCHMARK, a small town of Little Pomerania, in Polish Prussia.

BISCHOFSDORF, or BISCHDORF, also Pyspoki, with the privileges of a township, belonging to the upper district of the island of Schutt, and circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It is well-inhabited, and belongs to the archbishop of Gran.

BISCHOFF-ZELL, in Latin Episcopi Cella, in the Thourgaw, Switzerland, is a pretty town at the confluence of the Thour and Sitter, almost mid-way between Constance and St. Gall, 3 leagues and a half N. W. of the latter. It belongs to the bishop of Constance, partly subject to him, partly free, his bailiffs receiving half the tithes, but have no command over the town. They choose their own magistrates and senate, from whom is no appeal; and oaths between the bishop and the inhabitants are reciprocal.

BISCHOFSBURG, or BISCHBURG, a small town of Ermeland, belonging to Polish Prussia. It was once burnt down.

BISCHOFSCHEIM, a small town in the balliwick of Lichtenau, and lordship of Lichtenberg and Ochsenstein, belonging to Lower Alsace, in the government of the latter name, now a province of France.

BISCHOFSTEIN, or BISTEIN, a little town of Ermeland, a subdivision of Polish Prussia. It was built in 1325, taken by the Teutonic order in 1455, and burnt down in 1580.

BISCHOFSWERDES, a small town in the capital balliwick of Marionwerder, belonging to the circle of the latter name and Möhrung, in Oberlande, a subdivision of the kingdom of Prussia. It is situated on the Assle, and was founded in the year 1325. The great damage done it by fire in 1730 has been since pretty well repaired.

BISCHWEILLER, a fine market-town of Lower Alsace, in the government of the latter name, now a province of France. It lies near the river Motter, and belongs to the duke of Birkenfeld, who has a genteel seat here, formerly the residence of that family. It lies 5 miles W. of the Rhine and Port Lewis. Lat. 48, 40, N. Long. 7, 52, E.

BISCHWITZ, a small place in the county of Harburg, belonging to the duke of Wurtemberg, in Upper Alsace, and government of the latter name, now a part of France.

BISEGLIA, an episcopal see in the Terra di Bari, a province of the kingdom of Naples, in the Lower Division of Italy. It is situated upon a hill on the Adriatic, and in a fertile territory. Its bishop is under the prelate of Trani, from which latter city it lies about 5 miles to the E. Lat. 41, 10, N. Long. 16, 55, E.

BISENTIO, a small place in the duchy of Castro, a territory, with the county of Ronciglione, belonging to the Ecclesiastical state, in the Middle Division of Italy.

BISENTINA, an island in the last-mentioned duchy. It is situated in the Lago di Bolsena, in the Middle Division of Italy. See BOLSENA.

BISERT, a fortress belonging to the government of Orenburg, in the Asiatic part of Russia. It is situated on a river of the same name.

BISERTA, a town of the kingdom of Tunis in Africa, seated on a gulph of the same name, in E. Long. 10, 40. N. Lat. 37, 20. The gulf is a very large one, and the Sinus Hipponensis of the ancients. It is formed by the capes Blanco and Ziebeb, and has a beautiful sandy inlet near 4 leagues wide, which once admitted the largest vessels, but through the negligence of the Turks can now admit only those of the smallest size, and is in danger in a short time of being totally choked up. Some remains of the great pier of Hippo are still extant; by which it appears to have run out into the sea so as to break the north-east wind, and make this one of the safest and most beautiful havens in these parts. On the south, this gulf hath a communication with a lake of the same name, so as to form a kind of canal between it and the Mediterranean sea. Through this canal a constant stream is observed alternately discharging itself from the sea to the lake, and from the lake to the sea, in the same manner as the Atlantic ocean is observed to do in the Mediterranean, and back again; so that what the lake loses by exhalations is soon recruited by the sea, which in hot seasons runs into it with a very brisk current to keep up the equilibrium.

The town was formerly very considerable; and, though not above a mile in circuit, is said to have contained 6000 houses; whereas both it and the villages under it now scarce contain that number of inhabitants. It has still, however, some strong castles and batteries to defend it, especially towards the sea. There are also two very capacious prisons for slaves, a large magazine or warehouse for merchandize, and two towers with some other outworks to defend the entrance of the haven. The city, though so near the sea, is well supplied with fresh water from springs that surround it on every side towards the land. It is likewise well furnished with variety of fish from the adjacent lake.

The people are very poor, live meanly, and go worse clad. Their choicest dainty is their couscou, a kind of cake made of flour, eggs, and salt, which they dry, and keep all the year round. Their dress is nothing else than a piece of coarse cloth wrapped round their bodies, and another round their heads by way of a turban; and most of them go bare-footed and bare-legged. The poorer sort have nothing but a few skins laid on the floor to sleep upon; but the rich have narrow couches fixed against the wall, about 5 or 6 feet high, to which they mount by a ladder. They are very expert horsemen, as most in these countries are, and ride without saddle or bridle; nor do they ever shoe their horses. They are still more miserable from the neighbourhood of the Arabs, who living altogether by plunder, robbery, and murder, oppress the poor inhabitants with their frequent inroads and cruel exactions.

BISHAM, a place in Berkshire, opposite to Marlow, in Bucks, and intersected by the Thames; where formerly stood an abbey, of which the ruins are still to be seen. The estate came from the Knights Templars to the Hobby family; two of which name are celebrated in our histories, and whose monuments in the little church of Bisham are well worth seeing.

BISHOP and his CLERKS, rocks so called, on the coast of Pembrokeshire, South Wales. They lie about a league north-west of the Isle of Ramsey, and are very distinctly marked in all maps, at the extremity of the island of Britain that way, and not far from St. David's. From hence the land falls off, bending north-east to the west coast of South Wales. And here begins St. George's channel, which has a bold shore to the south-point of Cardigan-bay, for seven leagues and a half. These rocks are noted for aireys of excellent falcons bred in them; but they are more infamous for frequent shipwrecks.

BISHOP-AUKLAND. See AUKLAND.

BISHOPRIC. See DURHAM.

BISHOPS-CASTLE, a small borough of Pur-flaw, in Shropshire. It is governed by a bailiff, and sends two members to parliament. It has a weekly market on Friday, and its annual fairs are on Friday before Good-Friday, the first Friday after May-day, July 5, September 9, and November 13. It is situated on the river Clun, which meets the Teme at Ludlow, in a kind of promontory, between the shires of Montgomery and Radnor. Not far from this town, just at the entrance into the former county, is a noted place called Bishops-mott, being an acre of ground, surrounded with an intrenchment. It lies 15 miles south-west of Shrewsbury, and 140 north-west of London.

BISHOPSLACK, or LACK, a town of Upper Carniola, in the circle of Austria, in Germany. It is situated on a little river, 10 miles south of Crainburg, and 11 east of Laubach. It is fortified, and subject to the Bishop of Freysing. Its territory is 10 German miles round, and contains 200 villages.

BISHOPS-LYDEARD, a place in Somerset-where they hold fairs on March 25, and September 8.

BISHOP-STORTFORD. See STORTFORD.

BISHOPS-ZELL, in Latin Episcopi Cella, a pretty town of the Thurgaw, in Switzerland. It is situated at the confluence of the Thour and Sitter, almost midway between Constance and St. Gall, three leagues and a half north-west of the latter. It is partly subject to the bishop of Constance, and partly free. The bishop's bailiff, who resides in the castle, receives half the fines, but has no command over the town. Before the inhabitants swear fealty to the bishop, he swears to maintain their privileges without diminution. They choose their own magistrates and senate, from whom there is no appeal.

BISIGNANO, a small city of the Hither Calabria, a province belonging to the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy. It gives title of prince to the house of Sanseverino; and its bishop is immediately subject to the pope. It lies 20 miles north of Constanza. Lat. 39, 50, N. Long. 16, 45, E.

BISLEY, a place in Gloucestershire, where two fairs are held on April 23, and November 12.

BISNAGAR, formerly a very large and powerful kingdom of Asia, comprehending the kingdoms of Kanara, Mellowr, Travankor, Madura, Marava, and Tanjour. It was called Bisnagar from its capital city, and took the name of Narfinga from one of its rajahs or kings. We know nothing certain concerning this kingdom before the year 1520, when Khrisna Rajah, king of Bisnagar, made war with Adel Khan king of Ysiapur, from whom he took the city of Rachol, situated in the island of Salfette near Goa, which he said had belonged to his ancestors. In 1565, the happy state of this kingdom excited the envy of the kings of Dekan; who, having raised an army of 500,000 foot and 50,000 horse, defeated and killed the king of Bisnagar, though at the head of an army almost twice as numerous, and took the royal city itself. They are said to have spent five months in plundering it, although the inhabitants had before carried off 1550 elephants loaded with money and jewels to the amount of upwards of 100,000,000 of gold; besides the royal chair for state days, whose price could not be estimated. The victors, however, found a diamond of the size of an ordinary egg, besides another of a size somewhat inferior, and several other jewels of immense value. Afterwards, however, they were forced to abandon the kingdom, as being too large for them to keep in their hands. From this time the kingdom of Bisnagar remained pretty much unmolested till about the year 1627, when it was subdued by Aurengzebe, second son to Shah Jehan, and hath ever since remained subject to the Great Mogul. In some places of this kingdom it is said the roads have great forests of bamboes on each side, which are so thick that it is impossible for a man to pass, and are full of monkeys. They catch the wild elephants here in pitfalls, and then tame them by means of others already tamed; the latter seldom fail of beating the wild ones into good behaviour.

BISNAGAR, or CHANDEGRY, the capital of the last-mentioned kingdom, is situated in the middle of it, upon a high hill, near the river Nagundi, which falls into the Christena. It is a fine, large, rich, and strong city; has a fort, and is walled round; having a stately royal palace in it. The trade here is in Arabian horses, velvets, damasks, sattins, chints, saffron, scarlets, Turkey jewels, and gold ducats, or pagodas. The inhabitants wear velvet, sattin, and scarlet, with breeches like the Turks, and large gold ear-rings. When a great man dies, his wife and concubines are burnt with the dead body; but the wives of the poorer sort are strangled, as they hold the corps by the neck. It lies 250 miles north-west of Madras. Lat. 14, 10, N. Long. 78, 15, E.

BISSAGOS, a cluster of islands on the coast of Negroland, in Africa, situated between the mouth of the river Gambia and Rio Grande. Their names are Bulam, Cassuabac, La Gallinci, Cazegut, Calacha, and Oranguana, with some other small islands. Each of these islands is governed by a king of its own; and as all those petty monarchs are quite independent, they frequently make war with each other, yet they always unite against the inhabitants of Biacara, who are their common enemies. They have canoes that carry from 25 to 40 men with their provisions and arms, which are sabres, bows, and arrows. The inhabitants are negroes; who are tall, strong, and healthy, though they live only on fish, nuts, and palm-oil; choosing rather to sell the rice, mullet, and other grain produced in their country, to the Europeans, than not to gratify their passion for trinkets and ornaments. In general, they are idolaters; cruel and savage in their disposition, not only to strangers but to one another, when they happen to quarrel, as they frequently do about trifles; and if they happen to be disappointed of their revenge, they frequently drown or stab themselves.

BISSAO, BISSAW, or BISSAUX, an island on the coast of Africa, a few leagues to the south-east of the river Gambia, and separated from the continent only by the channel of the river Geves. In this island the French have a factory, and there is also a fort belonging to the Portuguese, at both of which a great trade is carried on. The island is about 35 or 40 miles in circumference, having an agreeable prospect to the sea, from which it rises by a gentle ascent on every side to an eminence in the centre of the island. There are, however, a great many hills inferior in height to that in the middle, and separated by beautiful and fertile vallies divided by little rivulets, which at the same time augment the richness and elegance of the scene. So rich is the soil of Bissao, that wheat and maize spring up to the size of Indian corn; or rather resemble a field covered with reeds or bamboos. The cattle also are of an extraordinary size, and seem to keep pace with the extravagant growth of the corn. Milk and wine are in the greatest abundance; but the island affords neither hogs nor horses. The former are forbid by the natives to be imported, and something in the soil or climate renders it unfit for the increase of the latter, which never thrive here. The dress of the men of all ranks in Bissao is only a skin fixed to the girdle before and behind. The dress of the married women consists of a cotton petticoat; but virgins go entirely naked, wearing bracelets on their arms and legs, and if they are of high quality their bodies are painted with the form of snakes and other hideous figures. Lat. 11, 25, N.

BISSENPOUR, a small district of the kingdom of Bengal, in the East-Indies, which has all along preserved its independence. It has been governed time immemorial by a Bramin family of the tribe of Rajah-puts. Here the purity and equity of the ancient political system of the Indians is found unadulterated. This singular government, the finest and most striking monument in the world, has till now been beheld with too much indifference. We have no remains of ancient nations but on brass and marble, which speak only to imagination and conjecture, those uncertain interpreters of manners and customs that no longer exist. Were a philosopher transported to Bissenpour, he would immediately be a witness of the innocent and inoffensive life led by the first inhabitants of India many thousand years ago; he would converse with them; he would trace the progress of this nation, celebrated as it were from its very infancy; he would see the rise of a government which, being founded in happy prejudices, in a simplicity and purity of manners, in the mild temper of the people, and the integrity of the chieftains, has survived those innumerable systems of legislation, which have made only a transitory appearance in the stage of the world with the generations they were designed to torment. More solid and durable than those political structures, which, raised by imposture and enthusiasm, are the scourges of human kind, and are doomed to perish with the foolish opinions that gave them birth; the government of Bissenpour, the offspring of a just attention to order and the laws of nature, has been established and maintained upon unchangeable principles, and has undergone no more alteration than those principles themselves. The singular situation of this country has preserved to the inhabitants their primitive happiness and the gentleness of their character, by securing them from the danger of being conquered, or of embroiling their hands in the blood of their fellow-creatures. Nature has surrounded them with water; and they need only open the sluices of their rivers to overflow the whole country. The armies sent to subdue them have so frequently been drowned, that the plan of enslaving them has been laid aside; and the projectors of it have thought proper to content themselves with an appearance of submission.

Liberty and property are sacred in Bissenpour. Robbery, either public or private is never heard of. As soon as any stranger enters the territory, he comes under the protection of the laws, which provide for his security. He is furnished with guides at free cost, who conduct him from place to place, and are answerable for his person and effects. When he changes his conductors, the new ones deliver to those they relieve an attestation of their conduct, which is registered and sent to the Rajah. All the time he remains in the country, he is maintained and conveyed with his merchandize at the expence of the state, unless he desires leave to stay longer than three days in the same place. In that case, he is obliged to defray his own expences; unless he is detained by any disorder, or other unavoidable accident. This beneficence to strangers is the consequence of the warmth with which the citizens enter into each others interests. They are so far from being guilty of an injury to each other, that whoever finds a purse, or other thing of value hangs it up upon the first tree he meets with, and informs the nearest guard, who give notice of it to the public by beat of drum. These maxims of probity are so generally received, that they direct even the operations of government. Out of about 350,000l. on an average it annually receives; without injury to agriculture or trade, what is not wanted to supply the unavoidable expences of the state, is laid out in improvements. The Rajah is enabled to engage in these humane employments, as he pays the Mogul only what tribute and at what time he thinks proper.

BISSOS, Town, capital of the island of Bissao, is very large, and almost three leagues long, because of the many orchards and plantations in it belonging to the Portuguese, who have there a colony of about 150 families, with a convent of Recollets, and a parish church; trading thence to all other islands of Bissos to Rio Nunnez, and Sierra Leona, bringing thence slaves, elephants teeth, some gold dust, &c. which they sell again to Europeans who resort thither. They value a man slave from 20 to 30 bars of iron, according to time and scarcity. The English have also a hand in the trade of the Bissos. The best road for ships to lie before the town of Bissos is just opposite to the parish church, not above one English mile from shore; but nearer shore is better anchorage, where ships of 60 guns may ride safe. The place by the French is called Port Bisseaux. Every ship or brig that comes to Bissos, or neighbouring road, pays duty of anchorage, besides the customs; which makes part of the king's revenue. Most of the bees-wax here comes from Cacheo and Gera, a Portuguese colony and town above 50 leagues up the country.

BISTONIS, a lake of Thrace, near Abdera, on which dwelt the Bistones: hence Bistonius Tyrannus is by Lucan used to denote Diomedes, king of Thrace, who fed his horses with human flesh; and Bistonius Turbo, a wind blowing from Thrace.

BISTRICZ, a handsome, strong town of Transylvania, seated on a river of the same name. Lat. 47. 33. N. Long. 25. 3. E.

BISTRITZ. See BESTERTZE and NAZENSTADT.

BITBURG, a town of the Netherlands, in the duchy of Luxemburg. E. long. 6. 43. N. lat. 41. 8.

BITETO, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Terra di Bari. E. Long. 16. 56. N. Lat. 41. 8.

BITHLIS, or BYTHIAS, a city of Mesopotamia, mia, situated between Hierapolis and Edeffa, 24 miles from the former, and 15 from the latter, 30 from Carrhæ to the W.

B I

BITHYNIA. This country, a part of Asia Minor, anciently known by the names of Mysia, Mygdonia, Bebrycia, Mariandynia, and Bithynia, was bounded on the W. by Bosporus Thracius, and part of the Propontis, S. by the river Rhyndacus and Mount Olympus, N. by the Euxine Sea, and E. by the river Parthenius. Ptolemy extends its confines on this side to Citorum on the coast, and to Juliopolis in the inland country; comprehending under the name of Bithynia some provinces belonging to Galatia and Paphlagonia according to other geographers. The chief cities of Bithynia on the coast were Myrlea, Dascylos, Cius, Nicomedia (the metropolis of the first Bithynia) Pronectus, and Drepanum, all on the Propontis (now the sea of Marmora) on the Bosporus, Chalcedon; on the Euxine sea Heraclea: and inland Prusa, Libyssa, Nicæa or Nice (the metropolis of the second Bithynia). The chief rivers were the Pissis, Colpos, Sangarius, (or Sangaris) Hypius, Rhebas, and the Lycus, all discharging themselves into the Euxine sea, between Chalcedon and Heraclea. As Bithynia lies between the 41st and 43d degree of N. lat. and was watered by so many rivers, it once abounded with all the necessaries of life. It was inhabited by various nations, differing in language, customs, and manners, viz. the Bebryces, Mariandyni, Caucones, Dolliones, Cimmerii, &c. But to inquire into their origin would be as useless to readers as tedious to the writer. It was divided into as many kingdoms as there were nations or tribes. Diodorus Siculus pretends they were governed by princes of their own, even in the time of Ninus king of Assyria.

Pherecydes mentions Amycus and Phyeus, reigning in Bithynia at the time of the Argonautic expedition. And Appian, that 49 kings had reigned therein before the Romans were acquainted with Asia. If such assertions be true, the kingdom of Bithynia must have been erected before the war of Troy. But that can hardly gain belief, since Homer who was so exact in enumerating the nations in the neighbourhood of Troas, never once mentions the Bithynians. From such his silence some have concluded Bithynia uninhabited at that time, and add, that the Thracians, who marched with Rhesus to the relief of Troy, after the death of their king, and the taking the city, settled in the part after known by the name of Bithynia, and that they gave it that name from the Bithyas, a river in their own native country. Strabo speaks of one Prusias reigning in Bithynia, who gave up the great Hannibal to the Romans, having fled to him for protection, and whose great grandson, Nicomedes IV. bequeathed the kingdom to the Romans. But before this they became subject to the Lydians, and after to the Persians, till Alexander the Great. But while subject to the Persians, they were still governed by princes of their own. At present it is to be described, the nearest province to Turkey in Europe, being parted only by the small strait called the Thracian Bosphorus, which is moreover so narrow here, that Scutari on the Asian shore is reckoned but a suburb to Constantinople. The Turks took it from the Romans, and now call it Beckfangil. It would be still as fruitful as anciently if the country was well cultivated: but that is scarcely to be found in all the lazy Turks possessions. The present most considerable towns are Prusa, Nice, Nicomedia, Chalcedon, Libyssa, Therma, and some others of inferior note.

BITO, a small kingdom or province in Negroland, in Africa, lies to the south of the Niger, having the kingdoms of Gubur and Zanzara north, Tombuto west, Dauma south, and Temian east. Its capital bears the same name.

BITONTO, anciently Batumi, and by Martial called Bitonta. It is a little episcopal city in the Terra di Bari, a province of the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy. It is situated in a spacious plain, eight miles south-west of the city of Bari, in the road to Ruvo, and about six or seven from the Adriatic sea. In its neighbourhood the Spaniards beat the Imperialists, in the year 1734; in consequence of which victory, the kingdom of Naples submitted to Don Carlos. Lat. 41, 20, N. Long. 17, 40, E.

BITSCH, an earldom or lordship of Lorrain, on the Farther Side of the Saar, and on the confines of the duchy of Zweybruck and Lower Alsace. It also belongs to German Lorrain, and is a part of the ancient inheritance of the ducal house, and a fief in the counts of Zweybruck: after the death of count Jacob in 1570, the count of Hanau was invested with the fiefment; but soon after duke Charles II. took the county from him, and annexed it for ever to Lorrain. The little town of the same name with the earldom, was taken by Lewis XIV. and fortified. But as he restored it by the peace of Ryswick, it was dismantled.

BITTERFELD, a town of Germany, in the circle of Upper Saxony, and in Misnia, between Hall and Wirtemberg, under immediate vassalage; situated on the Mulda, which has a seat and voice at the provincial diets, and a superintendency.

BIVERO, or VIVERO, a small town of Galicia, in Spain. It is situated on a mountain, at the foot of which runs the little river Landrova, and at its influx into the sea is formed a large haven; so that it is a sea-port next to Austrias. It contains 400 houses, has two parishes, four monasteries, two hospitals, and a college.

BIUGNEN, a place in the district of Fosen, belonging

longing to the bailiwick of Drontheim Proper, and diocese of the latter name, in Norway, where is a fine herring-fishery, the Drontheim herrings being taken in it.

BIUMBRES, in geography, an application given to the inhabitants of the torrid zone, by reason, at two different seasons of the year, their shadows are projected two different ways. The inhabitants are the same with those otherwise denominated Amphiscii.

BIVONA, a small place in the Val di Mazara, a province of the kingdom of Sicily, in Lower Italy. It is strongly situated on the top of a steep and craggy rock. It lies about six miles north of Calata-Bellota, and has the title of a dukedom.

BIYORT, in French Bieurt, a considerable village, two leagues above the bar of Senegal, upon a little channel or arm of that river which leads to it, belonging to Guinea and Négroland, in Africa. It is the principal place of a lordship, and a part of the kingdom of Cajor. At the mouth of the aforesaid small channel, is also a bar which is very dangerous. Near this arm of the river are several salt-ponds, where the salt formed at the bottom, like a scaly stone, is broken off and dried in the open air; but it is of a corrosive nature, more like allum than salt, and only used for curing of raw hides. In the same channel are vast numbers of large oysters; the fish of which is somewhat insipid, but the shells serve to make excellent lime.

BIZU, an old town in the province of Hascora or Escura, belonging to Morocco, in Africa. It stands on the top of a hill, containing, it is said, about 1500 houses. It is surrounded with walls and towers, has a stately mosque, and a large rivulet to supply it with water. The inhabitants are industrious and wealthy, and cultivate all the neighbouring grounds, which abound in corn and fruit, &c. particularly their figs, raisins, and dates, are sold through most parts of the empire. They are civil to strangers, and both men and women are as neatly dressed as in the great cities of Morocco.

BLACKBANK, a town of Armagh county, belonging to the province of Ulster, in the north of Ireland. It lies seven miles south of the city of Armagh. Lat. 54, 12, N. Long. 6, 50, W.

BLACKBOURN, a market-town of Lancashire, west of Coln, and eight miles east of Preston. Its annual fairs are May 21, September 30, and October 21. It lies 180 miles north of London.

BLACKBOYS, a place in Suffex, where they keep a fair on September 29.

BLACKBROOK, a river in Leicestershire, which runs, into the Stour, near Loughborough.

BLACKBURTON, a place in Yorkshire, where a fair is annually held on Whitfun-Monday.

BLACK-FOREST, the ancient Saltus Hircinus, or Hyrcinian forest, in the south-west part of

Suabia. It formerly extended through two thirds of Germany. That part of it which is about a league from Aschaffenburg, is there called Speshartwaldt, the trees being very close and thick on the great roads; and in this way, to the village of Esselbach, for upwards of four or five leagues thence, are precipices which render it very bad travelling.

BLACKGIERD, a rock in Lower Borresyssel, a fief or district belonging to the diocese of Christiana, in Norway. It lies on the Swedish confines, and in war-time is occupied by bodies of men, which formerly did great damage to Sweden.

BLACKHEATH, a heath or common, so called from the appearance of its surface, behind Greenwich, in Kent. It is beautifully situated and pretty high, enjoying, for that reason, an excellent air. Near it is a hill formerly used as a butt for archers; and hence it has the name of Shooter's-hill. On the east side of the heath is the noble college of Sir John Morden, Bart. a Turkey merchant, which is an hospital for the reception of decayed merchants, the number of which is now between 35 and 40. It is under the direction of seven Turkey merchants, and has a neat chapel, with a chaplain belonging to it. Besides many genteel seats built on and round this heath, is that of Sir Gregory Page, resembling a palace, with a fine park and gardens. Upon this heath the rebel, Wat Tyler, is said to have numbered near 100,000 men; in the reign of Richard II. That other rebel, Jack Cade, or Mortimer, encamped here in the reign of Henry VI. Here also 2000 Cornish rebels were slain, and the rest defeated in that of Henry VII.

Over this heath ran the famous Roman Watling-street, towards Shooter's-hill, to Rochester, Canterbury, and Dover. Here are several tumuli, small and great, in which human bones have been found. In the year 1011 the Danes lay long encamped on Blackheath, where the trenches and remains of their lines are still visible. Here two fairs are kept, on May 13, and October 17.

BLACKMIDDENS, a number of rocks so called, near Tinmouth-bar, not far from Clifford-fort in Northumberland, which are very dangerous. For preventing damage to ships among these, two light-houses have been erected not far off.

BLACKMOORE, a large heath or moor in Yorkshire. Of the same name is a place in Essex, where a fair is kept on August 20.

BLACKMOUNTAINS, a chain of hills, lying on the right hand, and Monuchdenny-hill on the left, as one enters Glamorganshire, from those of Radnor and Brecknock, in South Wales; it is a ridge of dreadful rocks and precipices.

BLACKLOW-HILL, in Warwickshire, in the parish of Wotton, is the place where the earls of Lancaster and Warwick caused Piers Gaveston, the favourite of Edward II. to be beheaded without any trial.

BLACKNESS, a strong castle, on a peninsula or neck of land stretching out into the frith of Forth, in West Lothian, Scotland, about two miles from Borrowstonness. It belongs to the Crown, and has been frequently used as a state-prison.

BLACK-RIVER, an English settlement at the mouth of the river Tinto, 20 leagues to the east of Cape Honduras, the only harbour on the coast of Terra Firma, South America, from the island of Rattan at Cape Gracias a Dios, and was for more than 60 years the refuge of the logwood cutters, when the Spaniards drove them from the forests of East Yucatan; which occasioned adventurers of different kinds to fix here, where the coast is sandy, generally low and swampy, with mangrove trees: higher up, near the rivers and lagoons, which are full of fish, the soil is more fertile, and produces plantains, cocoa-trees, maize, yams, potatoes, and several other vegetables; and the passion of drinking rum has made them begin to plant sugar-canes. The forests are full of deer, Mexican swine, and game. The shores abound with turtle, and the woods with mahogany, zebra wood, farfaparrilla, &c. and indeed the whole settlement flourishes spontaneously without cultivation. The last treaty of peace, which secured to the logwood-cutters at Honduras the uninterrupted enjoyment of their forests, far from making Black-river deserted, has given more activity to the settlement.

BLACK SEA, in Latin Mare Nigrum, the modern name of the Pontus Euxinus, or Euxine sea. It lies between Europe and Asia, and as far as it goes is their common boundary. It might be more properly called a large lake, if it did not communicate with the Mediterranean, by the Thracian Bosphorus. The Turks call it Cara Denghis. It is said to be 3800 English miles in circuit. On account of the dreadful storms which rage more furiously here than in any other sea, it has had the name of the Black or Terrible sea; though at the same time it appears, that these frightful ideas were formed of it, before navigation had arrived at the perfection it is now brought to: yet it has been found, from later experience, that the tempests on this sea are very violent and dangerous, from the sea itself being inclosed almost on every side, and the waves beating circularly upon the vessels that sail thereon. Besides, the danger is increased, as on its coasts are no good harbours; especially towards the south, where the Turks navigate for the most part. The southern banks appear something black, by reason of the large woods growing every where on the coasts.

Some are of opinion, that its appellation is derived from the Cimmerians, who dwelt on this sea; because their complexion was black. On the other hand, the Scythians, who admired white colour, have called it Axinus Pontus, i. e. the White sea; from which Euxinus has been formed. The water of this sea is fresher than that of any other; and is intirely frozen over in winter. Towards the north it communicates, by means of the straits of Caffa, with the sea of Azoph or Afow.

The Euxine has Tartary on the north, Circassia, Mingrolia, and Georgia on the east, Natolia Proper, and Asia Minor on the south, with Romania, Bulgaria, and Bessarabia on the west, so that it is intirely surrounded by the Grand Signior's dominions; within which limits is comprised also the Paulis Mæotis, extending from Caffa straits in Tartary, to the city of Afoph, at the mouth of the Don or Tanais. It extends from lat. 42, to 46, N. and from long. 48, 45, E.

The Turks, till lately enjoyed the sole navigation of this sea, except when disturbed by the Cossacs, who made excursions from the mouth of the Boristhenes, and committed great ravages on their coasts. The Turks sail on this sea with no larger vessels than saics and feluccas, with four oars, coasting along, and hauling ashore every evening; so that should they get out of sight of land, they would be at a loss how to steer, and look upon themselves as lost. They never put out but with a fair or calm wind. The utmost extent of their knowledge in navigation seems to be only this, that when they sail from Constantinople to Caffa, they must turn to the left; and so leave Trebezond on the right.

As to improving harbours, building moles, &c. the Turks are wholly ignorant or careless about any such matters, whereas the remains of such works, still to be seen, shew the care and skill of the Genoese, when masters of many places on those coasts, towards the declension of the empire; till dispossessed by Mahomet II. since which time none of his successors would suffer any Franks to traffic upon this sea.

From Constantinople to Trebezond, all the coasts says Tournefort, who sailed thither, are admirable for their verdure; and most of the woods extend themselves a pretty way into the land. As the Euxine water is fresher, so is it clearer than that of other seas; owing partly to the small communication it has with the Mediterranean, through an aperture next to nothing; and partly to the number of large rivers it receives into its bosom; namely, the Danube, Boristhenes, Don, Phasis, Cafalmak, Aitocza, and Zagari; besides many smaller ones.

Though it has no visible outlet, its waters are never higher at one time than another; nor have they any discernible flux or reflux.

BLACKSOD, or BLACKFORD, a harbour on the

the south side of a narrow isthmus, joining a sort of peninsula in the north-west corner of the county of Mayo, and province of Connaught, in Ireland.

BLACKSTON-HILL, one of the rocks in Shropshire, declining towards the Severn, out of which a hermitage, with a chapel and several apartments, are cut. Near it is a pretty rock, upon the edge of the water, covered with oaks, besides many curious plants.

BLACKSTON-EDGE, a number of high hills in Yorkshire, for a considerable track; at the foot of which is Rochdale town.

BLACK-STONES, a village in the county of Kerry, on the south-west corner of Ireland, surrounded with rocky hills and high mountains. Among these rocks there is plenty of ever-greens, yew, holly, and arbutus, with numberless cascades in the winter time, which form a very pleasing landscape. It is hardly possible to meet with more romantic prospects any where, than in these parts, where the rocks are extremely high and irregular, appearing in many points of view like the prodigious ruins of a great city. There are but few trees remaining where the ground was formerly covered, as they have been destroyed by the iron-works erected at this place, which stands on the river Carra. Near this place is a high and steep road across the hills, which hangs in a tremendous manner over that part of the sea that forms the bay of Castlemain, and is not unlike the mountain of Penmanmaure in North Wales, except that this road is more stony and less secure for travellers.

BLACKTAIL, a shoal or sand below Canvey or Candy island, or Leigh road, in Essex, which runs about three leagues due east, into the sea. At the end of it stands a sea-mark, set up by the Trinity-house of London. It is called Shoe-becon, from Shoeberry-nefs, a point of land where the shoal begins: and near it is the town of Shoeberry.

From this land, and on the edge of Shoeberry south-west of it, all the way to the mouth of Colchester-water, the shore is full of shoals, with some intermediate deep channels, so abounding with fish, that the Barking smacks are well employed; besides swarms of fishing-boats belonging to the towns and villages on the coast, who sell the lesser fish in the country, but send the largest on horses, that travel night and day, to the London markets. On this shore are taken also the best and most relishing, though not the largest, oysters in these parts.

BLACK-WATER, a town belonging, to the county of Armagh, and province of Ulster, in Ireland. It stands on a river of the same name, and is the boundary between this county and Tyrone. It had a strong fort, which was taken by the rebel earl of Tyrone, in 1593, after the garrison had held out till almost famished. It lies two miles from Charlemont.

BLACK-WATER, in Irish Avondow, or Avonmore, i. e. the Black or Great water, a river of Munster, in Ireland, which rises in Kerry, runs eastward; and, watering New-market, Mallow, Lefmore, and Youghall, near the last empties itself into the sea.

Of the same name is a river in Essex, which meets the Chalmers near its mouth.

BLACK-WATER, Hampshire, between Bagshot and Hartley-row. Fair November 8.

BLACKWATER-BAY, a little beyond Colchester, in Essex, famous for the pits of those excellent oysters called Wallfleet, from the shore where they lie, which is about five miles long, and defended by a wall of earth to keep out the sea.

BLADEN, a county of North Carolina, in the district of Wilmington, and is the boundary county to South Carolina.

BLADIAU, or PLADIA, a large village in the capital bailiwick of Balga, belonging to the circle of Brandenburg, in the kingdom of Prussia.

BLAGAI, a forsaken and ruined castle of Turkish Croatia, and province of the latter name, on the Save, in the kingdom of Hungary. It formerly belonged to count Ursini.

BLAGODAT, an iron-work belonging to the circle of Werchoturie, and province of Tobolskoi, in Siberia, and the Asiatic part of Russia. It stands on the rivulet Kuschwa, and belongs to the crown. In the mountain of Blagodat, from which the iron ore comes, are got also load-stones of a very good kind. Here is likewise a copper-work, to which the ore of Polowinnoi Rudnik is brought. Upwards of 100 dwelling-houses have been already built at this place. To the iron factory belongs also the iron flattening or hammer-mill of Turinskoi, upon the river Tura.

BLAIR-CASTLE, a seat of the duke of Athol, and the only place of note in the district of the latter name in Perthshire, in Scotland, on the confines of Broadalbain, and on the banks of a clear and fine river called the Tillin, near its influx into the Garry, which last falls into the Tay, a few miles lower. By means of sluices, this river (Tillin) is formed into a pond before the house, which is six stories high; and for its better defence, the windows are covered with iron-bars, as was usual in the old castles of Scotland, and the walls are five feet thick. The mountains here, and at some distance off, are vastly high on every side.

The village consists of sed houses, except that of the minister and the kirk, which are of stone. Blair-castle lies about 28 miles north-west of Perth. Lat. 56, 46, N. Long. 3, 35, W. See GILLI-CRANKY.

BLAIR-DRUMMOND, remarkable for a great water-water-fall near it, on the Keith, which empties itself into the Tay, in Scotland.

BLAISIS, a small territory in the government of Orleans, in France, lying north of Berry: it was formerly an earldom. It has a good soil, and is subdivided into Upper and Lower Blaisois. Blois is the capital town.

BLAKEMORE-FOREST, in Dorsetshire, on the east side of Sherborn, is also called White-hart-forest, according to a tradition, that a beautiful white hart being killed here by the gentry, after king Henry III. who had ran him down, and spared his life; he laid a fine upon their lands, which is paid into the exchequer to this day, by the name of White-hart-silver.

BLAMONT, or BLANKENBERG, a small town belonging to Lorraine, in the government of this name and of Bar, in France, and subject to this crown. It lies on the river Vezouze, has a collegiate church, and two convents, being about 28 miles south-east of Nancy. The lordship of Châtillon is a dependency on this place. Lat. 48, 38, N. Long. 6, 45, E.

BLANC, or BLANC EN BERRY, in Latin Oblincum, a town of Lower Berry, a subdivision of the latter name, in France. It stands near the confines of Poitou, upon the river Creuse, which runs through it. Blanc is the seat of an election, collection, and marshalsea. It is divided into the upper and lower town; in the former of which is the castle, and in the latter a priory, and an Augustine convent. Its territory is very barren, containing many woods and forests, and such vast numbers of ponds, that in one manor, are reckoned 300. Near Blanc is a vineyard, producing pretty good wine. Though the Creuse be not navigable here, floats of timber are sent down upon it from hence to the adjacent towns. Lat. 1, 13, E. Long. 46, 33, N.

BLANCHIER, an Upper District belonging to the princely imperial foundation of Luders, in Upper Alsace, and government of this name, now in France.

BLANCO, a pretty large island, among the Lesser Antilles, in the Atlantic ocean, lying opposite to New Andalusia, a province of Terra Firma, in North America. It is almost north of Margarita, and about 35 leagues from the main land. It is a flat, even, low, and uninhabited island; most of it savannas, with long grass, and some plats of Agnum vitæ trees, and shrubby bushes about them. The only road here lies on the north-west extremity, opposite to a small cave, or little sandy bay, it being deep water, and steep close to the land. On the west side is a little spring, and sandy bays all round the island, where turtles greatly resort. Lat. 21, 50, N. Long. 63, 36, W.

BLANCO (Cape) the westernmost known point of California, lat. 43, N. long. 233, E. Here the inhabitants expressed a want of iron in preference to any thing else when Capt. Cook visited it in 1778. The men are of an athletic make, very rough to appearance, but more civilized than their appearance promised, being very communicative of their devices to catch their game, of which they abound.

BLANCO, (Cape) in Patagonia, in South America. Lat. 47, 20, S. Long. 70, 0, W.

BLANCO, (Cape) a promontory of Africa, in the Atlantic ocean, 180 miles north of the river Senegal. Lat. 18, 30, N. Long. 20, 0, W.

BLANCO, (Cape) a head-land of Peru, in South America, on the Pacific ocean or great South sea. It lies 120 miles south-west of Guilaquil. Lat. 4, 15, S. Long. 81, 10, W.

BLAND-AA, a considerable river of Humavat, a district of Iceland, belonging to Norway. It is one of those called the milk-rivers, as being of that colour, and carrying down lime with its stream.

BLANDFORD, a large and flourishing borough of Dorsetshire, upon a flexure of the river Stour, over which is a bridge, and before it fine meadows. It lies in the road between Salisbury and Dorchester, and is governed by two bailiffs. Here the quarter-sessions for the county are held annually. It has been thrice burnt by accidental fires; more particularly, in the year 1731, when almost the whole place, consisting of 600 houses, with the church, and a village beyond the bridge, were consumed; and few of the inhabitants goods saved. It has since been rebuilt, and its streets and passages widened, but had another considerable fire in 1775. Formerly the principal trade of this place was in making of band-strings, afterwards straw-hats and bone-lace; of which last article some has been manufactured so fine, as to be rated at 30l. sterling per yard; but the greatest traders here now are malsters, brewers, and clothiers. Its market is on Saturday; and annual fairs on March 7, July 10, and November 8, for horse, sheep, and cheese. Its living is a rectory. Blandford lies in a very pleasant, healthy country, where wood thrives extremely, with a fine variety of arable and pasture lands, 10 miles north of Poole, and 90 west of London. To it is a great resort of gentry, who have delightful seats on the neighbouring downs of Burford extending to Dorchester.

BLANDFORD, a town in Prince George's county, Virginia, on the S. bank of a branch of James river, 2 miles E. of Petersburg.

BLANES, anciently Blanda, a small town of Catalonia, in Spain, not walled. It is situated on the Mediterranean, and is a sea-port. It has an old castle, and the inhabitants are about 600 families. It lies 20 miles S. of Gironne, in Lat. 41, 30, N. Long. 3, 40, E.

BLANKENBERG, a town of Germany, in the circle of Westphalia and duchy of Berg. E. Long. 7, 18. N. Lat. 50, 44.

BLANKENBURG and REINSTEIN, so called from their principal towns, are commonly considered but as one county, lying in the east part of the duchy of Brunswic, belonging to Lower Saxony, in Germany. They are about 24 miles from S. to N. but narrow at both extremities, and not above 9 miles where broadest. It once included Wernigerode on the W. which, with Quedlinburg, Hohenstein, Stolberg, and Schwartzburg, in Upper Saxony, were formerly one province called Hartzingow, i. e. the Hercynian county, a part of the ancient forest of the former name, now the Hartz; of which there are still some large woods and parks, abounding with game. Reinsteins, though claimed by the elector of Hanover as a vacant fief, was seized by the late elector of Brandenburg, as holding of his principality of Halberstadt. These countries lie S. of Brunswic Proper, S. W. of Magdeburg, W. of Halberstadt, N. of Thuringia, and E. of Hildesheim. It is a cold country, the snow lying on its mountains till Midsummer, and yields but little corn. Its inhabitants are strong, living to a great age. They have iron-mines in their mountains; one of which, called Brocken or Brockberg, the Bructerus of the Latins, is reckoned the highest in Germany.

Between Blankenburg and Elbingerode is a remarkable cave called Buman's hole, with a narrow entrance; but none ever found the end of it: though some miners affirm, if they may be credited, that they have gone as far as Goslar, which is 20 miles. Large bones of rare animals, and a giant's skeleton, have been found in it. Two large rocks near the convent of Michaelstein, and not far from Blankenburg, have been called Monks-cruises from their exact resemblance to two of that order in their habits. In this country are several castles upon inaccessible rocks, and some hewn out of the latter. The most remarkable is that near Brocksberg, where was an idol and temple of Saturn. Charlemagne called the place Hartzburg. Near a salt-spring at the bottom of this hill is a little town, called Juliusburg, lately built, which is now enriched by their trade in salt, copper kettles, and pots, wire, &c. The inhabitants of this country are reckoned the most stupid dolts in Germany, and extremely bigotted to their ancient customs. The town of Blankenburg is but small, and ill built. Here the duke has a castle, who, though he offered the inhabitants materials gratis for building, and did all that he could to inspire them with a taste for the arts, found it to no purpose. It lies 8 miles west of Quedlinburg, and south-west of Halberstadt, also 45 south-west of Wolfenbüttele, being on the confines of the principality of Anhalt. Lat. 51, 50, N. Long. 11, 20, E.

BLANKENBURG, a town on the coast of Dutch Flanders, eight miles north-east of Ostend, in lat. 51, 20, N. long. 3, 12, E.

BLANKENHEIM, a small territory of Germany, with the title of a county, which is part of that of Eyffel, near the archbishopric of Cologne, and duchy of Juliers.

BLANZAC, a small town of Angoumois, a subdivision of the government of Saintonge and Angoumois, in France. It has a chapter belonging to it.

BLAREGNIES, a town of Hainault, in the Netherlands, near which the Confederate army under the duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene, obtained a signal victory over the French commanded by the marshals Villars and Boufflers, in the year 1709. The French being encamped in the woods of Sart and Sanfart, cut down vast numbers of trees, and threw up a triple entrenchment; so that it cost the Confederates several thousand men before they could drive them from thence. The armies on each side, it is said, consisted of 120,000 men, of which at least 20,000 were killed. Moll says the number of the allies killed were 18,000, and of the French but 15,000. However, the French made a regular retreat, though Villars was wounded and disabled at the beginning of the action. This advantage on the side of the allies was soon after followed by their taking of Mons, from which Blaregnies lies seven miles south. This battle is sometimes called that of Malplaquet, Teniers, or Blangies, from villages of these names lying near the field of action. Lat. 50, 30, N. Long. 3, 35, E.

BLARNEY, or BLARNEY-CASTLE, a village in the county of Cork, in Ireland, on the river Lea. It is about three miles west of Cork, upon a rock, close to the river, over which it has a bridge, and on the other side a lake of 30 acres. The castle was demolished about 80 years ago, and had been one of the strongest in all Munster. The walls were 18 feet thick, and resisted the forces of king William III. for some time, standing out a stout and formal siege, but at last surrendered after its commander made his escape, and the fortifications were demolished.

BLASENDORF, the same with BALASFALVA; which see.

BLASERK, a remarkable mountain of Groenland.

BLASU-ZELLA, a small town in the principality of Gotha; and is famous for a foundery for fire-arms, in which they make beautiful damasked cannon.

BLATOBULGIUM. On a promontary, at present the boundary of England and Scotland, and formerly formerly of the Roman province and the country of the Picts, stood Blatobulgium (now Bulnefs,) from which, as the most remote limit of the province of Britain, Antoninus begins his Itinerary. Here Roman coins and inscriptions are frequently still found; and one mile beyond it, at low water, are to be seen the foundations of the famous wall, called the Picts Wall, built by the Romans to restrain the barbarians from breaking into the province. But though a vast arm of the sea comes up here about eight miles, by Ptolemy called Itunæ æstuarium, (now Solway-frith,) yet, at low water, the Scots and Picts found means to ford it.

BLATNITZ, a district belonging to the county of Thurotz, in the circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary. In it is the castle of Blatnitz, which stands on a steep rock, and belongs to the Revay family.

BLAVET, a town belonging to the bishopric of Vannes, in Lower Brittany, a subdivision of the government of the latter name, in France. Lewis XIII. called it Port Louis, from his own name, and built a citadel and other works here. It stands at the mouth of the river Blavet, has a very good harbour and capacious road. Its principal trade is in pilchards and eels, of which a considerable fishery is carried on in those parts. Lat. 47, 40, N. Long. 3, 5, W.

BLAUGIES, a place lying between Bavay and Maubeuge, in the government of French Flanders, near which the Confederates and French fought a very bloody battle in 1709. See BLAREGNIES.

BLAUBUREN, a town belonging to the circle of Suabia, in Germany. It lies 11 miles east of Ulm. Lat. 48, 22, N. Long. 9, 57, E.

BLAYE, or BLAYES, in Latin Blavia, or Blavium, a small city of Bourdelois, a subdivision of Guyenne Proper, in the government of the former name and Gascony, in France. It is situated on the Garonne, has a citadel with four bastions, and built upon a rock. This is the upper town, which is separated from the lower by a small river, into which the tide flows. In this lower town live the merchants, and have their ware-houses. In Blaye is a Benedictine abbey. Here the vessels bound for Bourdeaux must leave their cannon and arms, till they return. The Garonne being very broad at this place, upon an island in it a battery has been raised, in order to play upon any enemy's ships that would attempt to enter. Directly opposite to Blaye, on the other side of the river, in the territory of Medoc, is also a fort, flanked with four bastions. The port of Blaye is very much frequented by foreign vessels, and ships from Brittany, which load here the wine of the growth of this district. It lies two leagues below Bec d'Ambez. Lat. 45, 6, N. Long. 1, 23, W.

BLAZEY, (St.) a place in Cornwall, where an annual fair is kept on February 2.

BLECHINGLEY, a borough of Surrey. It is governed by a bailiff, who returns two members to parliament. The town stands on a hill, on the side of Holmsdale, with a fine prospect as far as the South-downs, and Suffex. Here is an alms-house for ten poor people, a free-school for 20 poor children; and the remains of its castle are still visible. It has a handsome church, but its spire and bells were destroyed by lightning in 1606. It lies east of Gatton, 16 miles in the same direction from Guildford, and 20 south of London. Its annual fairs are on June 22, and November 2, for horses, bullocks, and toys.

BLECKERT, a place near the village of Hunningen, about a league from Lintz, in the electorate of Cologne, in Germany; where is made excellent wine, which the Liegeois buy up in great quantities; and, after brewing it up, sell it for Burgundy.

BLEDES, (Las,) an island lying near Majorca, one of the Balears, in the Mediterranean, not far from the harbour of Olla. It is a considerable place, and was formerly very populous. In it is a good marble quarry.

BLEGON, a village in Somersetshire, seven miles south-south-east of Huntspill, with one fair, on the last Friday in August.

BLEGEN. See BLEKING.

BLEICHRODE, a small open town, populous and thriving, in the county of Hohnstein, with some manufactures and a good trade. Here are four mansion-houses and one for the Procurator.

BLEKING, or BLEKINGIA, by the inhabitants called Blegen, a subdivision of South Gothland, in Sweden. It lies on the east side of Scania, being 15 miles long and four broad. It is pretty mountainous; but withal so pleasant, especially between Carlscroon and Carlshamn, that few places of Sweden can be compared with it. Here is good quantity of wood, consisting of oaks, box, pine, pomegranate, and birch trees; but their arable land is not sufficient for the sustenance of the inhabitants, the country being too narrow for agriculture: for which reason some are obliged to furnish themselves with corn from the adjacent villages. In this province are reckoned 1089 gentlemens estates, and about 50,000 men. It has been frequently harassed in the wars between Denmark and Sweden, in 1505, and 1526.

The inhabitants drive a good trade in pot-ash, tar, tallow, hides, some leathern wares, beams, deal boards, and masts: and they also draw a good subsistence from fishing and hunting. The pastures here are fine, and consequently the best cheese in Sweden is made here. The breeding of cattle is indeed indeed followed with a good deal of care and pains; but they are of a smaller size than those of Scania. The province maintains no soldiers; only 1554 sailors for the use of the navy, which are divided into three companies. Besides several lakes; here are six rivers, which, taken together, have a good salmon-fishery; and they part Bromsloe-Bleking and Smaland from each other.

The principal islands belonging to this province amount to about 130 in number. Here are 29 country-parishes in all. The clergy are subject to the bishop of Lund. It consists of one territorial jurisdiction for raising the men, which are subdivided into the four following districts, as Oestra-harad, Medelsta-harad, Brackne-harad, and Listers-harad.

BLÉNEAU, in Latin Blenarium, a small town belonging to Gratinos Orleanois, a subdivision of Lower Orleanois, in the government of the latter name, in France. It is situated on the Loing, about four leagues from Briare, to the east. It belongs to the prince of Courtenay, and has a bailiwick in it.

BLÉNHEIM, a village of Bavaria, one of the circles of Germany, on the west side of the Danube, betwixt which and that of Hochstet, hence indiscriminately called the victory of Hochstet or Blenheim, was fought an ever memorable battle, August 2, 1704, by the Confederates under John duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene, in which the French and Bavarians, commanded by the duke of Bavaria, and the marshals Tallard and Marsin, were entirely defeated; when Tallard was taken prisoner, and continued so in England until peace was concluded. In this bloody and obstinate battle upwards of 20,000 lives were lost: and Blenheim which lay on the flank of the French army, being crowded with their soldiers upon the turn of the action, was surrounded and set on fire by the allies; when 10,000 men were forced to surrender at discretion, besides the many thousands that were pushed and perished in the Danube. It lies three miles north-east of Hochstet, and 25 north-west of Augsburg. Lat. 48, 40, N. Long. 10, 25, E.

BLÉNHEIM-HOUSE, a magnificent palace, about half a mile from New Woodstock, in Oxfordshire, a royal gift of queen Anne to the duke of Marlborough, which was founded in 1705, to perpetuate the memory of the signal victory he obtained over the French and Bavarians near the above-mentioned village of Blenheim, on the banks of the Danube.

BLERANCOURT, a genteel castle or seat of Le Valois, one of the two sub-stadtholderships belonging to the government of the Isle of France.

BLERE, in Latin Bliriacum, a small town in the government of Touraine, in France. It is situated on the river Cher, near Amboise. It contains 1400 souls. This being a thorough-fare for the soldiers, occasions its not being so well peopled as formerly.

BLESSINGTON, a small town belonging to the county of Wicklow, and province of Leinster, in Ireland. It stands on the Liffy, eastward of which it has three castles, and a most elegant seat of the viscount Blessington, which lies 14 miles from Dublin.

BLETSHO, a parish in the hundred of Willey, belonging to Bedfordshire, and upon the Ouse; and here a fair is annually kept upon the 19th of May.

BLETISA, an ancient little city of Lusitania (now Potugal) that was situated on the southern bank of the Durus, as may be inferred from an inscription in Guter. The modern name of Bletisa is Ledesma, according to Mariana, who supposes that the ancient and modern cities going by those names to have been the same.

BLIESCASTLE, the capital town of a county of the same name in Suabia.

BLITHBOROUGH, or BLIBURG, a place in Suffolk, and on the south bank of the river Blythe, where the Christian King Anna, of the East Angles, slain in battle by Penda the Mercian, lies interred, with his eldest son. Here several Roman coins have been dug up. It has a fine old church, kept in good repair, which was formerly eminent for a college of prebendaries. Its fair is on April 5. It lies four miles east of Halesworth.

BLITHE, a market-town in Nottinghamshire, the last town of this county towards the north, except Scroby, on the very edge of it. It stands higher up than Chaworth; has a very large and good church, and only the ruins of an old castle and priory. The fairs are on Holy Thursday for cattle and horses, and on October 6. It lies 18 miles north of Newark upon Trent.

BLOCKBERG, the highest mountain of the Hartz, in Saxony, Germany.

BLOCK-HOUSE-FORT. See PORTSMOUTH.

BLOCKLEY, a village in Worcestershire, though inclosed by Gloucestershire, seven miles south-east of Evesham, and has two fairs, on Tuesday after Easter-week, and on October 10.

BLOCKSYL, a place of considerable trade in Overissel, one of the seven United Provinces. It stands at the mouth of the river Aa, on the bank of the Zuider-see, which it partly commands. It is a very populous place, well fortified with bastions, and other works. Its harbour, formed by the Aa, can contain above 200 vessels. Lat. 52, 44, W. Long. 6, 0, N.

BLOIS, in Latin Blesæ, or Castrum Blesense, the capital of Blaisois, a province of Lower Orleanois, belonging to the government of the latter name, name, in France. It lies partly on an eminence, and partly on a plain upon the Loire, which river separates it from the suburbs of Vienne, that is joined to the city by a fine stone-bridge.

Blois had formerly the title of a county; it is the see of a bishop, who is a suffragan to the archbishop of Paris; has a diocese of about 200 parishes, five abbeys, above sixty priories, besides a vast many chapels; his annual income is 24,000 livres, and he pays a tax of 2533 florins to the court of Rome.

Blois is the seat of an election, bailiwick, chamber of accounts, marshalsea, and salt-granary; it has a college for polite literature and philosophy, with a fine church. Here are several collegiate and parochial churches, besides convents of both sexes. The cathedral is St. Sulpice, magnificently rebuilt by Lewis XIV. after having been entirely destroyed by storm. It has a royal palace, which has been built by several princes and lords, with noble gardens, and a spacious court; where stands the collegiate church of St. Saviour, and formerly the scene of several tournaments. Here, among others, was born Lewis XII. an equestrian statue of whom stands over a gate of the castle. In it is the black chamber, in which the duke of Guise, and that wherein his brother the cardinal, the heads of the league were both killed, by order of Henry III. in the year 1588; as also the hall where the states met then, for suppressing the disorders of the popish cabal; in the large fire place of which both their bodies were burnt to ashes. At present several noble families reside in this palace. The town was taken by the Protestants; but retaken and sacked by the duke of Guise in 1562.

The principal trade of Blois consists in wine and brandy, which are sent to Orleans, Paris, Tours, Angers, Laval, and even into Holland. Here formerly were many tanners; but the high tax upon leather crushed that manufactory. They also made some serges, and other woollen stuffs here; but that branch of trade is not considerable. This city is noted also for the best watches in the kingdom.

As Blois has been the residence of the court, and many princes of the royal blood, the French tongue is spoken here in its greatest purity. This elegant city lies in one of the finest countries in France: and W. of it is the forest of Blois, which takes up about 5300 acres of ground. This city lies thirty miles S. W. of Orleans, in lat. 47, 35, N. Long. 1, 25 E.

BLOMMESHOLM, a gentleman's domain or estate in the northern division, belonging to the prefecture of Bahusia and West Gothland, in Sweden. It is about three miles from Stromstad; and near it is an ancient monument, consisting of high stones set up in the form of a ship.

BLONAY, a barony belonging to Pais de Vaux, or French country, a subdivision of the Swiss canton of Bern. It is in a family of the same name, which has continued in possession of it for above 700 years. The village also denominated from this barony lies about a league above Vevey, at the foot of the mountains, on which it has a castle, commanding a prospect over the lake, the neighbouring country, and Savoy. In this place alone, of all the Pais de Vaux, they sing psalms in their churches with sound of trumpet.

BLONIEZ, a town belonging to the province of Warsovia, in Poland. It lies 20 miles west of Warsaw. Lat. 52, N. Long. 20, 35. E.

BLONSK, a district belonging to Watzchau, in Masovia Proper, in Poland.

BLOREHEATH, a small market-town in Staffordshire, about a mile from Drayton in Shropshire, at the head of the river Snow; famous for a very bloody battle fought in the reign of Henry VI. in 1459, between the houses of York and Lancaster; in which Nevil earl of Salisbury for the former, with 5000 men, beat Lord Audley for the latter, with twice that number.

BLOTZEN, a gentleman's seat or castle, with a village belonging to the bailiwick of Ulm, a subdivision of the Sundgau, in the government of Alsace, now subject to the crown of France.

BLOXHAM, Oxfordshire. It lies S. of Banbury, has a fine church; but its steeple is of an odd, though agreeable make.

BLUEFIELD-HARBOUR and River on the Musquito Shore, in the Gulph of Mexico, is the principal harbour belonging to the Musquitoes, and is situated at the bottom of Howe Sound. The entrance into the sound is over a bar, having not more than two fathom at low-water, and from 14 to 15 at high tides; but there are commodious anchoring grounds on the neighbouring coast, proper for ships of burthen. On the western side of the sound the land rises gradually into a fine healthy country, an excellent soil, and entirely free from musquitoes, flies so very troublesome on this coast and the West Indies. The river Bluefields, which falls into it, at the N. W. angle, is navigable for a considerable distance through the interior country; and near its mouth is an excellent situation for a town or colony. Upon its banks there is great abundance of large mahogany, cedar, and other timbers fit for any purposes. On the adjacent coasts are caught vast numbers of turtle, and in the sound are great plenty of fish. The river is formed by a high bluff of about 1500 acres, flat at the top, and inaccessible, except at two places. This bluff is joined to the continent northwards by an isthmus of a sand beach on the outside, and morassy ground overgrown with mangroves. The channel into the harbour runs in about N. N. W. On the left side is is a high quay, on the west of which is another shallow channel. The main channel has from 15 to 16 feet at high water, and 12 or 13 at low. Several rivers discharge themselves into the channel, the banks of which are high.

BLUFIELDS, a capacious bay near the S. W. end of the island of Jamaica, from whence the European ships generally take their departure for Europe, being their place of constant rendezvous in time of war. It is about eight or nine miles E. of Savannah la Mar.

BLUMBERG, in French Florimont, a lordship in the Sundgaw and government of Alsace. It consists of the little town and castle of the same name, with five villages more, and belonging to the barons of Pfird.

BOARE. Anta & Boare are two small villages between Sacunde & Sama, in S. Guinea, not considerable for gold trade, except by accident. The country behind is very hilly and woody. Anta is only famed for the great quantity of excellent palm-wine it produces, for which the blacks resort thither from 15 or 20 leagues about, and carry it to sell all along the Gold Coast. The land is also very fertile of all sorts of herbs, roots, fruits, &c. and stored with goats and poultry.

BOA DE QUIRES, (villa) a small district of Porto, belonging to Entre Douro e Minho, a province of Portugal.

BOBADELLO, a small place of Coimbra, in the province of Beira, in Portugal. It contains 300 souls.

Of the same name is another little place in the district of Viseu, and province of Beira. It includes one parish.

BOBENHAUSEN, a town of Germany, in Weteravia, with a castle; three miles from Frankfurt on the Maine, and seated on the small river Gerbrentz.

BOBERG, a high promontory within the bailiwick of Bofling, belonging to the diocese of Ripen, in North Jutland, Denmark. Near this head-land the coast is extremely dangerous; and therefore several ships have been split to pieces upon it.

BOBIÈSE, or BOBIO, a territory formerly belonging to the duchy of Milan, in Upper Italy. Since 1743 it has belonged to the king of Sardinia, having been ceded to him by the house of Austria. It is so called from its principal, and the only place of note in it; which is a small town situated on the river Trebbia, near the confines of Parma and the Genoese territories; and but a little way from a river which gives it its name. It is the see of a bishop, subject to that of Genoa; and is a place of no strength. It gives the title of count, and lies 30 miles N. E. of Genoa, and the same distance

S. W. of Tortona, and 28 S. of Pavia; in lat. 44. 48, N. long. 9, 36, E.

BOBIO, the largest river of Chili, in S. America. It has its source in the great mountains, called the Andes, and falls into the sea in 47 degrees of S. latitude.

BOBLINGEN, a small town in the forest of Schonbuch, in Wurtemberg, with a castle and a superintendancy. In 1547, the Spaniards lived here at discretion, as did the Imperialists in 1638. The neighbourhood produces some wine.

BOBROTZ, and BOBROWETZ, both inconsiderable towns, belonging to the northern district of the county of Liptau, in the circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary.

BOBROWNIKI, a small town in the territory of Dobrzyn, and palatinate of Wladislaw, a subdivision of Cugavia, in Great Poland.

BOBROWSK, a small town in the district of Korotojak, belonging to the government of Woronesh and Asow, in the European part of Russia.

BOCA CHICA, a narrow entrance to Carthage bay, in South America; with a fort of the same name defending it. This, with several other forts and platforms of cannon, the English under admiral Vernon took in the year 1741. Before this fort the Lord Aubrey Beauclerc, youngest son of the duke of St. Alban's, in the prince Frederic, sustaining a much superior fire of the enemy, both from the land and two Spanish men of war, for several hours together, had both his legs shot off. Though the English fleet had entered the bay with an intent to take the city of Carthage, they miscarried in their attempt, and were obliged to retire with considerable loss. See CARTHAGENA.

BOCA, (Cape) or Marfala, in the island of Sicily, is the nearest part of that island to any part of Afric, viz. Cape Bona.

BOCA, (Great and Little,) two islands on the coast of New Andalusia, in the terra firma of South America.

BOCA DEL DRAGO, a strait between the island of Trinidad and New Andalusia last mentioned.

BOCAGE, a small territory belonging to Lower Normandy, a subdivision of the government of the latter name, in France.

BOCANUM, a town of Mauritania Tingetana, to the south of mount Atlas; said to be that of Morocco in Africa. W. long. 9, 0, N. lat. 31, 0.

BOCHARA. See BOKHARA.

BOCHETTA, or BOCCHETTA, famous in the war of 1746 and 1747. This is a chain of mountains in the Riviera di Ponente, belonging to the Genoese dominions upon the continent, in Upper Italy: and over it is the high road out of Lombardy bardy to Genoa, through several windings. Upon the extremely steep peak of the highest mountain is a narrow way, in which hardly three persons can go a-breast; which pass is properly called the Bocchetta.

For its defence are three forts, which may be looked upon as the key to Genoa; for in the year 1746 the Imperialists, by taking these, opened themselves a passage to that city.

BOCHIM. Judg. ii. begins with informing us, that an angel of the Lord came up from Gilgal to Bochim, and there reproved the Israelites for breaking their covenant with God, by making a league with the inhabitants of the land, &c. whereupon God had said, that he would not drive out the said inhabitants, &c. Upon which the Israelites fell a weeping; whence they called the name of the place Bochim, i. e. weepers. That this place lay near to Shiloh is probably thought, because it follows, that there they sacrifice unto the Lord; whereas sacrifices were to be offered only where the Lord should choose, and where the tabernacle was set up; which then was at Shiloh.

BOCHIANICO, a large village of the Hither Abruzzo, a province belonging to the kingdom of Naples, in the lower division of Italy.

BOCHNIA, a town of the palatinate of Krakow, in Little Poland. It is famous for its salt-works, having been only a village before the discovery of the quarries of that mineral in its neighbourhood. A little way on this side of them runs the little river Raab, which falls into the Vistula. The town is quite surrounded with mountains and hills. The salt-pits form only a long and narrow strip of 75 fathom extent from S. to N. and 1000 in length from E. to W. the largest depth of them is 100, and in some places only 20 fathom. The mine begins only in strata, and the salt lies in all directions. It is, however, finer than that got at Wieliczka, especially when they dig somewhat deep into the quarries; and it is hewn down or cut small, and put into vessels. Between 2 and 300 men are employed in these mines. It is observed, that all the way the salt goes, the ground is quite dry, and under it are found black pieces of decayed wood. Here they find also alabaster. These pits are under the direction of the town of Wieliczka. Our philosophical Transactions, No. lxi. p. 1099, call them salt-gem mines.

BOCKENHEIM, a place about a league from Frankfurt on the Maine, upon the confines of Hesse and Franconia, in Germany. It is the territory of the Count of Hesse. The Calvinists have a place of worship here, to which the Lutherans of Frankfurt will hardly admit them to go, through the gate of their city, which they keep shut till a late hour in the days; having absolutely denied them the liberty of worship within the town.

B O

BOCKHOLM, a small island belonging to the district of Korsholm and Ostro-Bothnia, in Finland, Sweden; on which stands part of the town of Jacobstadt; which see.

BOCKHOLT, a town subject to the bishop of Munster, in the circle of Westphalia, in Germany. It lies 20 miles east of Cleef. Lat. 51, 40, N. Long. 6, 20, E.

BOCKI, a small town of Podlachia, a subdivision of Little Poland.

BOCKING, once a large and populous village of Essex, with spacious houses belonging to clothiers. It is parted from Braintree only by a small stream. It was formerly very rich and flourishing, occasioned by its great trade in a particular kind of baize manufactured here, called Bockings; for this town and Braintree sent weekly to London between five and six waggon-loads of that manufacture. But this trade having greatly decreased in a few years, the poors-rate, with other taxes, rendered it very burthensome to all the inhabitants. Besides, the small-pox had so infested the above-mentioned towns, that their markets were almost deserted by the country people. It lies 42 miles from London.

BOCHUM or BOCKUM a town in the county of Mark, Westphalia; inhabited by Catholics and Protestants, who use one church. In 1517 it was nearly destroyed by fire.

BOCKING-HARDE, a district belonging to the jurisdiction of Dreyharde, and bailiwick of Tunder, in the duchy of Sleswic, Denmark.

BOCZEYKOWO, a small town of Lithuanian Russia, belonging to the great duchy of the former name.

BOCKZOWCE, a small town in the district of Halicz, belonging to the palatinate of Lemberg, in Red Russia, Little Poland.

BODEGRAVE, the seat of the ancient Bagoads, who are supposed to have been a kind of banditti. This was a fine village of Holland, one of the United Provinces; before it was burnt by the French in 1672. Here the Prince of Orange encamped at that time, to cover the country. It was afterwards fortified, and is still a very pleasant place, about eleven miles S. E. of Leyden.

BODENFELDE, a market-town, on the Weser, in the principality of Calenberg, with a salt spring.

BODENSEE, in Latin Lacus Brigantinus, or Podamicus, at present called BODMAN, or PODMAN. It is a lake not far from Constance, a city of Suabia, in Germany. It divides itself towards Germany into two arms; namely, the Zeller-see, or Lacus Venetus, and the Bodmer, or Uberlinger-see, Lacus Acronius: in this is the island of Meinau, as in the former is that of Reichenau. That part of the lake from Bregentz to Constance is called the Upper lake, and that from Constance to Zell the Lower. The latter is betwixt twenty and thirty thirty fathoms deep, along the banks of which are near forty cities, towns and villages: yet the Upper lake has no less than fifty; and its greatest depth is said to be 350 fathoms. Here likewise, namely between Buchorn and Roschach, which are five leagues asunder, is its greatest breadth; which was found by actual mensuration to be, when the lake was frozen over, 7275 perches: but along its upper part it is much narrower. Besides the fish usually taken near Lindau and Bregentz, is a sort of salmon-trout, called gang-fische, which, when full grown, are pickled and exported as a rarity, being about two ells long, and called Rheinlacher, i. e. Rhine salmon. As the fishermen cannot always make a good market of such large fish, they pass a line through the gills, stopped by a bit of wood, which they fasten to a stake ashore, and so giving the fish a range of about forty paces, preserve it alive till they can meet with a purchaser.

BODENTEICH, a town in Lunenburg-Zell, situated in a bailiwick of the same name, near a lake.

BODENUERDER, a town on the Weser, in the principality of Calenberg.

BODGAM, a place in Suffex, nine miles from Winchelsea, where is kept an annual fair on June 6.

BODMIN, a market and borough town of Cornwall, 263 miles from London, stands between two hills, almost in the centre of the county, about 12 miles from each of the two channels. It had formerly an abbey, an hospital for lazars, a chantry, and was a bishop's see, but transferred through St. Germans and Crediton to Exeter; and the remains of a palace, priory, and friary are still to be seen here. Its church, whose spire was destroyed by a thunder-storm in 1699, is the largest in Cornwall. Here is a good corn and flesh market on Saturday, and fairs on St. Paul's day, Wednesday before Whitsuntide, and on the 6th of December. It is near a mile long, contains about 300 houses; and in the reign of Henry VIII. was reckoned the largest town in the county. The corporation consists of a mayor, 12 aldermen, 24 common-council, and a town-clerk. It was once the only staple of the county for the yarn manufactory, which is since much decayed. Here is kept the sheriff's prison for debtors. There is a well near this place, whose water is remarkable for being much heavier than other waters and for preserving its scent and taste the best part of a year; but though it is called Scarlet-Well, represents many colours like the rainbow. It began to send members to parliament in 23d of Edward I. It was formerly one of the towns for stamping of tin, but lost that privilege to Lestwithiel. Near this place are those monumental stones, called the Hurlers, which Dr. Stukely makes no doubt are the remains of an ancient Druid temple. They stand on a down in three circles, and had the name from the peasants superstitious notion that they were once men, but transformed into stones for diverting themselves on a Sunday at hurling, a recreation for which the Cornish men are particularly eminent, as well as for wrestling. There is a free school in the town.

BODOK, or BODROCH, a district belonging to the county of Neutra, in the circle on this side the Danube, a subdivision of Lower Hungary. In it is a slightly fortified castle of the same name, belonging to the counts of Bereny. It stands on the N. E. shore of the Danube, and has good pastures in its neighbourhood, which form the desert of Barmesche, 100 miles S. E. of Buda. It has been taken by the Turks, and retaken by the Hungarians. Lat. 46, 15, N. Long. 20, 20, E.

BODON, in Latin Bidimum or Vodenum, anciently Viminacium, a good fortress, belonging to the sangiacate of the same name in Bulgaria, a province of European Turkey. The Hungarians attempted it without success in the year 1739. It is the see of a metropolitan, in lat. 45, 10, N. Long. 45, 24, E.

BODSCHOT, a town of Brabant, a province of the Austrian Netherlands, on the river Nethe. It lies 12 miles N. E. of Malines, in lat. 51, 5, N. Long. 4, 45, E.

BODZER, a parish in the island of Samsøe, belonging to the bailiwick of Kallundborg in Seeland, a province of Denmark.

BOEDODOE, a trading village on the coast of South-Guinea, in Africa. It consists of about 50 houses, or huts, and governed by a magistrate, called by the Portuguese Veador; but if any capital crime be committed, they are not allowed to decide it.

BOEN, a town of France, in Forez, seated at the foot of mountains, on the side of which runs the river Lignon, 12 miles from Rouane.

BCEOTIA, a subdivision of the ancient Greece Proper. It is now commonly included in the modern Livadia, a province of European Turkey. It lies between the countries of Doris, Phocis, Thessaly, Attica, the Archipelago, and the isle of Negropont. It was divided into the Upper and Lower. In the former were the cities of Cheronea, the birth-place of Plutarch, Platea, where Pausanias and Aristides, the Lacedemonian and Athenian generals, defeated Mardonius, in the 75th Olympiad, &c. The Lower had Thebes, which was the capital of all Bœotia. See ACHAIA and GREECE.

BOETROE, is a village in the kingdom of Anta (or Ante) on the coast of South Guinea, seated on a little river, at the foot of a high hill, on which the Dutch have a small irregular fort, being an oblong, and divided into two parts, defended by two very indifferent batteries mounted with eight small guns. It was erected by consent of the king of Anta, to whom it pays a yearly tribute in gold, and was called Badenstein, or Batenstein,

B O

Bein, signifying profit. It commands Boetroe, which is thinly peopled, whose trade is by the blacks of Adom, &c. bringing thither very good gold.

BOETICA, anciently a province of Spain, so called from the famed river Boetis, since Tartesus, and now Guadalquivir, or the Great river. See SPAIN.

BOFLING, a bailiwick belonging to the diocese of Ripen, in North Jutland, in Denmark. It constitutes the northern quarter, and includes the districts of Wanfuld, with three churches or parishes, Schodborg with 16, Ulfborg with 11, and Hind with 12.

BOG, or BUG, anciently Hypanis, a considerable river of Poland; which rising in Podolia, runs south-east through this province and Budziac Tartary, and after joining the Neiper or Boristhenes, falls into the Black sea.

BOGAZI, the strait which parts the island of Samos from the continent of Asia, is by the Turks called the Little Bogazi, (that word in their language signifying a canal or strait) and the other, which separates it from the island Icaria, the Great Bogazi. As all the vessels trading from Constantinople to Syria and Egypt, pass through one of these straits, (the course between Mycone and Naxia being too long) they are still frequented by pirates, as they were in Strabo's time.

BOGDOIS, a considerable nation of eastern Tartary, on the north of China. The trade consists in the skins of fables and black foxes.

BOG of GIGHT, now Gordon-Castle, the usual residence of the duke of Gordon, in Bamfshire; the noblest palace in the north of Scotland, not far from the south banks of the river Spey, and but a little way from its mouth. It looks more like a town than a seat. In its neighbourhood to the westward is the village of Fochabus, a long straggling place. It lies about 8 miles east of Elgin, 4 south of the Murray frith, and 100 north-east of Edinburgh.

BOGHO, or BUEIL, a town in the county of Nice, in Piemont, situated on the frontiers of France. Lat. 44, 12, Long. 6, 45.

BOGIE, a river of Bamfshire, in Scotland. It gives name to the valley and village called Strath-bogy. It surrounds one side of the latter, and joins the Deveron, which invests the other. It abounds with fine trout.

BOGLIASCO, a large village of the Genoese territories on the continent of Upper Italy. It lies close to the sea.

BOGLIO, or BROGLIO, a small place belonging to a county of the former name, or Beuil, and its capital, in the county of Nice, a subdivision of Piemont in Upper Italy. It lies on the frontiers of Provence in France, 25 miles north-east of Nice; in lat. 44, 12, N. Long. 6, 50, E.

B O

BOGORODSKOI, a town on the Oby, in the province of Yenisei; in the church of which is a celebrated picture of the Virgin Mary. There are iron-works in this town.

BOGOTO, (St. Fe de,) the capital of New Granada, belonging to Terra Firma, a province of North America. It is the see of an archbishop. Here is also a sovereign court of judicature, whose president is governor of the whole province; and in this city is an university. It stands on the banks of the little river Pati, which falls into the Magdalena. Near it are gold mines, and it is subject to Spain. Lat. 4, 0, N. Long. 73, 55, W.

BOGUINDA, a river on the coast of Nigritia, or North Guinea, between cape St. Mary and cape Roxo, and reaches 12 or 15 leagues up the country, which is inhabited by Portuguese and Gourmet blacks, who gather and deal in wax.

BOHEMIA, in general, includes the kingdom of Bohemia Proper, the duchy of Silesia, and marquisate of Moravia, lying altogether in a form of a lozenge. It is bounded by Austria and Bavaria on the south; Brandenburg, the electorate of Saxony and Lusatia on the north; the palatinate of Bavaria, and another part of Saxony on the west; Poland and Hungary on the east. It lies between lat. 48, 52, N. being about 300 miles in length, and 250 in breadth. It formerly included Lusatia, till it was granted by the house of Austria to the electoral house of Saxony. And the greatest part of this kingdom was taken in the year 1741 by the king of Prussia; who still possesses Silesia, it having been since ceded to him by the queen of Hungary.

Bohemia being an inland country, and remote from the sea, the cold is more intense here than in some other places under the same latitude; and yet the air is not healthy; especially between Bohemia Proper and Moravia, and towards the south and east parts of Bohemia, on account of woods and mountains, though it lies more open to the north and west. Its principal rivers are, the Elbe, Muldaw, Egra, Oder, Vistula, Moraw, Teyn, and Iglä. Its revenues are reckoned at about 1,400,000. communibus annis. Its mines, though not properly looked after, are esteemed the richest in Europe for gold and gems. The proportion the three grand divisions bear to one another, may appear from the extraordinary subsidies which the emperor demanded in 1733, when Bohemia Proper, was to furnish 260,000, Silesia 190,000, and Moravia 140,000.

BOHEMIA, (Proper) is one of the best countries in the Austrian dominions, and, next to Hungary, yields most money. It is bounded by Moravia and Silesia to the east, Misnia and Baravia on the west, Lusatia on the north, and Austria on the south. Its extent from north to south is about 140 miles, and about 170 where longest from east to west, lying in the eighth and ninth climates, where the longest longest day is 16 hours and an half. It is almost surrounded with mountains, in which are mines of gold, silver, copper, tin, iron, lead, sulphur, and nitre. It abounds with carbuncles, emeralds, amethysts, jasper, sapphire, and other gems, more than any part of the empire. In some of its rivers is found gold sand. Here are salt-pits; but with this they are principally supplied from Misnia, &c. They make vast quantities of allum and glass. It was formerly a part of the Hercynian forest, which, though now replaced with a vast many towns and villages, yet has still forests and woods well-stocked with wild beasts, deer, and fowl. In general it is fat, and the land arable, though barren and sandy in some parts; and it not only yields corn, but plenty of saffron, yet far short in quality of the English. The gardens and orchards yield a sufficient quantity for consumption and exportation. Vineyards are not much cultivated here, because the wine will not keep. They have beer both brown and white, which is highly valued, and exported; and they have better hops and a greater plenty of them than their neighbours, though their quality is again short of our English kind. Here are meadows and pastures in abundance, with large cattle and horses fit for war, besides sheep, and geese: the feathers of which are sent abroad, there being scarce any beds at the public inns of the country but at Prague. Though the air of Bohemia be cold, yet it breeds contagious distempers in some parts. Besides many smaller rivers which supply this country with fish, the Moldow, rising in the mountains on its east-side, as the Elbe does in those of the north, both unite below Prague, and render that river navigable; which being joined also by the Egra, it retains only the name of the Elbe, and running through Saxony, and by Hamburg, falls at last into the German ocean, below the latter city.

The inhabitants are a mixture of Slavonians, those living in villages being slaves, and of Germans. The inhabitants of the towns are not fond of arms, arts, or trade; but prefer an indolent life. They are in general large bodied and well set, subtle, courageous, and true to their word: but the common sort are very thievish, both in the country and even in the towns, after sun-set. Their original language is the Slavonian; which was so copious and sweet, that their law-givers ordered its true orthography and pronunciation to be inviolably preserved; but most people of fashion, through their intercourse with the court of Vienna, speak High Dutch, which the common people have also intermixed with their own language. A few Hussites still subsist in Bohemia; but they keep very close, and the government seems to take no notice of them. The Jews have an open toleration; but the religion most predominant is the Roman Catholic.

The Protestant religion had very early footing here; for some about queen Anne, who was a Bohemian, and wife of king Richard II. of England, copying several of Wickliffe's writings at Oxford, carried them to John Hufs, and Jerome of Prague, who being convinced thereby, set about a reformation with great success; and it spread so after they were burnt at the council of Constance, that the pope, upon the death of their king Winceslaus, who defended the Hussites, instigated the emperor and others to extirpate them; but they bravely defended themselves under their general Zisca, whose soldiers, by his own desire, made a drum of his skin. But afterwards their enemies found means to divide them, which terminated in their ruin: upon which the remains of them being driven to the mountains of Moravia, joined the Waldenses, by which name they were afterwards called. They agreed with Luther in doctrine and discipline, and there were several barons and knights of their communion, the emperors Maximilian and Rudolph II. tolerating that religion; but Mathias persecuting them, hence arose the Bohemian war in 1618, when the Protestants chose Frederick V. elector Palatine, for their king; but he being defeated at the battle of Prague, in 1620 they were persecuted, and at last banished, in 1639; since which time their worship, which was much of the Calvinistic principles, was not tolerated in Bohemia till the present year 1782, when the emperor Joseph granted a general toleration to all persuasions. Since 1639, the Bohemians have been governed very despotically by the house of Austria. They have still only the shadow of liberty among them, their states meeting every year at Prague, who seldom refuse the whole of the emperor's demands.

The annual revenue of Bohemia is near a million sterling to the house of Austria. The wealth and grandeur of the nobility, with the extreme poverty and slavery of the peasants can hardly be imagined. The generality of the nobility and gentry despise preferments out of their own country; yet they travel into France or Italy, but not without express leave from the emperor, under the penalty of forfeiting their estates. When they come of age they are obliged to take the oath of fidelity to the king.

Many of the Bohemians have a talent for music, especially the hunter's horn; and there is no village where the mass is not sung in concert. The affairs of Bohemia are directed by a chancellor, who has a vice-chancellor under him; with several assessors and counsellors. King Winceslaus, who was canonized, is the tutelary saint of Bohemia.

B O

This was originally a limited monarchy, and elective. But Ferdinand I. by his marriage with Anne, heiress of Bohemia and Hungary, annexing those kingdoms to the house of Austria, they have claimed it as hereditary; which occasioned that bloody war between Ferdinand II. and the unfortunate Frederick V. above-mentioned, that ended in the ruin of the latter. Ever since which this kingdom has been subject to that family, and the crown made hereditary to it by the peace of Westphalia.

This country is properly divided into the eastern and western parts by the Moldaw; and each of these is subdivided into nine small provinces or circles; namely, in the east those of Prague, Kaurim, Bécheyn or Berawn, Czallaw, Chrudim, Konigink-rays, Glatz, Boleslaw or Buntzler, and Lejtometitz. In the west are the circles of Satz or Ziatech, Schlany, Rakonick, Elmbogen, Egra, Podesbrock, Pilsen, Moldaw or Ultaw, and Prachem.

BOHOL, one of the Philippine islands, in Asia, lying north of that of Mindano, and south-west of Leyte. Lat. 10, 0, N. Long. 122, 5, E.

BOIANO, anciently Bovianum, a small city and episcopal see of the county of Molise, one of the provinces belonging to the kingdom of Naples, in the Lower Division of Italy. It is situated on the river Tiferno, at the foot of the Appenine mountains, and the confines of Terra di Lavoro. Its bishop is subject to the prelate of Benevento, from which latter city it lies 15 miles north. Lat. 41, 30, N. Long. 14, 38, E.

BOIGNY, the principal commandery and meeting-place for the knights of the order of St. Lazarus. It is situated in Upper Orleanois, a subdivision of Orleanois Proper, in the government of the former name, in France.

BOILHOSA, a small district of Vienna, a jurisdiction belonging to the province of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal. It is annexed to Queijada.

BOINITZ, a town of Upper Hungary, in the county of Zoll, remarkable for its baths, and for the quantity of saffron that grows about it. Long. 19, 10, E. Lat. 48, 42, N.

BOIS-BELLE, in Latin Boscobellum; it is otherwise called Henrichemont: an absolutely sovereign principality, situated round Upper Berry, in France. is about 12 French leagues in circuit; and mostly consists of but an indifferent soil, containing about 6000 and some odd hundred inhabitants. The prince's domain only amounts to about 2000 livres: but the king's farmer-general gives him 24,000 livres annually, for the liberty of selling salt in his country. Besides the salt-duties, the subjects of this principality are burthened with no other taxes.

BOIS-BELLE, a large village of the last-mentioned principality, situated quite close to its capital Henrichemont; which see.

BOIS LAC, or THE LAKE OF THE WOOD, a considerable lake which lies in the communication between lake Superior and the lakes Winnepeek and Bourbon, near Canada, North America. Its waters are not esteemed quite so pure as those of others, it having in many places a muddy bottom. It is surrounded with a multiplicity of wood, such as oaks, pines, firs, spruce, &c. This lake lies up a branch of the river Bourbon, nearly east from the south-end of lake Winnepeek. It is of great depth in some places, being about 70 miles long and 40 broad, with but few islands, and those small. A few of the Killistnoe Indians sometimes encamp on the borders of it, to fish and hunt, which abounds with buffaloes, moose-deer, and caribboo deer.

BOIS DE SIOGNIES, a forest of Brabant, a province in the Austrian Low-Countries, about three miles from Brussels. See SIOGNIES.

BOIS LE DUC, a considerable fortified town of Dutch Brabant, upon the river Bommel. It lies 17 miles west of Grave. Its inhabitants are mostly soldiers. The linen and woollen manufactures flourish here; and its cutlery wares and needles are famous. It is surrounded also with rivers, and its meadows are often overflowed. This town is pretty large, and intersected with many canals, and its trade and shipping are considerable. Here are three Calvinist Dutch churches, one French, one Lutheran, and ten mass-houses, besides a gymnasium. It was founded in 1184, by Godfrey III. duke of Brabant, who caused a wood to be cleared, and used, to build the houses, to which circumstance it owes its name. It was walled in 1352, and in 1559 pope Paul IV. erected a bishopric here, but the Dutch taking it in 1629, the see was abolished. Lat. 51, 45, N. Long. 5, 20, E.

BOITZENBURG, a small town in the county of Schwerin, Mecklenburg, on a small river of the same name, where it runs into the Elbe. It receives a toll for the Elbe of 40,000 dollars annually, of which the house of Mecklenburg-Strelitz receives 9000. It has a priory, and in 1709 was almost destroyed by fire.

BOKE-MOLE, a capital town of a province of the same name, lying under the line in Africa. This country is inhabited by Jagas, who purchase elephants teeth from their neighbours, and bring them to Guinea.

BOKHARA, (Tartars of,) are generally looked upon as the most civilized of all that tribe, though great robbers. They are very courageous, and even the women among them are of an undaunted bravery. See TARTARY.

BOKHARA, a city of Tartary, in Asia, and capital of Great Bukharia, situated one day's journey to the north of the river Jehun, or Amu; in east east long. 65, 50, north lat. 39, 15. In 1219 it was besieged by Jenghiz Khan, as being part of Sultan Mohammed's dominions, a descendant of the famous Mahmud Gazari. At that time, besides the city-walls, which were very strong; Bokhara had an outward inclosure twelve leagues in compass. The castle surrendered at discretion, but the city being built of wood, except the palace and a few other houses, was totally burnt; and though it was demolished, the governor and garrison, out of a very extraordinary piece of clemency from so bloody a tyrant, had their lives spared. Bokhara continued in ruins for some years, but at length Jenghiz Khan ordered it to be rebuilt. It is now large and populous; and is the residence of a khan who is altogether despotic, though his power reaches but a little way without the city. The town is seated on a rising ground, with a slender wall of earth and a dry ditch. The houses are low, built mostly of mud; but the caravanseras and mosques, which are numerous, are all of brick. The bazars or market-places, which have been stately buildings, are now mostly in ruins. The inhabitants are more civilized and polite than some of their neighbours; and yet are cowardly, cruel, effeminate, and perfidious. Great number of Jews and Arabians frequent this place, though they are much oppressed, and frequently deprived of all their properties by the Khan or his attendants at pleasure. At best they pay heavy taxes, and it is almost criminal to be rich.

BOLABOLA, (Isle) one of the Society islands, northward of Otaheite, discovered by Capt. Cook, in 1769, in his voyage in the Pacific ocean. It is surrounded by rocks and several small islands.

BOLBITINUM, the second mouth of the Nile, reckoning from west to east; now very small, choaked up with sand, and called Le Bras de Beltin.

BOLCHERESK, a town in the south part of Kamtchatka, built by the Russians, and where a chancery is kept, in which the government of Kamtchatka is vested. It lies in lat. 52, 55, N. long. 156, 38, E.

BOLDSON, an island on the coast of Halflingland, a province of Sweden, with a good harbour.

BOLE, a village of Melli, a province of Negroland, in Africa. It is situated above Bot, not far from the mouth of the river Gesses.

BOLENTIUM, a town of Pannonia Superior, now Rackerberg in Stiria.

BOLESLAFF, or BUNTZLAU, a town of Silesia, seated on the river Bober, 17 miles north-east of Lignitz, and 25 east of Gorkitz. Long. 16, 0, E. Lat. 51, 12, N.

BOLI, or BOLLI, the Turkish capital of the province of the same name, in Phrygia Major and Asiatic Turkey. It is the seat of one of the 15 san-giacates of Anatolia Proper.

BOLINGBROOKE, an inland town of Lincolnshire, between the river Witham and the sea-coast, north-east, with a castle, famous for giving birth and title to king Henry IV.

BOLINGBROKE, a town in Talbot county, in the eastern division of Maryland, in North America, on the north-west point of Choptank river in Chesapeake bay; five miles east of Oxford.

BOLINGEY, a place in Cornwall, where an annual fair is held on March 5.

BOLISLAW, a town in the eastern division of Bohemia, and circle of the same name, subject to the house of Austria. It is situated about 30 miles north-east of Prague. Lat. 50, 25, N. Long. 14, 40, E.

BOLISSUS, now Voliffa, stands in the midst of the Arvisian fields, (so famed for the wines they produced) in the island of Chios, now Scio; where the inhabitants pretend to shew the house of the immortal Homer.

BOLKOWITZ, a town of Silesia, in the duchy of Glogaw, 12 miles south of the town of that name. Long. 15, 20, E. Lat. 51, 27, N.

BOLLING, a district belonging to the bailiwick of Ludeñas, and diocese of Ripen, in North Jutland, Denmark. In it are 12 parish-churches.

BOLL, or BULLE, a small town with a seat and a Capuchin convent, to which pilgrimages are continually made, in the canton of Freyburg.

BOLLO, a town on the coast of Nigritia, or New Guinea, lies between Bissos and Cacheo, and affords millet, cattle, and poultry.

BOLNEY, a place in Suffex, at which two annual fairs are held on May 17, and December 10.

BOLOGNA, BONONIA, or IL BOLOGNESE, (the territory or duchy of,) in the Ecclesiastical State and Middle Division of Italy. It is bounded by the Ferrarese on the north, Romagna on the east, Tuscany on the south, and Modena on the west. Bononia formerly maintained its independency as a republic, under the protection of the emperor of Germany; but in the year 1278, it subjected itself in some measure to pope Nicholas II. In succeeding times it underwent several revolutions, till pope Julius II. on occasion of the Venetian war, entirely annexed the city of Bologna and its territory to the papal dominions, in 1513. The city having freely submitted itself to the Romish chair, its various privileges have been preserved, which it still enjoys; such as the right of sending an envoy to the papal court, that of having an assessor in the rota, that no citadel be built at Bologna, and that the effects of the citizens shall not be taken from them upon any pretext whatever. In memory of their former state the word libertas is stamped on their coin. The temporal government is in a cardinal, who has the title of a legate, and who has a prelate as a vice-legate appointed him. The legate himself is either changed or confirmed every three years.

The archbishop of Bologna has the direction of the ecclesiastical matters. The whole territory is said to contain 308 cities, towns, boroughs, and villages; with 308,000 souls. Among its natural curiosities, is the famous Bononian stone, which is to be met with, particularly towards the Appenine mountains, and that of Paderno, about three English miles from Bologna city; besides many other places in Italy. It is commonly of the magnitude of a walnut, and in many parts of it sparkling like talc. After a heavy rain has washed the earth down from the hills, it is found very readily; when, by a particular calcination, differing before in nothing from another stone, it acquires the following property: that, after laying it in open day-light, it absorbs so much luminous splendor, as to shine in the dark like a glowing coal for eight or fifteen minutes; and, when the stone is very good, its lustre is like that of a flambeau. The moon-shine adds no force to it; and the sun-beams are too strong for it, as calcinating it too much, so as to crumble it to powder. It retains also its luminous quality, when laid in water; and in general it lasts for three or four years: at the expiration of which, or at any other time, it may be calcined anew, to recover its quality, but never becomes so luminous afterwards.

The soil of Bononia is very rich and fertile; but neither so well cultivated nor peopled, as under its ancient inhabitants, the brave Boii and Ligures; in whose time it flourished much better. The place of principal note in this country is the capital,

BOLOGNA, or BONONIA, commonly stiled the Fat, from the richness of its soil: it was placed in Gallia Transpudana, and anciently called Felsina. Next to Rome it was the best and richest city in all the Ecclesiastical State. It is large, being between five and six Italian miles in circuit; and populous, the number of its inhabitants being reckoned at 80,000. It lies at the foot of the Appenine mountains, in a fruitful plain, with a healthy air. The river Savona washes its walls, and the Reno runs through the city. Among its houses are several beautiful buildings; but the arched piazzas standing before the houses in most of the streets, and higher than these where people walk, on which the second story rests, hide much of their beauty. The vast number of churches and convents here have a good effect upon the eye, when this city is viewed at a distance. Here is the see of an archbishop. The churches are for the most part fine, and embellished with costly paintings. The cathedral has nothing particular about it. The church of St. Petronius is the largest in the city; but it is only of middling beauty: in it pope Clement VII. crowned the emperor Charles V. And the most remarkable curiosity in it is the meridian line, drawn by Mr. Cassini, which is said to be 180 feet long. It lies upon the pavement, in white marble, and is almost an inch broad, being made of brass: in the roof of the church, towards the south, a small round hole has been bored, through which the sun-beams fall upon it, shewing the true meridian point throughout the year. In the beautiful church of the Dominicans lies St. Dominic, who died here in the year 1221. In the convent just by it are between 140 and 150 monks, with a fine library belonging to it. In this church also lies buried the famous count Lud. Ferd. Marsigli. The other churches most beautiful in Bologna, are that of the Franciscans, St. Agnese, St. Bartholomai, Corpus Domini, S. Giovanni Battista, S. Maria di Galiera, and S. Paolo de Padri Bernabiti.

The quadrangular tower, called Degli Asinelli, is 371 feet high; and close by it is also the quadrilateral tower Garisenda, 130 feet high; which, after its foundation gave way, became so sloping on one side, that a plumb line let fall from the top, shewed that the top had swerved seven complete feet from the perpendicular. The palace, where reside the legate, vice-legate, and gonfaloniere, or principal person among the fifty senators, of which the council consists, with others in the magistracy, and where all the colleges meet, is situated in the market-place, belongs to the city, and is a more bulky fabric than it is costly. The brass statue of pope Gregory XIII. which stands over the outermost gate, is admired by connoisseurs; and on the left hand, after entering this door, is to be seen that of pope Boniface VIII. In the same palace are the natural curiosities of the learned Ulysses Aldrovandi, which he left by his will for the use of the public, together with his manuscripts, which fill a large cabinet or closet. Here also is the arsenal. The medicinal garden belonging to this palace is but small. Among the fine private palaces in this city, that of Caprari is most worth seeing. The university of Bologna is very old, and in it the Germans have their own magistrates, a particular matricula, with many other privileges. Among the buildings of the university, called Il Studio, the most beautiful is the anatomical theatre, built like an amphitheatre, wainscoted with cypress, and decorated with the statues and busts of the most celebrated physicians of Bologna. The Clementine academy, founded by pope Clement XI. for painting, sculpture, and architecture, has been united with that erected, in 1712, by the learned count Marfigli above-mentioned, for the sciences. In the buildings of this academy is a library, observatory, a cabinet of natural and artificial curiosities, an excellent printing-house, a public hall for declaiming, a chamber for painting, sculpture, &c. The tomb of the famous Telecotius, whom Butler ridicules in his Hudibras, is in this city. The twisted silk prepared here in great quantities, by means of the water-mills on the river Reno, is only of the second sort. The damask, taffety, velvet, and crape, manufactured in Bologna, are very highly prized. Here they drive also a considerable trade in flax, hemp, olives, oil, and wine; likewise in all sorts of works made of walnut-tree, preserved quinces, all kinds of essences, distilled spirits, wash-balls, snuff, theriac, a variety of rock crystal curiosities, flowers and fruits made of wax, besides leather-bottles, and other manufactures of this city; with fruits, which are produced in great plenty in its neighbourhood. They have a curious breed of lap-dogs, so small, that the ladies carry them in their muffs and apron-pockets. For facilitating the transportation of all commodities to and from Bologna, a large canal has been cut between the Reno and Po. Here an academy of wits, styled Gli Otiosi, have a fine structure, a noble library, and other curiosities. The town is surrounded with a high wall of brick, with towers at proper distances, and it has twelve stately gates. It lies 25 miles south of Ferrara, and 200 north west of Rome. Lat. 44. 30, N. Long. 11, 26, E.

BOLONGE. See BOULOGNE.

BOLSANE, a town of Germany, in the territory of Tyrol, and circle of Austria. It is very agreeably situated in the midst of a fine large valley, full of villages, and abounding in vineyards. The wines in this valley are the best in all Tyrol; but they must be drank the year after that of their growth, otherwise they become unfit for use. E. Long. 11, 11, N. Lat. 46, 42.

BOLSENA, a small contemptible town, but very delightfully situated, on the north end of a pretty large lake, called Lago di Bolsena, anciently Lacus Vulsinus, belonging to St. Peter's Patrimony, in the Ecclesiastical State and Middle Division of Italy. The mountains covered with oak-forests, that mostly surround this lake, represent a pleasant amphitheatre. Here it is said that a miracle was wrought with the host, which gave occasion to the institution of Corpus Christi festival. Not far from hence are to be seen upon an eminence the ruins of the ancient Etrurian city Volsinium. It lies 45 miles from Rome, in lat. 42, 40, N. Long. 13, 10, E.

BOLSOVER, a large and well built town of Derbyshire, but has no market, with a castle upon an eminence, in the hundred of Scarfdales.

VOL. I. — No. 25.

BOLSWERT, a well peopled town of West Friesland, one of the Seven United Provinces. It is situated on a rising ground, encompassed with a ditch and ramparts. The houses are neatly built, with several canals navigable by small vessels, that run through the town. It has five gates, four sluices, a town-house, a church with two ministers, a grammar-school, and hospitals for orphans and poor people: it is governed by its own magistrates. It had formerly a considerable trade by sea; but now the inhabitants deal principally with the neighbouring towns, by means of their canals. It lies about four miles from the Zuyder-see to the east, and 13 south-west of Lewarden, in lat. 53. 10, N. Long. 5, 20, E.

BOLT, one of the principal among the many large rivers belonging to Groenland. It lies in lat. 64 degrees north, and has been navigated between 18 and 20 Norway miles up the country.

BOLTON, a market-town of Lancashire; where are cotton and woollen manufactures. It is a staple for fustians of divers sorts, particularly those called Augsburg and Milan fustians, brought from all parts of the country to its market, which is on Monday; as also to its two annual fairs, kept on July 19, and October 2. Here are medicinal waters. The town lies eight miles N. W. from Manchester, the same from Lancaster, 27 from Liverpool, and 237 from London.

BOLTON, a place in Yorkshire, where a fair is annually kept on the 28th of June.

BOLZANO, the name given by the Italians to the town of Posen, in Austria. See POSEN.

BOMA, or BOMMO, a very populous large island, subject or tributary to the king of Congo, on the west coast of Africa. It abounds with all manner of sustenance proper to the climate, and has several small islands about it. The inhabitants do not use circumcision like their Pagan neighbours, whose wizards circumcise them on the eighth day. See CONGO PROPER.

BOMAL, a town of Luxemburg, in the Austrian Low Countries. It is situated on the river Ourte, about 20 miles south of Liege, in lat. 50. 20, N. Long. 5, 30, E.

BOMBAY, an island of Asia, in the East Indies, on the west coast of the peninsula on this side the Ganges. It is about seven miles in length, and 20 in circumference, and is situated in E. long. 73. 0, N. lat. 19. 0. The principal town is near a mile long; but the houses are mean, low, and paltry, a few only excepted which belong to the Portuguese. The soil is barren, and incapable of any improvement, nor has the island any good water on it. The best is what they preserve in their cisterns after the rains, that which is afforded by the wells having a brackish disagreeable taste. The estates on the island are chiefly laid out in groves of fine cocoa-trees. Their gardens also produce mangoes, jacks, and other Indian fruits. They make salt in large quantities by letting the sea into pits, where the sun evaporates the water, leaving the salt behind. The air and climate are rather unhealthy, although the natives, and persons accustomed to the country, live to a good old age. Most people on their arrival are seized with fevers, fluxes, scrophulous disorders, or a disease they call the barbers, which wholly enervates the body, reducing it to a total state of inactivity, and deprivation of all its loco-motive faculties. After rains, a multitude of venomous creatures appear, which grow to an extraordinary size. Their spiders are as large as a walnut, and their toads almost equal to a duck in magnitude. The inhabitants are a mixture of several nations, English, Portuguese, and Indians, amounting in all to 50,000 or 60,000. Formerly the president of Bombay appeared with all the pomp of a crowned head; being attended when he went abroad by troops of Moors and Banderins, colours flying, drums beating, and music playing; but after the presidency was removed to Surat, this splendor greatly diminished.

Bombay formerly belonged to the Portuguese; but on the setting on foot a treaty of marriage between Charles II. and the Infanta of Lisbon, it was thought a proper opportunity for procuring the cession of some convenient port and mart for the India company, as part of the Infanta's portion; and thus the island of Bombay came into the hands of the English, with whom it has ever since continued. After the king's marriage, a squadron, conducted by lord Marleburg, was sent to receive the possession and investiture of the island from the viceroy, who had received his Portuguese majesty's commands to that effect. But on lord Marleburg's arrival in September 1633, with a squadron of five men of war, the clergy made such violent opposition, and so positively refused to yield the island to heretics, that the viceroy was terrified, and determined to keep possession of the island. The governor of Surat, under whose jurisdiction Bombay then was, threatened the English factory at Surat, in case the English troops did not reembark from that place, to which lord Marleburgh had been obliged to retire on account of the viceroy's obstinate refusal. His lordship therefore set sail in January, 1664, with two ships for England, leaving the rest under Sir Abraham Shipman, to spend the remainder of the western monsoons in some of the neighbouring ports. During his stay he buried above 200 of his men on a desolate island called Anjadiva, where he had wintered. The monsoons being over, Sir Abraham threatened the viceroy and clergy who opposed his pretensions with the vengeance of the kings of England and Portugal, if they continued obstinate, or denied obedience to their majesty's instructions and contracts. At last the terrors of a British fleet got the better of their religion; the church began to abate of her zeal, and consented to a treaty, by which the inhabitants were to be continued in the free exercise of their religion and possession of their estates under the crown of England. Sir Abraham dying, Mr. Cook, next in commission, signed the treaty and in quality of governor, took possession of the island in the name of the king his master. Here he immediately set about building a fortress; but a capital mistake he made in concluding the treaty, by not including the appendages to Bombay, extending to Verfica on Saler, has been a bone of contention ever since. The fort was laid out in a regular manner, and an old square house fitted out for himself as governor; but Mr. Hamilton observes, that both Mr. Cook, and some of his successors, never once thought of a church.

Thus the trade of Bombay flourished exceedingly; but the revenues of the place not being equal to the expence of keeping it, and other political and commercial reasons superadded, the crown was obliged to make it over in fee-tail to the East India company, who still continue to hold it in that manner. After the fort was traced and the foundation laid, Sir George Lucas arrived from England with two ships, but affairs being accommodated before he came, he continued here no longer than January, 1666, when he returned to England, leaving the government as he found it, in the hands of Mr. Cook and the council, under the presidency of the settlement at Surat. Mr. Cook shewed his ignorance of architecture, by building the fort upon the ground on which it stands, and which is exceedingly inconvenient. As an engineer, too, he committed a capital error, his fort being commanded by a hill called Dangere, about 800 paces distant. The consequences of this unfortunate choice were apparent in the year 1689, when it was besieged by the Mogul. In this he is the more inexcusable, as common sense, though joined with the greatest ignorance of architecture and engineering, might have pointed out a much more commodious situation about 500 paces to the southward. As for the magnitude, figure, and materials of the fort, says captain Hamilton, there is nothing considerably faulty. It is a regular tetragon, whose outside polygon is about 500 paces, built of an excellent hard stone. It can mount 100 pieces of cannon; and these particulars are all that can be alledged in its favour. It has not a single spring of fresh water; which very circumstance must, in case of a siege, render all its fortifications of little or no value, since a little patience must render the enemy's masters.

masters of it at discretion.—For the farther particulars of the island of Bombay, see the article EAST-INDIES.

In the entrance of Bombay road is no danger but one hidden rock, about half a league from the castle; but which is dry at low water; and within it is a channel passable by the largest ships. Besides the town of Bombay, there are other smaller ones upon the island. It lies 130 miles south of Surat, and 40 north-west of Dun de Rajapore. Lat. 72, 30, N. Long. 19, E.

BOMBON, a barren province of South America, in Peru, and in the audience of Lima.

BOMENE, or BOMMENE, a port town, belonging, with its territory, to Holland; though the rest of this island is subject to that of Zealand, one of the United Provinces. It is walled, and has a deep ditch, with other fortifications. It lies on the north shore of this island of Schowen, and opposite to that of Goree; about 20 miles east of Bromershaven; in lat. 51, 50, N. Long. 4, 2, E.

BOMMEL, the capital and only considerable place of an island of the same name, or Bommelwaert, in Dutch Guelderland, one of the Seven United Provinces. It stands on the north bank of the river Waal, is doubly walled, and has broad and regular streets. It is fortified with good curtains, bastions, towers, and double ditches. It lies low, and can be overflowed by the above-mentioned river and the Maese.

In 1672 it surrendered to the French, who destroyed its fortifications, carried off all the artillery and warlike stores, and obliged the town to pay 36,000 guilders, to prevent its being burnt. The States fortified it afterwards, as it is at present. The town is governed by its own magistrates, under whose jurisdiction is the whole island, being 13 miles long, and four broad, between the Waal and Maese; and on it are several villages. Bommel is four miles north-east of Nimeguen; in lat. 52, 5, N. long. 5, 50, E.

BOMMELWAERT. See BOMMEL.

BON, or BONNE, in Latin Colonia Julia, or Ara Ubiorum, a small, but well-inhabited city, in the electorate of Cologne, in Germany, and the capital of the Upper Diocese. It is situated on the west side of the Rhine, and 12 miles south of Cologne, in a fruitful country, producing good wine; and the woods, with a ridge of mountains near it, abounding with game. Its churches, particularly the collegiate, are stately buildings. It is subject to the elector, who has a fine palace here, in which he usually resides; which in January 15, 1777, was discovered on fire, and burned with such rapidity, that the two towers, though 100 yards distant from each other, were consumed in less than half an hour. The principal apartments and the chapel were entirely burnt; only the two wings were saved, which contain the elector's apartment, the gallery, and the cabinet of natural curiosities, on one side, and the fine apartments for strangers on the other; the loss estimated at above 200,000*l*. About 12 persons were lost in the flames, or killed by the falling in of the floors, while they were endeavouring to save the archives.

It has been frequently besieged and taken; particularly in 1703, by the duke of Marlborough. Upon its restitution, by the treaty of Utrecht, its fortifications, were to be demolished. Lat. 50, 35, N. Long. 7, 50, E.

BON ACCORD, the name sometimes given to the new town of Aberdeen, in Scotland, from its motto so called. See ABERDEEN.

BON ESPERANCE, (Cape,) or the CAPE OF GOOD HOPE, the most southern promontory of Africa, where the Dutch have a good town and fort, the principal place of their settlements in Caffraria, or country of the Hottentots. Their territory here extends 200 miles inland, producing the most excellent wine, corn, and fruits, to be met with any where; with abundance of cattle, venison, fish, and poultry. It was discovered in 1487, and is a fine country, situated in a healthy climate, and abounds with various kinds of refreshments. In a paddock adjoining to the company's garden, which is extremely elegant, ostriches, zebras, with some curious birds as well as animals are kept. This would be a delightful place, were it not subject to storms, both in summer and winter, more than in any other part of the globe. It lies in lat. 34, 15, S. long. 2, 7, E.

BONA, a province of Algiers, in Africa. It lies on the maritime-coast, being bounded by Tunis on the east, Constantia on the south, and Labez on the west. It is so called from its capital, supposed to be the ancient Hippo, where the famous St. Augustine was once bishop.

This country abounds in corn and fruit; particularly the jujub-tree, which covers great part of it; and with its fruit, dried in summer, the natives support themselves in winter. They breed also great numbers of cattle, large and small. But they are so much exposed to the continual depredations of the Arabs, that only a little part of the mountains is inhabited.

The town of Bona was taken by the emperor Charles V. who landed here in 1535, when he invaded Africa: but it has since been re-taken by the Turks, who dismantled it; being now small, ill-built, the streets narrow, and not over populous. About a mile off are the ruins of a monastery built by the prelate above-mentioned; and near it a spring, which the Moors still call by his name, to which Romish sailors resort, in order to pay their devotions at an old statue there.

On the east side is a fort, in which the present governor governor of the province resides, with a garrison of 200 janizaries. The pirate, Barbarossa, annexed this town to Algiers. The road before it is good for little; but farther west-ward, where the Genoese have a fort, it is both deep and safe. On the east-side of the bay they have also a coral-fishery. Bona lies 200 miles east of Algiers city; in lat. 36, 5, N. long. 7, 57, E.

Upon the same coast to the east, and almost opposite to Sicily, is another cape of the same name.

BONAIRE, the largest of the three islands belonging to the Dutch, on the coast of Venezuela, a province of the Terra Firma, in America. It lies 20 leagues from the main, and reckoned about 17 in circuit. The road is on the south-west side, about the middle of the island, where a pretty deep bay runs in. Ships from the eastward come close to the eastern shore, and let go their anchors in 60 fathom water, within half a cable's length of it; but they must directly make them fast ashore by a hawser, otherwise the land-winds in the night would drive them off to sea, the ground being so steep, that no anchor can hold if once it starts. About half a mile off is a small, low island, with a channel between it and Bonaire.

The houses are about half a mile in-land, and right in from the road. A deputy to the governor of Curaçoa resides here, with seven or eight soldiers, and five or six Indian families. They have no fort; and the soldiers never watch but in war-time. They have some horses and cows. The south side is low and level, with several sorts of trees; but not very large. A small brackish spring near their houses serves the inhabitants. At the west end is a good spring of fresh water, where live three or four Indian families. On the south-side, near the eastern extremity, is a good salt-pond, whence Dutch stoops fetch salt. Bonaire lies 15 miles east of Curaçoa, with which the Dutch carry on a traffic from thence, and 40 north-west of Lagaira, a Spanish fort on the continent. The middle of the island is in lat. 20, 15, N. Long. 66, 37, E.

BONAISE, very high mountains of Savoy, in Upper Italy, close by Lafnebourg, whose tops are continually covered with snow and flakes of ice; the steep cliffs of which cannot be climbed, by such as gather rock-crystal, or go in pursuit of wild goats, without imminent hazard of their lives.

BONASCOLA, a large village of the Rivera di Livante, or eastern part of the Genoese dominions, on the continent, in the Upper Division of Italy.

BONAVENTE, or BONAVENTA, a town of Portuguese Estremadura, situated on the Tagus, and at the junction of the Zaito with that river. In it are 400 inhabitants in one parish, which is a priory, belonging to the knights of the order of Aviz. It lies thirty miles N. E. from Lisbon, and the same distance S. W. of Santarem.

BONAVENTURA, a port of Popayan, a province belonging to Terra Firma, in America. It is situated at the bottom of a bay of the same name; and inhabited by a few Spanish families, who send merchandize brought from New Spain to Popayan and the towns in that province. The place is very damp and unhealthy, from its high mountains, whence issue several rivers. A pilot is required to enter its harbour, the mouth of which is difficult to find. The Spaniards have built a fort in Bonaventura-bay, which is the staple for the cities of Cali, Popayan, Sante Fé, and for all the south part of Terra Firma. It lies in lat. 3, 20, N. Long. 75, 18.

BONAVISTA, one of the Cape Verd islands, in the Atlantic ocean, and subject to Portugal. It is about twenty leagues in circuit. Along the north coast is a ledge of white rocks, against which the waves break with great fury: the east coast is bounded by sandy downs, and inland it is mountainous. From the southern point juts out another bank of rocks eastward. The best road and harbour are under the south west point, from five to sixteen fathom water. This island is situated 200 miles west of the African coast. Lat. 16, 10, N. Long. 23, 5, W.

BONAVISTA, a fine bay on the east side of Newfoundland, in North America; where the English had a settlement so well fortified, that when the French had over-run great part of that island in 1696, they durst not attack it.

BONAVISTA, an island in the South-Sea, called so by the Spaniards, but Tinian by the Indians, where commodore Anson anchored, in his way from Acapulco to China. Lat. 15, 58, N. Long. 136, 25, E.

BONDORF, a market town, with a convent, in a county of the same name, in Suabia.

BONIFACIO, a fortified and well-peopled town, in the district of the same name, belonging to the country on the further side of the mountains in Corsica, and Upper Division of Italy. The town stands on a high rock, at the most southern verge of the island. The channel dividing it from Sardinia, is called the Straits of Bonifacio, formerly Fretum Taphros. Lat. 41, 24, N. Long. 9, 20, E.

BONGO, or BUNGO, a port town, and the capital of the Japanese islands of the same name, in Asia. It lies opposite to that of Tonfa, from which a narrow channel separates it. Lat. 32, 41, N. Long. 131, 57, E.

BONINGUE, one of the twenty-four parishes belonging to the government of Calais, in France.

BONNE, a small fortified town of Fausigny, a subdivision of Savoy, in Upper Italy. See BON in Germany.

BONNESTABLE had formerly the opposite name Malestable, from the bad accommodation in its inns: a small town of Upper Maine, a subdivision of the government of the latter name and Perche, in France. In it are about 700 families; and this place drives a very considerable trade in corn. It lies on the road to Rouen, and five leagues from Le Maus.

BONNEVAL, a small town of Chairtrain, a subdivision of Lower Orleanois, belonging to the government of the latter name, in France. It stands on the Loire, in a fruitful valley, from which it has its name. It is the seat of a royal prevoté and mayory. Here is a famous Benedictine abbey, with three parish-churches and an hospital.

BONNEVILLE, a large village of Rumois, a subdivision of Upper Normandy, in the government of the latter name, in France. It stands on the Rille.

BONNEVILLE, (La), a small fortified town of Faucigny, a province of Savoy, in Upper Italy. It is situated on the N. side of the river Arve, 20 miles S. E. of Geneva. Lat. 46, 18, N. Long. 6, 10, E.

BONNY, a town of France, in the Gatinois, seated at the confluence of a river of the same name with the Loire. E. long. 2, 54. N. lat. 47, 36.

BONONIA, a town of Italy, in the Gallia Cispadana; a name probably given by the Gauls, there being a Bononia in Gallia Belgica. Its ancient name, when in the hands of the Tuscans, who were expelled by the Gauls, was Falsina. In the 563d year of the city the Romans led a colony thither; which, about the beginning of the Actian war, was increased by Augustus, and is the Colonia Bononiensis of Tacitus, now Bologna; which see.

BONONIA, a town of Pannonia Inferior, between Mursa to the north-west, and Taurinum to the east. Another Bononia, a town of Moesia Superior, on the Danube; now Bodon, in Bulgaria. See BODON.

BONS, a small town of Chablais, a subdivision of Savoy, in Upper Italy.

BOOG, or BUG, a river of Poland, which rises in Podolia, and falls into the Nieper. See BUG.

BOOBERAK, a river in the territory of Algers, which runs into the sea, after receiving several small rivers.

BOORGLUM, a bailiwick belonging to the diocese of Aalborg, in North Jutland, Denmark; with a district of the same name, to which belong fourteen parishes. Of this name also is a castle, formerly the residence of the Catholic Bishop, which was secularised in 1537. It is now a gentleman's seat, and under its jurisdiction is the town of Sabye.

VOL. I.—No. 25.

B O

BOORSONY, or PILSEN, an old mountain-town and colony of Saxons, in the district of Bath and county of Barfch, belonging to the Circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary. The inhabitants formerly worked in the gold mines; but now they follow agriculture. It belongs to the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Gran.

BOOSING. See BOZIN.

BOOSZORMENY, one of the seven Heyduc towns, in the county of Szabolts, belonging to the Circle on the further side of the Theiss, in Upper Hungary; which Mathias II. exempted from the jurisdiction of the county, on account of their valour.

BOO-SHATTER is with the greatest probability supposed to be the place where stood the city of Utica, so famous in ancient history. See UTICA.

BOOTESHELLAH, a village in the Holy Land, in or close upon the skirts of that famous valley, near Bethlehem, where the angel made such prodigious havock of the great Senacherib's mighty army in the space of one night; 2 Kings xix. 35.

BOOTH, a place in Lancashire, where fairs are kept on Whitsun-Saturday, and Saturday before October 23.

BOOTLE, a place in Cumberland, where they hold fairs on April 5, and September 24.

BOPART, a town and fort of Triers, in Germany, belonging to that elector. It is situated on the west shore of the Rhine, at the foot of a hill, eight miles south of Coblentz, in lat. 50, 20, N. Long. 7, 10, E.

BOPSINGEN, a town of Suabia in Germany, seated on the river Egar, in E. Long. 9, 55, N. Lat. 48, 51.

BOQU, a village, between the river Sweiro da Costa and Cape Apolonia, on the coast of South Guinea, situated in the woods, near the mouth of the said river. The inland country affords excellent gold, some slaves, and a few elephants teeth, wherein the trade of this and its neighbouring places consists. The anchoring ground before them is about two English miles from shore, in 15 or 16 fathom water.

BORHAS, an inland town belonging to the territory of Elfsborg and West Gothland, in Sweden. It is situated in a woody and mountainous country, on the river Wiska. The inhabitants of this place travel through the whole kingdom, and trade in several home manufactures, for which they have an exclusive privilege. They look upon it as a disgrace to stay half a year at home. Here is a mineral spring; and it is the forty-third town in the general diet.

BORBA, a town of Villa Viçosa, an audience belonging to Alentejo, a province of Portugal. It contains 2700 inhabitants, has two parish-churches.

BOREKUL, one of the highest mountains of West-Gothish Dalia, in West-Gothland, Sweden.

BOREN, or BORM, a parish in the district of Schliefs, belonging to the duchy of Sleswick, in Denmark.

BORERA, an island lying north of North-Uist, one of the western isles of Scotland. It is four miles in circuit; in it is a fresh-water lake, abounding with large eels. On the coast of this island is found the largest and best sort of the seaweed, called dulse.

Of the same name is another island, lying about two leagues north of St. Kilda, the most north-westerly island of the Hebrides. It is about a mile in circuit, and mostly surrounded with a high rock. Here is good pasturage, with vast numbers of sea-fowl, solan-geese, &c. from March till September, whose eggs are preserved in peat-ashes, and the fowl also, without salt. Solan geese eggs are eaten here raw, as a pectoral. A bird called fulmar, of the size of a moor-hen, upon any one's approach, spouts out pure oil from its bill, which the natives have a method of catching when they surprize it, and use in their lamps, and for swellings, vomits, and purges, &c. with success. By ropes they climb the rocks, in order to get at the fowl and their eggs, which are their principal maintenance.

BORG, or BURG, an old town in Fenmar-isle, belonging to the duchy of Sleswick, in Denmark.

BORGA, a commodious harbour of Sweden. See BORGHOLM.

BORGERHOUT, a village called a liberty, belonging to the territory of Antwerp, and marquise of the Holy Empire, in the Austrian Netherlands.

BOGAR-FIARDUR, a district of the south quarter of Iceland, Norway.

BORGBERG, a ruined borough of Westmanland territory, in Uplandia, Sweden Proper.

BORGENTRYCK, or BORRERICK, a small town in the bishopric of Paderborn.

BORGHETTO, a small place belonging to the duchy of Castro, in the Ecclesiastical State, and middle division of Italy. Also a borough in the western part of the Genoese dominions, on the continent of Upper Italy. It lies on the Mediterranean: and of the same name is likewise a rich abbey in the duchy of Placentia, in Upper Italy.

BORGHOLM, a town with a handsome royal castle, in the north part of the isle of Oelandia, and belonging to East Gothland, in Sweden. It has a fortress which was taken several times by the Danes, but always restored to Sweden. Close by is the commodious and well-situated haven of Bor-ga; and not far off is a royal farm. It lies fifteen miles north-east from Colmar, in lat. 56, 57, N. Long. 18, 10, E.

BORGI

B O

BORGI, a town in the province of Zeb, in Africa. It lies about a league south of Biscara; both which places were seized by the Algerines, in order to have a free passage into the land of slaves, where they make continual irruptions.

BORGIA, a castle of Ancona, a marquiseate belonging to the Ecclesiastical State, in the middle division of Italy.

BORG, a district of Nyland, a subdivision of Finland Proper, in Sweden.

Of the same name, and belonging to it, is a maritime-town, which is very old, situated on the Finnic Gulph, with an indifferent harbour. Here is the seat of a bishop, with a good academy. The inhabitants trade in all sorts of linen-cloth; and it is the 60th town in the general diet. It lies on the eastern bank of a little river opposite to Paling, and 21 miles N. E. of Helsingfors.

BORG, (St. Sepulchro,) a town of Urbino, a duchy belonging to the Ecclesiastical State, in the middle division of Italy. It is situated on the Tuscan frontiers, and near the source of the Tiber. BORJA, (City of) anciently Balfio, a genteel place belonging to Aragon, in Spain, close by the famous Mount Cayo, at the foot of a hill, the neighbourhood abounding particularly with grain, oil, wine, hemp, flax, and all sorts of vegetables; and is well watered. Its walls are adorned with towers, and has a fortress. The inhabitants amount to about 800 families, having three parishes, one of the churches being collegiate, four monasteries, a nunnery, an hospital, and several chapels. It lies 35 miles north-north-west of Saragossa, in lat. 41, 48, N. long. 2, 10, W.

BORIA, a small town of Spain, in the kingdom of Aragon. W. Long. 2, 2. N. Lat. 41, 50.

BORIGUEN, one of the Caribbee islands in N. America, near that of Porto Rico. The English formerly had a settlement there, but were driven away by the Spaniards. It is at present without inhabitants, though agreeable and fertile; the air being wholesome, and the water good. There are a great number of land-crabs, whence some have called it Crab-island. W. Long. 64, 35. N. Lat. 18, 0.

BORISOGLIEBSK, a middling town in the district of Tambow, belonging to the government of Woronesch and Asoph, in the Asiatic part of Russia. It stands on the river Choper.

BORISOW, a town belonging to the circle of Moscow, and government of the latter name, in European Russia.

Of the same name is a small place belonging to the territory and palatinate of Minsk, in Lithuanian Russia. It lies on the river Berezina, is built of wood, but mostly ruined by the Russians; with a regularly fortified castle, round which are deep ditches, a double pallisade, and defended also by a morass.

BORISTHENES, the Latin name of the great river Dnieper; which see.

BORKELOE, a small city belonging to the earldom of Zutphen, in Guelderland; one of the Seven United Provinces. It is situated on the little river Berkel, whence it has its name. Since the contest between the bishop of Munster and the States General, about this place, during which the former took it twice, but restoring it in 1674, the latter have fortified it, and keep a strong garrison there, it being a key into their country. It is situated on the confines of the bishopric of Munster, five miles north-west of Grol, and 11 east of Zutphen.

BORKEN, an old town in the bishopric of Munster, with a collegiate foundation, two cloisters, and a commandery, and ever since 1364, a cloth manufacture.

BORMIO, a county depending on the republic of the Grisons, in Switzerland. It is bounded on the south by the estate of Venice, on the east by the the territory of the house of Austria, and on the south and west by Caddea. It is 15 miles over both ways; and is divided into five communities, viz. the town of Bormio, the valley of Forbia, the Interior valley, the Lower valley, and the valley of Luvinio. Bormio is the only town in this district; and has a governor, called a podeffa, sent by the Grisons to preside in civil and criminal affairs. It is seated at the confluence of the rivers Addo and Malacua; in E. long. 10. 10. N. lat. 46, 45.

Of the same name is a town, by the Germans called Worms. It is a populous place, and governed by a podeffa, sent hither by the Grisons. It is defended by a good castle.

BORMOLA, or BURMULA, an open town belonging to the island of Malta, in the Mediterranean. It consists of between 6 and 700 houses. It lies behind Senglea, and on the other side is inclosed by Citta Nuova Cottonera.

BORNA, a small town of Gestricia, in Nordland, a province of Sweden Proper, about 40 miles north of Gessle or Gevalia.

BORNE, or BOURNE, a small borough of Lincolnshire about 30 miles south of the city of Lincoln. Annual fairs are held here on March 7, May 6, and October 29.

BORNEO, one of the Indian or Sunda islands, in Asia. It is of a circular form, and is thought to be the largest island in the world, next to New Holland; being 2500 miles in circumference. It is seated under the equator, that line cutting it almost through the middle. It abounds with gold; and the finest diamonds of the Indies are found in its rivers, being probably washed down from the hills by its torrents. Here are also mines of iron and tin, and loadstones. Birds nests are to be had in this island which are eatable, and reckoned a great delicacy. The beasts are oxen, buffaloes, deer, goats, elephants, tigers, and monkeys. This island has finer rivers, especially towards the west and south. In their monsoon from April to September, the wind is westerly; and they have continual heavy rains, attended with violent storms of thunder and lightning.

The rainy season continues for eight months of the year; and, as during that time all the flat country near the coast is overflowed, the air is rendered very unhealthy, and the inhabitants are forced to build their houses on floats, which they make fast to trees. The houses have but one floor, with partitions made with cane; and the roofs are covered with palmetto leaves, the eaves of which reach within four or five feet of the bottom. The west and north-east sides of the island are almost desert, and the east is but little known. The inland parts are very mountainous; and the south-east, for many leagues together, is a sinking morass, which being overflowed in the wet season, is very unhealthy.

The Portuguese, who first discovered Borneo, had arrived in the Indies above 30 years before they knew any thing of it more than the name and its situation, by reason of their frequently passing by its coasts. At last one captain Edward Corril had orders to examine it more narrowly; and being once acquainted with the worth of the country, they made frequent voyages thither. They found the coasts inhabited by Malayan Moors, who had certainly established themselves there by conquest; but the original inhabitants still remain in the mountains, and are stiled Beajus, which in the Malayan language signifies a wild man. The most authentic account of these people is the following, which was extracted from the papers of father Antonio Ventimiglia, an Italian missionary. He was sent to Borneo from Macao, on board a Portuguese ship; converted great numbers to Christianity; and died on the island about the year 1691. The Beajus have no kings, but many little chiefs. Some are subject to the Moorish kings, and pay them tribute; but such as live far up the country, are altogether independent, and live according to their own customs. They are generally very superstitious, and much addicted to augury. They do not adore idols; but their sacrifices of sweet wood and perfumes are offered to one God, who, they believe, rewards the just in heaven, and punishes the wicked in hell. They marry but one wife; and look upon any breach of conjugal faith, either in the man or woman, as a capital offence. The Beajus are naturally honest and industrious, and have a brotherly affection for one another. They have a notion of property, which yet does not render them covetous. They sow and cultivate their land; but, in the time of harvest, each reaps as much as will serve his family, and the rest belongs to the tribe in common; by which means they prevent necessity or disputes. With the Moors on the coasts the Portuguese for some time carried on a considerable trade, and at their request settled a factory there; which, however, was afterwards surprised and plundered by the Moors, who put most of the people to the sword. The most considerable river in Borneo is called Banjar, at the mouth of which our East-India company have a factory.

BORNEO, a town of the island of the same name last-mentioned. It stands among fenns, near a great salt-water lake at the north-west corner of the island. On its east side is a deep, safe, and capacious harbour, at the mouth of a great river; but it is not a place of considerable trade, the greatest resort being to the south-east part, subject to the sultan of Caytongee, whose capital is 100 miles up the

the river of Banjar. Though upon the English attempting to build forts on the Banjar coast, they were either murdered or expelled, but they have since been permitted to return and trade here. It lies in lat. 4. 30, N. Long. 111, 30, E.

BORNHEM, a village in the territory of Aloft, belonging to Flanders, in the Austrian Low Countries. It gives title of count to the house of Celoma. It is situated between Dendermonde and Rouelmonde. Here is a Benedictine priory, and convent of English Dominicans, founded in 1670, by father Thomas Howard, duke of Norfolk, afterwards made a cardinal.

BORNHOLM, an island included in the diocese of Seeland, in Denmark. It lies in the Baltic, about sixteen miles from the outermost point of the isle of Seeland, and six from Ystad, belonging to Schonen in Sweden. It extends itself from N. N. E. to S. S. E. is seven miles long, and four broad. It is surrounded by sharp and high rocks, accessible only on the north side, which is defended by good batteries: its inhabitants are ready-witted, mild, polite, industrious, and good mechanics. Their youth are fond of travelling, and to be found often in foreign service. Nor does their country lose by their excursions; for they generally return to enrich the arts and sciences cultivated among themselves, with such experience and knowledge as they have acquired during their absence. The government is compounded of the civil and military powers, and their ecclesiastics are subservient to the bishop of Copenhagen. Among many towns upon this island, Roonne is the most considerable, which has two ports, wherein the largest ships of war had formerly sufficient water; yet at present they scarcely can admit the smallest barks; from whence one has some right to conjecture, that the north seas have, in some ages, undergone a considerable diminution. The same thing is observable with regard to the little port of another town here, called Suanike. Noxoes indeed enjoys the advantage of a good road, and is whimsically situated among rocks. The judge of Bornholm holds the sessions, and the clergy their assembly, at Aakirha, a town nearly in the center of the island. We know not when this island was first peopled; but the inhabitants embraced Christianity, anno 1060. In the following century, Sweno, king of Denmark, having a quarrel with Eschilus, bishop of Lunden, caused him to be hung up to the roof of his cathedral church in a large basket; and here he remained some time. The prelate threatened to be severely revenged of his sovereign for this indignity, and was appeased with a grant of three quarters of this island, which was ratified and confirmed by Waldemar the First. It was afterwards resumed by the crown, on the bishop's misbehaving; who, however, retired to a strong fortress upon the island, where he braved the royal vengeance he had roused. It would be tedious to recount the troubles this grant occasioned: let it suffice, that we say the king absolutely revoked it, annexed Bornholm once more entirely to his crown, then in a pious fit gave it up, and afterwards seized upon it again. After various revolutions, Bornholm fell into the hands of the people of Lubeck, who behaved in it with the most savage cruelty: it then belonged to the chapter of Lunden, and, in 1572, was once more reunited to the crown of Denmark. Having been long the sport of the ambition of their neighbours, the first object sacrificed to kindled animosity, the inhabitants at length began to lose sight of their misfortunes, and enjoy all the sweets of peace; when, in the 16th century, they were three times visited by a most violent pestilential disorder, which swept them off in heaps. This was succeeded by a remarkable earthquake; and the weather was so fever in the year 1635, that the sea was frozen so as admit of travelling upon the ice seven miles round. The Swedes being at war with Denmark, made a descent here, and were several times vigorously repulsed by the inhabitants; who being at length obliged to submit, were treated with great inhumanity, and so excessively taxed, that they unanimously revolted, made one bold effort to shake off their chains, and free themselves from the yoke of tyranny. In 1658, they threw themselves under the protection of the Danes, with whom they have ever since been incorporated. Thus did they confirm the axiom, "that despair may prove as fatal as the most formidable arms to excessive cruelty and ambition." The inhabitants drive a great trade in horses, and other beasts; but their principal source of wealth is, first, having vast plenty of herring and cod, but above all of salmon; the number of which is however diminished by the sea-dogs, who devour only the bodies of the fish, leaving their heads, and infest the particular places where the fishermen fix their lines. The soil of Bornholm is fruitful; but scurvy, epilepsies, fevers, &c. abound here, for the air is not the best. The number of inhabitants seem happily proportioned to its extent and fertility. The eldest daughter inherits here in default of male issue, and she is obliged to portion off the younger children. In a marshy part of this island are found variety of large trees, heaped upon one another to the height of three or four fathoms; and great oaks, with their tops larger than their roots, which are used in joiners work: they also dig up pieces of fir, of a fine blue colour, out of which they make curious utensils for the kitchen. As no firs grow on the island, would it not be curious to enquire how these came hither that are found under foot? Here are some Runick monuments scarcely worth being noticed. At Peers-song there is a marble quarry, wherein are often picked up round flints, containing real diamonds, as good and as valuable, as any that are brought from India. The late queen, Louisa of Denmark, had one of them of a most beautiful water. Their animals differ in nothing from those found in other northern countries; and they have not much game. They are troubled with a dangerous reptile, called the steel-serpent, because its skin shines like polished steel, or indeed rather like crystal. It moves very quick, and being cut in pieces, every piece spontaneously escapes with great celerity. A kind of passage-bird, called raager, appears upon the coast about the end of February; where having hovered for about a month, it ventures to advance farther in-land, and build its nest among the trees, where it multiplies exceedingly: its colour is deep black, and it avoids carrion. The flesh is something like pigeon, but not so delicate: the inhabitants eat of it with great seeming satisfaction. As these birds did much damage to the harvest, by destroying the ripe corn, every peasant was obliged yearly to present the government with a certain number of their heads; but this injunction diminishing their number considerably, it was remitted, and the breed encouraged, it being found, that the serpents and reptiles were infinitely more mischievous to the husbandman; for though birds, reptiles, and insects, fatten upon the common pasture, they prefer the corn as soon as it begins to ripen, and even are so bold as to follow the reaper's steps. Christian-Oe is an island about two leagues distant from Bornholm: it is well defended on the east by five inaccessible rocks. Here is a good harbour, capable of containing 30 vessels, and of protecting them either from the weather, or the attacks of an enemy. The Danish fleet often experience its conveniency, the whole being commanded by a good fortress, erected by Christian V. king of Denmark. E. long. 14, 56. N. lat. 55, 15.

BORNOU, a kingdom or province of Zaara in Africa, extending from 12 to 22 degrees of east longitude, and from 17 to 21 degrees of north latitude. The northern part is poor, and like the rest of the provinces of Zaara: but all the rest is well watered by springs and rivers that tumble down with a dreadful noise from the mountains; rendering the country prolific in corn, grass, and fruits, and giving it a pleasing aspect. The eastern and western frontiers are divided into mountains and valleys, the latter being all covered with flocks of cattle, fields of rice and millet, and many of the mountains with wood, fruit-trees, and cotton. On the north-west stands the mountain of Tarton, having plenty of good iron mines; and on the south flows the river Niger, which, it is said, after running a great many leagues under a long chain of mountains, rears up its head again, and mingles its stream with the waters of the lake Bornou in its course, from whence it washes the walls of the capital of this kingdom. The compilers of the Universal History, however, are of opinion, that in these mountains the river Niger hath its source, because no river hath been traced to the eastward, except the Nile, which runs in a different course from north to south, and the White river, on the western frontiers of Abyssinia, which is a branch of the Nile. The eastern and western parts of Bornou are inhabited by a people of a roving disposition, who live in tents, and have their women, children, and every thing else, in common; the word property, or any idea equivalent to it, being utterly unknown among them. They have neither religion, laws, government, nor any degree of subordination; and hence they have been supposed by Cluverius to be the lineal descendents of the ancient Garamantes; and this to have been the residence of that people. In these parts, the natives are almost to a man shepherds and husbandmen. In summer they go naked, except a short apron before; but in winter they are warmly clothed with the softest sheep-skins, of which they also form their bed-clothes; and indeed this is scarce a sufficient defence against the inclemency of the weather at certain seasons of the year, when a cold piercing wind blows from the northern mountains, that chills the blood in proportion as the pores of the body have been opened by the scorching heats of summer. Baudrand and Draper affirm that the natives are scarce superior in their understanding to brutes; not even having any names whereby to distinguish each other, except what they take from some personal defect or singularity; such as lean, fat, squinting, hump-backed, &c. In the towns, however, it is acknowledged that they are something more civilized and polite, being many of them merchants; but of these towns, or indeed of the kingdom in general, very little is known.

BOROA. The coast (between Swaleba point to Rio Gabon, of South Guinea) from the mouth of the river Camerones runs south by east to Rio de Boroa, or Borro, about 10 leagues, in which space the Borba cuts it through, falling into the gulph much nearer to Camerones than to Borba.

BORNOS, a small town of Andalusia, in Spain. It lies in a pleasant plain, abounding with grain, fruit, and oil, being inclosed by high, barren mountains.

BOROMEAN ISLANDS, in the Lago Maggiore, or Great Lake, and duchy of Milan, in Upper Italy. Of these there are a great many small ones, mostly belonging to the Boromeo family.

BORONDON, (St.) an island in the Atlantic ocean, mentioned by some writers, particularly Linschotten,

B O

Linschotten, in their descriptions of the Canary islands, as something supernatural. It is said to be about 100 leagues distant from Ferro, probably west, though no writer has pretended to lay down its exact situation. Here it is affirmed several ships have touched by accident, and all agree in their relations of the state of the inhabitants and the island. They affirm, that it is perpetually clothed with a great variety of wood, chiefly fruit-trees; that the vallies are in a perpetual state of verdure; and continually decked with flowers, grafs, and plants, the spontaneous productions of the earth, or with corn and pulse, cultivated with great care by the inhabitants; that the soil is so prolific as to raise large quantities of corn for exportation; and that the ships that call here never fail of meeting with refreshments of every kind. It is said to be peopled by Christians, who have a language of their own, apparently combined of a variety of modern languages; for, say they, whoever understands the European tongues may make shift to hold conversation with this people. It is remarkable, that no ships expressly sent upon this discovery, were ever fortunate enough to fall in with the island of St. Borondon, though the Spaniards have several times attempted it from the Canaries. Hence it has been called the marvellous island; and hence indeed we may conclude, either that it exists wholly in imagination, or at least that it is surrounded with such currents as insensibly carry ships out of their course, and prevent their meeting with it. Some writers affirm that it actually disappears upon certain occasions, and shifts its position; while others, with more appearance of truth, alledge, that it is frequently overcast with thick and impenetrable clouds, which occasions the disappointment of all the adventurers who have gone in search of it.

BORRISTOWN. See BOROUGHSTUNESS.

BOROS-JENO, a fortress which was formerly built against the Turks, in the county of Zarand, and Circle on the farther side of the Theiss, in Upper Hungary; but it is at present an open town, and well known for its excellent wine.

BOROSTYAN, a castle on a high mountain, at the foot of which is a town on the river Pinka, belonging to the county of Eisenburg, in the Circle on the further side of the Danube, in Lower Hungary.

BOROSTYANKO, a castle on the further side of the district, beginning at the Carpathian mountains in the county of Presburg, and Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It stands on a steep rock of the aforesaid mountains.

BOROUGHBRIDGE, or, as it is commonly pronounced by the country-people, BOROWBRIGG, i. e. the Borough at the Bridge, a town, governed by a bailiff, in the center of Yorkshire, and on the skirts of the north and west riding. It sends two members to parliament, and seems to have risen out of Aldborough, i. e. the Old-borough, adjacent. See ALDBOROUGH.

On the left hand, on going through it, are three large pyramidal stones in the fields, which are vulgarly called the devil's arrows. This town stands on the Eure, over which is a bridge of four or five arches, each 40 feet wide, the ends being continued with high causeways of stone. At this bridge king Edward II. defeated his barons in 1322, and afterwards ensued the execution of the earl of Lancaster, &c. at Pontefract. Its weekly market is on Saturday; and its annual fairs on April 27 for horned cattle, June 22 holds a week; also on October 23. It lies about three miles from Rippon, 15 N. W. of York, and 170 N. of London.

BOROUGH-HILL, a place near Aldborough, in Yorkshire, where a tessellated pavement and several other Roman antiquities have been discovered; and a temple is supposed to have stood here.

BOROUGHSTOWNNESS, a town of West Lothian, or Linlithgow in the Southern Division of Scotland. It is a long straggling town of one street, extending along the shore of the frith of Forth, and next to Leith, carries on the greatest trade to Holland and France of any place in the kingdom. For repairing its harbour, an act of parliament passed. It lies west of Blackness castle.

BOROWICZ, a town belonging to the palatinate of Kiow, a subdivision of Little Poland. It lies on the river Neiper, where, in the year 1638, the Cossacks were surrounded by the Poles, and obliged to deliver up their general, Paolucco, with four of their superior officers.

BORRESYSEL, anciently Wingulmark, a district belonging to the diocese of Christiania, in Norway; it has its name from the seat or castle of Borre, which was entirely swallowed up in the year 1703, after the waters of the cataract of Sarpen had undermined it, so that at present here is nothing but a deep hole, full of sand and rubbish. This province has good arable land, in which oats grow best, and in the greatest quantity, the ground lying low and wet. Upon the sea coast near Follo, the inhabitants draw a good maintenance from timber, which is carried to the lading places, where it pays duty; also at Krogstad, Drobach, Holen, Zoen, Huidsteen, and other parts. Its fresh waters are Manfoefjord, Rodenas, Temefjord, and Storely, which afterwards fall into the Sarpen, forming one of the largest water-falls in the country.

The whole province is in general divided into Upper and Lower Borresyssel; which again consists of several bailiwicks; 1. Racheftad, Heggan, and Froland;

B O

Froland; 2. Ide and Marcher; 3. Moofs, Oufoe, Thune, and Wemble; and 4. Follo. With regard to its ecclesiastical government, the whole contains three probsteys or priories, namely, the upper, middle, and lower probsteys of Borrefysfel. To the first belong 18 churches, to the second 13, and to the third 25. In Upper Borrefysfel are no remarkable places; but in the Lower are several.

BORSALO, a kingdom of New Guinea, reaches from that of Juala to the edge of the river Gambia, along the coast, and far east up the inland, being much larger than those of Juala or Ale. Some take Borsalo as well as Juala to be part of the people called Barbecins, mentioned by Marmol.

BORSCH, a ruinous little town belonging to the chapter of Straßburg, in Lower Alsace, and government of the latter name, now subject to France.

BORSOD, a borough, formerly fortified in the ancient taste; but after its fortifications were demolished, it became an open small town, giving name to its county, which lies in the Hither Circle of the Theifs, and belongs to Upper Hungary.

BORSPACH, a small place belonging to the lordship of Lutzelstein, in the government of Alsace, now subject to France.

BORTH, a place in Carnarvonshire, in North Wales, where two annual fairs are kept, on August 26, and October 24, for cattle.

BORVE, a medicinal spring in the Harries, one of the Western Isles of Scotland, good against the cholic and gravel.

BORWE, one of the two places of greatest note in Strathnavern, the most N. W. part of the main land of Scotland.

BORYGLIA, a town of Caria, a province of Asia Minor, anciently famous for a temple of Diana, some noble remains of which are still to be seen. It stood near the sea coast, at the entrance of the Doric gulph or Jasie bay, about 35 miles S. W. of Miletum, and 40 S. of Heraclea.

BORZELAND, or WURTZELAND; so called from an herb which it bears in its arms. It is one of the districts of that denominated the Royal Territory of the Saxons, a subdivision of Transylvania, in the kingdom of Hungary. It lies east of the Moldavian confines.

BOSA, anciently Bos, a small episcopal city of Cape Lugatori or Saffari, comprehending the Northern Division of the island of Sardinia, in Upper Italy. It is situated on the west coast, with a harbour defended by fort Saravalle, near the mouth of a small river of the same name. The fee is under that of Saffari, and the place is but thinly peopled. It lies 32 miles north of Orastagni. Lat. 40, 15 N. Long. 8, 30, E.

BOSCASTLE, a large village of Cornwall. Here two annual fairs are held, on August 5, and November 22.

BOSCAWEN, anciently BISCAY-WOANE, a parish near the Land's-end, in Cornwall. At this place are 19 stones set up in a circle, each about 12 feet asunder, and supposed to be a sepulchral monument of the Britons.

BOSCO, an abbey in the territory of Alesandrino, formerly part of the duchy of Milan, in Upper Italy, now belonging to the duke of Savoy.

BOSCO, or BOSCHI, a town of Italy, in the Milanese, seated on the river Orbe, five miles east of Alessandria, and north-east of Aquì. Long. 9, 44, E. Lat. 44, 53, N.

BOSCOBEL-HOUSE, a seat of the Pendlils, in the east part of Shropshire, next to Staffordshire, famous for giving shelter to king Charles II. after his defeat at Worcester, having been hid in a little cavity in the garret. About a gun shot from it is the royal oak, into which the king and colonel Carlos climbed by the hen-roost ladder, and so escaped from a party of horse sent to search the house, and who rode just by the oak whilst they were there.

BÖSEN, a large village in the capital bailiwick of Rheim, belonging to the circle of Sehest, in the kingdom of Prussia. It is situated on the lake of Sallen.

BOSHARTSTON-MEER, a pool or lake on the coast of Pembrokehire, in South Wales, near Stackpool-Bosher, which could never be fathomed. It foams before a storm; and the noise of its agitation is heard a great way off, and is supposed to have a subterraneous communication with the sea.

BOSNA, a navigable river of Turkish Illyrium, in Europe.

BOSNA-SARAJA, or simply SARAJA, a frontier town in the Sangiacate of Sarali, a subdivision of Bosnia, belonging to Turkish Illyrium, in Europe. It is a famous trading town on the river Bosna, which was burnt by the Hungarians in 1697. It lies 120 miles S. W. of Belgrade. Lat. 44, 10, N. Long. 19, 5, E.

BOSNIA, also RAMA, both from rivers of the same name, the river Bósna running through part of it, and falling into the Save; if it has not the former denomination from its ancient inhabitants the Bósseni. It is a province of Turkish Illyrium, in Europe. Towards the north it is divided from Slavonia by the river Save; on the east from Servia by the Orino; on the south by the mountains of Dalmatia; and on the west from Croatia by the river Verbas. It is upwards of 200 English miles in length, and 75 in breadth. This was anciently that part of Panonia, called Inferior, or Secunda Conularis. In time it became part of Hungary; and and for near two centuries had kings of its own, till 965, when Mahoment II. having taken Stephen V. the last sovereign, had him flead alive, and made Bosnia the government of a Beglerberg, who has three sangiacs under him; namely, Banialuck, Orback, and Sarati. The air here is sharp, but the soil yields some corn; and in it are some gold and silver mines. It is otherwise subdivided into Upper Bosnia, towards the south or duchy of St. Saba, or Hersegovina, confining on Dalmatia; and Lower Bosnia, or Bosnia Proper, on the Save. It is a frontier country of Christendom; that part east of the Unna, belonging to the Turks, and the other west of that river, to the house of Austria.

BOSPHORUS THRACICUS, the Latin name of the Hellespont Gallipoli, or Dardanelles; a narrow strait dividing Europe from Asia, so called because oxen could swim over it; and from the resemblance between it and the straits of Kassa, these last were anciently called the Cimmerian, and the former the Thracian Bosphorus. This strait, which is the communication between the Black Sea and that of Marmora, is about 20 miles in length, and a mile and a quarter in breadth where it is narrowest. The Turks have built two castles over against each other to defend the passage. The country about it is very pleasant: on one side stands Constantinople, and on the other Scutari, where the Grand Signior has a palace, and is looked upon as a suburb to Constantinople. The entrance of this strait is dangerous, and sometimes fatal to vessels.

BOSRA, or BUSSEIRITH, an ancient city of Arabia Petraea, in Asia. It was situated on the midland, on the back of Palestine, on the other side Jorday, and about 150 miles from the lake or sea of Galilee. In the Christian times it was a metropolitan see, and is now that of a Greek archbishop, and the seat of a beglerberg of this district. It is now much decayed.

BOSSINEY, (Cornwall), 3 miles N. W. from Camelford, on the N. coast, near king Arthur's castle, is 243 miles from London, commonly called Tintagel, as well as Trevena, is situated partly on an isthmus, and partly on an island, which in ancient times was joined by a bridge to the main land. Near it are the splendid ruins of a castle, said to have been the birth-place of king Arthur, and the seats of the dukes of Cornwall, in the time of the Britons. The castle, manor, and borough was settled by Edward III. on his son, the Black Prince, when he created him duke of Cornwall, and his heirs, the princes of the blood, for ever; and so it is become a parcel of that duchy; and as such is held by the corporation, which is governed by a mayor. It first returned members to parliament in the reign of Edward VI. It has fairs, August 5, and November 22.

BOSSUPT, a town of Brabant, a province of the Austrian Low Countries. It lies 8 miles S. of Louvain, in Lat. 50, 52, N. Long. 4, 30, E.

BOST, a very strong town of Persia, and capital of the province of Zablestan. E. Long. 64, 15. N. Lat. 31, 50.

BOSTON, Lincolnshire, 120 miles from London, is an abbreviation of Botolph's town, from Botolph, a Saxon, who had a monastery here, and is supposed to have been its founder. It is built on the river Witham, which is navigable from Lincoln, and having passed under a high wooden bridge here, soon falls into the sea. About the latter end of the reign of Henry I. it was set on fire by a gang of rogues, who came to its fair in the disguise of monks and priests; but soon recovered, and became a staple for wool, by which it was much enriched, and the merchants of the Hans-towns came and fixed their guild here. It has long been a famous flourishing town, is pleasant and well built, and has considerable merchants for foreign trade, besides a good inland trade, and others of the inhabitants apply much to grazing. It has markets on Wednesday and Saturday, and besides its fairs on the 4th of May, and July 11, has one on the 11th of December that holds 9 days, for cattle and all merchandize; and is called a mart, which is an ancient name, only used for this town and Gainborough in Lincolnshire, for Lynn-Regis in Norfolk, and for Beverley and Heydon in Yorkshire. It is reckoned the largest parochial church, without crosses, in the universe, being 300 feet long within the walls, and 100 feet wide. It is cieled with English oak, supported by tall slender pillars. It has 365 steps, 52 windows, and 12 pillars, answerable to the days, weeks, and months of the year. Its tower, which was begun to be built in 1309, is 282 feet high. It has a beautiful octagon lanthorn at the top, which is the guide of mariners as they enter the dangerous channe's of Lynn and Boston deeps, as well as the wonder of travellers, who see it 40 miles round.

Henry VIII. is said to have first incorporated this town, and queen Elizabeth gave the corporation a court of admiralty over all the neighbouring sea-coasts. It is governed by a mayor, who is chief clerk of the market and admiral, a recorder, deputy-recorder, 12 aldermen, a town-clerk, 18 common-council, a judge and marshal of the admiralty, a coroner, 2 serjeants at mace, &c. It has a commodious, well-frequented haven. It had formerly, besides St. Botolph's monastery, a priory, 4 frieries, and 3 colleges, whose lands Henry VIII. gave to the town, and it has now two charity-schools. The town is supplied with fresh water by pipes, from a pond in the great common, called the Westfen, where a water-house and mill were erected in the reign of queen Anne, by act of parliament. All the neighbouring county is marsh-lands, which are very rich, and feed vast numbers of large sheep and oxen.

BOSTON, lately a very noted and opulent trading town, the metropolis of New-England, in North-America, in the county of Suffolk, till the town was proscribed, and port removed by the English parliament, April 4, 1774, for refusing a tax on tea, which they destroyed in 1774. The king's forces in a great measure defaced the town, by pulling down several buildings to supply themselves with firing during the late contests; before which it was the largest and most considerable city of all the British empire in America; and was built the latter end of the year 1630, by a part of a colony which removed hither from Charles-town, and stands upon a peninsula of about 4 miles in circumference, within 44 miles of the bottom of Massachusetts-bay. It was greatly damaged by an earthquake, on October 29, 1727. It is the most advantageously situated for trade of any place in North-America; on the north side are a dozen small islands, called the Brewsters, one of which is called Noddle's-island. The only safe way for entrance into the harbour is by a channel so narrow, as well as full of islands, that three ships can scarce pass in a-breast; but there are proper marks to guide them into the fair way; and within the harbour there is room enough for 500 ships to lie at anchor in a good depth of water, where they were covered by the cannon of a regular and very strong fortress, now in ruins. At the bottom of the bay is a very noble pier, near 2000 feet in length, along which on the north side extended a row of warehouses. The head of this pier joins the principal street in the town, which is, like most of the others, spacious and well built. The town had a fine and striking appearance at entering, as it lies at the very bottom of the bay, like an amphitheatre. It has a town-house, where the courts met, and the exchange kept, large, and of a tolerable taste of architecture. Round the exchange are a great number of booksellers shops, which, till lately, found employment for 5 printing-presses.

There are 19 places of worship, three only of which are episcopal, and seven are for dissenters, which are lofty and elegant, with towers and spires: and it contained about 6000 houses, and at least 30,000 inhabitants. That we may be enabled to form some judgment of the wealth of this city, we must observe, that from Christmas, 1747, to Christmas, 1748, 500 vessels cleared out from this port only for a foreign trade, and 430 were entered inwards; to say nothing of coasting and fishing vessels, both of which were numerous to an uncommon degree, and not less than 1000. It received damage by a fire to the amount of 300,000l. March 20, 1760; and by a terrible storm in August 1773. Indeed the trade of New-England was great, as it supplied a vast quantity of goods from within itself; but was yet greater, as the people in this country were in a manner the carriers for all the colonies in North-America and the West-Indies; and even many parts of Europe. The home commodities were principally masts and yards, for which they contracted largely with the royal navy; also pitch, tar, and turpentine; staves, lumber, and boards; all sorts of provisions, beef, pork, butter, and cheese, in vast quantities; horses, and live cattle; Indian corn and pease; cider, apples, hemp, and flax. Their peltry or fur trade was not so considerable. They had a noble cod fishery upon the coast, affording employment for a vast number of their people; they were enabled by this branch to export annually above 30,000 quintals of choice cod-fish to Spain, Italy, the British islands, Great-Britain, the Mediterranean, &c. and about 20,000 quintals of the refuse sort to the West-Indies, for the negroes.

The great quantity of spirits which they distilled in Boston from the molasses, received in return from the West-Indies, was as surprizing as the cheap rate they vend it at, which was under two shillings a gallon. With this they supplied almost all the consumption of our colonies in North-America, the Indian trade there, the vast demands of their own and the Newfoundland fishery, and in a great measure those of the African trade. But they were more famous for the quantity and cheapness than excellency of their rum. They were almost the only one of our colonies which nearly supplied themselves with woollen and linen manufactures. Their woollen cloths were strong, close, but coarse and stubborn. As to their linens, that manufacture was brought from the north of Ireland by some presbyterian artificers, driven thence by the severity of their landlords, or rather the master workmen and employers; and from an affinity of religious sentiments they chose New-England for their retreat. As they brought with them a fund of riches in their skill of the linen manufactures, they met with very great encouragement, and exercised their trade to the great advantage of the colony. They made large quantities; and of a very good kind; their principal settlement was in a town, which, in compliment to them, is called Londonderry.

Hats were made in New-England, and which, in a clandestine way, found vent in all the other colonies.

There was a light-house erected on a rock for the shipping, but it was lately destroyed, as were the fortifications. On March 17, 1776, the king's troops quitted the town, which was immediately repossessed by the Provincials, who put it again into into a posture of defence, by repairing a great part of its fortifications. The government was directed by a governor, a general-court, and assembly, to which this city sent four members. The independent religion was the most numerous, and the professors said to be 14,000; and out of 19 places of worship, six were for this profession. Lat. 42, 25. Long. 71, 10.

BOSWORTH, an old market-town of Leicestershire, on a hill, situated in a fruitful soil. About three miles off is Red-moor, a plain where the decisive battle between Richard III. of the house of York, and Henry VII. of that of Lancaster, was fought in the year 1486, in favour of the latter. Richard was slain, and in him the contest between the white and red roses terminated, which from its beginning had cost this nation above 200,000 lives. This is called Market-Bosworth, to distinguish it from another in Gartery hundred. Its weekly market is every Wednesday: and its annual fairs are held on May 8 and July 10. This lies eleven miles south-west of Leicester-town, and north-west of London.

BOT, a village of Mellin, a province of Negroland, in Africa. It lies near the mouth of the river Gefves, where most of the traders buy rice, which is in great plenty here, and very good.

BOTAO, a small place in the district of Coimbra, belonging to the province of Beira, in Portugal. It contains about 550 inhabitants.

BOTEÄ, a parish of Angermanland, a subdivision of Nordland, in Sweden.

BOTAMAR, or BOTMAR, a town of Luenenburgh-Zell, belonging to the elector of Hanover, in Germany.

BOTHNIA, (East) or Ostro-Bothnia, a subdivision of Finland, in Sweden; it lies high towards the north, and so called, as situated on the east side of the Bothnic gulph. To reckon, according to the road by land, it is above 723 English miles in length, and 280 in breadth; others reckon the former only 462, and the latter but 84. Nature has divided it from the adjacent countries by mountains that extend themselves along the east-side. From these arise several rivers, which partly fall into the White sea, and partly into the Bothnic and Finnic gulphs. The land is level for the most part, especially in the southern parts, towards the sea-coast, and in some other places; but at the same time full of morasses. Agriculture is followed here to great advantage, for which reason this country can supply other places with corn: yet sometimes the cold does a little damage. The inhabitants frequently make use of the Swedish land, as it is called; yet still vast tracks remain unoccupied. Here one meets with great numbers of forests, lakes, and rivers, abounding with fish; it has also a good salmon-fishery. In some rivers they fish likewise for pearls, among which there are some near as large as swallow eggs. Here are some iron works, with flattening mills. Towards the sea side lie large and spacious craggs. The inhabitants on the coast speak Swedish, but the others Finnish. They trade in timber, boards, tar, and train oil; also cattle, salmon, butter, and other provisions. Their principal maintenance they have from husbandry, breeding of cattle, burning of lime, bricks, and tar (of which last article is made about 50,000 tons; and this quantity requires about 3,200,000 fir trees) hunting and fishing; as also the sea-dog fishery, building of ships, and the profits or lopping of the woods. In the parishes of Carleby and Cronoby they build ships. In the whole country is no more than 19 Finnish and 9 Swedish parishes.

The number of its inhabitants is reckoned at 80,000. Ostro-Bothnia maintains a whole regiment of foot; but instead of soldiers some parishes furnish ship carpenters for the royal navy at Carlscroon. The clergy belong to the bishopric of Abo.

The country is divided into three fiefs or parts, which together are under one territorial governor. These are Cajana, lying on the north; Uleaborg, which is divided into north and south districts, and Korsholm, also divided in like manner.

BOTHNIA, (West,) or WESTRO-BOTHNIA, a subdivision of Nordland, in Sweden, so called, as lying on the west side of the gulph of Bothnia. The parts inhabited of this country is reckoned to be in length, from the confines of Angermanland to the church of Upper Tornea, about 406 English miles, and between 112 and 126 in breadth. Near the sea shore are several pleasant islands. The country abounds with woods, lakes, and rivers. The largest forests border on Lampmark. Its pastures are fine; but on the high mountains is mostly rein-deer moss.

The land is level, and its soil fruitful; and though the seed be sown late, yet it ripens between six, seven, and eight weeks, according as the land lies more or less to the north. Here the cold frequently causes considerable damage, particularly the hoarfrosty nights, in the month of July. Here are several good copper and iron mines. The inhabitants have gained themselves the reputation of bravery. They get their maintenance from agriculture, breeding of good cattle, hunting and fishing. They can bear hunger better than the people of other countries; for they are accustomed from their youth, even in fruitful years, to mix pure corn with the refuse, and pine bark ground for the purpose: and for this reason they call their bread stampe-brot. They trade in timber, deals, and oak boards, tar, salted and smoked salmons, with other kinds of fish treated in the same manner, and pikes dried in the sun; as also in feathers, bread, cummin, train oil of sea dogs, wild game, tallow, butter, and cheese; in like manner they trade in various peltry, as the skins of black, blue, and white foxes, ermines, bears, and wolves, with other rough hides, otter and beaver skins, castor, linen cloth, and rein-deer hides; all which are imported, not only into Sweden, but carried over the mountains and barren wastes into Russia and Norway. The country maintains a regiment of soldiers; it is divided into four parts or bailiwics, under one territorial governor, to whom the Lampmarks are also subject. It has two juridical districts, or courts of justice, and the clergy are under the bishop of Hernosund.

BOTHWELL, a village of Lanerksire, in the South Division of Scotland, about two miles and a half from Hamilton, on the other side of the river Clyde.

Over the Clyde is a bridge, noted for the defeat of a body of undisciplined and unheaded Presbyterians, by the duke of Monmouth, in the year 1679, commonly known by the name of Bothwell-brigg; many thousands of which were afterwards hanged, imprisoned, or transported to the plantations, by king Charles II.

BOTLEIGH, in Hampshire. Here annual fairs are kept on Shrove-Tuesday, Whitsun-Tuesday, Tuesday before St. Bartholemew, and August 24.

BOTRYS, now Patron and Elpatron, an ancient town of Phœnice, a province of Asiatic Turkey, on the Mediterranean, between Tripoli to the north, and Byblus to the south. It lies near the head-land of Peniel, now called Capo Pagro. Here, except the ruins of several churches and monasteries, are now only a few cots of fishermen.

BOTSAND, BAATSENDAR, a trading place and fish-haven of Gulbringu-district, in the south quarter of Iceland.

BOTSDALE, or BOTTISDALE, a long mean built thoroughfare town of Suffolk, it has a grammar free-school. Here is a market every Thursday, and a fair on Holy Thursday.

BOTTSACK, a dangerous place on the east side of the isle of Samsoe in Kullundborg bailiwick, and diocese of Seeland, in Denmark.

BOTWAR, a town of Wurtemberg, and Circle of Suabia, in Germany. It lies 15 miles south of Hailbron, and is subject to the duke of Wirtemberg. Lat. 49. 2, N. Long. 9. 15, E.

BOTZA, a mountain town of the eastern district, in the country of Liptau and Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It lies in a deep valley, and consists of three parts; namely, Upper Botza, Lower Botza, or Joachimsthal, and Bobrow. The country round it is partly royal, and partly a noble demesne. Its mineral waters are of great virtue. The gold mines here yield indeed fine metal, though it is but in an indifferent condition. The Urburarii, as they are called, who are at all the expence of the working it, and to whom it belongs, pay the king, and the noblemen whose property it is, only a certain duty.

BOTZENBURG, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Mecklenburgh. It had a castle, which was destroyed by the Danes in 1202. It is seated on the Elbe, and the vessels that pass by are obliged to pay a considerable toll. E. long. 10, 48. N. lat. 53. 34.

BOVA, a small episcopal city of the Further Calabria, and utmost verge of the kingdom of Naples, and all Italy. It has the title of a county, and stands on the southern coast, upon a hill, surrounded with craggy rocks. Its see is under the archbishop of Reggio, who is also temporal lord of it: and it lies twenty miles south-east of the city of that name. Lat. 38, 20, N. Long. 16, 15, E.

BOUCACHARD, BOURG-ACHARD, a large village of Roumois, one of the subdivisions of Upper Normandy, in the government of the latter name, in France. Here is a collegiate church.

BOUCAS, a district of Porto, in the province Entre Douro e Minho, belonging to Portugal. It includes eight parishes.

BOUCHAIN, in Latin Buccinium, the capital of the district of Ostervant, in Hainault, belonging to the government of French Flanders. It is a small fortified city, which is divided by the Scheld into the Upper and Lower town. Here are sluices, by which the ditches may be filled. The French took it in 1676, after six days siege. The duke of Marlborough took it in 1711; but after the battle of Denian, it was retaken by the French, who still possess it. It is situated seven miles north of Cambray. Lat. 50, 30, N. Long. 3, 15, E.

BOUCHART, a town of Touraine, in France, situated in a small island, formed by the river Vienne, 15 miles from Tours.

BOUCLANS, a large village belonging to the bailiwick of Amont, in the Franche-Comte, one of the governments of France.

BOUCONVILLE, a castellany belonging to Barois, that was not alienated from France, in the government of Lorain and Bar, now subject to that crown. It has its seat in the small town of the same name, which is situated on the little river Mail. To it belong the lordships of Trognon and Thiaucourt.

BOUCRE, a village of one of the 24 out-parishes belonging to the jurisdiction of Calais, in the government of Picardy and Artois, in France.

BOUDRY, a small town of Switzerland, in the province of Neuchâtel, and capital of a chatelainry of the same name. E. long. 7, 5. N. lat. 47, 19.

BOVENSE, a mean village in the bailiwick of Rugaard, a subdivision of the bishopric of Funen, in in Denmark. Its inhabitants have some little trade with Norway. At this place, and in the neighbourhood called Norre Sletting, they make bedding; and they cultivate here great quantities of the Danish cummin-feed. From hence is a ferry of two miles to Klacking in Jutland.

BOVEY-TRACEY, a place in Devonshire, where two annual fairs are kept, on Holy Thursday, and July 7.

BOVENTE, a small town on the island of Funen, with a manufacture of blankets and rugs, and some trade to Norway.

BOUFLERS, or CAGNY, a small place of Beauvaisis, a subdivision belonging to the third sub-stadtholdership, in the government of the Isle of France. It is a dukedom and peerage under the first name. Here is a castle or seat, and a brass statue of Lewis XIV.

BOUGHTON, a noble seat of the late duke of Montague, in Northamptonshire, built after a model of the French king's palace at Versailles, with fine paintings, gardens, and a park, all in beautiful order, though the road near it is very dirty. At the village of this name is kept an annual fair on June 24.

BOUILLE, (La,) a large village of Roumois, a subdivision of Upper Normandy, in the government of the latter name, belonging to France. Here is a salt granary, and a manufacture of cloth.

BOUILLON, (duchy of,) a part of the county of Ardenne; which, by the peace of the Pyrennees in 1659, was ceded to France. It lies contiguous to the principality of Sedan, and north of it, being inclosed within the duchy of Luxemburg, near the confines of Champagne, Hainault, and Condros, a province of Liege. It is now comprehended in the government of Metz, belonging to France. The dukes of Bouillon had tedious contests with the bishops of Liege about it, which last had been long in possession of it, and had purchased it; but Lewis XIV. of France, having taken the city of Bouillon in 1676, restored it two years afterwards to the duke of Bouillon, his great chamberlain.

BOUILLON, in Latin Bullio, the capital of the last-mentioned duchy of the same name, is situated on a rock on the river Semois. It is a fortified town; and on the steepest eminence of the rock is also a strong castle, which the French king keeps in his own hands. It lies 10 miles north-east of Sedan; in lat. 45. 55. N. Long. 5. 7. E.

BOUIN, (isle of,) belonging for the most part to the bishopric of Nantes, a subdivision of Upper Brittany, in the government of the latter name in France.

BOVINES, a small city of Namur, a province of the Austrian Low Countries, situated on the Maes: and very nearly opposite to Dinant. Here is one parochial church and two convents. Lat. 50, 20, N. Long. 4, 50, E.

BOVINO, a small episcopal city of the Capitanate, one of the provinces of the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy. It is situated at the foot of the Appenine mountains, near the Cervaro, and gives title of duke. Near this place the Spaniards were beaten by the Imperialists in 1734. It lies 60 miles east of Naples city. Lat. 41, 2, N. Long. 16, 15, E.

BOULAM, (Island) in the kingdom of Melli, Negroland, Africa, lies at the mouth of Rio Grande, which by means hereof divides itself into two branches. It is between eight and ten leagues long from east to west, about five broad, from north to south, and between 25 and 30 in circumference. It is surrounded with woods, beyond which the country is very fine, and well cultivated by the negroes of the Bissago islands, who come hither to sow millet, rice, and other grain, and return home after harvest. Here are many considerable rivulets, which constantly run in the driest season.

BOULAI, or BOLSHEN, a small place belonging to the German bailiwick of Lorain, in the government of the latter name and Bar, now subject to France. It is the seat of a castleward.

BOULM, a petty kingdom in the territory of Sierra Leona, on the coast of South Guinea. The Portuguese missionaries formerly made some converts here, among whom the king himself, and they continue to make more from time to time. Boulm signifies low land.

BOULENE, a small town in the jurisdiction of Carpentras, and county of Venassim, in the government of Provence, in France. Here is the seat of a provincial judge.

BOULOGNE, anciently Gesoriacum, afterwards Bononia, a maritime town of Boulonois, in the government of Picardy and Artois, in France. It is situated on the English channel, near the mouth of the little river Laine, with a harbour, the entrance of which is very difficult, and defended by a small fort on the site of an ancient tower, called Tour d'Ordre, which was originally a light-house built by the Romans under Caligula, when that emperor was at Boulogne, and pretended to make preparations for sailing with his fleet to Britain. It was repaired by Charles the Great, and afterwards in 1545 by the English. The rock on which the tower was built being at last undermined by the sea, they both fell down on July 29, 1644. The edifice was worthy of the Roman grandeur, and its description will not be unseasonable. It was built in the form of an octagon; each of its sides was near 27 feet in length, the whole circumference being 214, and its diagonal almost 39. It had 12 entabllements or galleries, all visible on the outside, except cept the lowest, which was covered by the fort the English had built round it. Each entablement was taken off the breadth of the wall below it, and formed a kind of gallery of a foot and a half in breadth. By this means it decreased gradually as other light-houses do, to the top, on which a fire was lighted every night to direct the ships which sailed into the channel. The layers of stone and brick with which it was built, were varied in such a manner, with a certain mixture of colour, that it rendered the aspect of the whole very agreeable. First were to be seen three layers of such stones as are to be found on that coast, of an iron-coloured grey: next, two layers of a yellowish and softer stones; over them, two rows of brick very red and hard, each being two inches thick, a little more than a foot long, and something more than half a foot broad. This order continued throughout the building, which must have been at least 160 feet high.

A light house on the same spot would be exceedingly useful to navigators of all nations who come up the channel. The Duc de Praslin, convinced of all the advantages of a Pharos in this place, had adopted the scheme of rebuilding the Roman tower on the Roman plan.

Ships of war can come no farther than the road of St. Jean, and cannot keep there unless the wind blows from some point between the north and south east, and merchantmen can enter the harbour only with the tide. This town is the seat of a provincial government, bailiwick, provostship, admiralty, marshalsea, forest-court, and governor. The harbour of Boulogne is dry at low water, and almost barred by a sand bank which lies north-east and south-west. Over the north-east end of it there is a Buoy, and at the south-west extremity a mast is erected, having a lantern on its top. This bank may be passed on two sides, that is, by the north and by the south, in two and a half or three fathoms water. The tides in this port are S. S. E. and N. N. W. the flood is N. and N. N. E. and the ebb S. and S. W.

It is divided into the Upper and Lower town, about 100 paces asunder: the latter is larger and better built than the former; is mostly inhabited by trading people and merchants, and has only one parish. The Upper town is small, but in it is the cathedral, and judges palace or court-house. Here also is a seminary, a college, a convent, an hospital, and some houses of religious orders. Its bishop is a suffragan to the metropolitan of Rheims, has a diocese of 277 parishes, 147 chapels of ease, and a yearly revenue of 12,000 livres: his tax to the court of Rome is rated at 1500 florins. Some hundred paces from hence is a mineral spring that tastes of iron, for which reason it is called La Fountain de Fer. Godfrey of Boulogne, and his brother Baldwin, kings of Jerusalem, were descended from the counts of Boulogne; though Moll says, that the former was duke of Bouillon. Henry VIII. of England, took it, but it was restored for 300,000 crowns. It lies about 16 miles south-west of Calais, 130 north of Paris, and about 21 from the nearest coast of England. Lat. 50, 43, N. Long. 1, 42, E.

BOULOGNE, a barony belonging to the provincial states. It lies in Lower Vivarais, and diocese of Viviers, in Lower Languedoc, a subdivision of the government of the latter name, in France.

BOULON, a bourg in the vigourie of Perpignan, and county of Rouffillon, belonging to the government of the latter name, in France.

BOULONOIS, a subdivision of Picardy, in France; this and the reconquered land constitute an under-stadtholdership. The former is a particular government of itself, and not under the general governor of Picardy. It extends from the river Canche, as far as the borders of Flanders, having been formerly a part of the ancient county of this name. It had counts of its own, one of whom exchanged it for that of Lauraguais, in Languedoc; upon which Lewis XI. of France gave it for ever as a fief to the church of the Virgin Mary, at Boulogne, of which that crown still holds it, presenting at every accession a gold heart, worth about 6000 livres, in token of homage: a custom observed by the French kings to this day.

BOURBON, (so called by the French), or MACARIN, or MASCARENNAH's Isle; an African island in the Indian ocean, almost under the southern tropic, to the east of Madagascar, from which it is distant about 80 leagues. It does not seem that the ancients had any knowledge of this island, and no inhabitants were found in it, when the Portuguese discovered it. They gave it the name of Mascarenhas from their chief, and the common people keep that name still, in calling its inhabitants Macarins. This island was not properly begun to be settled before the year 1654, when Mr. De Flacour, a French gentleman, and governor of what the French had then in Madagascar, being informed that the island of Mascarenhas was very fertile, and had a very wholesome air, sent thither 7 or 8 of his people who could not be cured of the diseases they had contracted in Madagascar; and as they were cured very soon and very easily, it gave others an inclination to go and settle there. Since that time, the name of Bourbon was given to this island; but no considerable settlement was formed there, until the French East-India company took possession of it, in 1680, under the king's authority, and sent inhabitants from Europe. Consequently, no language but the French is spoken in the island, and the Popish religion is the only one professed; of which there are several secular priests dispersed in the several villages of the island.

The island, which is circular, and about 250 miles in circumference, is flat near the sea coast; but the middle is full of mountains, interspersed with valleys; and many rivers come out of these mountains, by which the island is plentifully supplied with water. The flat country is divided in three quarters, viz. St. Denis, St. Paul, and St. Sufan, where the inhabitants have their houses; or rather farm-houses, for grubbing the land, by which it is made to produce corn, rice, millet, and all manner of roots.

The mould of the flat country is but 2 feet deep, for you then meet with the rock; and for this reason, the inhabitants are obliged to lay it up every three years; but this mould, which is remarkable, is deeper on the hills, and those who can afford to grub it find a great benefit. In 1708, there were 900 male inhabitants in the island, reckoning the children and the negroes. There is a governor, a register, and a magazine-keeper for the Company. All the foreign trade of the inhabitants consists in sending a large bark every year to Pondicherry, and selling all manner of provisions to the East-India ships, which last article is very advantageous to them.

The air of this island is very wholesome, though the natives seldom live to be very old, but others very often attain to a hundred years of age. The most common distempers are the cholic, and an odd kind of disease, by the inhabitants called dog's-evil, which they cure in as odd a manner, by burning with a red hot piece of iron the heel of the person afflicted. There are no venomous creatures in the island; but towards the east, there is a great volcano, or burning mountain, continually flaming, by which the flat country near it is all burnt up, and covered with calcined stones, brittle and sharp, like flints. This part of the country is desert, and good for nothing; therefore the inhabitants call it the Burnt Land. In the other parts, the land on the top of the hills is better than that which is below, because it is there much colder, and in the mountains so very cold, that there is often much ice, which is the more remarkable, as the island is nearly under that side of the tropic which is next the equator.

Among the plains on the mountains, the most remarkable, and yet the least taken notice of, in the accounts of this island, is that named the Plain of Kaffers; for having been discovered by some Kaffer slaves, who fled thither from their masters. The road from the sea to this plain, is along the side of St. Stephen's River, and, for 20 miles, of so gentle an ascent, that you may travel it on horseback. On both sides the land is level and good; and, till you come within 5 miles of the plain, covered with lofty trees, whose leaves, when fallen, are food for the tortoises, which in great numbers haunt this river. The height of this plain may be reckoned at 6 miles above the horizon, so that from the bottom of the mountain, it is hidden in the clouds. Its circumference is about 15 miles; but over the whole the cold is almost intolerable, with a continual moist fog, so thick, that it wets as much as rain, and hinders people from seeing one another at 10 yards distance: as it subsides in the night, the air is then clearer than in the day time; but it freezes so prodigiously hard, that in the morning, at the rising of the sun, the whole plain is covered quite over with ice.

What is still more extraordinary, there is in this plain a great number of earthen pillars, almost round, and so prodigiously high, that they are reckoned equal in height to the towers of Notre Dame church in Paris, which is about 34 fathoms. They are disposed something like the manner of nine-pins; but in such confusion, that it is very difficult to number them. In the island they call them pitons; and if one has a mind to stay at the foot of one of them, whilst his companions take a farther view of the plain, they must take care not to go above the distance of 200 yards from him, otherwise they will run a risk of not being able again to find the companion they had left, these pitons being so numerous, and so much resembling one another, that even the natives themselves are often deceived and bewildered. To avoid this inconveniency, when travellers choose to disperse themselves, he that stays at the foot of one of the pitons, makes a fire, and if the fog be so thick as to prevent seeing the smoke or the fire, which frequently happens, they have a sort of large shells, into which they blow as into a trumpet, and thereby produce a loud and shrill sound, which may be heard at a great distance.

There are on this plain many aspin trees which are always green; but as to the other trees, they are covered, as well their trunks as their larger branches, with moss which is a yard thick. Although they seem to be all withered, being without leaves, yet they are so moist, that it is extremely difficult to make a fire with them; and if after a great deal of trouble you have lighted some of the small branches, your fire is unfit for dressing any thing; for it is but a black fire without any flame, and producing a reddish smoke, with which it besmears the meat instead of dressing it; and even after you have collected your wood, you must seek for a place proper for making a fire, which must be near some of the pitons where the ground rises a little, above the level of the plain; for every where else the bottom is covered with slush, so that in walking you are always in mud up to the middle of the leg. Yet in this plain there are abundance of a sort of birds which nestle among water ferns, and were unknown before the escape of the Kaffers.

From this plain one may see the mountain of the three Salazes, so named because of the three points of the rock on the top of it, which is the highest ground in the island; for from this mountain all the largest rivers of the island take their source; but it is so steep that it is not possible to get to the top of it. And there is also in this island another plain called Silaos, higher than that of the Kaffers, and of the same nature, but it is extremely difficult to get up to it. This island abounds in almost all sorts of wood; and some of the trees are of an amazing height and size. The ebony tree grows here; but what is called ebony, is only the inside of the tree, of never more than half a foot diameter. There are also some trees, the wood of which is very good for making casks; and if it was not for the great care that gums require, they would here have a great deal of several good sorts. The facamaca-tree, and the benjoin, grow very high, as well as another tree called natte. And there are Flamingo birds, which exceed the height of a tall man.

But this island has no harbour, nor any place where one can easily be made; though no one can tell what may hereafter be done, by the ingenuity and industry of man. There are only two roads, that of St. Denis, and that of St. Paul, where ships may at most times ride pretty safely; but in the hurricane season, they have no shelter, therefore must be driven to sea, or dashed to pieces against the shore.

When the present Company of India became, by their perpetual establishment, possessed of the island of Bourbon, they began to improve it exceedingly: raising new forts and batteries, so as to render it in a manner inaccessible; and importing coffee-trees from Arabia, which have succeeded so well, that it is believed they produce an eighth, according to some a sixth, part as much coffee as is raised in the kingdom of Yemen in Arabia, and it is likewise held next in goodness to that. In 1763, the population amounted to 4627 white people, and 15149 black; the cattle consisted of 8702 bees, 4084 sheep, 7405 goats, and 7619 hogs. Upon an extent of 125,909 acres of cultivated land, they gathered as much cassava as would feed their slaves; 1,135,000 pounds weight of corn, 844,100 pounds of rice, 2,879,100 pounds of maize, and 2,535,100 pounds of coffee; which last the Company bought up at about 3d. per pound.

In 1748, admiral Boscawen appeared before this island with a British fleet; but found it so well fortified both by nature and art, that he was obliged, after some cannonading to very little purpose, to pursue his voyage. It lies 100 miles E. of Madagascar. Lat. 20, 52, S. Long. 55, 35, E.

BOURBON, (l'Ancy,) in Latin Bourbo Ancelli a small town of l'Autunois, a bailiwick in the government of Burgundy, in France. It stands on a mountain, upon the Loire, and is divided into three parts; namely, the proper town, with a strong castle upon a rock, and two suburbs, one of which is called St. Leger. In the latter are hot-baths, that are saltish, sulphureous, and ferruginous; they are remarkably hot; some say of nearly the same degree with boiling water. Here is a royal court, a salt magazine, a chapter, three parish-churches, two convents, and two hospitals. It lies 55 miles south west of Chalons, in lat. 46, 33, N. long. 3, 46, E.

BOURBON L'ARCHAMBAUD, or BURBO ARCHEMBALDI, a small town in the government of Bourbonnois, in France. It is surrounded with four hills, upon one of which stands an old castle, in which are three chapels; of these, that called the Holy is extremely beautiful. In this town is the seat of a castellany and provincial bailiwick. It has one parish-church, a chapter, priory, convent, and two hospitals. Its warm baths and cold mineral waters are famous for their salubrious quality. It lies 27 miles south of Nevers. Lat. 46, 33, N. long. 3, 10, E.

BOURBONNE, a small town of Vallage, in Champagne Proper, and government of the former name, and Brie, in France. It is well known for its mineral waters. This place was burnt down in 1719.

BOURBONNOIS, one of the governments of France. It is bounded on the N. by Nivernois and Berry; on the W. by Upper Marche; on the S. by Auvergne; and on the E. by Burgundy and Forez. Its length is about 30 French leagues, and its breadth 20. This province is pretty fertile, especially in corn, pasturage, and fruit. It has also good wine, but none of it is exported, and several mineral springs and warm baths. It is watered by the Loire, Allier, Cher, and some smaller rivers. In July, upon the melting of the snow on the mountains of Auvergne, the second river above-mentioned swells exceedingly, and does great damage by its inundations.

This country had formerly its own dukes, who styled themselves also princes. It was raised to a duchy in 1327. Duke Lewis had two sons, Peter and James; the latter was count de la Marche, whose posterity ascended the throne of France, on which they still sit; the former was the founder of the other dukes of Bourbon, of which Charles, constable of France, having rebelled against king Francis I. had his duchy taken from him; and it was annexed to the crown. By the peace of the Pyrennees, in 1659, it was given to Lewis of Bourbon, prince of Condé, instead of duke Albert. It is subject to the parliament of Paris. All civil officers officers are nominated by the duke; yet they are not his, but the king's officers. Besides a governor and general-lieutenant, here are two deputy-governors; and Bourbonnois is reckoned to have 22 large towns and boroughs.

BOURBON-LAKE, the most northern yet discovered in North America, and received its name from some French traders who accompanied a party of Indians, from Canada to Hudson's Bay. It is about 80 miles in length from N. to S. and is nearly circular. There are no large islands on it. The land on the eastern side is good, and to the S. W. are some mountains. Its latitude is between 52 and 54 degrees N. and lies nearly S. W. of Hudson's Bay. The river Bourbon connects this lake with the Lake of Forts, from which rises York-river, that runs into Hudson's-Bay. It is also connected with Lake Winnepeek and Meadow's Lake, and receives and gives rise to some other small streams.

BOURBOURG, a small town in the quarter of Freylandes, and government of French Flanders. It lies close to the sea, upon a canal extending from Dunkirk to the Aa. It has been often laid in ashes, and taken, consequently has much declined. Here is a Benedictine nunnery. It lies 3 miles S. of Gravelines, in Lat. 55, 5, N. Long. 2, 10, E.

BOURDEAUX, or BORDEAUX, anciently Burdigala, the capital of Guyenne, part of the government of this name and Gascony. It is the seat of an archbishop, a parliament, intendency, and collection, a chamber of imposts, provincial-court, country-bailiwick, admiralty, election, marshal's office, &c. It lies on the Garonne, in the form of a half-moon, is pretty large, and populous; and has a good number of spacious and costly stone houses, but antique; and narrow streets. Its harbour is large and commodious. The finest, and withal the newest, part of the town, is the royal square facing the harbour; where is a noble warehouse, the exchange, and a bronze statue of Lewis XIV.

The suburb of Chartron or Chartreux is a fine place. Three forts serve to defend the town and harbour, which were fortified by Vauban. Chateau Trompette is a citadel, which partly serves to cover the harbour, and partly to keep the town in awe, having been put into its present condition by Lewis XIV. It is magnificently built of entire pieces of square free-stone; and, as the ramparts are not made of earth, but arched over, one may walk quite round them. In the arsenal are arms for about 6000 men. The other two forts, Le Chateau de Haa, and St. Lewis, or St. Croix, are not considerable.

The archbishop has 9 suffragan prelates under him, whose diocese consists of 450 parishes, besides 50 chapels of ease, and a yearly income of 55,000 livres. He pays a tax of 4000 florins to the court of Rome. To him belong the districts of Montravel, Belvez, Bigaroque, &c. The cathedral is a Gothic structure, very large, but waste and empty. Its vestry-treasure is but moderate, and only the large silver casket for reliques on the high altar is worth seeing. The Dominican church and convent are new and beautiful buildings. And both these also belong to the Carthusian monks, than which no finer charterhouse can be met with any where else. Here is also a Benedictine abbey, of the congregation of St. Maur. The Jesuits had a beautiful college. The university was founded in 1441; and the king erected an academy of arts and sciences in the year 1712, the library of which indeed is not numerous, but select, and a beautiful repository for the books. Here are likewise three seminaries.

The trade carried on in this town is very considerable, to an advantageous share in which are admitted English, Dutch, Danes, Hamburgers, Lubeckers, and likewise Portuguese Jews; though these last have no synagogue; nor are the Protestants allowed any public place of worship, except the English, who are winked at in this respect, and have a clergyman in a secular habit: other Protestants are not debarred from reading a sermon to their families. The rich foreign traders here call themselves negociants.

At Bourdeaux are still to be seen several remains of Roman antiquities, particularly the amphitheatre of the emperor Gallienus, the two principal entries to which are at present standing, &c. This was the birth-place of king Richard II. of England, his father the Black Prince having resided some years here. Bourdeaux is a vast staple for wine and brandy. And in this city the Scottish nation have particular privileges in trade, on account of a gallant defence they once made here, added to the ancient alliance which subsisted long between both crowns. It lies 90 miles S. of Rochelle, and 260 S. W. of Paris, in Lat. 44, 50, N. Long. 0, 30, W.

BOURDEAUX, a small place of Diois, in the Lower Delphinat, a subdivision of the government of Dauphiny, in France; where Isaac Casauban was brought up, but born at Geneva.

BOURDEILLES, a large village of Upper Perigord, a subdivision of the territory of the latter name and Guyenne Proper, in the government of Guyenne and Gascony, in France.

BOURDELOIS, a territory of Guyenne Proper, in the government of the former name and Gascony, in France, and the most considerable district in it. In a strict peculiar sense it is called the provincial bailiwick of Guyenne, and is a country abounding very much in wine. It is in general fruitful, though the soil is also pretty sandy. Here are chesnut and fig trees of an uncommon magnitude; and in the open fields one sees propped vine-stocks, almost as large as trees.

B O

BOURDINESS, a town of Namur, a province of the Austrian Netherlands. It lies 10 miles N. E. of Namur city, in Lat. 50, 35, N. Long. 5, 2, E.

BOURG, the capital of La Bresse, a subdivision belonging to the government of Burgundy, in France. It is situated on the river Reclouffe, and is the seat of a governor, deputy-governor, bailiwick, provincial-court, collection, castellan, sub-forest-court, marshalsea, salt-house, &c. Here is a collegiate and parochial church, a good college, and 7 convents. Though this place be not well situated for trade, yet they keep several fairs here, at which are sold cattle, horses, and skins; the last extremely well whitened, which the merchants of Grenoble and Lyons buy. It lies 32 miles N. of the latter city, in Lat. 46, 20, N. Long. 5, 5, E.

BOURG SUR MER, a small town of Bourdeaux, a territory belonging to Guyenne Proper, in the government of the former name, in France. It is situated on the Dordogne, with a little harbour, where they load wine, near Bec d'Ambez, at the junction of that river with the Garonne. It lies 15 miles N. of Bourdeaux, in lat. 45, 10, N. Long. 0, 57, W.

Of the same name is also a mean place of Retelois, a subdivision of Upper Champagne, in the government of this name and Brie, in France.

BOURG, the capital of the Isle of Cayenne, and French settlements on the coast of Guiana, in South America. It lies 150 miles S. E. of Surinam, in lat. 5, 2, N. Long. 52, 15, W.

BOURG D'AULT, (Le), a place in Vimeux, a subdivision of the under government of Picardy and Artois, in France. It is the seat of an admiralty, and salt-magazine, belonging to the duke of Orleans. From this neighbourhood comes the best fresh fish in all the canal.

BOURG-THEROUDE, a large village of Roumois, belonging to Upper Normandy, in the government of the latter name, in France. It has a collegiate church, and an hospital.

BOURGANEUF, or BOURGNEUF, a small town of Upper Marche, in the government of the latter name, in France. It is situated on the little river Taurion; and here is the seat of an election. It lies 6 leagues above Limoges, on the confines of Limosin.

BOURGES, anciently Bituriges, or Bituricæ, also Avaricum, the capital of Upper Berry, and the whole government of the latter name, in France. It is situated on the river Eure, is the seat of an archbishop, the seat of an intendency, election, bailiwick, provincial-court, royal prevoté under the bailiwick, a royal independent court, a salt-granary, forest court, marshalsea, &c. Here is an university of four faculties, and a beautiful and large college. Besides the cathedral, here are also four collegiate churches, not to mention the two which are united with the seminary, 16 parish-churches, four abbeys, &c. so that the clergy and their dependents constitute the greatest part of the inhabitants. The archbishop styles himself patriarch and primate of Aquitain: he is metropolitan of five bishops, has a diocese of 900 parishes, and an income of 30,000 livres, paying a tax of 4033 florins to the court of Rome. In one part of the old palace resides the governor, and in the other are held the above-mentioned courts. In the large beautiful hall assemble the states of the country. Here is a mineral spring also. An assembly of prelates, held in this city in the year 1438, acknowledged the council of Basil, and approved their pragmatic sanction, as the parliament of Paris did the ensuing year. This constitution, principally relating to the free election of bishops and abbots, independently of the king and pope, continued until Francis I. abolished it in 1516; when by a concordate with the pope, the king should name to all the bishoprics and abbeys, and have the income of all vacant benefices; and that the pope should have the annats or first-fruits.

The citizens of Bourges, among other privileges, pay nothing out of their estates to the king; and are exempted from serving in the king's armies, from garrisons, and winter-quarters, &c. Though this be a large and elegant city, its trade is not considerable. Here Charles VII. of France resided, when the English were nearly masters of all the rest of France; and by way of derision called king of Berry. It lies 50 miles south-east of Orleans, and 150 south of Paris, in lat. 47, 50, N. long. 2, 30, E.

BOURGET, one of the most considerable inland-lakes of Savoy Proper, in Upper Italy. In it is taken a fish not known in other countries, and called lavarets: it frequently weighs between four and five pounds, and is much prized at Chamberry, on account of its excellent taste. Upon this lake stands a small town of the same name.

BOURGOGNE. See BURGUNDY.

BOURGMONT, a small town belonging to the country-district of La Motte and Bourmont, in the bailiwick of Bassigni and Barrois Mouvant, a subdivision of the government of Lorrain and Bar, now subject to France. It lies very near the river Meuse, and the borders of Champagne. It is the seat of a bailiwick and provincial district, has one parish-church, two chapters, and as many convents.

BOURGNEUF. See BOURGANEUF.

BOURNE. See BORNE.

BOURNIQUEL, a large village of Lower Quercy, a subdivision of the territory of the latter denomination, belonging to Guyenne Proper, in the

the government of the former name and Gascony, in France.

BOURNO, one of the two considerable lakes, through which the Senago or Senegal, a river of Africa, runs. It lies under lat. 16, N. and long. 19, E. near the capital of the same name. It is observable, that the Sanago or Niger, before it falls into this lake, loses itself under ground in a long ridge of high mountains for a considerable way; after which it emerges and waters the above-mentioned city, and then runs through the lake.

BOURNO, or BORNO, a province of Africa. It is situated between Gaoga on the east, the river Senago on the south, and Cano and Agades on the west. It is a despotic kingdom, extending from lat. 17, to 21, N. and from long. 13, 22, E. Only towards the northern part it may be ranked among the deserts of Zahara; but far the greater part is well watered, producing corn, and several sorts of fruit. On the N. W. is mount Taunton, where are some good iron-mines; and on the N. E. is the most desert part of all. On the S flows the Senago. The eastern and western parts are partly level and partly mountainous, inhabited by people living in tents, with scarcely any signs of religion. The mountains are covered with herds of cattle, and some of them produce millet and cotton. The people go naked in warm weather, with only an apron before; and in winter are covered with sheepskins, which also serve them for bedding. They have neither name nor appellative, but what they give one another from natural defects. In the towns the inhabitants are somewhat more tractable, a good many of them being merchants and artificers. Their king is said to be very rich. The capital of the same name is situated on the north bank of the Senago, near the confines of Cano, carrying on a good trade with all the neighbouring countries.

BOURNONVILLE, a small place of Boulonois, a subdivision belonging to the government of Picardy and Artois, in France. It gives title of duke.

BOURO, an island among the Philippines, in the Indian ocean, in Asia. It is situated in the midway between those of Macassar and Ceram, the latter being west of it. It is about 25 leagues long, and 10 where broadest. Besides cloves and nutmegs, it produces cocoa, and other Indian fruits, rice, millet, barley, beans, pot-herbs, and tobacco. In its mountains are forest of ebony and lary. The shore is mostly steep, and the island is subject to earthquakes. It belongs to the Dutch, and they have a fortress here. Lat. 3, 30, S. Long. 124, 5, E.

BOURO, a small district of Vianna, belonging the province of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal. Under it are 12 parishes. Another small district called Santa Martha de Bouro, in the same province, has six parishes belonging to its jurisdiction.

BOURSEY-LOUVERAL, a mean place belonging to the bailiwick of Bapaume, in the government of Picardy and Artois, in France.

BOUSCHET, a small place in the jurisdiction of Valeras, and county of Venaissin, in the government of Provence, in France. Here is an abbey.

BOUSSAC, a small town of Lower Berry, in the government of the latter name, in France. It has walls and towers round it; and the castle stands on an almost inaccessible rock.

BOUTAN, a kingdom of India beyond the Ganges. It has Tartary on the north, China on the East, Afem on the south, and Great Thibet, with part of the Mogul's dominions, on the west. The people are worshippers of monstrous idols. Their king has always a guard of between 7 and 8000 men; and they have had the use of fire-arms long among them. Their country is defended from their only enemy, the great mogul, by inaccessible mountains of snow. They have silver pieces of money coined here, to the value of half a crown; and with regard to what little gold they have, it is brought hither by merchants from the east.

BOUTON, an island in the East Indian ocean, about 12 miles distant from the south-east part of the island of Macassar, or Celebes. The inhabitants are small, but well shaped, and of a dark olive complexion. The principal town is Callasjung, which is about a mile from the sea, on the top of a small hill, and round it a stone wall. The houses are not built upon the ground, but on posts. The religion of the inhabitants is Mahometanism. E. long. 122, 30. S. lat. 4, 30.

BOUTONNE, a considerable river of Saintonge and Angoumois, in France: it rises at Chef-boutonne in Poitu, is navigable near St. Jean d'Angely, and falls into the Charente.

BOUVILLON, a city of Luxemburg in the Austrian Netherlands; situated in E. long. 5, 0. N. lat. 49, 55.

BOUVILS, one of the communities belonging to the valley of St. Martin, in Piemont, Upper Italy.

BOUVINES, a bourg in the quarter of La Peule, belonging to Lille, in the government of French Flanders.

BOUZONVILLE, the principal place of a lordship, in the German bailiwick belonging to the duchy of Lorrain, in the government of the latter name and Bar, now subject to France.

BOW, a village of Middlesex, and on the confines of Essex; which county begins after passing Bow-

B O

Bow-bridge, being the first place one comes to from London, after leaving Mile-end. It lies not far from Stratford, has very good houses, the seats of merchants and citizens belonging to the neighbouring capital. It has its name from the stone arches, called bows, of the bridge over the river Lea. It is noted for dying of scarlet; and had a manufactory of porcelain lately set up in it, said by some to be little inferior to that of China. Its annual fair is on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday in Whitsun-week.

BOW-ISLAND, discovered in the South Sea by Captain Cook, in 1768; in lat 17, S. long. 142, W. The land was low, between 10 and 12 leagues in circumference; resembling in form a bow, the cord and arch forming the land, and the interstice marking the water. The beach was flat without any visible herbage upon it, being covered with sea-weeds. Its length was between three and four leagues, and its width about 200 yards; the bow terminated with two large tufts of cocoa-nut trees, and the arch was covered with trees of various heights and of different verdure, and by fires made on it appeared to be inhabited.

BOW-DITCH, a large circular camp upon a hill, in the parish of Chu, about a mile from Stanton-drew, in Somersetshire. It was trebly fortified. From it is a view of Flatholm and Steepholm isles, in the sea; as also here is a petrifying spring, with many other springs, which make it a bad road for travelling.

BOWE, a small, yet very neat town of Devonshire, it lies 12 miles north-west of Exeter. Fairs are kept here on Holy Thursday, and November 22.

BOWMAN'S-ISLANDS, a knot of several islands in the southern or antartic countries, discovered in steering N. W. from that of Recreation, in lat. 12, S. and long. 152, W. They are well planted with fruit-trees of all sorts, and produce abundance of corn, vegetables, and roots. The Indians come on board the Dutch vessels with fish, cocoa-nuts, Indian figs, and other refreshments, which they exchange for trinkets. All the inhabitants of these islands are white, only a little sun-burnt; and shewed nothing savage in their behaviour. They were handsomely clothed. It appeared, that each family or tribe in these islands had its particular district, the whole ground being laid out in regular plantations.

BOXFORD, a well-built village of Suffolk, about seven miles from Sudbury. It carries on a considerable traffic. Here are two fairs kept, on Easter-Monday, and St. Thomas's day, December 21.

BOX-HILL, a rising-ground in Surrey, planted with box and other wood; from which is a view quite over the Wealds of Suffex to the South

B O

Downs, &c. besides an unbounded prospect into Kent.

BOXTED, a place in Suffolk, where a fair is kept on Whitsun-Tuesday.

BOXTEL, a town of Dutch Brabant in the Low Countries. It is situated on the river Bom-mel, about eight miles south of Bois-le-duc, in lat. 51, 30, N. long. 5, 16, E.

BOXTHUDE, a pretty large town of Bremen and Lower Saxony, in Germany. It has broad streets, with a wall and ditch round it. It is situated on the Effa, which falls about four miles off into the Elbe, and is navigable for boats. It was several times taken and retaken in the civil wars of Germany. It lies 15 miles west of Hamburg, and subject to the Elector of Hanover. Lat 53, 50, N. Long. 9, 16, E.

BOYLACH, or BANNACH, one of the baronies constituting the county of Donegal, and province of Ulster, in Ireland.

BOYLE. See ABBEYBOYLE.

BOYNE, a river rising in Queen's county, and province of Leinster, in Ireland. It falls into the Irish sea a little below Drogheda. It is famous for a victory gained near it by king William, July 1, 1690, over king James and the Irish army.

BOYOLO, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Mantua, capital of a territory of the same name; subject to the house of Austria, and lies 15 miles S. W. of Mantua. Long. 10, 25, E. Lat. 45, 9, N.

BOYNE, one of the districts of Bamfshire, in the Middle Division of Scotland. See BAMF-SHIRE.

BOZENTIN, a strong town belonging to the Palatinate of Sandomir, in Little Poland. It is surrounded with a rampart and wall, and is subject to the bishop of Cracow, who has a fine palace here. It lies at the foot of Mount Kalenberg. In its neighbourhood is plenty of iron.

BOZIN, in Latin Basinga, a small but genteel royal free-town, of the Upper and Outer District, in the Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It stands something high. The inhabitants employ themselves in the cultivating of vineyards, in trade, and handicrafts. It has been thrice burnt to ashes.

Of the same name is a castle on the north side of the town, under the jurisdiction of which are seven castles more.

BOZIO, a district of the north-east division of Corsica, in Upper Italy. It can raise 380 men.

BOZOK, a district belonging to the county of Hont, in the Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary.

Of the same name with it is a small town with a castle. It had formerly a Præmonstratensian priory.

BOZZOLO, a principality and subdivision of the the duchy of Guastalla, in Upper Italy. It belongs to the duke of Parma and Placentia. It is about 5 miles long, and lies nearly in the middle between Cremona and Mantua.

Of the same name is its capital, a small, genteel, and fortified city, with a castle. It lies 12 miles S. W. of the city of Mantua. Lat. 45, 40, N. Long. 11, 5, E.

BRABANT, (duchy of), in Latin Brabantia; a province of the Austrian Netherlands. It is bounded on the N. by Holland and Guelderland, on the W. by Zealand and Flanders, on the S. by the counties of Hainault and Namur, and on the E. by the bishopric of Liege. Its extent from S. to N. including the marquise of the Holy Empire and lordship of Mechlin; is about 75 miles; and from E. to W. about 63. It is commonly divided into Austrian Brabant and Dutch Brabant. The greatest part of it is subject to the house of Austria, and its capital Brussels; the remainder is subject to the Dutch, and its capital Breda. This province is governed by its states, consisting of clergy, nobility, and commoners, who meet commonly four times a year. They appoint a committee of two clergymen and two noblemen, to meet daily during their recesses. The high council of Brabant judges without appeal, and is established at Cortenberg, between Brussels and Louvain; at the head of which is the chancellor. The air in this province is in general good, and the soil very fertile, except in some of the northern parts. The rivers here, besides the Maese and Scheld, are the Demer, Dommel, Senne, Aa, Dyle, Geete, Jeckes, the Great and Small Nethe, and the Merk. Here are also a great number of lakes.

BRABANT, Austrian, contains Brussels, with a large territory belonging to it, Louvain, and its territory, Gemblours, and Diest.

BRABANT, Dutch, or that part of it belonging to the States General of the United Provinces, is bounded on the S. by Austrian Brabant and the bishopric of Liege; on the E. by Prussian Guelderland, on the N. by Dutch Guelderland and Holland, with the North sea and Western Scheld on the W. Its greatest length from E. to W. is about 70 miles, and breadth from S. to N. 36. It is divided into three countries, which take their names from their capitals; namely, the marquise of Bergen-op-zoom, the barony of Bréda, and the mayory or manor of Bois-le-duc.

BRABORG, a royal domain belonging to the chief of Linköping, in East Gothland, Sweden, the old castle of which was demolished by the Russians in 1719.

BRACCIANO, a duchy of St. Peter's Patrimony, a province of the Ecclesiastical State, in the Middle Division of Italy. It was sold in 1696 to prince Liv. Odescalchi, for 386,000 dollars. Here are medicinal warm-baths. It includes a lake, called Lago di Bracciano.

And of the same name is a little town on the W. side of the above-mentioned lake. It lies 12 miles N. of Rome, in Lat. 42, 7, N. Long. 13, 4, E.

BRACCIO DI MANIA, or TZAKONIA, a subdivision of the Morea, a province of European Turkey. It includes the ancient Arcadia and Laconia.

BRACHNELL, a place in Berkshire, where three annual fairs are held, on April 25, August 24, and on October 1.

BRAIKHAUSEN, a country-seat belonging to the elector of Hanover, in the duchy of Zell.

BRACKLEY, an ancient, large and corporate mayor-town of Northamptonshire. It is situated on the Ouse. In it are two parish-churches, and it had formerly a college belonging to Magdalen college in Oxford; but now converted into a free-grammar-school. Its weekly market, which is on Wednesday, was once the staple for the wool in this county, by the removal of which it has since declined. It sends two members to parliament. Its annual fairs are on Wednesday after February 25, third Saturday in April, Wednesday after June 22, Wednesday before St. Michael, October 10, and December 11. It lies 15 miles S. W. of Northampton.

BRACLAW, palatinate of Podolia, in Little Poland. It consists of the two districts of Winnica and Zwinograd.

Of the same name is a double town, situated on the river Bog. It is the seat of the Palatine. It is also called St. Peter's town, as bearing his image in its coat of arms. In 1659 it was taken from the Cossacs. It lies 110 miles E. of Kamienieck. Lat. 48, 5, N. Long. 29, 20, E.

BRACNE-HARAD, a district of Blekingia, a province of South Gothland, in Sweden.

BRACONS, a small town belonging to the district of Dole, in the government of the Franche-Comté, in France.

BRAD, or BROD, a small fortress in the Lower prefecture of the confines of the Saave, belonging to the generalate of Sclavonia, in Hungarian Illyrium. It defends the vessels, that sail upon the Saave. In its territory lies the regiment of Brod infantry. It is about 17 miles S. of Posega. Lat. 45, 20, N. Long. 18, 36, E.

BRADALBIN. See BRAIDALBIN.

BRADFIELD, a market-town of Essex, about 14 miles north of Chelmsford.

BRADFORD, a market-town of Wiltshire, lies on the side of a hill on the Avon, over which river it has a stone bridge. Here is made the finest broad-cloths; and many of the gentry in these parts have been originally raised to very great estates from this noble manufacture. Here is a charity-school for 65 boys. Its weekly market is on Monday, and and annual fair on Trinity-Monday. It lies W. of Devizes, and 98 of London.

BRADFORTH, or BRADFORD, a market-town in the West-Riding of Yorkshire: it is noted for the woollen manufacture. Its weekly market is every Thursday; and annual fairs on March 14, 15, and on June 28, 29, 30. It lies 30 miles south-west of York, and 133 north from London.

BRADING, a place in Hampshire, where two annual fairs are kept, May 12 and October 2, for toys.

BRADNINCH, formerly Bradneysham, or Braines, in Devonshire, on the Columb, and in the road from Exeter to Wellington, six miles from the former, and 177 from London.

BRADSBERG, a fief, or district, belonging to the diocese of Christiania in Norway. It includes the county of Tillemarken, which is subdivided into Upper and Lower Tillemarken, each of which constitutes a bailiwick; but the former of them is subject to Christianland in ecclesiastical matters. It has, according to all appearance, given occasion to the ancients, of calling Norway and Sweden by the name of Thule. Its inhabitants have at all times been looked upon as the most warlike people among all the Normans, on account of their hardihood and courage. To the Lower Tillemarken and the priory of Bramble belong 22 churches. Upon a mountain near Skicen is the seat of Bradsborg, from which the fief takes its name, and where the royal seoffee formerly resided.

BRADWELL, a place in Essex, where a fair is held on June 24.

BRAE-MARR, or the Braes of Mar, a hilly district belonging to Aberdeenshire, in Scotland; where the late earl of Mar begun the rebellion against king George I. upon his accession to the throne of Great-Britain in 1714. This mountainous tract lies 27 miles N. W. of Aberdeen.

BRAE-MURRAY, or the Braes of Murray-Land, a rising ground, running west and east above Elgin, Forres, Nairn, and running to Inverness in Scotland, the whole tract being above 30 miles, including a good deal of moor, peat, and wood lands, though some parts of it produce grain, especially black-oats, in Stradern in Stranairn, particularly towards the river sides; as it advances to Elgin, the soil is more fertile. It is watered principally by the Nairn and Findorn, two rivers abounding with salmon.

BRAGA, (audience of,) a district belonging to the province of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal. Of the same name is an archiepiscopal city, and capital of the province. It is situated in a delightful plain, which is surrounded by the rivers Cavado and Deste, on the south-side of the former river. It was successively in the hands of the Greek, Carthaginians, Romans, Suabians, Goths, Moors, and the kings of Leon. The Romans stiled it Augusta Bracara, and it was the royal residence of the Suevi, or Suabians, abovementioned. The town, with all penal jurisdiction, both supreme and subordinate, belongs to the archbishop, who is also primate of Portugal; but an appeal lies in all such cases from the archbishop's audience to the royal court, called Relagoens. To this archbishopric belong five ecclesiastical districts, namely, Braga, Valenza, Chaves, Villá-real, and Torre de Moncorvo. The city contains 12,300 inhabitants, with five parish-churches, among which is the spacious and old cathedral. To its jurisdiction belong 27 churches. Besides, here are eight cloisters or convents, a Casa da Misericordia, for persons of both sexes well born, who have come to decay, and who are settled in it for life, or provided for with wonderful privacy, an hospital, and a seminary. Between the church of St. Pedro de Maximos and the hospital, are the remains of considerable old buildings, particularly an amphitheatre and aqueduct. This is the seat of an audience, auditor, and judge. It lies 32 miles north of Oporto. Its lat. according to F. Capassi, is 41, 20, N. Long. 8, 40, W.

BRAGANZA, (audience of,) belonging to the province of Tras los Montes, in Portugal. It consists of one city and ten towns; of which the house of Braganza are proprietors, and in the jurisdiction of Miranda. Of the same name is the city, which is situated in a spacious plain upon the little river Fervenga, which divides it from Mount St. Bartholemew. It consists of a city and town; the former of which is surrounded with a wall and towers, having a good castle within; the latter is also fortified, and Fort S. Joao de Deos, standing on the rock Carrascal, covers both, but is of no great strength. The town contains two parishes, with 2700 souls, a house of mercy, an hospital, and four convents. It is likewise the seat of an audience, the auditor of all the places belonging to the house of Braganza, and a judge. Here are several silk-manufactures carried on. It lies 55 miles north-east of Villa-real, and according to F. Capassi's observation, in lat. 41, 50, N. Long. 7, 0, W.

BRAGNAS, a fief or district, belonging to the diocese of Christiania in Norway, together with Hurum, Rogen, Eger, Lier, and Buskerud. Here are several iron-works, as at Egen, Modum, and Lier. Through this district runs the large river Drammen, which falls into the bay of Christiania; and upon it stands the towns of Bragnas and Stromfoe; the former on the north-side of the river, and the latter directly opposite. They both have their own town-bailiwicks and churches; yet together they form but one place for taking of toll, which is one of the largest and most considerable in all Norway, as great numbers of deals, beams, iron, brought brought from the neighbouring parts, are exported from hence. Both places are commonly called Drammen. To the priory of Braghas belong 16 churches.

BRAHALLA, a seat belonging to the territory of Jonkioping, in Smolandia, a subdivision of East Gothland, in Sweden.

BRAHEHUUS, a seat also in the last-mentioned province of Sweden. It stands on the Wetter lake.

BRAHELINNA, a royal demesne of Savolaxia, a subdivision of Finland Proper, in Sweden.

BRAHESTAD, a well-situated maritime-town in the N. part of Uleaborg district, belonging to East Bothnia, a subdivision of Finland Proper, in Sweden. It has its name from count Pehr Brahe, one of the king's counsellors, who built it for handicraftsmen, and purchased also the privileges of a township for it. Here is a good haven. It ranks as the 99th town in the general diet of the kingdom.

BRAIDALBIN, a district of Perthshire in Scotland, stretching 32 miles from E. to W. and 13 where broadest from S. to N. is a mountainous country, lying among the Grampian hills, supposed to be the country anciently known by the name of Albanii; whence the Highlanders to this day call themselves Albinich. It is bounded on the W. by Lochaber, Lorn, and Knapdale; on the N. and E. by part of Lochaber and part of Athol; and on the S. by Strathern and Montreth. It produces plenty of game and black cattle; is inhabited by Highlanders said to be the most ferocious in all Scotland; and gives the title of earl to a branch of the Campbell family, which is possessed of a noble and magnificent seat in this division. Much flax is cultivated here. Some years ago, when premiums were given for the greatest crops, from 70 to 120 hogheads of lintseed were annually sown, each peck yielding two stones of dressed flax, and when the yarn fold highest, 2000l. worth has been fold out of the country. Oats and potatoes are the other crops. Oats yield from four to six fold at the most, oftener less; bear from eight to ten, at an average six. The corn raised seldom suffices the number of inhabitants, so they are often obliged to have recourse to importation. From their potatoes some have distilled a very strong spirit, which has been found cheaper than what is distilled from any grain. Starch is also made from them; and, in some places, bread. Corcur, or the lichen omphaloides, is an article of commerce; great quantities have been scraped from the rocks, and exported for the use of the dyers, at the price of 1s. or 16d. per stone.

A good many sheep are reared here, and much wool is sent out of the country. There are few horses raised in this country: such as feed on the tops of the higher hills are often afflicted with a distemper that commonly proves fatal. If a remedy is not applied within 24 hours. It attacks them in the months of July and August, usually after a fall of rain, or before the dew rises in the morning. An universal swelling spreads over the body: the remedy is exercise, chasing, or any method that promotes urine and perspiration. The common people attribute this evil to a certain animal that scatters its poison over the grass; but, more probably, it arises from some noxious vegetable hitherto unobserved. Before the year 1745, lord Braidalbin was obliged to keep a constant guard for the protection of his vassals' cattle, or to retain spies among the thievish clans, having too much spirit to submit to pay an infamous tax, called blackmeal, to the plundering chieftains; as the price of their safety.

BRAILA, or IBRAELI, a small town lying in the E. part of Walachia, or on the farther side of the river Aluta, in European Turkey. It is situated on the Danube, and has a strong castle of seven towers, which the Russian general, M. Ronne, took in 1711; but by the czar's orders he evacuated it directly.

BRAILES, a place in Warwickshire, where a fair is kept on Easter-Tuesday.

BRAILOW, a town in the palatinate of Bracław, belonging to Podolia, a province of Little Poland. It is situated on the river Bog, 40 miles N. of Bracław, in Lat. 43, 50, N. Long. 29, 14, E.

BRAINE, or BRENNE, a small town of Soissonois, a subdivision of the two under governments in the Isle of France. It is situated close by the little river Vesle, with the title of a county, annexed to the duchy of Valois. Here is a small abbey.

BRAINE-LE-COMTE, a town of Hainault, in the Austrian Low Countries. It is so called in contradistinction to Braine-la-leu, and Wauter-Braine, in Brabant. It belongs to the duke of Aremberg; as does its castle-ward, containing 11 villages. It lies 9 miles N. E. of Mons, in Lat. 50, 46, N. Long. 4, 5, E.

BRAINTREE, in Doomsday-book called Rains, consisting of Rain Magna and Parva, formerly a flourishing market-town of Essex, where the bays-manufacture was carried on with vigour; but since very much reduced. It is parted from Bocking only by a little stream. It lies 12 miles N. of Chelmsford, and 42 E. of London. Its weekly market is on Wednesday; and it has two fairs, on May 8, and October 2. See BOCKING.

BRAIDFORD, a small town in New-England, in the province of Massachusetts-Bay, and county of Essex, near a branch which runs into Merimak river, below Mitchell's Falls.

BRAINTREE, or BRANTREE, a town in Suffolk county, in Massachusetts-Bay. It stands at the bottom of a shallow bay, and has no harbour, but is well watered with springs: the river Smelt runs through through it, and about a quarter of a mile S. runs the river Stony.

BRAKEL, a town of Panderborn, belonging to the Circle of Westphalia, in Germany. It is situated on the river Brug, 20 miles E. of Panderborn, and subject to the bishop of the latter name, in lat. 51, 42, N. Long. 6, 4, E.

BRACLAW. See BRACLAU.

BRAMANT, a town in the county of Maurienne, a subdivision of Savoy, in Upper Italy. It is situated on the river Arc, 35 miles N. W. of Turin, in lat. 45, 7, N. Long. 6, 45, E.

BRAMBER, or BRAMBOROUGH cum Botolph, a mean borough of Suffex, governed by constables, yet sends two members to parliament. One half of the town joins to Steyning; the other, about half a mile off, is called Bramber-street, N. W. of which latter are the ruins of a strong and stately castle. Here is neither market nor fair. It lies 16 miles S. of East Grinstead, and 45 S. of London.

BRAMPOUR, the capital of Candish, a kingdom in the southern division of Indoستان in the East Indies, Asia, and subject to the mogul. It lies in an unhealthy valley near the head of the river Tapti, and is mostly inhabited by Banians. The streets are many but narrow, the houses low and mostly mean. Here is a large castle, where is the mogul's palace, from which he sees the elephants fight in the river. Here also is one caravanserai for his treasure, and another for lodging strangers. The Dutch, who have a factory here, barter pepper for opium. The water of the Tapti being brackish, the inhabitants are supplied from a basin in the market-place. It lies 220 miles E. of Surat. Lat. 21, 30, N. Long. 77, 15, E.

BRAMPTON, a market-town of Cumberland, about a mile below the Picts' wall, and 6 N. E. of Carlisle, on the river Itching. Upon the bank of the river, in a rock called Helbeck, is an imperfect inscription, set up by an ensign of the Legion Augusta under Agricola. In the town is an hospital for 6 poor men and as many women, founded by lady Carlisle. Its weekly market is on Tuesday, and two fairs are kept here on the second Wednesday after Whit-Sunday, and last Wednesday in August. It lies 287 miles from London.

BRAMTON ABBOTS, a place in Herefordshire, where a fair is held on June 22. It is 12 miles N. E. of Hereford-city, and 134 W. of London.

BRANCA, a small island of the Atlantic ocean, and one of the Cape de Verde, to the W. of St. Nicholas. It is little better than a high craggy rock, without water and inhabitants.

BRANCALEONE, a small place near Cape Spartimento in the Further Calabria, a province of Naples, in the Lower Division of Italy.

BRANCHON, a town of Namur in the Austrian Low Countries. It is situated on the Meuse, 2 miles S. E. of Ramilies, in lat. 52, 32, N. Long. 4, 50, E.

BRANDEIS, a town of Bohemia. It is situated on the Elbe, about 10 miles N. E. of Prague. Lat. 50, 15, N. Long. 14, 25, E.

BRANDENBOURG, or BRANDEBURG, (marquissate and electorate of), properly so called, in Germany, was originally inhabited by the Varini and Naithones, branches of the Suevi or Semnones, or Longobardi, and known under the general name of the Slavi, having Mecklenburgh and Pomerania on the north; Poland, on the east, Silesia, with the Lusitias, the electorate of Saxony, Anhalt, and duchy of Magdebourg, on the south; and part of the same duchy, and that of Lunenburg, on the west. Its greatest length is near 200 miles, and its greatest breadth near 100. Its northern situation makes it very cold for 7 or 8 months in winter. The soil in general is far from being fruitful, a great part consisting of sand; yet there are several fruitful spots in it; and the whole, under the last and present reign, has been greatly improved, and much better peopled. In some parts there is great plenty of potatoes and turnips; in others of buck-wheat, millet, and flax; in others of tobacco, woad, and other herbs for dyeing. All sorts of colour earths, together with alum, salt-petre, amber, iron, stone, and medicinal springs, are found in it. Abundance of cattle, especially sheep, are bred here; and the woods not only supply the inhabitants with fuel, but with timber, charcoal, tar, and wood-ashes, both for domestic uses and for exportation.

The culture of silk also is carried on in this country with great success. The principal rivers by which it is watered are the Elbe, the Oder, the Prignitz, the Havel, the Warthe, and the Spree. Some of the rivers and lakes abound in fish, and are united by canals, for the benefit of navigation. They reckon in the whole Mark 120 towns, above 2500 villages, and about 800,000 inhabitants. The states here consist of the nobility and towns, whose assembly-house is in the Spandau-street, at Berlin, and who still enjoy some small remains of their ancient privileges. The hereditary offices of the marquissate are a marshal, chamberlain, cup-bearer, purveyor, sewer, treasurer, and ranger. The king of Prussia, who is also elector of Brandenburg, with his whole court, are Calvinists; but the religion of most of the inhabitants is Lutheranism. The churches of both persuasions are well endowed, and the laity jointly employed by the government. The Roman-catholics are also tolerated here. In short, every inhabitant enjoys full liberty of conscience. A great variety of manufactures, most of which were introduced by the French refugees, are carried on in the marquissate, especially at Berlin and Potsdam; where are also excellent painters, statuary, and engravers. By means of these manufactures, fabrics and arts, not only large sums are kept in the country, but also imported from other parts, to which considerable quantities of the manufactures, and natural productions, are exported. For the education of youth, and the advancement of learning, besides Latin schools in several places, and gymnasia, there is an university at Frankfort on the Oder, and an academy of sciences at Berlin.

This marquisate, together with the arch-chamberlain's office, and the electoral dignity, was conferred, in 1415, hereditarily on Frederic V. or VI. burgrave of Nuremberg, in whose family it still remains, with the addition of many other territories and dignities. The present king of Prussia and elector of Brandenburg, Frederic III. is one of the greatest and most powerful princes of Europe, as well as one of the most despotic. He hath greatly enlarged his dominions, by the addition of all the Lower, together with the greatest part of the Upper Silesia, and the county of Glatz. In 1744 he took possession of East Friedland; but in 1754 disposed of his share of the succession of the late king William, prince of Orange, to the present prince and stadtholder. The qualifications and talents of this prince are great, and he hath performed many singular actions; but his ambition would have proved his ruin, had he not been supported in the last war by the troops and treasures of Great Britain. It is hard to say, whether his subjects have been greater gainers by his encouraging and promoting commerce, manufactures, agriculture, population, order, and the regular distribution of justice; or sufferers by the wars in which his ambition hath involved them, and the prodigious standing army he keeps constantly on foot, to maintain his conquests, and extend them, as opportunity offers. Such an army must be a great burden, besides their labour being lost in a great measure to the country. Among the electors he possesses the seventh place. As arch-chamberlain, he carries the sceptre before the emperor at his coronation, and brings him water in a silver basin to wash with. In the college of princes of the empire, he has five voices. His assessor, as elector, is 60 horse and 277 foot, or 1828 florins in lieu of them. To the chamber of Wetzlar, his quota is 811 rix-dollars, 58 kruitzers, each term. As to the orders of the knights of the Black Eagle, and of Merit, it is sufficient here to observe, that the former was instituted by Frederick I. at his coronation, and the other by the present king.

For the government of this country and the administration of justice, there are several supreme colleges and tribunals; particularly for the departments of war, foreign affairs, and the finances, there are distinct boards. Here is a supreme ecclesiastical council and consistory for the Lutherans; a supreme directory of the Calvinist church; a supreme medicinal college; a supreme mine-office;

a college or board of trade, &c. Those of the French nation, settled in this country, are allowed particular courts of their own. The amount of the yearly revenues of the Mark, arising from the domains, protection-money paid by the Jews, tolls, land-tax, mines, forests, duties on stamp-paper, salt, and variety of other imposts and excises, is computed at about 2,500,000 crowns; but the money is said to be much inferior in goodness to that of Saxony and the dominions of Hanover. During the late war it was extremely debased. Some estimate the whole number of the inhabitants of the royal and electoral dominions at 5,000,000, and the revenues at about 2,000,000*l.* sterling. The present king and elector keeps upwards of 100,000 men on foot in time of peace, which are said to cost him more than half of his whole revenue. These troops are under strict discipline, very expert at their exercise, always in readiness to march, and always complete. Each regiment has a particular canton or district allotted it for its quarters and raising recruits. The infantry are clothed in blue, and the horse and dragoons in white; and both are required to hear sermon twice a day when in quarters or garrisons. In time of peace they are allowed, for several months in the year, to hire themselves out, or to follow their business either as burghers or peasants, in the canton where they are quartered; but they are not allowed to marry. A considerable part of these troops are stationed in the Mark, particularly at Berlin and Potsdam. The corps of hussars alone amounts to about 10,000 men. The Mark of Brandenburg is divided, in general, into the electoral and New Marks. The former is again subdivided into the Old Mark, the Pregnitz, the Middle Mark, and the Ucker Mark. The Old Mark, which lies on the west side of the Elbe, between that river and Lunenburg, is about 50 miles in length, and 30 in breadth.

BRANDENBURG, a city of Germany, and capital of the marquisate of that name, situated on the river Havel, in E. Long. 13, 0. N. Lat. 52, 25. It is divided into the old and new town, and was anciently the see of a bishop. The mountain in the neighbourhood, called Marienberg, is planted with vines. Here is a small colony of French Calvinists, with a manufacture of cloth, fustian, and canvas; and a pretty good trade is carried on by the Havel. The fort here looks like a suburb, and contains a riding-school, with the cathedral church. The greatest part also of the members of the chapter which still subsists, and is composed of a Lutheran provost, dean, senior, sub-senior, and three other canons, reside in it. They are distinguished by a cross of gold enamelled with violet, terminating in eight points; and have a considerable estate. Near the town is a large lake.

BRANDENBURG, (Circle of), in the kingdom of Prussia, includes a part of the old Natan-

gia. It is a province very well inhabited; for agriculture, and the breeding of cattle, flourish extremely here. So that, though the soil be a little stony in some places, it yields better corn than Samland and Little Lithuania do. It has no want of wood, wild game, and fish. Of the 15 capital bailiwics in Natangia, 7 are called German, and 8 Polish. The capital bailiwick of Brandenburg comprehends the districts of Karschau, Kobbelsbude, Uderwangen, and Dolstadt. The 25 churches of this capital bailiwick are under the inspection of the upper court-preacher at Königsberg. Besides this, here are two other capital bailiwics, as Balga, and Prussian Eylau.

BRANDENBURG, a midling borough in the Circle last-mentioned, belonging to the kingdom of Prussia, pretty well built, and mostly inhabited by fishermen. It lies on the Frisch-haf, into which the Huntuau falls at this place. The old spacious castle having been demolished by the Prussians in 1520, has been since rebuilt. Here was formerly a considerable commendary, which duke Frederic seized upon, and converted into a capital territory for raising the men, with principal directors over it.

BRANDO, a fief of Capo Corfo, in the district on this side the mountains, belonging to the Island of Corsica, in Upper Italy.

BRANDON, a town in Suffolk, not ill built, with a good church belonging to it. It is commodiously situated on the Ouse; and over this river is a bridge, with a ferry belonging to the bishop of Ely, to and from the island of which latter name goods are carried thereby. It has also a harbour. It has lost its weekly market; but has three fairs, on February 14, June 11, and November 11. It lies 10 miles N. of Bury, and 78 of London.

BRANDON-HARBOUR, is situated on the N. side of Long-Island, New-York, 9 miles W. of Smithtown, and the same distance from Hempstead Plain.

BRANE, a river in Caermarthenshire, which runs into the Towy near Llanythefry. Another river of the same name in Brecknockshire, which runs into the Uske, by Aberbrâne.

BRANECK, or BRUNECK, a considerable fortress in the bishopric of Brixen, a subdivision of Austria, in Germany. It is the property of the prelate, and lies 10 miles N. E. of Brixen city.

BRANSKEY, an island at the entrance of Poole-bay, in Dorsetshire, which divides it into two; and where is an old castle of the same name, for defending this passage, particularly in time of war with France.

BRANSBURTON, a place in Yorkshire, where a fair is held on May 14.

BRANSKI, a small place of Podlachia, or palatinate of Biełsk, in Little Poland, where is held a provincial-court.

BRANSKA, a town of Transylvania, on the river Merisch, 25 miles S. of Weissenburg, and subject to the house of Austria, in lat. 46, 5, N. Long. 23, 15, E.

BRANSKI, or BRANSZO, a small strong town of the duchy of Sewerski in Western Muscovy. It stands on the river Dezna, about 20 leagues from Novogorod Sewerski, and the same distance from Demetriowitz.

BRANT, a river in Anglesea in N. Wales, has its source on the east side of the island, and runs mostly southward, till it falls into the Menue.

BRANTOLME, or BRANTOME, a bourg of Upper Perigord in Guyenne Proper, belonging to the government of the former name and Gascony, in France. Here is a Benedictine abbey of the order of St. Maur.

BRANVITSKA, a castle belonging to the Josiki family, in the county of Weissenburg, a district of Transylvania, in the kingdom of Hungary.

BRASCHOW, or BAKOW, (which see) a town of Walachia, on this side the Aluta, in European Turkey. It lies near the confines of Moldavia and Transylvania, 50 miles north of Targowist.

BRASIL, a large country of South America, being the easternmost part of that continent, lying between the equinoctial line and the tropic of Capricorn. It is about 1560 miles in length, and 1000 in breadth; but measuring along the coast, it is 2000 miles long, and is bordered with mountains that open from time to time, and form good harbours where vessels may lie in safety. It was accidentally discovered to by the Portuguese in 1500. Emanuel king of Portugal, had equipped a squadron of 15 sail, carrying 1200 soldiers and sailors destined for the East Indies, under the conduct of Peter Alvarez Cabral. This admiral, quitting Lisbon on the 9th of March 1500, struck out to sea, to avoid the coast of Guinea, and steered his course southward, that he might the more easily turn the Cape of Good Hope, which projects a good way into the ocean. On the 24th of April, he got sight of the continent of South America, which he judged to be a large island at some distance from the coast of Africa. Coasting along for some time, he ventured to send a boat on shore, and was astonished to observe the inhabitants entirely different from the Africans in features, hair, and complexion. It was found, however impracticable, to seize upon any of the Indians, who retired with great celerity to the mountains on the approach of the Portuguese; yet, as the sailors had discovered a good harbour, the admiral thought proper to come to an anchor, and called the bay Puerto Seguro. Next day he sent another boat on shore, and had the good fortune to lay hold on two of the natives, whom he clothed and treated kindly, and then dismissed, to make a proper report to their countrymen. The stratagem had the desired effect. The Indians, having heard the relation of the prisoners, immediately crowded to the shore, shore, singing, dancing, and sounding horns of different kinds; which induced Cabral to land, and take solemn possession in the name of his Portuguese majesty.

As soon as the court of Lisbon had ordered a survey to be taken of the harbours, bays, rivers, and coasts of Brasil, and was convinced that the country afforded neither gold nor silver, they held it in such contempt, that they sent thither none but condemned criminals and abandoned women. Two ships were sent every year from Portugal, to carry the refuse of the kingdom to this new world, and to bring home parrots and woods for the dyers and cabinet-makers. Ginger was afterwards added; but soon after prohibited, lest it should interfere with the sale of the same article from India.

In 1548, the Jews, many of whom had taken refuge in Portugal, beginning to be persecuted by the Inquisition, were stripped of their possessions, and banished to Brasil. Here, however, they were not entirely forsaken. Many of them found kind relations and faithful friends; others, who were known to be men of probity and understanding, obtained money in advance from the merchants of different nations with whom they had formerly had transactions. By the assistance of some enterprising men, they were enabled to cultivate sugar-canes, which they first procured from the island of Madeira. Sugar, which till then had been used only in medicine, became an article of luxury. Princes and great men were all eager to procure themselves this new species of indulgence.

The court of Lisbon, notwithstanding its prejudices, began to be sensible, that a colony might be beneficial to the mother country, without producing gold or silver; and this settlement, which had been wholly left to the capricious management of the colonists, was now thought to deserve some kind of attention; and accordingly Thomas de Souza was sent thither in 1549, to regulate and superintend it.

This able governor began by reducing these men who had always lived in a state of anarchy, into proper subordination, and bringing their scattered plantations closer together; after which he applied himself to acquire some information respecting the natives, with whom he knew he must be continually engaged either in traffic or war. This was no easy matter to accomplish. Brasil was full of small nations, some of which inhabited the forests, and others lived in the plains and along the rivers. Some had settled habitations; but the greater number of them led a roving life, and most of them had no intercourse with each other.

In 1629 the Dutch seized upon the captainships of Siara, Seregippe, and the greater part of that of Bahia. Seven of the 15 provinces which composed the colony had already submitted to them, and they flattered themselves that one or two campaigns would make them masters of the rest of their enemies possessions in that part of America; when they were suddenly checked by the revolution happening on the banishment of Philip IV. and placing the duke of Braganza on the throne. After this, the Portuguese recovering their spirits, soon drove the Dutch out of Brasil, and have continued masters of it ever since; so that at present the Portuguese are sole masters of the country, which is the only tract they hold in America, extending themselves no farther than along the coasts, whilst the inland parts are still inhabited by the natives. It is now stiled a principality, as giving title to the presumptive heir of Portugal. It is bounded on the north by the Atlantic ocean and the river of Amazons or Maraynon; on the east by the same Atlantic ocean; on the south by the river De la Plata, and on the west by Paraguay and the country of the Amazons; lying between the equator and lat. 35 S. and between 35 and 60 W.

The first aspect of the country from the sea is rather unfavourable, as it appears high, rough, and unequal; but on a more narrow inspection, nothing can be more delightful, the eminences being covered with woods, and the valleys and savannahs with the most refreshing verdure. In so vast a tract of land it cannot be imagined that the climate will be found at all equal, or the seasons uniform. The northern provinces are subject to heavy rains and variable winds, like other countries under the same parallels. Tornadoes, storms, and the utmost fury of the elements, wreak their vengeance here; while the southerly regions are blessed with all the comforts which a fine fertile soil and temperate climate can afford. In some of the provinces the heat of the climate is thought to prove favourable to the generation of a great variety of poisonous reptiles; some of which, as the liboya, or roebuck-snake, are said to extend to the length of 30 feet, and to be two or three feet in circumference. The rattle-snake, and other reptiles of the same kind, grow likewise to an enormous size; and the serpent, called ibibakoka, is affirmed to be seven yards long, and half a yard in circumference, possessed too of a poison instantaneously fatal to the human race. Here are also scorpions, ant-bears, tigers or madilloes, porcupines, janonveras, and an animal called tapirasson, which is the production of a bull and an afs, having a great resemblance to both. No country on earth affords a greater number of beautiful birds, nor variety of the most exquisite fruits; but the chief commodities are Brasil wood; ebony, dying woods, ambergris, rosin, balsams, indigo, sweet-meats, sugar, tobacco, gold, diamonds, beautiful pebbles, crystal, emeralds, jasper, and other precious stones; in all which the Portuguese carry on such an amazing trade, as may justly be reputed the the support, and indeed the vital fountain, of the mother-country.

The gold and diamond mines are but a recent discovery: they were first opened in the year 1681; and have since yielded above five millions sterling annually, of which sum a fifth belongs to the crown. So plentiful are diamonds in this country, that the court of Portugal hath found it necessary to restrain their importation, to prevent too great a diminution of their value. They are neither so hard nor so clear, as those of the East Indies, nor do they sparkle so much, but they are whiter. The Brazilian diamonds are sold 10 per cent. cheaper than the oriental ones, supposing the weights to be equal. The largest diamond in the world was sent from Brasil to the king of Portugal. It weighs 1680 carats, or $12\frac{1}{2}$ ounces; and has been valued at 56,787,500*l*. Some skilful lapidaries, however, are of opinion that this supposed diamond is only a topaz; in which case a very great abatement must be made in its value.

The crown-revenue arising from this colony amounts to two millions sterling in gold, if we may credit some late writers, besides the duties and customs on merchandise imported from that quarter. This indeed is more than a fifth of the precious metal produced by the mines; but, every other consequent advantage considered, it probably does not much exceed the truth. The excessive confluence of people to the Brasil colonies, as well from other countries as from Portugal, not only enlarges the imports of gold, but, what is of infinitely more importance to Europe in general, the exportation of the manufactures of this hemisphere; of which the principal are the following. Great Britain sends woollen manufactures; such as fine broad medley cloths, fine Spanish cloths, scarlet and black cloths; ferges, duroys, druggets, sagathies, shalloons, camblets, and Norwich stuffs; black Colchester bays; feys, and perpetuanas, called long ells; hats, stockings, and gloves. Holland, Germany, and France, chiefly export fine hollands, bone-lace, and fine thread: silk manufactures, pepper, lead, block tin, and other articles, are also sent from different countries. Besides the particulars already specified, England likewise trades with Portugal, for the use of the Brasils, in copper and brass, wrought and unwrought pewter, and all kinds of hardware: all which articles have so enlarged the Portuguese trade, that, instead of 12 ships usually employed in the Brasil commerce, there are now never fewer than 100 sail of large vessels constantly going and returning to those colonies.

To all this may be added the vast slave-trade carried on with the coast of Africa for the use of the Brasil colonies; which, we may believe, employs a great number of shipping, from the multitude of slaves that are annually transported. Indeed the commerce of Brasil alone is sufficient to raise Portugal to a considerable height of naval power, as it maintains a constant nursery of seamen: yet a certain infatuation in the policy of the country has prevented that effect even amidst all these extraordinary advantages. All the ships in this trade, being under the direction of the government, have their appointed seasons of going and returning, under convoy of a certain number of men of war: nor can a single ship clear out or go, except with the fleet, but by a special licence from the king, which is seldom granted; though it is easily determined, that such restrictions can prove no way beneficial to the general commerce, though possibly the crown-revenue may be better guarded thereby. The fleets sail in the following order, and at the following stated periods: that to Rio de Janeiro sets sail in January; the fleet to Balria, or the bay of All Saints, in February; and the third fleet, to Fernambuco, in the month of March.

The natives are divided into several nations, and these again subdivided into a variety of tribes; the principal of which are the Tupinambos, Tobajaras, Petiguaras, and Tapyas, &c. They are not naturally black, but made so by the heat of the sun and painting; those of the inland go mostly naked, with only a covering of leaves about their middle; but such as live near the sea-coast go dressed like the Europeans, among whom they converse. The obsequious wife commonly accompanies her husband every where, even to the wars, and serves him in the quality of a beast of burthen, with a basket on her back and another on her head, carrying all the paltry household furniture; besides a child tied to her, and another by her side. They generally live in mean villages, or scattered hamlets. Their common food is bread made of maize or the maudic root, with the flesh of such beasts and fowl as they kill, and fish they catch, either boiled or half roasted, but mostly raw. Their usual drink is water, sometimes mixed with black sugar, and at other times with a few leaves of akaju, which makes it heady. But that which they press from the fruit of it is very potent; which liquor they drink to great excess, at the same time smoaking their stout tobacco very plentifully. But they are most fond of brandy, rum, or any such distilled spirits. The inland inhabitants scarcely seem to have any religion; and yet they have a kind of priests. They believe a future state, where they shall excel in all sorts of pleasure, more or less, according to their former prowess in war, or number of enemies they have killed and eaten. But as for such as do nothing like this, they shall be severely punished. The Brazilians are said to be cannibals, rather out of revenge against their enemies, than any love of human flesh. They disfigure themselves by cutting a gash in the under-lip, and hanging a kind of green jasper per at it to keep it open. The coasts of Brasil are the nearest to those of Cafreria in Africa of any others in America.

They have two roots on which they mostly feed; namely, the acpy and manioc, besides other plants both for eating and phyfic. They keep no religious festivals, and have neither temples nor idols; having only rejoicings after some victory, or in pitching upon such of their prisoners as they think fit to be butchered and eaten: both men and women are decked about their heads, arms, waists, &c. with variety of plumes, and beautiful small feathers, &c. glewed on their bodies: and the festival is usually attended with music in their way, and dancing, at which they do not forget alternate eating and drinking. This diversion lasts two or three days, and sometimes 10 or 15.

The Portuguese have here an archbishop; namely, that of St. Salvador, which is the capital, situated on All-saints-bay, together with some suffragans, but have no university in all this vast tract.

The government among the natives being split into a vast number of kingdoms, nations, and languages, have in each a chief or captain over them. but some live like the wild Arabs of Africa, wandering about without either laws or government. The Portuguese, we are told, exercise such cruelties over their negro-slaves, and are so hated by the natives, that they are in continual danger of being driven out, if not massacred by their united forces; against which combination they are obliged to be more than ordinary watchful.

Brasil hath a great many very considerable rivers, particularly that of the Amazons. See AMAZONS.

The next is Paranyba, springing from a ridge of mountains about the middle of the country, and in its course northwards receiving about 30 others: some of them pretty large, falls into that of the Amazons, near its mouth. Its course, exclusive of its windings, is upwards of 600 miles, and has various nations who live on each side of it, and trade with the Portuguese by means of it. There are others less considerable, that discharge themselves into the same gulph; as the Para, Pacaxes, and Tocantino. Farther east are those of Maracu, Topocoru, Mony, and some smaller ones; all which join their streams at Cuma-bay, where they form the island Sant Lodovigo de Maragnon. All these, and many others still farther east have their course northward, and fall into the Atlantic ocean. On the eastern coast are also a considerable number; as that of St. Francis, whose course is mostly eastward, from long. 46 to 35. This river, about mid-way between its fountain and mouth, buries itself several leagues under ground; and, after emerging, forms some considerable islands, and divides the captainrie of Fernambuco from that of Seregipe, after which it falls into the Atlantic ocean. Rio-Real, i. e. the Royal-river, runs parallel with that of St. Francis, and divides Seregipe from the captainrie of Todos los Santos, and falls into the same ocean, about 41 leagues north of the bay of the same name. Rio Dolie, or Rio de los Magos, in its course from west to east, receives several other rivers, dividing the captainrie of Porto Seguero, from Santo Spirito. The Rio de Janeiro, running from north to south gives its name to a captainrie, and falls into the same ocean a little to the west of Cabo Frio. The entrance into it is guarded on the east side by fort Santa Cruz, and by that of San Juan on the west and northward, a little higher, by that of San Jago, and the city of St. Sebastian, the capital of that captainrie.

The principality of Brasil is divided into governments or prefectures, which the Portuguese stile captainias. They begin from the west corner, where the river of Amazons discharges itself, and and running along eastward, then southward, and then westward, according to the course of the coast, are as follows: Para, Maranhao, Sjara, Rio Grande, Parahiba or Parayba, Itamarica or Tamarac, Fernambuco or Pernambuco, Seregipe, Bahia de Todos los Santos, Rio de los Ilheos, Porto Seguro, Espirito Santo, Rio de Janeiro, De San Vincente, Angra, and Del Rey.

Every one of these prefectures is under a peculiar governor, and all are accountable to the viceroy of the country, who commonly resides at St. Salvador. Of these captainries eight belong properly to the king, who maintains the colonies here, and hath the whole revenue; the others belong to Portuguese noblemen, who have formerly obtained grants of them, and peopled and fortified them. These last receive their governors from their respective lords; but they acknowledge the viceroy's sovereignty; and have each their inferior governments, like those belonging to the king.

From the discovery of the diamond-mines abovehinted at, the Spaniards have been induced to attempt possessing themselves of the south part of Brasil; whence continual hostilities arise between their respective colonies at the mouth of Rio de la Plata, the Portuguese being in possession of the N. shore of that river, and the Spaniards of the S.

BRASLAW, one of the subordinate districts belonging to the palatinate of Wilno, in Lithuania Proper, in the great duchy of the former name. Its capital of the same name is a spacious place, and situated on a lake, and is the seat also of a provincial diet. It lies 70 miles north-east of Wilna; in lat. 56, 20, N. long. 26, 5, E.

BRASS-ISLAND, one of the Virgin-islands, situated near the north-west end of St. Thomas, on whom it is dependent.

B R

BRASSA, or BRESSA, one of the Shetland isles, belonging to Scotland, formed by the strait called Brassa's-Sund, lying east of the Mainland of Shetland, and about a mile opposite to Lerwic the capital. It is 5 miles long and 2 broad, with an excellent harbour or road of the same dimensions, and has some arable land, and two churches in it.

BRASSINGTON-MOOR, a plain or heath, beginning a little beyond Wirksworth in Derbyshire. From Brassington to Buxton it is full 12 miles; but not quite so much from Wirksworth. Here is a high mountain.

BRASSO. See CRONSTADT in Transylvania.

BRASSY, a small place, with a bailiwick, belonging to the district of Morvant, a subdivision of the government of Nivernois in France.

BRASTEAD, a place in Kent, where a fair is held on May 23.

BRADENBRUNN, or SZELES-KUT, in the Hungarian, a fine, well inhabited and walled town, in the county of Oldenburg, or Sopron; a subdivision of the Farther Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary.

BRATSBURG, one of the bailiwicks belonging to the diocese of Aggerhuus, or Christiana, in Norway.

BRATSKOI, an Ostrog, or place surrounded with palisades and earthen ramparts, in the Circle of Himsloi, a subdivision belonging to the province of Irkutzkaja, in Siberia, and Asiatic part of Russia. It lies on the river Angara; and contiguous to it are about 50 dwelling-houses, and 5 wersts from it is the monastery of Spaskoi.

BRAVA, the capital of an aristocratical republic of the same name, in the country of Ajan, and the only one perhaps in Africa. It lies in lat. 1° N. between two arms of the river Quilmanci, near the maritime-coast, where is a pretty good harbour. It is a large walled city, with houses in the Moorish taste, and inhabited by merchants trading in gold, silver, silk stuffs, &c. who pay the Portuguese a small annual tribute of about 200l. sterling. The principal inhabitants are Mahometans. The body of the people choose from among the most ancient families, 12 cheques, who manage all public matters. On the coast is a great deal of ambergris.

BRAVAHUL, or BRÁVAGHUL, a river of Caffria in Africa, by part of which the country of the Hottentots is bounded to the N. W.

BRAUBACH, a town of Germany, in Witteravia, with a castle, seated on the Rhine, 8 miles S. of Coblenz.

BRAUGHING, in Hertfordshire, was anciently, next to Verulam, the most considerable place in the county. It lies a little E. of the northern road, and thought to be the Cæsaromagus of the Romans, 28 miles from London, according to Antoninus. There are still the ruins of its former grandeur to be seen. It lies exactly 16 miles from Duro-litum (Cheshunt), and 12 from Canonium (Littlebury-hill in Essex). The church is a handsome building, and has a ring of 5 good bells. Near the church-yard is an old house, now inhabited by poor families, which was given with all sorts of furniture for celebrating weddings: some of which were in being a few years ago. Here a fair is annually held on Whitfun-Monday, for toys.

BRAULIO, one of the Alpine mountains, in the country of the Grisons, and on the frontiers of Tirol, near the town of Bormia. It is a large mountain, and the principal of the Rhetic Alps.

BRAUNAW, a town in the Circle of Bavaria in Germany. It is fortified, and lies on the Inn. It held out against the Swedes in 1632, and was garrisoned by the late emperor Charles VII. but taken by the queen of Hungary's troops in 1743. It is situated 26 miles W. of Passau, in lat. 48, 20, N. Long. 13, 15, E.

BRAUNSBURG, a pretty large and good trading-town of Poland, in Regal Prussia. It stands on the Passarge, which not far from hence falls into the Frischaf. It is divided into the Old and New town, is a populous place, and under the Lubecker law. Its celebrated college was formerly a Franciscan convent, and founded by the learned and famous cardinal Hosius, bishop of Ermland, and therefore called Hosianum. Here is also a nunnery. The cathedral has 16 prebends, with the same number of canons. It belongs to the bishop of Ermland. It is a town of Regal Prussia, on the Baltic, about 50 miles S. W. of Königsberg, and subject to Prussia. In 1626 it was taken by the Swedes. Lat. 54, 15, N. Long. 20, 5, E.

BRAUNSFELD, a town of Germany, in the circle of the Upper Rhine, and country of Solmes, with a handsome palace or castle. E. Long. 8, 32. N. Lat. 50, 22.

BRAZZO, LABRAZA, or BRAC, an island in Venetian Dalmatia, and Hungarian Illyrium, in the kingdom of the former name: it is so called from a large village in it.

BREBINCE, or BOURBINCE, a river of Burgundy, in France, which issues out of Lake Longpendu.

BRECHIN, a town of Scotland, in the county of Angus, situated in E. Long. 2, 18. N. Lat. 56, 40. It consists of one large handsome street, and two smaller; and is seated on the side of a small hill, washed by the river Southesk, over which there is a stone-bridge of two large arches. At the foot of the town is a long row of houses independent of it, built on ground held in feu from the family of Northesk. It is a royal borough, and, with four others, sends a member to parliament. In respect to trade, it has only a small share of the linen manufacture. It lies at no great distance from the harbour of Montrose: and the tide flows within two miles of the town; to which a canal might be made, which perhaps might create a trade, but would be of certain service in conveying down the corn of the country for exportation.

Brechin was a rich and ancient bishopric founded by David I. about the year 1150. At the Reformation, its revenues, in money and in kind, amounted to 700l. a year; but, after that event, were reduced to 150l. chiefly by the alienation of lands and tythes by Alexander Campell, the first Protestant bishop, to his chieftain the earl of Argyle. The Culdees had a convent here. Their abbot Leod was witness to the grant made by king David to his new abbey of Dumferline. In after times, they gave way to the Mathurines or Red Friars. The ruins of their house, according to Maitland, are still to be seen in the College Wynd. Here was likewise an hospital called Maison de Dieu, founded in 1256, by William de Brechin, for the repose of the souls of the kings William and Alexander; of John earl of Chester, and of Huntingdon his brother; of Henry his father, and Juliana his mother. Albinus, bishop of Brechin, in the reign of Alexander II. was witness to the grant. By the walls which are yet standing, behind the west end of the chief street, it appears to have been an elegant little building.

The cathedral is a Gothic pile, supported by 12 pillars; is in length 166 feet, in breadth 61: part is ruinous, and part serves as the parish-church. The west end of one of the aisles is entire: its door is Gothic, and the arch consists of many mouldings; the window of it neat tracery. The steeple is a handsome tower, 120 feet high; the four lower windows in form of long narrow openings; the belfry windows adorned with that species of opening called the quatrefoil: the top battlemented, out of which arises a handsome spire. At a small distance from the aisle stands one of those singular round towers whose use has so long baffled the conjectures of antiquaries. These towers appear to have been peculiar to North Britain and Ireland: in the last they are frequent; in the former, only two at this time exist. That at Brechin stood originally detached from other buildings. It is at present joined near the bottom by a low additional aisle to the church, which takes in about a sixth of its circumference. From this aisle there is an entrance into it of modern date, approachable by a few steps, for the use of the ringers: two handsome bells are placed in it, which are got at by means of 6 ladders placed on wooden semicircular floors, each resting on the circular abutments within side of the tower. The height from the ground to the roof is 80 feet; the inner diameter, within a few feet of the bottom, is 8 feet; the thickness of the wall at that part, 7 feet 2 inches; so that the whole diameter is 15 feet 2 inches; the circumference very near 48 feet; the inner diameter at top is 7 feet 8 inches; the thickness of the walls, 4 feet 6 inches; the circumference, 38 feet 8 inches: which proportion gives the building an inexpressible elegance: the top is roofed with an octagonal spire 23 feet high, which makes the whole 103. In this spire are four windows placed alternate on the sides, resting on the top of the tower; near the top of the tower are 4 others facing the 4 cardinal points: near the bottom are two arches, one within another, in relief; on the top of the outmost is a crucifixion: between the mouldings of the outmost and inner are two figures; one of the Virgin Mary; the other of St. John, the carpenter, and lamb. On each corner of the bottom of this arch is a figure of certain beasts; one possibly the Caledonian bear; and the other, with a long snout, the boar. The stone-work within the inner arch.

arch has a small slit or peep-hole, but without the appearance of there having been a door within any modern period; yet there might have been one originally; for the filling up consists of larger stones than the rest of this curious rotund. The whole is built with most elegant masonry, which Mr. Gough observed to be composed of 60 courses. This tower hath often been observed to vibrate with a high wind.

The learned among the antiquaries are greatly divided concerning the use, as well as the founders of these buildings. Some think them Pictish, probably because there is one at Abernethy, the ancient seat of that nation; and others call them Danish, because it was a custom of the Danes to give an alarm in time of danger from high places. But the manner and simplicity of building, in early times, of both these nations, was such as to supersede that notion: besides, there are so many specimens left of their architecture, as tend at once to disprove any conjecture of that kind; the Hebrides, Caithness, and Ross-shire, exhibit reliques of their buildings totally different. They could not be designed as belfries, as they are placed near the steeples of churches, infinitely more commodious for that end; nor places of alarm, as they are often erected in situations unfit for that purpose. The most probable opinion therefore seems to be that of the late Mr. Peter Collinson, viz. that they were Inclusoria; et arcti inclusorii ergastula, the prisons of narrow inclosures: that they were used for the confinement of penitents; some perhaps constrained, others voluntary, Dunchad o Braoin being said to have retired to such a prison, where he died A. D. 987. The penitents were placed in the upper story; after undergoing their term of probation, they were suffered to descend to the next; after that they took a second step, till at length the time of purification being fulfilled, they were released and received again into the bosom of the church. Mr. Collinson says that they were built in the 10th and 11th centuries. The religious were in those days the best architects, and religious architecture the best of any. Ireland being the land of sanctity, Patria Sanctorum, the people of that country might be the original inventors of these towers of mortification. They abound there; and, in all probability, might be brought into Scotland by some of those holy men who dispersed themselves all over Christendom to reform mankind.

The castle of Brechin was built on an eminence, a little south of the town; but no vestige of it is now left. It underwent a long siege in the year 1303; was gallantly defended against the English under Edward III. and, notwithstanding all the efforts of that potent prince, the brave governor, Sir Thomas Maule, ancestor of the present earl of Panmure, held out this small fortress for 20 days, till he was slain by a stone cast from an engine on the 20th of August, when the place was instantly surrendered.

Brechin is also remarkable for a battle fought near it, in consequence of the rebellion raised in 1452, on account of the murder of the earl of Douglas in Stirling castle. The victory fell to the royalists under the earl of Huntly. The malcontents were headed by the earl of Crawford, who, retiring to his castle of Finhaven, in the frenzy of disgrace declared, that he would willingly pass seven years in hell, to obtain the glory which fell to the share of his antagonist.

BRECKNOCKSHIRE, South Wales, an inland county, in the diocese of St. David's, contains 600,000 acres, and 36000 inhabitants, is 39 miles long, and 27 broad, has four market-towns, six hundreds, 61 parishes, and is about 106 miles in circumference. It sends two members to parliament, one whereof is for the county. As to its situation, it is bounded by the county of Radnor on the N. by the counties of Cardigan and Caermarthen on the W. by those of Hereford and Monmouth on the E. and by Glamorganshire on the S. The air of this county is remarkably mild, except only on the hills, which is principally owing to the high mountains that shelter it from the winds on all sides. As to its soil, that on the hills is for the most part barren and stony: there are several springs, however, that issue out of the rocks, which water the vallies in such a manner, as render them very fertile, both in grass and corn. Its principal commodities are cattle, corn, fish, and otters' fur; to these may be added some manufactures of cloth and stockings. Its most considerable rivers are the Uske, the Wye, and the Yrvon. These and all its rivulets, abound with fish of various kinds, but the Wye and the Uske in particular, are noted for fine trout, and the best salmon.

BRECKNOCK, the county town, is 161 miles from London, and 34 from Llanbeder; it is situated in the center of the country, at the confluence of the Hodney and the Uske, over which there is a good stone-bridge. The Romans, as appears from several coins, and other antiquities, had formerly a station in these parts. Its castle and walls were built by one Bernard Newmarch, and was a stately fortress. The town, as to its present state, is well-built, in an oval form, and well walled, with towers for its defence. Its inhabitants who are very numerous, have some small share in the cloathing trade. It contains three parish churches, one whereof is collegiate, and sends one member to parliament. The government of it is vested in two bailiffs, 15 aldermen, two chamberlains, two constables, a town-clerk, and other inferior officers.

B R

Its markets are on Wednesday and Saturday: fairs May 4, July 5, Sept. 10, and Nov. 17.

BREDA, the capital of Dutch Brabant, in the Netherlands. It lies on the river Merk, is a large and beautiful city, with four spacious market-places, and plenty of salt and fresh-water fish, its river falling into the Roover, by which it communicates with the sea.

The great church, now in the hands of the Protestants, has several very fine monuments, and a handsome spire 362 feet high; besides two other churches, the one for the Dutch, and the other for the French Protestants. The Roman Catholics, though more numerous, are allowed only three chapels; but no pastoral functions can be performed by their priests, without leave from the baron of Breda, or his deputy. The Lutherans have also a church here. The town-house is very large. They have an old castle, and also a fine new one, built by king William III.

This city suffered very much during the wars between the States and the Spaniards, who took and retook it alternately; but the former, since 1637, have been in possession of it.

It is a fortified place, and has a Dutch garrison; but the property and civil government of the town and barony belong of right to the Prince of Orange. Here king Charles II. resided, when invited over to England; and from Breda his famous declaration was dated. Between him, Lewis XIV. of France, and the States-General, a peace was concluded here in 1669. It lies 26 miles south-east of Rotterdam, in Lat. 50, 40, N. Long. 4, 40, E.

BREDA, (barony of,) is bounded on the N. by the province of Holland; on the W. by the mayory or manor of Boisdeduc; on the S. by that of Hoogsteden and Ryen; and on the E. by the marquise of Bergen-op-Zoom and Princelund. It was anciently more extensive; but contains now, besides the capital of the same name above-mentioned, only 17 villages or manors. The States-General levy the same duties here as they do in the cities and territories of the republic: though the lord of Breda has very considerable prerogatives; and is possessed of several estates, &c.

BREDE, a place in Suffex, where a fair is held on Easter-Tuesday.

BREDEFOR. See BRETEVORT.

BREDENBERG, or BREITENBERG, one of the fairest small towns belonging to the king of Denmark, in Stormar, a subdivision of Holstein, in Germany. In the civil wars it made a stout resistance against count Wallenstein, who took it by storm, and put all the garrison to the sword. It lies 11 miles N. E. of Gluckstadt.

BREDSTADT, a county of Sleswic, in Denmark, formerly called Norgosharde, is about eight

B R

English miles long, and the same in breadth, being full of marsh-lands. It is subject to the bailiff or amman of Flensburg. Here is an æconomy-college, and a court for regulating all accidents by fire. In civil and ecclesiastical matters it is under the consistory of Flensburg.

Of the same name is an old market-borough belonging to it, which is well-built and populous, resembling a little town. To the south-west of this place a large tract of land was drained in 1742 by Count des Mercieres, and called Sophia Magdalenkoeg.

BREEDING, a well-known harbour of Bradberg fief, in the diocese of Christiana, in Norway, and much resorted to.

BREEVORT, or BREDEVORT, a town of Zutphen, belonging to Guelderland, one of the United Provinces. It lies on a small river near the bishopric of Munster. It is five miles from Groll, to the south, and fortified, being encompassed besides with marshes, so as to be inaccessible but by one narrow path. Prince Maurice taking it in 1597 by storm, his soldiers found therein a very rich booty; and having lost several men before it, he could hardly refrain his enraged soldiers from committing great cruelties, usual on the like occasions.

BREEWOOD, a pretty market-town of Staffordshire, lying south-west of Stafford. Here an annual fair is kept, on September 19.

BREGANCON, a pretty castle on an island belonging to the provincial bailiwick of Heires, and Lower Provence, in the government of the latter name in France.

BREGANZA, a place belonging to Il Vicentino, one of the provinces of the Venetian dominions, in Upper Italy; in the neighbourhood of which a sweet wine is produced, that is greatly admired.

BREGENTZ, or BERGENTS. Antoninus's Brigantia, a town of Suabia, in Germany, but annexed to Tirol. It lies at the east extremity of the lake of Constance, hence called Lacus Brigantinus; once a famous city, but now much declined. It is six miles south of Lindau, and subject to Austria; in lat. 47, 30, N. Long. 4, 40, E.

It is the capital of a county of the same name, bounded on the N. by the territory of Wangen; on the E. by the bishopric of Augsburg and county of Tirol; on the S. by the counties of Pludentz and Montfort; and on the W. by the Rhine and lake of Constance. It is mountainous, particularly on the east side.

BREHNA, a small town in Thuringia, with a seat and voice in the provincial diets; and was anciently the capital of the county of Brehna.

BREIDE, a narrow pass of Gulbrandsdalen, and diocese of Christiana, in Sweden, famous for the defeat of a body of Scots, in 1612, under Saintclair their commander, who wanted to join the Swedes, but were beaten by some peasants, who had hastily assembled themselves here. In this place a monument has been erected with an inscription on it.

BREISACH, or BRISAC, (New,) a considerable fortress, built by the French in the county of Harburg, and in the Wirtemberg territories, belonging to the Sundgaw, in the government of Alsace. It stands close by the west shore of the Rhine, and opposite to old Brisac; which latter is in Suabia, 30 miles south of Straßburg, and subject to the house of Austria; in lat. 48, 10, N. Long. 7, 15, E.

New Brisac is a regular octangle, and so exactly constructed in the inside, that from the large market-place one may see its four gates. Lewis XIV. built it after the peace of Ryswic. Just by is fort Mortier, upon a branch of the abovementioned river, with Jacob-Schanze or fort James, not far off.

BREITENBACH, a large market-town, seated on a small river, in a pleasant situation, in Schwarzburg, having two churches and a palace.

BREITENECK, a lordship with a small town, which has a citadel, in the Upper Palatinate, BREMEN, (duchy of,) in Lower Saxony, in Germany. It borders on the Elbe, which separates it from Holstein to the N. E. on the Weser, which parts it from Westphalia to the S. on the German ocean on the W. and Lunenburg on the S. E. Its dimensions are variously given. The Present State of Germany makes it 60 miles in length, and 40 in breadth, including Verdun.

Hubner divides it into 12 districts: and others into five; 1. The land of Bremen Proper, which lies some miles round the city of its name; 2. Wursterland, along the coast from the Weser to the mouth of the Elbe: 3. Hadeland, the N. part of the duchy, at the mouth of the Elbe, whose inhabitants are so fond of gay clothes, that it is proverbially said, "There are no peasants in Hadeland;" one part belongs to Hamburgh, and the other to Saxelawenburg: 4. Kedingerland; in which is situated, 5. Altland, a fruitful tract of about 14 miles in length.

Between Bremen and Stade the country is either a barren sand, or morass; but towards the rivers are pleasant fields, meadows, and orchards. The inhabitants were formerly valiant, and are still reckoned as good soldiers as any in Germany. The situation of the country between two such navigable rivers, has given the minds of the people in general a turn to trade.

This country was long subject to its archbishop, till, by the treaty of Westphalia, his diocese being secularized, was converted into a duchy, and given to the Swedes, in lieu of other places taken by them during the civil war in Germany, and for restoring its peace. They continued masters of it till 1712, when this country and Verdun were conquered by the king of Denmark; who soon after mortgaged it to the late elector of Hanover, king George I. of Great Britain; who, in the year 1715, had 250,000*l.* granted him by parliament, for enabling him to make a purchase of it.

In 1720 Sweden consented in form to the dismembering of this duchy from her dominions, and confirmed it to the house of Hanover. The common dialect here is a sort of Lower Saxon, neither Low nor High Dutch, but the root of both: yet every one understands the latter. The rivers Tech, Humme, and Hamma, join together, and fall into the Weser; as do the Brept, Luni, Stotel, &c. The Eska, Schwingel, and Oste, empty themselves into the Elbe.

BREMEN, an imperial city in the above duchy of its own name, and its capital, is situated on a plain on both sides of the river Weser, over which it has a bridge. Only a small quarter of the town, in which stands the cathedral, is subject to the elector of Hanover: the rest, with its territories, is free, and under its own laws and magistrates, chosen out of the citizens, who profess Calvinism, which is the established religion; and they have five churches for the citizens of that persuasion. The number of inhabitants is computed at 30,000. The greatest part of the streets are narrow; the shops are well-stored with merchandize; and they have many houses of good appearance. They have a town-house, an exchange, and water-works supplied from the river, an hospital, and a gymnasium.

In the market-place is the figure of a man in armour, called Rowland, or Royland, from the name of a general, by whom, say they, this was made a free city. The figure, however, serves to keep up a sense of freedom; though under the burlesque form of a giant of about 14 feet high.

But nothing is so remarkable in this place as the cathedral, where worship is performed after the Lutheran manner. It is a Gothic building; and under it is a vault, in which are the bodies of several persons, first discovered about 60 years since. These lie in it as one common grave; their skins look black and parched, but their features are distinguishable; they are extremely light, but the cohesion of the parts entire.

Bremen, standing on the Weser, but 12 German miles from the sea, would be as advantageously situated for trading as Hamburgh; but the ships of burthen cannot come within eight miles of the town, as there is often not above four feet water, therefore are obliged to unlade at Brake or Elsfleth. This deficiency is supplied by boats, and does not hinder their their building large fly-boats at the town. Notwithstanding the neighbourhood of Hamburg, the trade is here considerable. In 1757 it was taken by the French, who attacked it also again in 1761, but were repulsed. They have fresh fish in plenty in some seasons: and are said to dress leather extremely well. It lies 70 miles N. W. of Zell, in lat. 53, 8, N. Long. 9, 14, E.

BREMERFURD, or BREME-VERDEN, a walled town of Bremen, in Lower Saxony, Germany. It has a good castle, but its fortifications and town were laid open in 1683; has a palace on the river Oste, which runs into the Elbe. It lies 15 miles S. of Stade, and 27 N. of Bremen. Its principal trade consists in passengers to and from these two last-mentioned towns. It has been twice taken; but restored each time. At this place the duchy-chancery is kept. It lies in lat. 53, 48, N. Long. 8, 35, E.

BREMETOMACÆ, a famous station of Antoninus, in Lancashire; on the site of which stands Overborough. The military way may still be traced from Cocæum or Ribchester to it. Here is a fine park, with gardens.

BREMGARTEN, a borough of the free provinces, a subdivision of Baden, in Swisserland. It belongs to the 8 old cantons, who choose their chief magistrate; but in capital causes it is subject to Zurich. It is encompassed on three sides by the river Rufs, over which is a good wooden bridge. It consists of the Upper and Lower town: has a considerable trade, particularly in paper. It is entirely Catholic, and lies in the road to Lucerne, 12 miles W. of Zurich. Lat. 47, 26, N. Long. 8, 22, E.

BREMIS, a village of the Valesians, in alliance with the Swiss cantons. It stands on the confluence of the Rhone and Borni. Here is a church and a monastery hewn out of a rock, but deserted since the 16th century. It lies opposite to Sion.

BREMSNAS, a place in the diocese of Drontheim, in Norway, where a remarkable glass or goblet of cast crystal, and surrounded with a gold rim, was found in 1672, full of ashes. This urn is preserved in the royal museum at Copenhagen.

BRENBURG. See BERNBURG.

BRENDOLA, the seat of a vicariate, in the Vicentino, a province belonging to the republic of Venice, in Upper Italy. To it belong 11 villages.

BRENNE, a damp and marshy track belonging to the government of Touraine, in France. See BRANE.

BRENNER, (Mount), the highest part of the Alps, at the foot of which stands the city of Brixen, in Austria. Though for 9 months covered with snow, it is inhabited to the very top, and produces corn and grass in abundance. The passage of this mountain is very difficult.

B R

BRENO, the capital of the valley of Camonica, belonging to the Bresciano, a territory of the Venetian dominions, in Upper Italy. It lies near Oglio, where is a podestaria.

BRENT, Devonshire, 6 miles from Ashburton, 198 miles from London; has a market on Saturday. Fairs May 13, and October 10.

BRENT, a river in Middlesex, which runs into the Thames at Brentford.

BRENT, a river in Somersetshire, which rises in Selwood-forest, and after receiving a considerable number of smaller streams, falls into the sea, or Bristol Channel, a few miles below Bridgewater.

BRENTE, a river rising in the bishopric of Trent, in Austria, runs S. E. through the Venetian territories in Italy, and falls into the Adriatic, opposite to Venice.

BRENTFORD, a market town with a ford, on the river Brent, in Middlesex, where it falls into the Thames. It is divided into the Old and New; the former to the E. and the latter to the W. where is the market-house and the church. This place being a great thoroughfare to the W. and about 10 miles in the same direction from London, and near the Thames, has a considerable trade, particularly in corn, both by land and water carriage. Here are two charity-schools. On the N. side of it is an airy place called the Butts, with several seats in it, where the poll is always taken for knights of the shire. And on the W. side near the Thames, is Sion-house, a seat of the duke of Northumberland. A little to the N. W. of Brentford lies Osterley-house, built by sir Thomas Gresham, founder of the Royal Exchange in London, with a fine park. Its weekly market is on Tuesday, and its annual fair on July 7.

BRENTFORD, a town in Connecticut, and county of New-Haven; considerable for its iron-works. It is situated on the side of a river of the same name, which runs into Long-Island Sound, 10 miles E. from New-haven. Long. 55, 15. Lat. 41, 15.

BRENT-KNOWLE, a rising ground in the flat country of Somersetshire, midway between Bridgewater and Uxbridge. It commands a very wide prospect all round. The low part between Bridgewater and Bristol suffered greatly by a dreadful inundation of the sea, occasioned by the storm of 1703; at which time a ship was driven several hundred yards beyond the usual high-water mark here, and left on the land.

BRENTWOOD, a village in Connecticut, on the coast opposite Long Island, New England; which was destroyed by the British forces, July 16, 1770.

BRENTWOOD, or BURNTWOOD, a large market-town of Essex. It stands on a hill, and is principally principally maintained by the number of carriers and passengers continually going this way to London, with droves of cattle, provisions, and manufactures. On Purstow-wood-common, in the neighbourhood, are frequent horse-races. The town lies 18 miles E. of London. Its weekly market is on Thursday; and fairs on May 17, 18, 19, and September 12, 13, 14, 15.

BRESCAR, by Arabic authors Berfac, and Ptolemy's Campi Germani, an ancient Roman city of Sargel, in Africa, full of old monuments and structures. It is walled, and very populous, the inhabitants stout, and mostly employed in the weaving business. The neighbouring territory abounds with corn, flax, linen, and cattle, particularly excellent figs exported into all parts of Barbary.

BRESCIA, or BRIXIA, a fortified city of Bresciano, one of the Venetian territories in Upper Italy. It stands on the river Garza, which runs through it, and its walls are watered by the Mela on the W. and Navilio on the E. It has a strong castle upon a hill. Besides the cathedral, here are 19 parish-churches, 45 convents and foundations, with a general hospital. Its bishop is under the metropolitan of Milan, and has the titles of duke, marquis, and count; with considerable revenues. The cathedral is a beautiful new structure; to which its famous bishop, cardinal Quirini, contributed very largely, and gave the town a library, two marble busts of whom the magistrates erected in 1750; the one in this church, and the other at the entrance into the library. Among the curious reliques in the former, is an Oriofamma, as it is called, or a sky-blue cross, said to be that which appeared in the air to Constantine the Great. The number of its inhabitants is nearly 50,000, and the gentry here live nobly.

This city drives a considerable traffic, particularly in fire-arms, swords, knives, cutlery, and other iron wares, all in great estimation. They make also fine linen cloths, and deal in many other kinds of merchandize. Not only the men, but the very women, go about the streets and sit in the shops, as in England and France. It lies 30 miles N. of Cremona, in lat. 45, 31, N. Long. 10, 5, E.

BRESCIANO, or BRESSANO, (territory of), in Latin Ager Brixianus, a province belonging to the republic of Venice, in Upper Italy. It is bounded on the E. by the Lago di Guarda, on the W. it incloses the Lago d'Isèo (Lacus Sabinus), on the S. the little lake Idro, and has the Bergamasco on the W. Besides the two lakes just-mentioned, it is watered by the river Oglio, which falls into the Lake Isèo. Its other rivers are Mela, Garza, Noviglio, and Chiese; the three first of which unite a little above Brescia, and a little below they divide themselves into several branches. Hence the whole territory, being intersected by so many streams, is mostly divided into valleys, as Val Camonica, Trompia, Sabbia, and Salò.

The territory of Brescia is a part of Lombardy, for the most part, indeed, mountainous, yet abounding in wine, oil, wheat, and other grain. It has also iron, copper, silver, gold, allum, and marble of different colours.

BRESCOW, a fort in the diocese of Agde, belonging to Lower Languedoc, in the government of the latter name, in France. It stands on a rock in the sea, near the mouth of the river Craut, and the promontory of Agde.

BRESELLO. See BERSELLO.

BRESELLO, a town of Modena, situated on the S. shore of the river Po, 25 miles N. W. of Modena, and 20 S. of Mantua. E. long. 11, 0. Lat. 44, 40.

BRESINI, a town of Poland, in the palatinate of Lencici, 15 miles S. E. of Rava. Long. 20, 22, E. Lat. 50, 2, N.

BRESLAU, a small duchy of Lower Silesia, in Germany, lying between those of Wolaw, Oliffe, Briegg, Schwednitz, and Lignitz. It is every where level and flat; is an excellent corn country, yielding also good pasture; abounding also with herds of cattle and flocks of sheep; but destitute of wood, except in one district or circle; and the roads in general are very bad. It is an immediate principality, that is, one of which both the property and jurisdiction belong to the king, forming a part of one of the three bailiwicks into which all the immediate principalities are divided. This duchy was ceded to the king of Prussia by the Austrians in 1748.

BRESLAU, the chief town of the duchy of that name, and of all Silesia, is situated at the conflux of the Oder and Ohlau, in E. long. 17, 5. N. Lat. 51, 4. Including the suburbs, it is of great extent; having many large regular squares, broad streets, stately public and private edifices; but the fortifications are of no great importance. Here are in particular a great many churches and convents belonging to the Catholics; of the former are several also belonging to the Lutherans, one to the Calvinists, and another to the Greeks. The Jews have likewise two synagogues, the bishop a stately palace, and the Lutherans two gymnasiums. The Polish university is a noble structure, nor is the exchange destitute of magnificence. This city is the seat of all the high colleges; and the third in rank, next to Berlin and Königsberg, in all the Prussian dominions. The magistracy of it is Lutheran, and its trade and manufactures are very considerable. Several of the monasteries and nunneries are very magnificent; and there are also some good public libraries in it, with two armouries, a college of physicians, and a mint. Breslau is very populous, and much frequented by Hungarian, Bohemian, Polish, Polish, and other merchants, having several yearly fairs. The city was taken by the king of Prussia in 1741, and retaken by the Austrians in 1757; but the king of Prussia took it back again the same year, and gained a signal victory over the Austrians at Lenthén, a village not far from the capital. Lat. 51, 3, N. Long. 17, 13, E.

BRESLAW, a town in Lithuania, Poland, stands near a great lake on the confines of Courland, 80 miles N. E. of Wilna, and 88 S. E. from Riga. It is built of timber, but defended by a castle on a rock; and has a large jurisdiction, which Hartnack (the most learned of the Polish geographers) reckons a part of Wilna.

BRESLE, (La), a town of Lyormois, a subdivision of the government of the latter name, in France. It is situated between the mountains, on the river Tardive, and suffered greatly by an inundation in the year 1715.

BRESSE, (La), a subdivision of the government of Burgundy, in France. It is bounded on the N. by Burgundy, on the N. E. by Franche Comté, on the E. by Savoy, on the S. by Vernois, and on the W. it has the principality of Dombes and the Soane, which divide it from Maçonnois. It takes its name from a forest called Brexia, and had been long in the hands of the dukes of Savoy, under the title of a county, till, by the treaty of Lyons, in 1601, they ceded it to France, for the marquisate of Saluzzo. It has its particular states, who meet here every three years, in order to deliberate on the affairs of their own district, and afterwards send deputies to the assembly of the states of Burgundy. Its capital is Bourg.

BRESSVIRE, a town of Poitou, in France, according to some authors; but neither Busching nor any modern maps have it. It lies 35 miles N. W. of Poitiers. Lat. 46, 50, N. Long. 0, 30, W.

BREST, in Latin Brestia, formerly Gesocribate; a famous sea-port town in the government of Brittany, in France. It is situated at the N. side of a large commodious bay or harbour, opening to the Atlantic ocean, in the most extreme western part of that kingdom. It is a small but strong place, and the streets are narrow. It is defended by a castle upon a rock, which is very steep towards the sea, and on the land-side surrounded with a broad ditch, a tower, and some other works.

The harbour, lying between the town and suburb of Recouvrance, has a narrow entrance, called the Goulet, which is extremely difficult by reason of some rocks covered at high-water, known by the names of Minons, Filets, and Minganti. This port, therefore, is one of the French king's capital ports for his ships, and the best and securest anchorage for the royal navy in all the kingdom, where the greatest number of them, as at Toulon the ships of largest burthen, winter and are fitted out. It suffered greatly by a fire in 1776.

At Brest are laid up all sorts of naval stores and provisions, to furnish, they say, 70 men of war; and ships of 80 and 90 guns are built here, which renders this a populous and rich place. In the castle is always kept a strong garrison, which is commanded by staff officers. Here is also an arsenal, an admiralty, and a provincial bailiwick. It has two parish-churches, a seminary, and a convent: here is likewise an academy for the marine.

In 1694 the English attempted to take the town of Brest; but the design unhappily perishing, the avenues to the place were so strongly defended by a numerous train of artillery, and a superior army to that of the invaders, that general Talmash, who commanded the English, was mortally wounded in making the descent, and the forces obliged to re-embark with loss. It lies about 50 miles N. W. of Belle-Isle, 150 in the same direction from Nantz, and 300 W. of Paris, in lat. 48, 23, N. Long. 4, 36, W.

BRESTE, (the palatinate of), is one of the provinces of Cujava, in Poland. It lies between the palatinates of Ploesko, Rava, and Lincici-Wladislaw. It is divided into 4 chatelanies, and Brest is the capital of the whole.

BRESTE, or BESSICI, the capital of the palatinate of Bressici, and of Polefia, in Poland, seated on the river Bug, 80 miles E. of Warsaw, and subject to Poland. It is a fortified town, and has a castle built upon a rock. Here is a famous synagogue, resorted to by the Jews from all the countries in Europe. Long. 24, 0, E. Lat. 41, 35, N.

BRETAGNE. See BRITTANY.

BRETCHER, in Polish Grathan; a town and castle of Culmerland, in Polish Prussia. It lies on the Drebnitz, and was built in the year 1254.

BRETEUIL, a town and viscounty of Upper Normandy, in the government of the latter name, in France. It is situated on the river Iton, and is the seat of a forest-bailiwick, 35 miles S. of Rouen, in lat. 48, 50, N. Long. 1, 5, E.

BRETON, (Cape), an island of North America, situated in the Atlantic ocean, and separated from Acadia or Nova-Scotia by the narrow strait of Canso. This island properly belongs to the division of Acadia or Nova-Scotia. It is about 140 miles long, and upwards of 50 broad. It lies between lat. 45 and 48, N. and between long. 61 and 62, W.

It is a small settlement, full of mountains and lakes, being intersected by a vast many creeks and bays, almost meeting each other on every side. It seems in general, both for the coast and inland, very much to resemble those of the most northern countries, as Scotland, Iceland, Denmark, and Sweden. Though it be covered with snow in winter, and subject to great fogs even in summer, yet the soil is sufficiently fruitful in certain parts; it being excessively cold, it hardly produces any corn or grass: it however yields vast quantities of timber in every part for all uses. In the earth are coals; and on its shores is one of the most valuable fisheries in the world. The only town in this island is Louisburg. See LOUISBURG.

The possessors of Cape Breton command the navigation to Canada by the river St. Lawrence. The English took it from the French in 1745, but restored it to them by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748. They again took it in 1759, and are still in possession of it and Louisburg.

BRETON, a river in Suffolk, which runs into the Stoure near Hadley.

BRETEN, a town belonging to the Palatinate of the Rhine, and on the frontiers of Wirtemberg, in Germany. It is the capital of its bailiwick, and is the birth-place of the famous divine Melancthon, who composed the Augsborg Confession. It lies ten miles E. of Philippsburg, and 18 S. of Heidelberg. Some place it in Creigow.

BRETTIGAW, a territory or valley of the Grisons, lying between the Rhine and the county of Tyrol, and on the river Lanquet. The fortrels of Castle is the principal town.

BREVORDT, a town of Guelderland, one of the Seven United Provinces, in the Netherlands. It lies 24 miles south-east of Zutphen, in lat. 52, 5, N. long. 6, 35, E.

BREUSCH, in Latin Bruscha, a very considerable river of Lower Alsace, in the government of the latter name, now a province belonging to France. It rises in the Wasgau mountains, in the county of Salm, and in the bailiwick of Dachstein divides itself into two branches; one of which receives the river Mosly, and runs above Strasburg into the Ill, through the canal made by Lewis XIV. which is four French leagues in length, 24 feet in breadth, and eight in depth; so that all timber materials for building may be carried upon it: but the other runs through Strasburg, and below this city mingles its waters with the Ill. Into the Breusch fall the rivers Sauvel, Mossig, Hasel, &c.

BREWERSHAVEN, a good harbour at the north extremity of the isle of Chiloe, lying off the coast of Chili, in South America, which the Dutch entered with a squadron and land forces, in the year 1642, with a view of making settlements at Baldivia and other parts of Chili, but they were driven out from hence by the Spaniards, in conjunction with the natives. It lies in Lat. 42, 5, S. Long. 82, 10, W.

BREWOD, in Staffordshire, a pretty country town, on the S. side of Boscobel, 120 miles from London; has a market on Tuesday, and a fair September 19. The parishioners adorn their well here on Holy Thursday like those of Bilbrook, with boughs and flowers. Here is a free-school. A dreadful earthquake is said to have happened here the 4th of November, 1678.

BREY, a town belonging to the principality of Liege, in Germany. It lies 11 miles W. of Maesyc, and 16 N. of Maestricht; and is subject to the bishop of Liege. Lat 51, 15, N. Long. 5, 40, E.

BREYDA-FIARDAR-DALER, a district in the western quarter of Iceland, in Norway, so called from the bay Breydashordur. It is the most pleasant, if not the only pleasant part in all this island. Between the mountains, which run parallel, are green and delightful alleys, watered by frequent small streams, and in the bay are several isles.

BREYNANDY, a river in Pembrokeshire which runs into the Clidhy, near Llaneykeyen.

BREZAN, a well-inhabited town of Red Russia, in Little Poland: where is a strong castle. At this place the Poles were encamped in 1698.

BREZOWA, a very populous town in Vihely district, and county of Neutra, in the Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. The inhabitants follow husbandry and handicraft trades.

BREZESC, or BREZESTI, oddly spelt by the Poles Brzesc, in Latin Palatinatus Brestiensis, a palatinate of Cujavia, which is a subdivision of Great Poland. It includes Kruszwica and Kowal. It is very fertile in all sorts of grain, of which it exports vast quantities to Dantzic.

Of the same name with the Palatinate is a town surrounded with a wall, rampart, and ditch. It is situated in a marshy country, 16 miles W. of the Weiffel, and 30 S. W. of Thorn. Herein is a castellain, forest, and provincial court.

BREZESKI, or BRZESKI, a territory belonging to Lithuanian Russia, in Lithuania Proper, in Poland.

In it is a middling and fortified town of the same name, or Brzesc; it has a castle upon a rock, on the river Bug, in a marshy situation. Without the town is a royal palace and garden.

The famous Jewish synagogue here is resorted to by those of this nation from all parts of Europe, both on account of studying, and for the sake of preferment. Here is also a Greek bishop and a provincial diet. See POLESIA.

BRIANCON, in Latin Brigantio, the capital of Brianconnois, a subdivision of the Lower Delphinat, in the government of Dauphiny, in France. It is a small, but ancient town, and the seat of an election. It has a strong castle on a steep rock, at the foot of which the place lies. Just by the little rivers Dure and Ance unite their waters, and so form the Durance. It is situated 45 miles S. E. of Grenoble. Lat. 44, 50, N. Long. 6, 20, E.

BRIANCONNOIS, a subdivision of the Lower Delphinat, in the government of Dauphiny, in France. It lies to the E. of Graisivaudan, and W.

of Piemont, being part of the Alpes Cottiae, and entirely among these mountains.

Through this country goes one of the principal roads out of France into Italy. The inhabitants long maintained their freedom; but at length they submitted to the Dauphins of Viennois, upon very advantageous conditions, and that they should be preserved in the same state in which they had been time out of mind.

All that part of Briançonnois on the east of the Alps, towards Piemont, and in the diocese of Turin and Salucces, was yielded by Lewis XIV. of France, in consequence of the treaty of Utrecht, to the duke of Savoy, who gave up to the French in exchange, all that belonged to him on the west of the Alps, and in the diocese of Ambrun.

BRIARE, in Latin Brivodurum, a small city of Gatinois-Orleannois, a subdivision of Orleanois Proper, in the government of the former name, in France. It is situated on the Loire, over which is a bridge. Here is only one street. But it is principally noted for the canal that begins at Briare, which unites the Loire with the Seine, by means of the river Loing, the water being brought over hills. It passes at Montargis and Chatillon, and falls into the Loing at Cepoi. The duties paid by the boats on this canal are said to amount at present to 100,000 livres per annum. By means of this canal a communication has been opened between Paris and the sea, and between that capital and the inland provinces situated on the Loire, or where other rivers fall into it. Briare lies 75 miles S. of Paris. Lat. 47, 40, N. Long. 2, 45, E.

BRICK-HILL, (Little,) a place in Buckinghamshire, where fairs are held on May 1, and October 18.

BRIDGEND, in Glamorganshire, seven miles from Cowbridge, 27 from Cardiff, and 176 from London. It is seated on the river Ogmore, which divides it into two parts, but they are joined together by a stone-bridge. Market on Saturday, fairs Nov. 17, and Holy Thursday.

BRIDGENORTH, or BRUGES, Salop, 135 miles from London; is a very ancient, large, and populous town on the Severn, which flows among the rocks here with a steep fall; and consisting of the Upper and Lower towns, separated by the river, over which it has a stone-bridge, that has a gate and gate-house on it, besides some houses. Its situation is pleasant, as well as commodious for trade; its air healthy, and its prospect delightful. Many of the houses are founded upon a rock, and most of the cellars are hewn out of it; on the roof of which are gardens made without much cost or art; and pathways made over them, so that one may walk over the tops of several houses, without danger or difficulty. On the S. side of the hill, where it is very steep, a castle stood once, since demolished, and part of it converted into one of the finest bowling-greens in the kingdom for its prospect. Upon the brow of this hill there is a walk, which Charles I. said he thought the pleasantest in his dominions. The town consists chiefly of three streets, well paved with pebbles, and well-built; one of which, called Mill-street, because it leads to the town-mills, parallel to the river on the west side, is adorned with stately structures. It is a place of great trade both by land and water, and has many great privileges granted to it by charters. It is governed by two bailiffs, elected yearly out of the 24 aldermen, who are such as have gone through all the offices of the town, by a jury of 14 men; together with 48 common-council-men, a recorder, town-clerk, &c. Its market, which is on Saturday, is well stocked with all sorts of provisions; and its fairs, which are on Thursday before Shrove-Sunday, June 30, August 2, October 29, are resorted to from most parts of the kingdom, for cattle, sheep, butter, cheese, bacon, linen-cloth, hops, and most other merchandize. The town is also noted for gun-makers, and its stocking manufacture.

Here are two churches, St. Mary Magdalen's and St. Leonard's; which, though the parishes are large, and the town very populous, are but indifferently endowed; here is also a free-school, that maintains 18 scholars at Oxford. A hollow way cut through the rock, in some parts 20 feet deep, leads from the high town to the bridge, besides many vaults and dwellings hewn out of the rock. The town is not only supplied with water by leaden pipes from a spring half a mile off, but the Severn water is thrown up to the top of the castle-hill. Very good mills on the little river Worfe, which falls into the Severn, belong also to the town. It was fortified formerly, but now the ruins of the castle are only visible. In the high church-yard is an hospital for 10 poor widows. It lies 15 miles S. E. of Shrewsbury.

BRIDGE, or St. Michael's Precinct, includes the S. part of the island of Barbadoes, one of the Caribbee islands, in the Atlantic ocean, and contains the parishes of St. Michael, St. George, and St. John.

BRIDGE-TOWN, or City, the capital of the island of Barbadoes. It lies on its S. W. part, and in the precinct last-mentioned: it is a fine large place. It was first called St. Michael's, from the church in it dedicated to the archangel, and has its present name from a bridge in its E. part, which is laid over the waters that come from the neighbouring marshes after rain. It is in the innermost part of Carlisle-bay, which can contain 500 ships, being a league and a half broad, and a league long. The neighbouring grounds being low, were usually over-overflowed, and a noisome marsh, till the inhabitants drained them. But there is still one E. of the town, occasioned by great floods.

The town lies at the entrance of St. George's valley, that runs several miles into the country. Formerly a river fell into the bay at the bridge, by which sloops could come about a mile up into the country, but is now quite choked up. The houses, which are of brick or stone, are about 1200, being high, and the streets broad. The harbour lies open to the W. but is secure from the N. E. which is the constant trade-wind here, and blows from morning till evening. But during the hurricanes, to which this island is very subject, such ships as happen to be in the bay, are in the utmost danger of being wrecked on the shore, if they cannot get out to sea; and therefore seldom venture to ride out those storms. The bay, formed by Needham and Pelican points, has 20 fathoms water, so clear that one may see the bottom; yet so foul and rocky, that the cables are always buoyed up with casks. As the wind generally blows from the E. or N. E. the E. part of the town is called windward, and the W. part leeward. The wharfs and quays are very convenient. And here are several forts towards the sea. The first of these to the west is James's fort, near Steuart's wharf, mounting 18 guns, where is a fine council-house. The next is Willoughby's, built on a neck of land that runs out into the sea, with 20 guns. Above Needham's and more within the land, is the royal citadel called St. Anne's fort, the strongest in the island. Charles fort on Needham's point lies out in the sea to windward of the bay and town, and built with stone and lime. From this a platform runs towards Ormond's fort, in the leeward part. On the E. side of the town is a small fort of eight guns, and a magazine built of stone, for powder and stores, under a strong guard.

In short, this is not only the safest, but the richest place in all the Carribbees; the store-houses and shops being very well furnished. The church here is large, with a good ring of bells, and a curious clock. Here are large taverns and eating-houses, with a post-house; and packet-boats carry letters to and from this island monthly. The number of militia for the town and precinct is 1200, called the royal regiment of foot-guards. This is the seat of the governor, assembly, and courts.

About a mile from the town to the N. E. is the governor's house, called Pilgrims. From the town to it along the shore runs a line, fortified with a parapet; and at Fontabel, about a mile and a half N. W. of the town, is a battery of 10 guns. From Maxwell fort runs a ridge of hills to Harrison's, the farthest plantation to the W. Under Chace's plantation is a battery of 12 guns, called Randal's fort; and great rocks and steep cliffs lie from thence to Mellows-bay, where is another battery with the same number of guns. The town having been burnt was rebuilt with stone and brick. Formerly there was a mole in Carlisle-bay, which ran out from James's fort into the sea; but a hurricane in 1694 ruined it.

Near the church is a convenient building, handsomely endowed for a free-school; also an allowance for 20 poor widows. A college has likewise been erected here, and endowed by Colonel Christopher Codrington, for propagating the Christian religion among the negroes in this and the neighbouring Carribbees, and for teaching surgery and physic. Labat, who was here in 1700, says, that in this town there was no want of gold-smiths, jewellers, watchmakers, and other curious artists; and a splendor and elegance in the houses not to be equalled any where else. It lies in lat. 13, 30, N. long. 58, 10, W. See BARBADOES.

BRIDGEWATER, a small town in the county of Bristol, and colony of New Plymouth, in Massachusetts-bay, New-England, near Town-river, which empties itself into Narraganset-bay, Rhode-Island. It is about 5 miles N. E. from Raynham, and 10 W. from Duxbury.

BRIDGEWATER, in Somersetshire, 143 miles from London; was given, after the conquest to one Walter, a Norman; and in all the old charters, particularly king John's, the first that made it a free borough; it is called Brugge-Walter, or Walter's-Borough. The castle here was built in the reign of king John. Here is a quay called the haven, and a stone-bridge over the river Parret. King Edward II. and Edward III. confirmed its charter of king John. Edward IV. and queen Elizabeth, or as some say Henry IV. granted it others, for changing the bailiff to the mayor, who governs it, together with a recorder, two aldermen, who are justices of the peace, and 24 common-council-men. They have also a town-clerk, clerk of the market, water-bailiff, and two serjeants at mace, and out of the common-council are annually chosen two bailiffs, who have the same power as sheriffs, and a receiver, who collects the town rents and makes payments.

The revenues, which consist of the manor of the borough, the great and small tithes, the manor of East-Stour in Dorsetshire, &c. are valued at 10,000l. a year. Its freemen are free in all the ports of England and Ireland, but London and Dublin; and the sheriff of the county cannot send any process into the borough, it having been made a distinct county by Henry VIII. It has a spacious town-hall, and a high cross with a cistern over it, to which water is conveyed by an engine from a neighbouring brook, and carried from hence to most of the streets. Its church has a spire, it is said to be one of the lofliest in England; and here is a fine meeting-house, with an advanced seat for the mayor and aldermen who happen to be Dissenters, as also a private academy for such of their youth as are intended for preachers. Here is a large free-school belonging to the chamber, and under it are lodgings for the poor of the parish. Here is also a neat almshouse, but it is inhabited by the poor without endowment. Its markets are on Thursday and Saturday; the last granted by Henry VII. and its fairs, which are two days each, are the second Thursday in Lent, June 24, October 2, and December 28. In a field here, called the Friars, where St. Matthew's fair is kept, was a priory, which, in the reign of Henry VIII. was dissolved with the other religious houses. King James again dignified it by a charter, which gave all the parishioners the same privilege as the burgesses.

The town stands where the Parret runs into the Bristol-channel, from whence a spring-tide flows 22 feet at the quay, and comes in with so much rage and roar, that it is called a Boar. Ships of 200 tons may come up to its quay; by which convenience for navigation, they carry on a pretty good coast-trade to Bristol, and all down the Severn, to Wales for coals, to Cornwall for slate, &c. and at least 20 coal-ships are constantly employed. The receipt of the customs here amounts to about 3000l. a year. Its foreign trade is chiefly to Portugal and Newfoundland. Wool is brought here in good quantities from Ireland. A great retail trade is carried on here, and its Thursday's market is the most considerable in the county for corn, cattle, hogs, sheep; and for cheese there are few, if any, greater markets in the kingdom, many waggon loads coming in here, on a market-day, for Devonshire; Tuesday and Saturday are great flesh markets, and the shambles the finest in England for their bigness. The best of provisions are so cheap here, that it may justly be called a paradise for epicures.

BRIDLINGTON, or BURLINGTON, the capital of New Jersey in North-America. It lies in the subdivision of West Jersey, upon an island in the middle of Delaware river, and opposite to Philadelphia, in which, though few or no plantations are within 20 miles of it, the courts and assembly of West-Jersey used to be kept. The houses are mostly of brick, and well built: and here is a market-place, supplied with plenty of provisions. It hath a town-house and two good bridges over the river, namely, London-bridge and York-bridge. It carries on a brisk trade through its easy communication with Philadelphia and the ocean, by means of the river Salem, which falls into Delaware-bay. The town is laid out into spacious streets, with commodious quays and wharfs, which can receive ships of 2 or 300 tons. It lies 20 miles N. of Philadelphia. Lat. 40, 40, N. Long. 74, 10, W.

BRIDPORT, Dorsetshire, between two rivers, 6 miles from Lime, 145 from London, from whence it is a thoroughfare to Devonshire, not far from the shore of the Channel. In the time of the Saxons it had a mint; and was created a borough by king Henry III. The corporation under the king are entire lords of all. It had once a good harbour and trade, and manufactured so much hemp in ropes, cables, &c. that, in the reign of Henry VIII. it was ordered that the cordage for the English navy should, for a limited time, be made here, or within 5 miles of it, and no where else; which act was confirmed by almost every parliament for near 60 years after. Yet this trade is sunk to little or nothing, though the soil, between this place and Beaminster, is so fruitful in hemp, that, when a man was hanged, it was proverbially said, he was stabbed with a Bridport dagger; and as for the harbour it has been long barred up by the tides with sand, but after many fruitless attempts to restore it, here is a safe port, where may ride about 40 sail. The situation of the town is low; but the soil, though dirty is good. It was incorporated by Henry VII. and afterwards by queen Elizabeth, and king James I. by whose charter two bailiffs were to be chosen yearly out of 15 capital burgesses; and the corporation was empowered to choose a recorder, and town clerk. The quarter-sessions for the county are held in the town-hall once a year. The market is on Saturday, and the fairs April 5, Holy-Thursday, and October 10. Here was formerly a priory. It is also called Burport, from the river Bur, or Bret, on which it stands. It began to send members to parliament the 23d of Edward I.

BRIE CHAMPENOISE, a subdivision of Upper Champaign, belonging to the government of the latter name, and of Brie, in France. It is a part of the county of Brie (Pagus Brigenfis) which was formerly a large forest, and belonged to the government of the Isle of France.

BRIE FRANCOISE, (La), a subdivision of the second subgovernment in the Isle of France; it lies from Lagny to Melun, between the Seine and Marne. It is very fertile in corn, fruit, &c. To it belongs BRIE, properly BRAYE, Comté Robert, in Latin Braia Comitatus Roberti, so called from Robert of France, count Dreux. See BRAYE. It is a small town, situated on the river Yerre; which, after several possessors, was annexed to the crown by Francis I. Here is a governor, a royal jurisdiction, castellany, and bailiwick, which is under the provostship and viscounty of Paris. It has a salt-granary, a provincial church, a large market-place, and a convent of Minims. It lies 3 leagues N. of Merun, and 5 S. E. of Paris. Lat. 48, 41. Long. 2, 41.

BRIEG, one of the principal duchies of Silesia, in Germany. It is bounded on the N. by the principality capitality of Breslaw and barony of Wartenberg, and on the E. by Poland. The river Brinnitz separates great part of it from the principality of Oppelen. It is also bounded on that side by those of Grotka and Munsterberg; and that of Schweidnitz shuts it in to the W. The river Law, which rises here, runs through it from N. to S. as does the Olaw: and the Neiss enters it near its junction with the Oder. It is likewise watered by the Browitz. Upon the demise of the last of its dukes in 1675, this country devolved to the emperor, as king of Bohemia and duke of Silesia. It contains 9 towns; of which two, namely Reichenstein and Silberberg, are noted for their mines.

BRIEG, the capital of the last mentioned duchy of the same name. E. Long. 17, 35. N. Lat. 50, 40. It might have passed for a handsome place before the last siege; the castle, the college, and the arsenal, being very great ornaments, and most of the houses very well built. But the Prussians, who besieged it in 1741, threw 2172 bombs into it, and 4714 cannon bullets, which reduced a great part of the town to ashes, and quite ruined a wing of the castle. It was obliged to surrender, after sustaining 7 days continual fire. The Prussians, to whom this place was ceded by the peace, have augmented the fortifications, and built a new suburb. The town stands upon the Oder; on the other side of which there are plenty of fallow-deer, and large forests of beech and oak trees. They have a yearly fair, at which they sell above 12,000 horned cattle. Since 1728, they have begun to manufacture fine cloth.

BRIEL, (in French La Brille), a neat town of Holland, one of the Seven United Provinces in the Netherlands. It stands in the island of Voorn, on the left side of the Maese, near its mouth. It is a strong place, with a convenient port, which brings it a pretty good trade, and renders it populous. The streets are large. The great church is a good structure, and its steeple is a land-mark to sailors. On the ramparts are pleasant walks of trees. This was one of the cautionary towns, given to queen Elizabeth for her assisting of the Dutch, and was garrisoned with English troops; but king James I. restored it 30 years after. It lies 5 miles N. of Helvoetsluys, in lat. 51, 50, N. Long. 4, 10, E.

BRIENNE, (St.), or BRENA, a small town of Vallage, a subdivision of Upper Champagne, belonging to the government of the latter name, and of Brie, in France. It is one of the 7 old counties and peerages in Champagne, at present in the possession of the house of Lomeny. It consists of 2 places; namely, Brienne la Ville, which lies on the Aube; and Brienne le Chateau, about 1000 paces distant from the former. It lies about 5 leagues from Bar sur l'Aube, and 8 from Toinville to the W.

BRIENNOIS, a subdivision of the government of Burgundy, in France. It lies to the S. and is a small territory on the Loire; taking its name from Brienne, a place which long since has been demolished.

BRIES, (Die). See BRIZNO-BANYA.

BRIESCIA. See BRESTE, or BREZESCI.

BRIG, or BRIGGS, a market-town of Lincolnshire, where a fair is held on August 16. It lies 24 miles N. of Lincoln.

BRIGANTIA, or BRIGANTIUM, a town of Vindelicia; now Bregentz, in Tyrol, at the E. end of the lake of Constance. Another Brigantium in the Alpes Cottiae; which last is probably Briançon, a town on the borders of Dauphiny.

BRIGHTHELMSTONE, a town standing on a bay in the county of Suffex, about 54 miles from London, built nearly in a quadrangular form, with several good streets. Most of the houses are built with flints gathered from the beach, and cemented with common mortar. The church stands on a hill a small distance from the town, in which are 8 bells; and the Quakers, Presbyterians, and Methodists, have each their places of worship. The market-place is neat and convenient, and the market days are Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays; besides there is a market for fish on the beach. Here is a good playhouse, in which, during the season for bathing, plays are performed three times a week. The ruins of a castle, built here in 1539 by king Henry VIII. were to be seen in 1761, under the Clift, and the ruins of the wall reaching 400 feet from the E. to the W. gate, raised by queen Elizabeth, for defending the town, are still visible on the beach. The E. gate has been pulled down within these 12 years to make room to build a battery for the defence of the town. In 1699, 130 houses were destroyed by the sea, which at different times has done great damage, and greatly encroached upon the town. Charles II. after the battle of Worcester, fled to this town, and was conveyed from hence to Fecamp in Normandy by Nicholas Taterfal, in a small vessel, who has an inscription on his tomb in the church-yard, mentioning the transaction. On the Steyne, where the gentry walk, who come here to bathe, is an orchestra, and two libraries; and there are in the town three sets of public rooms for assemblies, &c. In 1770 was completed a building where there are hot and cold baths, supplied with water from the sea. This is looked upon to be the genteelst watering place in the kingdom, and upon the whole the most commodious. Here are fairs held September 4, and on Holy Thursday.

BRIGNOLES, (provincial bailiwick of), a subdivision of Lower Provence, in the government of the latter name, in France. It consists of a viguerie or district of its own name, that of St. Maximin, and and that of Barjols. Belonging to the first of these districts is the town of Brignoles, in Latin, Brinonia, which is a pretty large place, in a fine and fruitful country. It takes its name from an excellent sort of plums, which the ancients called Brinones, and in French have the name of Brignons or Brugnons. Besides its parish-church, here are 5 convents, and an hospital.

BRIGSTOCK, or BRICKSTOCK, a village in Northamptonshire, 3 miles N. W. of Thrapston, with three fairs on May 6, for horses and horned cattle, on September 5, for sheep, brags, and pewter, and on November 22, for black hats.

BRIHUEGA, or BRIOCA, a small town of New Castile, in Spain. It is situated on the river Tajuna. Here is a strong castle; and it trades in wool and woollen-cloth. In this place, in 1710, lieutenant-general earl Stanhope, with a body of 8 squadrons and as many battalions of English, having unwarily separated from the confederate army under count Staremberg, were surrounded by the French and Spaniards; when, after a brave defence with their small arms, and all their ammunition expended, they were obliged to surrender prisoners of war. It lies 43 miles N. E. of Madrid, in lat. 41, 0, N. Long. 3, 20, W.

BRIN, or BRINO, a town of Moravia, a dependency of Bohemia, in Germany. It stands at the confluence of the Schwartz and Switta, is a pretty large well-built town, but not very populous; has four gates, a cathedral, and several other churches, a college late of Jesuits, several convents, an episcopal palace, provincial house, and other public structures. It held out bravely against the Swedes in 1645. The courts are held, and the states meet here, alternately with Olmutz. It is defended by a strong castle on Spilberg-hill, encompassed with a double ditch and the like wall. Near it is found the unicorn-minerale. In 1742 the Prussians besieged it; but soon quitted it, and all Moravia. It lies 40 miles S. W. of Olmutz, and is subject to the house of Austria. Lat. 49, 14, N. Long. 16, 20, E.

BRINDISI, anciently Brundisium, a city possessed by the Salentines. It lies in the territory of Otranto, a province of the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy, and on the entrance to the Adriatic sea on the coast, with a harbour which is choked up; but formerly very good, and described by Cæsar, as the city was considerable. What is left of the port is guarded at its entrance by a fortress upon an island. It is the see of an archbishop, and lies 35 miles N. W. of Otranto city, in lat. 44, 5, N. Long. 18, 45, E.

BRION-ISLE, one of the Magdalen-Isles, in the Gulf of St. Laurence, 5 or 6 leagues W. from the Bird-Islands; and to Cape Rosiers, the entrance of St. Laurence river, it is 39 leagues N. W. by N. It is in long. 60, 40. Lat. 47, 45.

BRINYE, or PRUNDEL, a frontier-fortification belonging to the district of Zengh, in Hungarian Dalmatia. It is situated on a stony hill, in the middle of a plain.

BRIOUDE, in Latin Brivas, a very old town belonging to the chatelet of Vodable, constituting the old dauphiny of Auvergne, and the government of the latter name, in France. It is situated on the Allier, not far from its source, with a stone bridge of one arch over it, which is looked upon as a work of the Romans, of whom it is not unworthy. It is very long, and elevated, resting on two high mountains: and from this bridge the city has its name. This is properly called Vielle Brioude: the other, called Brioude Glise or d'Eglise, from St. Julian the Martyr's church being in it, stands close by the Allier. This is a collegiate-church, the canons of which are counts; and to them belong the lordship over the town: it is also the seat of a seneschalship; and lies 5 leagues above Issoire.

BRIQUERAS, a fortified town in the Piemontese valleys, belonging to the principality of the former name, in Upper Italy. In 1655 the Evangelical inhabitants or Waldenses in its neighbourhood were driven out. It has been taken and retaken, but last of all by Lewis XIV. and is now in the possession of the French. It lies near the little river Peles, on the confines of Dauphiny to the W. and 7 miles S. of Pignerol.

BRISAC. In the siege of 1636, in which the Swedes and French, under the duke of Saxe-Weyma, took this place, the besieged dug the soldiers dead bodies up and ate them. And on both sides 80,000 men were slain, and 1,100,000 crowns were spent in ammunition. See BREISACH, Old and New; the former in Suabia, and the latter in Alsace. It was taken by the Swedes in 1633, and by the French again in 1703. Lat. 48, 10. Long. 7, 15.

BRISGAW, a territory of Suabia, in Germany. It lies on the E. side of the Rhine, which divides it from Alsace, between the Ortnaw on the W. and the principality of Furstenberg on the E. It belongs to the house of Austria, who are possessed of the greatest and best part of it, including Brisac and Fribourg; but the rest belongs to the family of Baden-Dourlach. The French made themselves masters of the greatest part of it, particularly the city of Brisac; but by the peace of Ryswic, in 1697, restored it, after demolishing the bridge, the W. part of the town, and forts next to Alsace, all but Fort Morther, on the French side of Brisac, which they retained.

BRISSAC, anciently Brochefac, in Latin Brissacum, Braccum-faccum, a town belonging to the government of Anjou, in France. It is situated on the Aubance. Near this place a very bloody battle was fought in 1067 between Geoffroy the Bearded and his brother Folques Rechin. It contains but one one parish, and that not above 61 families. Ever since 1611 it has been a duchy-peerdom, in favour of Charles II. de Coffe, known by the name of marshal de Brissac. It lies about 2 or 3 leagues from Angers, and 7 from Saumer.

BRISSELTON, a place in Somersetshire, between Keynsham and Bristol, where are mines of coals, like those at Newcastle upon Tyne, covered with a hard crust called wark, and of the shape of a fern-leaf: it will split like black slate, and is much more brittle.

BRISSON, (St.), an ancient town of France, in Berri, 3 miles from Gien. It is seated on an eminence on the farther side of the river Loire, with a castle taken notice of in history for its strength, and for maintaining a siege against Louis le Grosse. Long. 2, 40, E. Lat. 47, 44, N.

BRISTOL, a city of England, and inferior to none, except London, for wealth, trade, and number of inhabitants. Bristol is a corruption of Brightstow, as it was called by the Saxons. It is thought to have stood anciently altogether on the west or Somersetshire side of the Avon, before the bridge was built; but after that, it came to be partly in Somersetshire, and partly in Gloucestershire, until it was made a county of itself, though even before that, in the parliament rolls, it was always placed in Somersetshire. At present the east side is by much the largest and most populous. It had anciently a castle, built by Robert earl of Gloucester, natural son to Henry I. which was demolished by Cromwell; and the ground is now laid out into streets.

The corporation consists of a mayor; recorder; 12 aldermen, of whom the recorder is one; 2 sheriffs; and 28 common-council men. The recorder is generally a serjeant at law, and sits as judge in capital and all other criminal causes. The mayor, to support his dignity, and defray his extraordinary expence, is entitled to certain fees from ships, which long ago amounted to 500 or 600*l*. Besides the cathedral, which was anciently the church of the Augustine monastery, there are 18 parish-churches. Here are dissenters of all denominations, of whom the Quakers are very respectable both for their wealth and numbers. When Henry VIII. dissolved the monastery, he applied its revenues to the maintenance of a bishop, dean, 6 prebendaries, and other officers. Of the parish-churches, St. Mary Ratcliff is reckoned one of the finest, not only here, but in the whole kingdom. In this church, besides two monuments of the founder, William Cannings, who had been 5 times mayor of this city, one in the habit of a magistrate, and another in that of a priest (for in his latter days he took orders), there is one of Sir William Penn, father to the famous Quaker.

The old bridge over the Avon consisted of four broad arches, with houses on both sides like those formerly on London-bridge, but this has been lately pulled down, and another erected in its place. No carts or waggons are admitted into Bristol, for fear of damaging the vaults and gutters made under ground for carrying the filth of the city into the river. Queen's-square, in this city, is larger than any in London; except Lincoln's-inn-fields, and has in the center an equestrian statue of king William III. All the gates of the city remain entire, and a part of the walls; the rest were razed in the reign of William Rufus. It is almost as broad as long, about 7 miles in circumference, and contains about 95,000 inhabitants. Of the hospitals, the chief are, 1. That called queen Elizabeth's, in which 100 boys are taught reading, writing, arithmetic and navigation; 6 of whom, when they go out, have 10*l*. and the rest 8*l*. 8*s*. to bind them apprentices: the master is allowed 450*l*. a year for the maintenance of the boys. 2. Colston's hospital; in which 100 boys are maintained for 7 years, and taught and apprenticed, as in queen Elizabeth's. 3. Another founded by the same gentleman in 1691, for 12 men and 12 women, with an allowance of 3*s*. per week; and 24 sacks of coals in the year. This charity cost the founder 25,000*l*. 4. Another founded partly by Mr. Colston. and partly by the merchants, in which 18 men on account of the merchants, and 12 men and women on account of Mr. Colston, are maintained. 5. An infirmary, which was opened in 1736 for the sick, lame, and distressed poor of the city, which is maintained by subscription, besides 5000*l*. bequeathed to it by John Eldridge, Esq; formerly comptroller of the customs at this port. There are, besides these, a bridewell, several alms-houses, and charity-schools. There is also a guildhall for the sessions and assizes; the mayor's and sheriffs courts; a council-house, where the mayor and aldermen meet every day, except Sundays, to administer justice; a handsome new exchange, with three entrances, about two thirds as large as that in London; and a quay half a mile in length, the most commodious in England for shipping and landing goods, provided with several cranes. In College-green was formerly a stately high cross, with the effigies of several kings round it, which is now erected at Stour-Head, the seat of Mr. Hoare. In Winch-street is a guard-house, with barracks.

As to the trade of this city, it was computed many years ago to be much greater in proportion, especially to America and the West Indies, than that of London. Fifty, sail, some of them ships of considerable burden, have arrived here at one time, or very near one another, from the West Indies. For this trade, and that to Ireland, it is much better-situated than London, besides the great advantages tages it possesses of an inland navigation by the Wye and Severn. Their trade extends to the Baltic, Norway, Holland, Hamburgh, Guinea, and the Straits. The largest ships are discharged at Kingroad, 4 miles below the city, and the goods are brought to the quay by lighters. For building, equipping, and repairing ships, there are docks, yards, rope-walks, and ship-wrights. Here are some considerable woollen manufactures; and no less than 15 glass-houses, for which Kingwood and Mendip furnish the coals. The city companies are 13: 1. The merchant adventurers. 2. The merchant tailors. 3. The mercers. 4. The soap-boilers. 5. The tobacconists. 6. The butchers. 7. The barbers. 8. The tilers. 9. The holliers, who are the sled-men. 10. Shoemakers. 11. Coopers. 12. Bakers. 13. Smiths. For supplying the city with water there are 6 public conduits; and handsome hackney-coaches may be hired at very reasonable rates, but they do not ply in the streets. There are also stage-coaches, which set out every day for Bath, London, and other places.

A mile below the city, close by the river, is the hot well, whose waters are specific for the diabetes, and good in phthirical, scorbutic, and inflammatory disorders. Hither is a great resort in the summer of invalids, as well as other company; for whose accommodation and entertainment there is a pump-room, ball-room, coffee-house, with taverns, and a great number of elegant lodging-houses, both below on a level with a well; and above in the delightful village of Clifton, which is situated on the brow of a hill, from whence there are downs extending several miles, where the company ride out for exercise. Nothing can be more pure and salutary than the air of these downs, which afford a variety of the most romantic and agreeable prospects, comprehending Kingroad, with the ships at anchor, the mouth of the Severn, and the mountains of Wales. In the rocks above the well are found those six-cornered stones called Bristol-stones; but they are not so plentiful now as in Camden's days, when, he says, whole bushels might have been easily gathered.

In this city is a theatre, where plays are acted almost every night during the recess of the comedians from the metropolis. There are two annual fairs, to which the concourse is so great, that the neighbouring inns have filled 100 beds a-piece with their guests. In the winter season there is an assembly every Thursday for the gayer part of the citizens of both sexes. About half way betwixt Bristol and Bath, at a place called Warmly, a company of Bristol merchants have erected a noble manufacture of pins and other brass utensils, which employs a great number of hands, including above 200 children of both sexes from 7 to 12 or 13 years of age. All the different operations of melting, splitting, drawing, hammering, turning, &c. are performed by wheels worked with water, which is raised by two fire-engines of a very curious mechanism. The city of Bristol gives title of earl to the family of Hervey. It is worth observing, that whoever marries a citizen's daughter becomes free of the city.

The exchange, whose foundation was laid in 1740, and opened with great solemnity in 1743, is a handsome building. Its weekly markets are on Wednesday and Saturday, and on Thursday for cattle; and its annual fairs are held on January 25, and July 25, for most sorts of goods. It sends two members to parliament; and lies ten miles W. of Bath, about 30 from Gloucester, and 115 W. of London. Lat. 51, 30. Long. 2, 40.

BRISTOL, (New,) the principal town belonging to Buckingham county, in Pennsylvania, in N. America. It is situated 20 miles N. of Philadelphia, on the river Delaware, opposite to Burlington or Bridlington, in West New-Jersey, and contains between 70 and 80 houses. It is noted for mills of several sorts; and lies in Lat. 40, 45, N. Long. 75, 10, W.

BRISTOL, (County of,) a subdivision of New Plymouth colony, in New England, North America. It includes Rhode-Island as well as Elizabeth-Island, at the mouth of Mounts-bay, and lies to the S. W. of Plymouth county, another subdivision of this colony.

Of the same name is the largest and most populous, though not the oldest, town of the county, which has a convenient harbour, with Rhode-Island lying at the entrance of it: and next to Boston, has the best trade in New England, and is continually increasing both in that respect and in the number of its inhabitants. Near Bristol is a remarkable hill called Mount-Hope, where Philip, styled king of the Wamponoags, who made war on the English in king Charles II.'s reign, had his residence, as he afterwards met his fate and quietus at the bottom of it, when driven back thither by the English.

BRISTOL, a small town in Maryland, in the county of Charles, in the western division of the colony.

BRITAIN, (Great,) a populous, rich, and fruitful island of Europe, including England and Scotland, since the union of both these parts of it in 1707 under one head, and from that period down, under the same laws, only with a reserve of those previously belonging to Scotland, together with the numerous islands on their coasts, particularly in the latter kingdom. See ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, &c.

The old title of Britain was renewed under king James I. of England, and VI. of Scotland; and the addition of Great was put to distinguish it from the French province of Bretagne, which was formerly called Little Britain. The kingdom of Ireland is subject to it, and is divided from it by St. George's channel. Great Britain, and its islands, lie in the Atlantic ocean, being bounded on the N. by the Northern ocean; on the E. by the German ocean, which divides it from Norway, Denmark, Germany, and the Netherlands; they have the English channel on the S. the narrowest part of which is the Straits of Dover, or Pas de Calais, which divides them from France; and by the Atlantic or Great Western ocean on the W.

Its latitude at the Lizard-point, Cornwall, is 50, N. and at the head-land at Caithness or Dungsby-head in Scotland, 58, 30, so that, according to the geometrical measure of English statute miles, which is 69 miles and 864 feet to a degree, the true length of the island is 587 miles. And the longitude, London being the first meridian, 6, 15, at the Land's-end in Cornwall; and at the South Foreland in Kent 1, 13, in all 7, 30, the parallel there giving 38 miles to a degree of longitude; the true distance therefore is 285 miles. But others say its extent from S. to N. is upwards of 560 miles, and its greatest breadth from W. to E. not much above 250.

The ancients called this island Insula Magna, and Cæsar boasted that he had found a new world. Its form is triangular, the Land's-end, Dover-head, and Dungsby-head, in Caithness, shooting out into three promontories, form the three angles. Its boundary, the sea, has several names. On the N. it is called the Northern sea; on the W. the Irish sea; on the S. the Channel; and on the E. the German ocean. The sea thus surrounding it, is not only a security against an enemy, but also against the violent colds the climate would otherwise be exposed to, the continual motion of the sea sending a kindly vapour, which mollifies the natural sharpness of the air; so that in some parts of France and Italy they feel more winter than we do in Great Britain.

That part of Great Britain lying towards the Atlantic ocean is mountainous, as Cornwall, Wales, and many large tracts of Scotland. But the inland parts are mostly a champaign country, abounding in corn and pasture. The most considerable mountains, by some called the English Appennines, is that continued ridge which runs from S. to N. dividing the whole island into E. and W. The smaller islands round it, are some of them single; as the isle of Wight, the isle of Man, and the isle of Anglesey; others are in clusters, as the Cassiterides or Scilly islands, off Cornwall; the Orkades, Shetland islands, and Æbudes, in Scotland. &c. scattered all along the coast. It has on all sides very convenient harbours, and abundance of navigable rivers, which convey the riches of the sea and of foreign countries into the very heart of the kingdom; the most considerable among these are the Thames, the Severn, and Humber, in England; the Clyde, Forth, Tay, &c. in Scotland; which carry along with them into the sea, vast numbers of lesser streams.

The inhabitants of the several parts are of a different original. Those of Cornwall and Wales are in a great measure the posterity of the ancient Britons, who, upon the invasion, first of the Picts, and then of the Saxons, retired to those mountainous out-skirts, which they have ever since retained.

The Scots are not without a mixture of the Picts, particularly the Lowlands, or champaign part of that country, which they possessed before the former had totally subdued them. But the Highlands, particularly the western, our historians are very positive, were peopled from Ireland; and the Irish or Erse, a dialect indeed of the former language, puts it, according to them, beyond all dispute. Yet they and the Welch are the most unmixed part of Great Britain; though, as is commonly the case, the natives of both countries are fond of running up their original too high, so as to render it fabulous.

The English nation is a mixture; the principal ingredients of which seem to be of Romans, Danes, Angles, and Saxons; besides innumerable accessions from other foreign nations making to it every day, as trade, liberty of conscience, and other advantages, invite adventurers over.

Upon the whole, the English, Scots, Welch, and Irish, as the subjects of one and the same prince, have mutual intermarriages, and other amicable intercourse with one another, and seem now to have a laudable emulation in all parts of the globe, which of them shall serve their king and country with most honour, intrepidity, and valour, against their invading neighbours.

Besides the islands already mentioned, Great Britain possesses, 1. in Europe, those of Jersey, Guernsey, Sark, and Alderney or Aurigny, not a great way from the coast of Normandy in France; the fortress of Gibraltar in Spain, with Minorca; (which articles see.) 2. In Africa, several forts and settlements in Guinea Proper, and St. Helena; and other settlements on the Sanago. 3. In Asia, several places on the Coromandel coast; Bombay and Dabul on the coast of Cuncan; and Marlborough fort on the island of Sumatra, &c. 4. But in America, the whole of the country, from Hudson's-bay to the mouth of the Mississippi in the gulph of Mexico, and several of the West-India islands.

The ancient religion of Britain was that of the Druids, the Gauls coming hither, as Cæsar tells us, to learn their rites and ceremonies. This made way, by its belief of one God and the immortality of the soul; for Christianity, which was planted here by Eleuthanus and Meduanus, whom pope Eleutherius sent hither at the request of king Lucius. At the Saxon invasion, the Christian religion was driven with the Britons to Cornwall, the shelter of that people; and nothing but Paganism prevailed, with the sword of the conquerors, till pope Gregory sent over Austin the monk, who laid such a foundation, that his successors propagated it through the whole nation; and here were religious houses and churches in great numbers. Thus it continued till the Danes burnt and plundered wherever they came.

Upon an accommodation with these Pagan barbarians, it revived and spread mightily; so that England for number of religious houses, was as considerable as any part of Europe, till Henry VIII. quitting his subjection to the see of Rome, dissolved them, reformed the corruptions which had crept in among us, and still remaining himself a Roman Catholic, became the occasion of establishing the Protestant religion in the succeeding infant reign of king Edward VI. and the ever glorious one of his sister, queen Elizabeth.

The first language of this nation was the British; which, with the people, was driven out by the Saxons, and succeeded by theirs.

The Danish invasions brought some little admixture with them; but the Norman conqueror so far established his own language, that before the end of the reign of king Henry II. the Saxon was quite new moulded. And even now, though the English, in itself a very copious and masculine language, has had its old stock enlarged by many auxiliary terms, particularly in the arts and sciences, a thing much wanted, from the Latin and Greek; yet some of our writers, especially since the Revolution, have wantonly debased it by the dimsey adulteration of French terms, in contempt of our own more substantial words; so that a plain English reader is often at a loss to understand some writers without help of a French vocabulary. The British, now Welch, and the old Gaulish language, are so near a kin as plainly to indicate the same original in all the people.

Julius Cæsar, from his short stay in Britain, may be looked upon to have rather discovered than subjected this island. He was succeeded by Claudius, who by his own conduct, and that of Aulus Plautius, made way into the more inward parts of the country.

After these, Vespasian, Publius Ostorius, and Paulinus Suetonius, proved very troublesome to the inhabitants, who in return omitted no opportunity of surprising the Roman legions, and more than once broke out into open rebellion against their new governors. But it was Agricola, who, under Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian, gave the finishing stroke to the conquest of Britain; not by severities, such as his predecessors had used, but by courtesy and good nature; though during eight years he continually engaged one party or other among the inhabitants; for observing them to be a stubborn intrepid people, inured to all kinds of hardships, and extremely tenacious of their liberty and independency; instead of threatenings, Agricola had recourse to artful insinuations; and, introducing among them the Roman customs and modes of living, he gradually lessened their aversion to their conquerors.

After the Romans, the Saxons came over into Britain, upon the following occasion: In the reign of the emperor Valentinian the Younger, the necessities of the empire, from the inundations of the northern nations into Italy, obliged the Romans not only to recal their own forces out of Britain, but also to drain it by their frequent levies of its natives. The Scots and Picts took this opportunity to plunder the frontiers, and make inroads into the territories of the Britons, who, being quite dispirited, flew for refuge to the Romans; but they were too much engaged nearer home to relieve them. Upon this the Britons sent the same request to the Saxons, whose courage they were convinced of by their frequent piracies on their coasts, even while the Romans continued in Britain. The Saxons accordingly came over, repelled the enemy; and having the isle of Thanet assigned them as a reward for their services, were mightily pleased with their new quarters. In short, they laid hold on all occasions for quarrelling with the Britons, pretending they had not stood to their terms, so that at length they banished the old natives, and made themselves masters of the greatest part of their country.

About the year 800, the Danes, by main force, settled themselves among the Saxons, though they had not so fair a pretext for coming over as these had, and used the Saxons in much the same manner as they had done the Britons before. They robbed and plundered till the Saxons were forced to a composition, and assigned them lands in several parts of the country; but, not content with this, they made frequent incursions into the neighbouring territories. Hence arose that tax called Dane-gelt, which was a sort of bribe to them from over-running the whole country. But neither would this do; for such was their insolence, that the English entered into a plot, and in one night, so the historians say, put them all to the sword. Sueno, king of Denmark, to revenge this injury, invaded England with a powerful army, and possessed himself of the crown, which four kings of that race enjoyed, and then it returned to the Saxons.

Scarcely had this happened, but the Saxons fell into a worse condition: for upon the demise of Edward the Confessor, without issue, the title to the crown was contested by two powerful parties, neither of which had any right to it; Edgar Atheling, heir of the Saxon line, being alive. One of these was Harold, son of earl Godwin, who, taking advantage of Edward's minority, possessed himself of the throne; the other was William duke of Normandy, who, by virtue of the Confessor's promise, between whom there was a very close intimacy, for some years, and also of Harold's obligation to see it discharged, he landed with a powerful army, in support of his claim, conquered the English in a set battle, in which Harold was slain, and immediately took possession of the government.

With regard to the administration among the ancient Britons, we are told by Cæsar, that in time of peace the Druids had the conducting of all civil affairs: and in that of war, they chose one of remarkable courage to lead them out to the field. The Romans governed Britain by pro-prætors, and other subordinate officers; and they had legions ready at hand for their defence, upon any emergency. But the Saxons, as they gained ground, settled distinct kingdoms, which, upon their entire conquest of the country, amounted to 7; and this is what is commonly called the Saxon Heptarchy. This country was anciently called Albion. For the ancient divisions, as well as the present, &c. we refer the reader to the article ENGLAND.

NEW-BRITAIN, a large country of North America, called also Terra Labrador, has Hudson's bay and strait on the north and west; Canada and the river St. Lawrence, on the south; and the Atlantic ocean on the east. It is subject to Great Britain, but yields only skins and furs. The following is the best description of this country that hath yet appeared. It was drawn up by the commander of the Otter sloop, and communicated to the Royal Society by the honourable Daines Barrington in 1774.

"There is no part of the British dominions so little known as the immense country of Labradore. So few have visited the northern parts of this vast country, that almost from the straits of Belleisle until you come to the entrance of Hudson's bay, for more than 10 degrees of latitude, no chart which can give any tolerable idea of the coast hath been hitherto formed. The barrenness of the country explains why it has been so seldom frequented. Here avarice has but little to feed on.

Perhaps, without an immoderate share of vanity, I may venture to presume, that as far as I have been, which is to the latitude of 59, 10, the draught which I have been able to form is by much the best of any that has hitherto been made. Others have gone before me blest with abilities superior to mine, and to whom I hope to be thought equal only in assiduity. But I had advantages of which they were destitute: with a small vessel, and having an Indian with me, who knew every rock and shoal upon the coast, I was enabled to be accurate in my observations; and these are the reasons why I deem my own sketch preferable to all others. As this country is one of the most barren in the whole world, so its sea-coast is the most remarkable. Bordered by innumerable islands, and many of them being a considerable distance from the main land, a ship of burden would sail a great way along the coast without being able to form any notion of its true situation. Hence it is that all charts of it have been so extremely erroneous; and hence arose those opinions that some of the inlets extended a vast distance into the country, if not quite into the sea of Hudson's bay.

Davis's inlet, which has been so much talked of, is not 20 leagues from the entrance of it to its extremity. The navigation here is extremely hazardous. Towards the land, the sea is covered with large bodies and broken pieces of ice; and the farther you go northward, the greater is the quantity you meet with. Some of those masses, which the seamen call islands of ice, are of a prodigious magnitude; and they are generally supposed to swim two thirds under water. You will frequently see them more than 100 feet above the surface; and to ships in a storm, or in thick weather, nothing can be more terrible. Those prodigious pieces of ice come from the north, and are supposed to be formed by the freezing of cataracts upon the lands about East Greenland and the pole. As soon as the severity of the winter begins to abate, their immense weight breaks them from the shore, and they are driven to the southward. To the miserable inhabitants of Labradore their appearance upon the coast serves as a token of the approach of summer.

This vast track of land is extremely barren, and altogether incapable of cultivation. The surface is every where uneven and covered with large stones, some of which are of amazing dimensions. There are few springs; yet throughout the country there are prodigious chains of lakes or ponds, which are produced by the rains and the melting of the snow. These ponds abound in trout, but they are very small.

There is no such thing as level land. It is a country formed of frightful mountains and unfruitful valleys. The mountains are almost devoid of every sort of herbage. A blighted shrub and a little moss is sometimes to be seen upon them, but in general the bare rock is all you behold. The vallies are full of crooked low trees, such as the different pines, spruce, birch, and a species of cedar. Up some of the deep bays, and not far from the water, it is said, however, there are a few sticks of no considerable size. In a word, the whole country is nothing more than a prodigious heap of barren rocks. The climate is extremely rigorous. There is but little little appearance of summer before the middle of July; and in September the approach of winter is very evident. It has been remarked, that the winters within these few years have been less severe than they have been known heretofore. The cause of such an alteration it would be difficult to discover. All along the coast there are many rivers that empty themselves into the sea, yet there are but few of any consideration; and you must not imagine that the largest are any thing like what is generally understood by a river. Custom has taught us to give them this appellation; but the greatest part of them are nothing more than broad brooks or rivulets. As they are only drains from the ponds, in dry weather they are every where fordable; for, running upon a solid rock, they become broad without a bed of any depth below the surface of the banks. The superficial appearance of this country is extremely unfavourable. What may be hidden in its bowels, we cannot pretend to suggest: probably it may produce some copper; the rocks in many places are impregnated with an ore of that resemblance. Something of a horny substance which is extremely transparent, and which will scale out into a multitude of small sheets, is often found amidst the stones; there are both black and white of this sort, but the black is the most rare. It has been tried in fire, but seems to be no ways affected by heat.

The species of wood here are not very various: excepting a few shrubs which have as yet received no name from the Europeans, the principal produce of the country is the different sorts of spruce and pine. Of these, even in the more southern parts, there is not abundance; as you advance northwards they gradually diminish; and by the time you arrive at the 60th degree of latitude, the eye is not delighted with any sort of herbage. Here the wretched residents build their miserable habitations with the bones of whales. If ever they cheer their aching limbs with a fire, they gather a few sticks from the sea shore, which have probably been washed from Norway or Lapland. Here a vast quantity of snow remains upon the land throughout the year.

Although the winter here is so excessively rigid, in summer the heat is sometimes disagreeable; and in that season the weather is very moderate, and remarkably serene. It is but seldom foggy, speaking comparatively, between this and Newfoundland; nor are you so frequently liable to those destructive gales of wind which visit many other parts of the globe. It is in general high land, and sometimes you meet with mountains of an astonishing height; you are also frequently presented with prospects that are really awful, and extremely romantic. The inhabitants of New Britain, are called Esquimaux, who differ but little from the other Americans.

BRITANY, in French Bretagne, in Latin Britannia Minor, formerly Armorica, i. e. upon the sea; and Letavia, Lyddaw, of the same import; one of the governments into which France is divided. This province is a peninsula surrounded on all sides with the sea, except the isthmus towards the E. where it borders on Normandy on the N. E. Maine and Anjou on the E. and Poitou on the S. W. Its greatest length from W. to E. that is from Vitrey to Conquet, is computed at 60 French leagues; and greatest breadth, from Nantes to St. Malo, that is, from S. to N. at 45; though in many places it is also very narrow, from the many gulphs on its coasts; and lies between lat. 47 and 49 degrees nearly. It has its name, says Busching, according to the common opinion, from the old Britons (Britones or Britti) who, about the 5th century, were driven out of the island of Britain by the Angles and Saxons; whereupon they crossed the sea into Gaul, and, after some migrations, settled in the country of the Curiosolitæ and Osismi, who were descendants from the Armorici, and also took possession of almost the whole territory of the Vanni, whose country acquired its name from them. This denomination however was first mentioned by Gregory of Tours. Thus far Busching: but, according to the common opinion, the reverse is more probable, that the Britons who peopled this island of Britain, originally came from that part of Gaul now called Bretagne: and the assistance which they gave to the inhabitants of Gaul their progenitors, against Julius Cæsar, was one of the inducements to that invader, next to his unbounded ambition, for coming over into this island, after he had subdued Gaul, to vanquish their allies. Besides, it is unquestionable, that the peopling of the earth must have been primarily from the continent, and that gradually from E. to W. But to return: Francis I. king of France, having married Claudia, one of the heiresses of Bretagne, annexed this country, at the desire of the states, to the crown, in 1532; whose successor, Henry II. abolished the title of duke of Bretagne.

This province has fine harbours, but hardly any navigable rivers, except the Loire, which ends its course here, and the Vilaine (Vicinoma). The land is partly level, and partly mountainous. In Upper Britany are most mountains, a whole chain of which, called Mount Arré, extends itself throughout. The air is every where pretty temperate, but thick and moist towards the sea-coast. The soil does not produce much grain or wine, and for that reason their pasture-grounds are so much the better; consequently they have a considerable trade in butter. It yields vast quantities of hemp and flax, flax, from which linen and sail-cloth are made and fold.

In the diocese of Quimper is a lead mine at Carnot, though this mineral is not near so good as the English. In some parts of the diocese of Nantes are pit-coals; but these are also much inferior in goodness to those of England. On the coasts they catch vast numbers of pilchards and other fish. Here are many and large forests full of game.

In the diocese of Nantois they make salt. A considerable trade is carried on here in horses; and the inhabitants are good sailors. In Upper Bretagne they speak French; but in Lower Bretagne a particular language is spoken, which is thought to be the old Celtic, and analogous to the Welch, of which the latter is a dialect: and it is said that French and English Britons can understand each other. This country has its own parliament, which sits at Rennes, and is governed by its own laws. It has also particular states. These consist of the clergy, the nobility, burghers, and peasants; and are called together every two years by the king. The governor is at the same time governor of Brittany; under him are two general-lieutenants; one of which has the direction of eight dioceses, and the other only of the county and bishopric of Nantes. Besides these, are three deputy-governors; namely, the first for Rennes, Dol, St. Malo, and Vannes; the second for St. Brieux, Treguier, S. Paul de Leon, and Quimper; and the third for Nantois. In the assembling of the states, and laying on the taxes, the country is divided according to the nine dioceses, into Upper and Lower Brittany. To Upper Brittany belong five dioceses; namely, Rennes, Nantes, Dol, St. Malo, and St. Brieux. In Lower Brittany are four bishoprics; namely, Treguier, Vannes, to which belongs Belle-isle, Quimper or Cornouaille, and S. Paul de Leon, in which is the town of Brest. Rennes is the capital of all Brittany.

BRITISH CHANNEL, or the CHANNEL, that branch of the Atlantic ocean which divides France from England, from Dover to the Scilly islands on the north side; and from Calais to Ushant on the south; and joins the German ocean between Dover and Calais. In order to give a clear idea of the breadth of the Channel in different places, we have inserted the following TABLE.

BRITTONORO. See BERTINORO.

BRIVE, (La Gaillarde,) so called from its agreeableness, properly Brive sur le Coureze, from its having a bridge over a river of the latter name, which here receives the Vezere. It is a town of Lower Limosin, a subdivision of the government of Limosin in France. Here is the seat of an election, a provincial court, and bailiwick: it has a collegiate church and college, in a fine taste, and its frontispiece curiously ornamented with sculpture. It

B R

It lies in a little valley, surrounded with hills, all planted with vines and chefnut-trees; and contains about 4000 souls. All the necessaries, nay, and comforts of life, are to be met with in this city; where are pretty walks; a causeway along the river, and a little island in it planted with trees; also ramparts, and the adjacent hills and fields very delightful; so that this is the only good town in the province. It lies five miles from Tulle to the south west, and seven from Sarlat to the east.

BRIVIESCA, a large borough of Old Castile, in Spain. Here is a Jacobine convent, with a college.

BRIXELLUM, a town of Gallia Cispadana, remarkable for being the place where Otho killed himself, after the battle of Bedriacum, now Bersello.

BRIXEN, a bishopric of Tirolese, a subdivision of the circle of Austria, in Germany. It is about 45 miles long, and 30 broad. It is bounded by Tirol on the N. and W. by Salzburg and part of Carinthia on the E. and by part of Trent and the Venetian territories on the S. From its bishop, who is a prince of the empire, lies an appeal to the court of Tirol's court, which title is in the house of Austria. This country, though lying among the Alps, is very fruitful, particularly in good wine. But all of it does not belong to the bishop; nor is he entirely independent. He possesses indeed both the spiritual and temporal jurisdictions here, but his diocese is not above eight leagues in extent. His revenue, equal to that of Trent, amounts to between 30 and 35,000 crowns, arising principally from the city of Brixen, of which he is lord; from Bruneck, Ebrenburg, the lordship of Veldes in Carniola, and the isle of Notre Dame. The religion in this diocese is the Roman Catholic, and staunch zealots they are in their superstition; though some of the peasants are said to be Lutherans. The chapter consists of eighteen canons, one half of which are nobles, and the other doctors or licentiates.

BRIXEN, the capital of the last-mentioned bishopric, in Latin Brixinum or Brixia, is situated on the Eysach, at its junction with the Reintz, and at the foot of Mount Brenner; so called, when, for the clearing of its wood, the country people burnt it. It is in a fine country, abounding with vineyards, which yield choice of red-wine, and is the see of a bishop, who is a suffragan of Salzburg. Here are spacious squares, a handsome palace for the bishop, a cathedral, and two other churches contiguous to each other, with two convents. It is a populous place, has a post-stage from the Venetian territories, and is the more frequented, on account of the mineral wells in its neighbourhood. The houses are well-built, with porticos; and their best shops are in vaults from one side of the street to the other. It is the station of some merchants between German and Italy. It is more rugged on the Trent side than towards Inspruck, and is the highest part of the Alps on this road; and, though covered with snow for nine months, it is inhabited up to the very top, and produces abundance of corn and grass. The passage of this mountain is very difficult, and some times impracticable; which is the more inconvenient for travellers, as the inns are bad on both sides; yet the bread here is very delicate.

The country between this city and Bollsano is extremely populous, and even the steepest mountains are cultivated. The road to Stertalingen is pretty good, between a chain of mountains coasting along the Eysach. The people here in general are more civilized than in the rest of Tirol. At this city sat the council of German and Italian bishops in 1080, who deposed Pope Gregory VII. It has its own magistrates, the principal of which are two burgomasters; and lies 50 miles N. E. of Trent. Lat. 46. 45. N. Long. 1. 45. E.

BRIXHAM, a fishing-town of Devonshire, about three miles west of Dartmouth, remarkable for a reciprocating spring, called Lay-well, near the foot of a large ridge of hills, from which flows a considerable quantity of water. When it ebbs and flows regularly, the flux and reflux happens eleven times in an hour; and farther, in an interval of seven hours, it has been observed to do so 77 times. See Philosophical Transactions, No. 204.

BRIXWORTH, a place in Northamptonshire, where a fair is held on Whitfun-Monday.

BRIZEN, or BRIETZEN, a town of Germany, in the middle Marche of Brandenburg, seated on the river Adah, 12 miles north-east of Wirtemberg, Long. 13. 14. E. Lat. 52. 0. N.

BRIZNO-BANYA, BRIES, or BRENZO, a royal free-town in the Upper District belonging to the county of Altschl, in the Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It lies on the river Gran, and has suffered much by frequent fires, by which it has been greatly reduced. The inhabitants are employed in breeding of sheep.

BROADALBIN. See BRADALBIN.

BROADCLIST, a place in Devonshire, where is a fair on May 3.

BROADHEMBERURY, a place in Devonshire, where a fair is kept on Nov. 30.

BROADWATER, a place in Sussex, where fairs are held June 22, and October 29.

BROADWATER, a river in Cumberland, which runs into the Irish sea below St. Bride's.

BROCHTY-CRAIG, a place in the shire of Angus, in Scotland. It is a rock which lies in the mouth of the Tay near Dundee, and is noted for a fine salmon-fishery in its neighbourhood. It was formerly fortified, and defended many months together by an English garrison.

BROCKLEY.

B R

BROCKLEY-HILL, a mount near Stanmore, in Hertfordshire, from which is a noble prospect across Middlesex and the river Thames, into Surrey.

BROD. See BRAD.

BROD, or BRÖDT, a strong place of Hungary, in the county of Possega, seated on the river Save in Slavonia, famous for a battle gained by the Turks in 1688. It is 20 miles south-east of Possega. Long. 19, 25, E. Lat. 45, 15, N.

BRODICH, or BRODY, a famous castle in the isle of Arran, belonging to the shire of Bute, in the S. of Scotland.

Of the same name is another castle and handsome seat, in the Highland language called Caistell Vraigh, in the N. of Scotland, in Murrayland, about 16 miles from Inverness, and four from Forreths.

Of the same name is also a town belonging to the Palatinate of Beltz, in Red Russia, in Little Poland.

BRODERA, or BROUDRA, a large town of Cambaya, a kingdom of Mogul, in the East-Indies, in Asia. It stands on the E. side of the gulph of Cambaya; and lies under the tropic of Cancer, in a country producing cotton, wheat, barley, rice, &c. and so abounding with gum-lac, that Sindikera, a village near the town, yields annually 25,000 pounds weight. Its tower is in a large sandy plain, on the little river Wasset; is well fortified in the old taste with pretty good walls, and towers also. It is inhabited by many Banians and callico-weavers, who drive a considerable trade to all parts of the province. Its governor has 200 villages under his jurisdiction, 65 of which are assigned for the pay of the mogul's garrison here. It is said to have 10 stately palaces, with fine gardens and tombs in it. Brodera lies 50 miles S. E. of Cambaya town, and 55 of Amandabat.

BROD-NEMEKI, or TEUTSCH-BROD, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Czazlaw, seated on the river Sozawa, near the frontiers of Moravia, 18 miles S. by E. of Czazlaw. Long. 15, 45, E. Lat. 49, 32, N.

BRODRA, a town of Asia, in the dominions of the great mogul, near the gulph of Cambray, 8 miles south of Amanadab. Long. 72, 30, E. Lat. 22, 10, N.

BRODSTEER, a good harbour in the isle of Thanet, in Kent.

BRODZEIC, or BRODZICOW, a town belonging to the palatinate of Minsk, in Lithuanian Russia, and great duchy of the former name, in Poland. It stands on the river Berezina, which runs S. E. through the territory of Rohaczow, and falls into the Neiper. It is defended by a strong castle, with a garrison: and lies 40 miles S. of Borislow, and 75 S. E. of Minsk.

VOL. I.—No. 28.

B R

BROEL, a pretty town belonging to the electorate of Cologne, in Germany. It lies 10 miles E. of Cologne, and in the mid-way between it and Bonne. It has a castle, which is a hunting-seat of the elector.

BROMBERG, in Polish Bedgotzi, a small town of Little Pomerania, in Polish Prussia. It stands on the river Bro, which quite surrounds the castle lying without the place. It is particularly famous for a treaty of peace concluded at this place in 1657, between the King of Poland and the elector of Brandenburg. Here is a provincial court.

BROMFIELD, a place in Somersetshire, where a fair is held on Nov. 3.

BROMHALL, a place in Norfolk, where fairs are held, on Monday after Ascension, and the 30th of November.

BROMLEY, a market-town of Kent, on the river Ravensbourne. Here is a palace of the bishop of Rochester, and an hospital for 20 clergymen's widows, with 20l. per annum for each, and 50l. for a chaplain, founded by Dr. Warner, bishop of Rochester. Its weekly market is on Thursday; and fairs are held here, on February 3, and July 25. It lies ten miles S. E. of London.

BROMLEY, formerly Abbot's-Bromley, and since Bromley-Pagets, a pretty market-town of Staffordshire, and on the skirts of Derbyshire. Its weekly market is on Tuesday; and fairs on Thursday before Midlent-Sunday, May 22, and August 24. It lies seven miles from Tutbury, 10 E. of Stafford, and 128 from London.

BROMLEY, a village on the confines of Middlesex, near Essex, it has handsome seats in it belonging to merchants and other citizens of London. Here formerly was a monastery; and the present church seems to have been part of that which belonged to it.

BROMSEBRO, a place belonging to the territory of Calmar, in Smolandia, a subdivision of East Gothland, in Sweden. It lies on the confines of Bleking; and its name indicates, that here formerly stood a large bridge over the stream, which falls into the open sea. It is separated from a little island which lies in the middle of that water, and has two boundary stones. Meetings were held here in 1541 and 1572, for settling the arms of the three crowns: and here a peace was likewise concluded between Sweden and Denmark in the year 1641.

BROMSGROVE, a borough of Worcestershire, governed by a bailiff, and once sent members to parliament. It lies on the river Salwarp, near its source. It contains at least 400 houses, and is about six furlongs long. It drives a pretty brisk clothing-trade, and is the center of four great roads; one of which leads to Coventry and Leicester, another to Warwick, and so to London; a third to Worcester; and the fourth to Shrewsbury. It has a charity-school for 12 boys, who are put out apprentices. The weekly market is on Tuesday; and fairs on June 24, and October 1. It lies 10 miles north-east of Worcester; and 118 west of London.

BROMYARD, a place in Hartfordshire, where fairs are held, Thursday before March 25, May 3, Whitfun-Monday, Thursday before June 25, St. James's day, and Thursday before October 29.

BRON, or BRONNO, a town of Pavia, in the Milanese, belonging to Upper Italy. It lies on the south side of the Po, and 12 miles south of the city of Pavia; in lat 44, 50 N. Long. 10, 5, E.

BROOK, so the river Were is called, near its rise, in Wiltshire.

BROOKLAND, a place in Kent, where a fair is held on August 1.

BROOKLYN, a small town on Long Island, where the Provincials threw up works to oppose the king's troops, when they proceeded against New-York, but were defeated August 27, 1776.

BRORA, a village at the mouth of a river, and upon an island, both of the same name, in the shire of Sutherland, and north of Scotland. In the neighbourhood are mines of coal and salt-pans, which would afford great quantities for exportation, besides home-consumption. But neither have yet been carried into execution, though nature seems to furnish both these advantages; an experiment of the former articles having been actually made.

BROS, or SZASZ-VAROS, a royal free town of the district lying before the Wood, as it is called, in the royal territory of the Saxons, a subdivision of Transylvania, in Hungary. It is situated on the river Maros, and is the principal place in the district of the same name; the soil round it being fruitful, the inhabitants employ themselves in husbandry. It has been received by the Saxons among the German towns, and was Socinian, like Claufenburg. By an inscription on one of its gates, it seems to have been a Roman colony; and is situated 16 miles S. W of Weissenburg.

BROSELY, a place in Shropshire, noted for a well which exhales a sulphureous vapour, and when contracted to a small semi-circular vent, by means of an iron cover, and fired by a candle, burns like spirits of wine; a steak broiled in its flame will receive no tang from the sulphur; the water of itself is extremely cold; and as soon as the fire is put out, it feels as cold as if none had been there.

BROTHERTON, a village in the West-riding of Yorkshire, where Margaret, wife to king Edward I. when a hunting, was forced to put in, and delivered of a son, called Thomas of Brotherton, afterwards earl of Norfolk, and earl-marshal of England. To this village great quantities of limestone are brought from Tadcaster, in the burning of which many hands are employed, and this manufacture is dispersed into the southern parts, which turns to a very good account.

BRAU, one of the five baronies of Le Perche Gouet, a subdivision of Lower Orleanois, in the government of the latter name, belonging to France. It lies on the small river Douzain, above Dangeau, between Chateaudun and Nogent-le-Rotrou, five leagues and a half to the S. E. of the latter. It is noted for its markets.

BROUAGE, a small strong town belonging to the territory of Brouageais; which last, though a part of Saintonge, is now in the government of Aunis, in France. It lies on the sea-coast, has fine salt-marshes, with a harbour once very good, but now choked up. It lies between the mouth of the Garonne and that of the Charente; and produces great quantities of good salt from the bay, called bay-salt; and here generally is a garrison of between 5 and 600 men. It is very regularly built, consisting of five or six streets, which all terminate in the great square. It lies 18 miles S. of Rochelle. Lat. 45, 58, N. Long. 1, 5, W.

BROUAGEAIS, a district in which lies the last mentioned town of Brouage.

BROUG, or BROUCK, in the canton of Bearn, in Swisserland, 8 miles N. E. of Araw, has its name from the fine stone broug, or bridge, over the river Aar. It is a pretty large well built town, but stands on uneven ground, sloping down to the river. The government is the same as at Araw and Zoffinguen. The chief buildings are the town-house, adorned on the outside with paintings of great personages, the college, where is a fine library, and a fine granary.

BROUGH, or BURGH, under Stanemore, i. e. a borough under a stony mountain, or the moor of the latter name near it, in Westmoreland. It stands on a rivulet, not a great way from the river Eden. It is divided into the Upper or Church-brough, where the church stands, with a castle and small fort called Cæsar's tower; the latter being in ruins, where was a Roman station. Near the bridge a spaw-well has been discovered. The other part is called Lower Brough, from its situation, and Market Brough, from its market, which is pretty considerable, and is held on Thursday. Here a fair is held, on Thursday before Whitfun-day. It is a post-town, and lies in the road to Carlisle, two miles from Kirby-steven, and four from Appleby. Among the many fells, stony wastes, or craggy rocks, on the one side, all along to the last-mentioned town, is Hell-beck-fell, a quarter of a mile above this place: and to the north-north-westward about a mile is a famous fair held in the fields, on September 30, which is called Brough-hill, where farmers and middling people of this county supply themselves with little wild horses chiefly from Scotland, which they call Galloways; not so much from the shire of that name, as now from the Highlands: for they have no breed of their own; and they serve them as drudges for fetching coals, &c.

BROUGHTON, Lincolnshire, on the river Ank, near Glandford-bridge, and the Roman causeway, which leads from London to Lincoln by the Humber. On the east of Broughton wood is a spring of water that petrifies moss; and not far off are the ruins of the stately priory of Thornholm.

BROUGHTON, a place in Hampshire, where a fair is kept on the first Monday in July.

Also another place of the same name, in Lancashire, where a fair is held on August 1.

BROURS-HAVEN, a port-town of the United Provinces, in the island of Schonen in Zealand, seated on the north side of the island, in a bay of the sea, in E. long. 3. 35. N. lat. 51, 50.

BROWALLA-HEIDE, a waste or kind of heath belonging to Cronoberg territory, in Smolandia, a subdivision of East Gothland, in Sweden. It lies about two miles from Wexio, and is famous for a defeat given to the Danes upon it, in ancient times, by the brave heroine Blenda heading the Smaland women, in the absence of their husbands, who were elsewhere engaged in fighting their enemies. For which reason the females in these parts formerly obtained particular privileges, with suitable warlike ornaments; and even at present they have an equal share of inheritances with the males.

BROVONIACUM, the name which the Romans gave to Carlisle.

BROWER-STRAIT, a passage at about 12 or fifteen leagues E. of another small one between Strait Le Maire, and the eastern part of Terra del Fuego. It lies in Terra Magellanica, South America. It is now commonly used by such ships as sail from the Magellanic coasts into the South sea, and reckoned much safer and more easy than venturing through Le Maire or Magellan strait.

BROWERS-HAVEN, a harbour of the isle of Schonen, belonging to Zealand, in the United Provinces, so called from the great quantities of beer brought hither from Delft and other places, and distributed through this province. It lies on the N. side of the island, about six miles N. of Zurickzee. It was formerly a considerable place, but now much declined, and subsists principally by fishing, and husbandry. See BROURS-HAVEN.

BROXBERG, BROCKBERG, or BROEKEN, the Bructerus of the Latins, a mountain of Brunwick, in Lower Saxony, in Germany. It is reckoned the highest in all this country. See BLANKENBERG.

BROXBURG, a pleasant village of Hartfordshire, near Hoddesdon. It lies high, on the New-river, and not far from London, with pleasant meadows down to the river Lee.

BRUARTH ARTHUR, or BRUACH ARTHUR; i. e. a middling, steep, and high hill, vulgarly so called, or Arthur's hill or mount. It lies near Kyle-maen Llwyd, and not far from Caermarthen, in South Wales. On it is a circle of prodigious large stones, very much like Stone-henge in Wiltshire, or rather like Rollrich-stones, in Oxfordshire.

BRUCK, or PRUCK, on the river Mur, in Latin Bruga ad Murum, or Muripons, i. e. the bridge on the said river. It is a pretty well built town of Upper Stiria, a subdivision of Austria, in Germany; and is only noted for the meeting of the states of Stiria, Carinthia, and Carniola here, by order of the Emperor. It has two monasteries; the one of Franciscans, and the other of Capuchins. It lies 64 miles S. W. of Vienna; in lat. 47, 50, N. Long. 16, 50, E.

BRUCK, or BRUGG, so called from its fine stone-bridge over the river Aar, a large well built town belonging to the canton of Bern, in Switzerland. It stands uneven and sloping to the river. Here is a college, public library, and fine granary. On St. James's day is an annual procession of the scholars, regents, ministers, and magistrates of this town, to a fine plain without the town, where the students run races in their waistcoats for prizes. This is said to be a custom of very ancient establishment. The place is governed by an avoyer; and lies 8 miles E. of Aaraw.

BRUCK, or PRUCH, a town of Austria in Germany. It is situated on the river Leyta, 24 miles S. E. of Vienna. Lat. 48, 18. N. Long. 16, 51, E.

BRUCKE-TRAJAN, in Walachia, a part of European Turkey. See TRAJAN'S BRIDGE.

BRUCKSAL, a large, open, but sorry town, belonging to the bishopric of Spire, and circle of the Upper Rhine, in Germany. It stands on the river Saltza, with a castle, the bishop's usual residence. Here was Prince Eugene's head-quarters during the siege of Philipsburg by the French in 1734, from which it lies eight miles to the S. E. and 12 N. E. of Dourlach. Lat. 49, 25, N. Long. 8, 36, E.

BRUCOE, inhabited by a people of the Munding race, but strict followers of Mahomet, a town, with a factory of English, on the S. side of the river Gambia, and empire of Jemarrow, in Negroland, Africa. About half a mile below it is a ledge ledge of rocks, dry at low water, which reaches from the northern shore five-sixths of the way over the river, and leaves so narrow a channel, that it is dangerous for large vessels to pass it: for which reason our sloops take the opportunity of slack-water to go through this place, which is called Pholey's pass. About nine miles below it, near the town of Dabocunda, are several rocks reaching from the S. side two-thirds across the river: and about three miles farther up is another ledge, dry at low-water, but with a deep channel on the N. side.

BRUGES, a city of the Austrian Netherlands, capital of the territory of Bruges, with a bishop's see. It is seated on a plain, 8 miles from the sea; and has a great number of canals, made for the benefit of trade, one of which leads to Ghent, another to Ostend, another to Sluys, to Newport, to Furnes, to Ypres, and to Dunkirk, which you may reach in a day in the summer time. All the waters about Bruges are without any current: but they may be changed in half an hour's time, by opening the sluices, and letting the water run into the sea. There are several bridges about the city, and that which was built in 1739 of free-stone, is very stately.

Bruges was in a very flourishing condition upwards of 200 years ago, and every nation had a consul herein for the maintenance of their rights and privileges; but since the enlargement of Amsterdam and Antwerp, the trade is diminished, and its inhabitants are not numerous enough for so large a place. However, there are many rich merchants, and a chamber for trade. There are several fine churches; in the first rank of which is the cathedral, whose rich ornaments and treasure deserve notice. The finest square in the city is the great market, in which stand the halls, with public galleries, and a large court in the middle, and on one of its sides a high steeple supported only with four pillars. It is full of bells, with the most harmonious chimes in all the country. On the side of the great square there is a structure which serves for a public magazine to lay cloth in. It is built on a canal, and supported by pillars in such a manner, that small vessels can pass under it, to cross the city from the canal of Ostend to that of Ghent.

The square where the Wednesday's market is kept is very fine; for it contains several walks between two rows of trees, and a new guard-house in the middle. The Burg is a large square, in which is the town-house, built in the Gothic manner, and adorned with a variety of figures of the ancient counts and countesses of Flanders. In the same square are several other public buildings. The church dedicated to the Virgin Mary is very fine, with a high steeple, which serves as a sea-mark for the ships that come to Ostend; on the inside are two tombs of copper, gilt, of an extraordinary magnificence. Besides the cathedral and two collegiate churches, there are five parish churches, 24 chapels, and 12 convents for men and women. There are a great many alms-houses and hospitals, one of which is called the school of Bogards, where there are about 180 boys, some of which are brought up to learning, others to trades, according to their genius. The habit is cloth, and half of them wear blue and half red, with a black bonnet. There is also a school for poor girls, to the number of 120, clothed with red or blue. In short, there is no place in the Low Countries where they take more care of widows and orphans.

It is remarkable that the knights of the Golden Fleece were instituted in this city in 1430, when the marriage of Philip the Good was celebrated with Elizabeth princess of Portugal. The parts about the city, which belong to it, are called Franc of Bruges, and contain 37 villages, and enjoy perfect liberty, according to the tenor of their freedom. The fortifications of Bruges are but trifling, inasmuch that in time of war they always yield to the strongest party. It is 8 miles E. of Ostend, 24 N. E. of Ghent, and 46 W. of Antwerp. E. long. 3, 5. Lat. 51, 11.

BRUGGE, or BRUGGEN, a town of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony, and in the bishopric of Hildesheim, 4 miles from the city of that name. It is so called from a bridge over the river Leyne. Long. 14, 13, E. Lat. 52, 20, N.

BRUGNETTO, a city of Rivera di Levante, or eastern part of the Genoese dominions on the continent, in Upper Italy. It is the see of a bishop, who is the suffragan to the metropolitan of Genoa. Lat. 44, 20, N. Long. 9, 5, E.

BRULLOIS, a small territory and viscounty of Lower Armagnac, a subdivision of the county of the latter name, belonging to Gascony, in the government of Guyenne and Gascony in France.

BRUMATH, a bailiwick belonging to the lordship of Lichtenberg and Ochsenstein, in the government of Alsace, now subject to France. Of the same name is a market-town in it.

BRUMHILL, a place in Suffolk, where a fair is held on July 7.

BRUNDALO, a city belonging to the duchy of Venice, in Upper Italy, upon an island formed by the rivers Adige and Ferrara. It had formerly a very large fort, four miles in circuit, with a bank in the middle. This city the Genoese sacked; and the Venetians, to drive them out, destroyed the remaining fortifications: so that but little remains of either the city or harbour.

BRUNDUSIUM, an ancient city of the kingdom of Naples, in Italy, on the coast of the Adriatic sea, which had formerly a commodious haven, whence whence they took passage into Greece. Here Pompey made his retreat with his fleet from Cæsar, by whom he had been besieged in this city; which is now called BRINDISI; see that article.

BRUNETTO, a small city of the Genoese territories, on the continent of Italy. It lies on the river Verra, near its fall into the Magra, and at the foot of the Appenines. It is the see of a bishop, under the metropolitan of Genoa, about nine miles north-east of Spezza, and fifty east of the metropolis.

BRUMPTON, a place in Yorkshire, where a fair is kept, on November 12.

BRUNSBURG. See BRAUNSBURG.

BRUNSBO. See SKARA.

BRUNSBUTTLE, a seaport town of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony, and in the duchy of Holstein, seated at the mouth of the river Elbe, 13 miles north-west of Glückstadt, subject to Denmark. Long. 8, 42, E. Lat. 44, 30, N.

BRUNSHUSEN, a fort of Bremen, in Lower Saxony, at the mouth of the Schwing. Here the elector of Hanover has a considerable toll; all ships, except the Hamburgers, that come up the Elbe, must stop here, and give an account of their cargo, for which a Hanoverian comptroller at Hamburg receives a duty.

BRUNSWICK Duchy, taken at large, includes the duchy of Hanover, principality of Grubenhagen, and counties of Blankenburg and Rheinftein. It is bounded S. by Thuringia and Hesse-Cassel; W. by the Weser, and the counties of Lippe and Hoya; N. by Lunenburg; E. by Magdeburg and the principality of Halberstadt and Anhalt. The chief rivers are the Leina and Ockar, exclusive of the Weser, which washes its borders. But the duchy of Brunswick Proper, possessed by the duke of Brunswick Wolfenbottle and Bevern, borders on the duchy of Magdeburg and Lunenburg, principalities of Halberstadt, Grubenhagen, and Calenberg, and bishopric of Hildesheim.

BRUNSWICK dominions in general. The family of Brunswick is divided into two branches, Wolfenbottle and Lunenburg. That of Wolfenbottle was subdivided into 3. viz. 1. That of Brunswick. 2. That of Wolfenbottle. 3. That of Bevern. The branch of Lunenburg was subdivided into 2. viz. Those of Zell and Hanover; but, on the death of the last duke of Zell, without issue male, 1705, that branch became extinct, and the estates devolved to the earl of Hanover, our king George I. by marriage to the duke's daughter and sole heiress, Sophia Dorothea, who died in 1726. In the description of this country, two things are carefully to be distinguished, viz. The dominion of the House of Brunswick, and Brunswick Proper, because all the several branches of this family are sometimes stiled dukes of Brunswick.

BRUNSWICK LUNENBURG Electorate, &c. belong immediately to his Britannic majesty, as elector of Brunswick Lunenburg and Hanover. These dominions lie almost contiguous, some in the Circle of Westphalia, but the greater part in Lower Saxony, of which almost the whole Circle belongs to this elector; his neighbours being the elector of Brandenburg, landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, dukes of Holstein and Mecklenburg, and bishop of Münster. The dominions of this electorate may be considered under 3 heads. I. The patrimonial estates, II. The succession of Lunenburg-Zell, III. The duchies of Bremen and Verden. I. The patrimonial estates of the family, viz. 1. The duke of Hanover or Calenburg. 2. The principality of Grubenhagen, in which are salt-pits and rich mines. 3. Half the county of Diepholt. 4. The towns of Stolzenau, Diepenau, Stigerberg, and Barenburg, in the county of Hoya. 5. The bailiwicks of Coldengen, Lutern, Barinberg, and Westerhoff, in the bishopric of Hildesheim, with the protectorship of that city. II. The succession of Lunenburg-Zell, containing, 1. The towns of Lunenburg and Zell, Ultzen, Bardowic, Walfrod, Guthorn, Botmar, Ilten, Harbour, &c. 2. The county of Danneberg, (yielded by the duke of Wolfenbottle to the house of Lunenburg-Zell, for their pretensions to the city of Brunswick). 3. The other half of the county of Diepholt. 4. The country of Hoya. 5. The duchy of Saxe-Lawenburg, with the small but populous trading towns, on the Elbe, of Lawenburg, Mollen, Wittenburg, and Ratzebourg. III. The duchies of Bremen and Verden (except the city of Bremen, and a small track of land at the mouth of the Elbe, called Hadeland, which belongs to Hamburg). The extent of these dominions from S. to N. is about 190 miles, and 160 where broadest, from E. to W. But they are intermixed with the bishopric of Hildesheim and dominions of Brunswick-Wolfenbottle, which both together are not above 120 miles from E. to W. nor above 65 from N. to S. though both ways very unequal by being indented by the elector's and other dominions.

The elector's pretensions are only to the small county of Eichfield (of which the elector of Mentz is possessed) as part of the principality of Grubenhagen; to the larger half of the bishopric of Hildesheim; to the fortrefs of Peyna, and to the county of Rheinftein, as a vacant fief; which was seized by the elector of Brandenburg, as holding of his principality of Halberstadt. His revenues arise, 1. From the salt pits or springs of Lunenburg. 2. From taxes on land, cattle, merchandize, public-houses, and inns. 3. His greatest arise from the rich mines of silver, iron, and copper. Those of

Clausthall,

B R

Clausthall, St. Andrew, and Altena, yield near 200,000 l. a year. The whole revenue is calculated to amount to at least 400,000 l. a year.

These counties in general produce all the necessaries of life; such as all kinds of grain, and culinary herbs; also flax, hemp, tobacco, madder, woad, honey, wax, all kinds of game, slate, lime, stone, marble, coal, sulphur, iron, lead, copper, silver, &c. with such a quantity of wood as to enable them to make pitch and tar. The manufactures are of great variety, such as woollen, cotton, silk, linen, lace, hardware, &c. The military establishment of Brunswick Lunenburg consists of 12 regiments of horse, and 24 regiments of foot, with some hunters, hussars, and light troops. The militia is formed into 31 companies, making about 5000 men.

Here is the office of state usually in the courts of crowned heads; with five or six courts, or councils, viz. that of state, of war, chancery, justice chamber, and consistory or ecclesiastical court: which last is made up of the ministers or presbytery of the city of Hanover, assisted by lay-elders, who are generally persons distinguished for learning, piety, rank, and interest at court. The sovereigns and subjects are Lutherans; yet Calvinists and all other professions enjoy free liberty of conscience, &c. A Jewish synagogue and a Roman Catholic church are tolerated at Hanover; and the clergy are well provided for.

BRUNSWICK-WOLFENBUTTE, contains the cities of Brunswick, Wolfenbuttle, Helmstadt, Koenigsflutter, &c. 2. The bailiwick of Hesse, Lichtenburg, Jerxen, Calvoerde, Forst, Schaepenstein, Schaeningen, Lutter, Walkenried, Gandesheim, &c. 3. The principality or county of Blankenburg, containing the towns of Heimbarg, Boernick, monastery of Michelsstein, &c. The reigning prince has for his consort princess Augusta, sister to the king of Great Britain. His revenue is above 300,000 l. a year, and he is able to bring 12 or 14,000 men into the field. The peasants are robust, sober, and laborious, and make good soldiers. The duke's court is magnificent and numerous, and his titles, arms, and pretensions, much the same as those of Hanover. The people are mostly Lutheran. The counties of Blankenburg and Rheinstein are usually considered together as one. They are so called from their towns, and lie in the E. part of this duchy, about 24 miles from S. to N. but narrow at both ends, nor above 9 miles where broadest. These counties (together with Queidlinburg, Hohenstein, Stolberg, and Schwartzbourg, in Upper Saxony) were formerly one province, and called Hartzingow, i. e. the Hercynian country, having been a part of the ancient Hercynian Forest, now called Hartz, of which still remain great woods and parks, with game.

Rheinstein was claimed by the earl of Hanover as a vacant fief, but seized by the earl of Brandenburg, as holding of his principality of Halberstadt. These counties are S. from Brunswick Proper, S. W. from Magdeburg, W. from Halberstadt, N. from Thuringia, and E. from Hildesheim. It is so cold that the snow lies on the mountains till midsummer, and affords little corn; but the valleys are filled with cattle. The inhabitants are strong and vigorous, and many live 100 or 110 years. There are iron mines in the mountains, one of which called Broeken, or Brocksberg, (the Bruclerus of the Latins) is reckoned the highest in Germany. Between Blankenburg and Elbingerode is a remarkable cave, called Buman's Hole, from its first discoverer Buman, which has a narrow entrance, but none ever found the end, though some miners have affirmed they have gone in as far as Gollar, 20 miles. Large bones of strange creatures have been often found in it, which the neighbouring gentry keep for rarities; among the rest the skeleton of a giant. There are two great rocks near the convent of Michaelstein, not far from Blankenburg, which represent two monks in proper habit, as nicely as if they were carved out, and are therefore called the Monks Craigs. Many castles are here on the tops of inaccessible rocks, and some even hewn out of the rocks. The most remarkable is that near Brocksberg, said to have been built 300 years before Christ by the Chauci, a branch of the Saxons, who had an idol and temple of Saturn here, which were destroyed by Charlemagne, who called the place Hartzburg. A salt spring having been discovered at the bottom of this hill in the time of Julius, duke of Brunswick, he built a small town for the workmen called Julius Hall, which is now grown rich and large, by their trade in salt, copper kettles and pots, wire, &c.

BRUNSWICK (City), in the foregoing dominions, is situated on the river Ocker, in a plain near the N. bounds of the country, 40 miles N. W. from Halberstadt, 51 W. of Magdeburg, 60 E. of the Weser, 70 W. of the Elbe, 51 W. of Brandenburg, 73 N. of Erfurt, 55 E. of Hanover, and 30 S. E. of Zell; E. long. 10, 44. Lat. 52, 14. The Latin name is Brunopolis, from Bruno, a duke of Saxony, who built it in 861. It became an imperial city, and capital of the duchy, and had liberty of choosing its own magistrates, &c. and grew a rich and powerful Hans town, but was at length taken by duke Rodolph Augustus in 1671, and reduced under sovereignty; the dukes building a citadel, and augmenting fortifications, &c. to keep it so; whereupon several merchants, &c. removed; and most of their noble houses, warehouses, and halls, are now empty. The Ocker runs through the city, which is still rich and populous, though short of what it was when free. It is 2 miles in compass, compass, and surrounded with double walls and ditches, and the ramparts are planted with mulberry trees; and on them is a mortar-piece of brass, 10 feet 6 inches long, and 9 feet 2 inches in circumference, weighing 1800 quintals, and has 93 quintals of irons in its carriages. It will carry a ball of 730 pounds weight to the distance of 33,000 paces, and throw a bomb of 1000 weight; but it requires 52 pounds of powder for a charge.

The houses, though mostly timber, are generally well built. The town-house is magnificent, and the duke of Blankenburg's palace is a stately old fabric. The duke built a magnificent new one, large enough for commodiously lodging 10 sovereign princes, which has rich furniture, fine pictures, a cabinet of curiosities, and a splendid library, in which is a very curious collection of scarce Bibles in several languages. The palace is called the Grave Hof, and its gardens are laid out in an exquisite taste. On the Hagenmarkt is the college, built in 1745, and the opera-house. In this city is also a play-house, a mint, a work-house, an orphan-house, which since 1753 has had a Latin school annexed to it, and a printing-house. The Lutherans have 10 churches here, and the cathedral of St. Blasius was erected in 1172, by duke Henry the Lion, who placed in it a treasure of reliques and curiosities, the greatest part of which in 1671 were carried to the palace church at Hanover. The records of the Brunswick Lunenburg family are kept in this cathedral, and there are to be seen the monuments of the founder and his second consort, and the vault of the dukes of the Bevern line. Before the Old Burg, called at present the Moshof, stands a brass lion, on a stone pillar, erected in 1166, by the founder of the cathedral. Here are two gymnasiums, a school for surgery, and a college for physic, a lazaretto, an hospital, and in the new town a council-house. The first spinning wheels were invented here, by Jurgen, a statuary, in 1530. The town has several manufactures and fabrics. Its strong beer, invented by Christopher Munnen, and called after his name, is exported even as far as Asia. Here are two considerable yearly fairs held. Brunswick, while a Hans town, was several times besieged by the dukes. In 1757 it was possessed by the French, who quitted it the year following. Under duke Charles the Ocker was made navigable from this palace to Wolfenbüttele, and the road between these cities well paved and planted on each side with trees.

BRUNSWICK, a town in the county of the same name, in the district of Wilmington, in North-Carolina, of which it is the principal. It is situated about 5 miles E. from the Atlantic, on the river Cape Fear, is the best built in the whole province, carries on the most extensive trade, and has a collector of the customs.

B R

BRUNSWICK, a town in the county of York, and province of Massachusetts-bay, in New-England, in the bay of Casco. It is the county-town, and is 13 miles from Falmouth, and is 53 from York. Taken by the British forces December 1, 1776.

BRUNSWICK, (New,) a town on the river Rariton, in a county of the same name in East Jersey, in North America.

BRUNSWICK, (New,) a town on a branch of Hudson's river, in the province of New-York.

BRUNT-ISLAND, or BURN'T-ISLAND, a royal borough of Fifeshire, in Scotland, which, with Dyfart, Kirkaldy, and Kinghorn, sends alternately one member to the British parliament. It lies on the N. side of the frith of Forth, and opposite to Leith; has a very commodious harbour, which enters into the heart of the town, with 18 feet water commonly, and at spring-tides 26. This is the usual port of safety for vessels driven up the Forth.

In this town, as on all the Fife coast, is a linen manufacture, especially of green cloth, for which there is a great demand in England, for printing, in the room of callicoe. It lies 12 miles N. W. of Edinburgh.

BRUSSELS, the capital of Brabant in the Austrian Netherlands, and generally the seat of the Austrian governor, is situated on the small river Senne, which runs through it. It is a rich and handsome city; and among the public structures, the ducal palace, where the governor resides, the town-house, and the arsenal, are the most superb. No city in Europe, except Naples and Genoa, makes a finer appearance at a distance: but, like them, when in the town, it is all up and down hill. It is encompassed with a double brick wall, and has seven gates; but being seven miles in compass, is too large to hold out a long siege. In Brussels are seven fine squares, or market-places; that of the great market is one of the most beautiful in the world. the town-house takes up one quarter of it, and has a very high steeple; on the top of which is a brazen statue of St. Michael, 15 feet high. In one of the apartments which is handsomely adorned, the states of Brabant meet. In three other rooms there is the history of the resignation of Charles V. wrought in tapestry; which is so well done, that it may be mistaken for painting. In the other parts of this square are the halls of the different trades. There are here several palaces of the nobility: that of Orange now belongs to the king of Prussia. The opera-house is built after the Italian manner, with rows of boxes, in which are chimneys. One is covered over with looking-glass, so that they can sit by the fire, drink a bottle, and see what is doing. There are twenty public fountains, adorned with statues, at the corners of

of the public streets; and in the middle of the town-house is one with Neptune, the tritons, and the horses spouting out water from their nostrils. The hospitals are well endowed, some of which are for the maintenance of strangers for three days. There is also a foundling-hospital, and one for penitent courtezans. Among the churches, that of St. Gudula is very magnificent. It stands on the top of a hill, near the gate of Lovain, and is surrounded with iron ballustrades. It is an old Gothic structure, with two large steeples at the east end, and is finely adorned within. The Jesuits had a fine church as well as a library. There are several monasteries and nunneries, two of which last are English. The nunnery, called the Béguinage, is like a little town, being surrounded by a wall and ditch, and has little streets, where each nun has an apartment. Six or seven hundred girls are educated here. The city is divided into 40 quarters, and the burghers into 9 classes, or nations as they are called. The magistracy is elected yearly out of the seven patrician families. The brewers at their house of meeting have erected an equestrian statue of gilt marble to duke Charles of Lorraine.

In 1695 Brussels was bombarded by marshal Villeroy, who demolished 4000 houses, the stadthouse, and several churches. In 1708, the duke of Bavaria besieging the city had near taken it, but was bravely repulsed by Mr. Pâchal the governor, major-general Murray, &c. And at the same time, the confederate army forcing the French lines on the Scheld, made the elector raise the siege with precipitation. The present emperor of Germany has lately ordered the fortification to be destroyed, but that order is not yet put in execution. At the gates of Brussels begins the famous wood of Sogne, consisting of 16,526 acres, out of which the inhabitants furnish themselves with firing. The only curiosity we can mention here is four fine pictures of the markets of Brussels, by Rubens and Schneider, which were 132 years in the family of the dukes of St. Pierre, and cost them 40,000 florins; but were lately in England, among the collection of the earl of Orford's, at Houghton-hall, and sold to the present empress of Russia, with many others of that nobleman's collection in 1781. The trade of this city consists of camblets, laces, and fine tapistries made here; and hence sent all over Europe.

This city being pleasantly situated, and the residence of the governor general of the Netherlands, it is much resorted to by nobility and gentry. It is also the see of a bishop. The territory of Brussels is of a very large extent, containing several manors and lordships, within each of which are many considerable villages. It lies 25 miles S. of Antwerp. Lat. 50, 31, N. Long. 4, 26, E.

BRUSKETH, a river in Cumberland which runs into the Eden, near Carlisle, opposite Petterel.

B U

BRUTON, Somersetshire, 115 miles from London, is a well built populous town, with a neat church, a free-school founded by Edward VI. and a noble alms-house, the ruins of an abbey. Its chief trade is in serges, stockings, malting, &c. It has a stone bridge over the river Bru, in the London road to Bridgewater. Here is a market on Saturday, with a spacious hall over the market-house, where the quarter-sessions are sometimes held for the E. division of the county. Its fairs are on May 4, and Sept. 19.

BRUX, a royal borough in the circle of Saaz, in Bohemia, seated on the small river Bila, at the foot of a mountain. It contains three cloisters, a commandery of the order of the knights of the Cross with the Red Star, and is well built.

BRUYERES, the capital of a provostship, belonging to the bailiwick of Vosge and duchy of Lorraine, in the government of the latter name, and Bar, now subject to France.

BRYANSBRIDGE, a town in the county of Clare, and province of Connaught, in Ireland. It lies on the Shannon, about 10 miles N. of Limerick.

BRYNMAUR, corruptly called so; but properly called Bynhmore, i. e. the great mountain; a steep hill in the neighbourhood of Hereford, in the county of the latter name. Its top is woody, and from it is an extensive prospect.

BRYSET, a place in Suffolk, where a fair is held on July 5.

BUA, an island of the gulph of Venice, on the coast of Dalmatia, near the town of Trau; called likewise the Partridge-island, because frequented by those birds.

BUARCOS, a small city of Coimbra, in the province of Beira, belonging to Portugal. It lies not far from the Mediterranean, where the river Mondego runs into it. In 1752 it was very much damaged by an earthquake, which demolished most of its buildings. Lat. 40, 30, N. Long. 8, 40, W.

BUBAINEN, a pretty borough in the capital bailiwick of Insterburg, belonging to the Circle of Tapiau and Insterburg, in the kingdom of Prussia. Here is a very fine palace, which stands on an eminence, consisting of four grand buildings, but not inhabited.

BUCEPHALUS, a city which Alexander built on this side the river Hydaspes, in India, to perpetuate the memory of his victory over Porus, and named thus in honour of his famous horse, who died here, as Arrian says, of mere old age, being on the verge of 30.

BUCK, formerly BUYES, a territory of Bourdeaux, in Guyenne Proper, belonging to the government of the latter name, and Gascony, in France.

BUCHAN, a district partly in Bamfshire, but the greatest part of it is in Aberdeenshire, Scotland. It is the most level track, and freest from mountains, for for its magnitude, in the whole kingdom, and very fruitful in corn. It has the German ocean on the N. and E. and it is bounded by Marr on the S.

BUCHANNESS, a head-land in the most extreme eastern point of Buchan, in Bamfshire, Scotland; where begins that great bay called the Murray frith. From Buchanness ships begin their departure for their several voyages. From Fifeness, which is the most northern point on the mouth of Edinburgh frith, and most southern land of Fifeshire to Buchanness, the land lies almost due N. and S. and the shore is the easternmost land of Scotland. The distance between them is 33 leagues and 1 mile, which is exactly 100 miles; though mariners say it measures no more by sea than 28 leagues; and from Wintertonness, near Yarmouth in Norfolk, is just 300 miles. Buchanness is generally also the first land of Great-Britain which ships make in their voyages home from Archangel in Russia, or from their whale-fishing voyages to Greenland and Spitzbergen, in the N. seas. Lat. 57, 55, N. Long. 1, 20, W.

BUCHAW, a small imperial city in the territory of Algow, belonging to Suabia, in Germany. It lies on the W. side of the lake called Federlee. Its abbey is of the order of St. Augustine; the abbess votes in the general diet, and its capitulairs are countesses or baronesses. Many of the inhabitants are Protestants. It lies 26 miles S. W. of Ulm, and subject to its own magistrates. Lat. 48, 8, N. Long. 9, 40, E.

BUCKHOLZ, a small town in the circle of Erzeberg, under immediate vassalage; and has both seat and voice at the land diets. Lace is made at this town.

BUCKFASTLEIGH, a place in Devonshire, where fairs are held on June 29, and August 24.

BUCHOR, or BUCKOR, one of the western provinces of Indostan, in Asia, subject to the great mogul. It is bounded on the W. by Sigestan in Persia, on the E. by the Hindowns county, and on the S. by part of Tatta and Jesselmere. The river Indus divides it in two; which renders it fruitful. Its extent from N. E. to S. W. is 360 miles, and almost 240 from N. to S. Its capital of the same name lies on an island in the Indus. Here is a strong garrison to awe the inhabitants, who are Mahometans, and have a considerable trade in Indian cloths, and other commodities.

BUCHORN, a free imperial city of Algow, in Suabia, Germany, on the E. side of the lake of Constance. It is small, but has a good trade with the neighbouring countries by the lake. It lies 14 miles E. of Constance, and subject to the house of Austria. Lat. 47, 40, N. Long. 9, 20, E.

BUCKENBURG, a town in the county of Schaumburg, in Westphalia, Germany. This is thought to be the Ara Bructorum of the ancients, who sacrificed here to Hercules.

BUCKEREST, a fortified town of the division of Walachia, on the farther side of the river Aluta, in European Turkey. It is situated on the Dembrovitz; it is the residence of the Woywode, and also the see of an archbishop. It is subject to Turkey, and lies 60 miles S. of Tervogisto. Lat. 44, 20, N. Long. 26, 30, E.

BUCKHAVEN, a village of Fifeshire, in Scotland, inhabited by fishermen, who are daily employed in catching fish, and carrying them to the markets of Leith and Edinburgh.

BUCK-ISLAND, one of the lesser Virgin isles, situated on the E. of St. Thomas, in St. James's Passage. Long. 63, 30. Lat. 18, 15.

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE is bounded by the Thames which divides it from Berkshire on the S. by Oxfordshire on the W. by Northamptonshire on the N. and by the counties of Bedford, Hartford, and Middlesex on the E. It is about 39 miles long, from N. to S. 18 miles broad, from E. to W. and 138 miles in circumference, containing an area of 548 square miles, or 441,000 acres. It is divided into 8 hundreds, containing 15 market-towns, 185 parishes, 15 parks, and 18,390 houses. It lies in the diocese of Lincoln and province of Canterbury, and sends 14 members to parliament. The S. E. part of this county lies high, consisting of a ridge of hills, called the Chiltern, probably from Cyllt, or Chilt, a Saxon name for chalk. The N. part is distinguished by the name of the Vale. The air on the Chiltern hills is extremely healthy, and even in the Vale it is better than in the low grounds of other counties. The soil of the Chiltern is stony, though it produces good crops of wheat and barley. In many places it is covered with thick woods, among which there are still great quantities of beech. In the Vale, which is extremely fertile, the soil is marl or chalk; some parts of it are converted into tillage, but more is used for grazing. The gentlemen who have estates in this county, find grazing so lucrative, that they generally keep their estates in their own hands, and the lands that are let, fetch more rent than any other in the kingdom. One single meadow, called Beryfield, in the manor of Quarendon, near Ailesbury, was let many years ago for 800l. per annum, and has since let for much more.

BUCKINGHAM, 17 miles from Ailesbury, and 60 from London, is the county town, and washed on all sides, but the N. with the Ouse, over which it has three stone bridges. A castle was built by the Saxon king Edward the Elder in the middle of the town, and it is divided into two parts; one where the church is, the other where the town hall is. The tower of the church fell down in 1776, but is rebuilt. It was a corporation and had summons to send members to parliament in the reign of Edward III. but does not appear to have done so, till the 36th of Henry VIII. though from that of Edward VI. it has sent two members regularly. Queen Mary incorporated it, by the name of a bailiff and 12 burgesses. Charles II. in 1684, granted it a new charter, changing the magistrates into a mayor and aldermen, but the old charter was restored 9 years after, and the magistrates are still a bailiff and burgesses. Here is a handsome town-hall, where are kept the weights and measures of the county by act of parliament of Henry VII. In the reign of Henry VIII. the county business, which had been chiefly transacted here, was removed in a great part to Ailesbury. This town was many years a woolstaple, and some of its wool-halls are yet standing. It is a large populous place with a church whose spire, reckoned one of the tallest in England, was blown down in 1698 by a tempest, and never rebuilt. Here is a free-school.

The county jail was kept in a castle here, till it fell to decay; but a new one is built; and by a late act of parliament the summer assizes which had been held sometimes at Ailesbury, are always to be held here. On March 25, 1725, a melancholy fire happened here, by which 138 families lost near 33,000*l*. Several paper-mills are erected on the Ouse in its neighbourhood; and its market is on Saturday. Fairs on March 6, Thursday in Whitsun week, May 6, July 10, September 4, October 2, November 8, and on Monday se'nnight after Epiphany.

BUCKENHAM, (New,) in Norfolk, 79 miles from London, stands on the river Waveney, half way between Ipswich and Norwich, has a market on Saturday, and is supposed to have had its name from the bucks in the neighbouring woods. Here was a fine strong castle, now destroyed, and the lords of the manor are butlers at the coronation of our kings.

BUCKINGHAM, a county in the province of Pennsylvania, south-west from Philadelphia. It is separated from Jersey by the Delaware river on the south-east and north-east, and from Northampton county on the north.

BUCKLAND, a place of Devonshire, where fairs are held, on Whitsun-Tuesday and November 2. Of the same name is another place in Somersetshire, where a fair is held on October 10.

BUDA, or BUDEN by the Turks, by the inhabitants called Offen, anciently Aquineum Corfa and Solva, and by the Germans Euelburg; both an old and new town in the district of Pilis, belonging to the united counties of Pesth, Pilis, and Solth, in the Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. The old town stood in the plain extending from the suburbs of New Buda, between the mountains of Pilis and the Danube, and was anciently called Sicambria. It is at present a mean place, about which are vast heaps of ruins, where remains of Roman antiquities are still found. New Buda is a royal free city, well fortified, and has a castle that is almost impregnable. The houses are tolerably handsome, being most of them built with square stone. It was a much finer place before the Turks had it in their possession; but they being masters of it 135 years, have suffered the finest buildings to fall to decay. The lower city, or Jews town, extends like suburbs, from the upper city to the Danube. The upper town takes up all the declivity of a mountain, and is fortified with good walls, which have towers at certain distances. The castle, which is at the extremity of the hill, on the east side, and commands the greatest part of it, is surrounded with a very deep ditch, and defended by an old-fashioned tower, with the addition of new fortifications. There is also a suburb, inclosed with hedges, after the Hungarian manner. The most sumptuous structures now are the caravanseras, the mosques, bridges, and baths. These last are the finest in Europe, for the magnificence of the building, and plenty of water. Some of the springs are used for bathing and drinking; and others are so hot, that they cannot be used without a mixture of cold water. The Danube is about three quarters of a mile in breadth, and there is a bridge of boats between this city and Pest, consisting of 63 large pontoons. The Jews have a synagogue near the castle-gardens. The adjacent country is fruitful and pleasant, producing rich wines; though in some places they have a sulphureous flavour.

This city was the residence of the Hungarian monarchs till the Turks took it in 1526. Ferdinand, archduke of Austria, recovered it the next year; but in 1529 the Turks became masters of it again. In 1684 the Christians laid siege to it; but they were obliged to raise it soon after, though they had an army of 80,000 men. Two years after, the Turks lost it again, it being taken by assault in the sight of a very numerous army. The booty that the Christians found there was almost incredible, because the rich inhabitants had lodged their treasury in this city as a place of safety. However, part of these riches were lost in the fire occasioned by the assault. This last siege cost the Christians a great deal of blood, because there were many in the camp who carried on a secret correspondence with the Turks. When the seraskier saw the city on fire, and found he could not relieve it, he beat his head against the ground for anger. In 1687, this city had like to have fallen into the hands of the Turks again, by treachery. After this, the Christians augmented the fortifications of this place, to which the pope contributed 100,000 crowns, for this is looked upon as the key of Christendom.

Udedom. It is seated on the Danube, 105 miles south-east of Vienna, 163 north by west of Belgrade, and 561 north-west of Constantinople. E. long. 19, 22. N. lat. 47, 20.

BUDA, (the beglerbeglic of,) was one of the chief governments of the Turks in Europe. It included all the countries of Upper Hungary between the rivers Teisse and Danube, and between Agria and Novigrad all Lower Hungary, from Gran and Canisca, the eastern part of Slavonia, and almost all Servia; but a good part of this government now belongs to the queen of Hungary.

BUDSDALE, a long and tolerably built market-town of Suffolk, with a free grammar school. Its weekly market is on Thursday, but small; and has a fair on Holy-Thursday. It is a thoroughfare from Bury St. Edmund's to Yarmouth, and lies 13 miles N. E. of the former place, and 81 from London.

BUDINGEN, a county of Hesse and the Upper Rhine, in Germany. It is divided into Upper and Lower. The former is properly Budingén, and lies between the counties of Nidde, Solms, and Hanau, being 20 miles long and between 8 and 9 broad. Among its most noted towns is that of the same name, which is the capital, with a fine castle or seat on the river Seyne. It lies 30 miles N. E. of Franckfort, Ostenbach and Renneburg. Near it are rich copper-mines.

BUDISCH, a village of Zuio, a district belonging to the county of Thurutz, in the Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary; where is a famous mineral spring.

BUDISZIN, a Circle of Lusatia.

BUDELICH, a town of Germany, in the electoral circle of the Rhine, and in the archbishopric of Triers, or Treves. It is seated on the little river Traen, 10 miles E. of Triers. Long. 6, 55, E. Lat. 49, 52, N.

BUDOA, in Latin, Butua, a small but regularly fortified town of Venetian Dalmatia, in Hungarian Illyria, with a port on the Adriatic. Here resides a bishop, suffragan to Antivari; from which city it lies about eight miles. Not far from the town is a castle or citadel called St. Stephano. This place was greatly damaged by an earthquake in 1667. Lat. 42, 15, N. Long. 19, 20.

BUDRIO, a town of Italy, in the Bolognese, whose adjacent fields produce large quantities of fine hemp; for which reason it is of greater consequence than larger places. It lies 8 miles east of Bologna. Long. 11, 35, E. Lat. 44, 27, N.

BUDEWIS, a large town of Bohemia, in Germany, on the river Moldaw; subject to the house of Austria. Here the Austrians defeated a large body of French and Bavarians in the year 1741. and in 1744 it was taken by the Prussians. It lies 64 miles south of Prague. Lat. 49 10, N. Long. 14, 20, E.

BUDWORTH, a place in Cheshire, where fairs are held on February 13, April 5, and October 2.

BUDZIACK, or BUDSCHACK, the name given by the Tartars to Bessarabia, that part of the European Turkey which lies between the N. branch of the Danube and the Niefter, upon the Black sea. It formerly belonged to Lower Moldavia. The inhabitants are either descended from the old Budini, or they have taken their name from them. They still, as of old, retain the denomination of White Hords, a clan of Tartars who neither own the chan nor the Turks, and live a desultory life, but principally by rapine. Their usual food is the flesh of their cattle and horses, with cheese and milk; particularly mare's milk. Of the same name is a mean place on the Niefter, in the neighbourhood of which stood formerly Tyras or Ophiusa.

BUEIL. See BOGLIO.

BUELT, or BUILTH, a pretty market-town of Brecknockshire in South Wales, in a woody country on the Wyde, over which is a wooden bridge leading into Radnorshire. It is fortified with a castle, which was demolished by Rice ap Griffith, and rebuilt by the Breoses and Mortimers. In 1690 a considerable part of the town, being that side of the street next the river Wye, was totally destroyed by a fire. Its weekly markets are on Monday for cattle, and on Saturday for corn, &c. Its fairs are held on June 27, October 2, and December 6: and in the town is a considerable manufacture of stockings.

BUEN RETIRO, a royal seat on the E. side of Madrid, in Algarria, a subdivision of New Castile, in Spain. It consists of four capital parts, which form a perfect square, with a pavillion at each angle. In the principal area is an equestrian statue of Philip II. In its pleasant and spacious wilderness are ponds, pavillions, gardens, and fountains: and near the house are two very delightful places called St. Antony and St. Paul, which may be looked upon as summer-houses. Here the king of Spain resides all the spring, and the best part of the summer season.

BUENOS AYRES, a bishopric and government under the jurisdiction of the audience of Charcas, in South America and empire of Peru. It begins S. E. of that province, and extends to all the countries under the temporal government of the same name; westwards it extends to Tucumana, and terminates on Paraguay; and is bounded on the S. by the land of Magellan. Its countries are watered by the great river of Plate, and were discovered by Juan Diaz de Solis, who lost his life by the treachery of the Indians. It is bounded towards the the S. by the lands of Magellan, and its capital is called Nuestra Senora de Buenous Ayres, founded 1535 by Don Pedro de Mendoza. Cattle abound here in such a manner, that horses are no other cost to the owner than the trouble of taking them. Flesh provisions are so cheap and good here that they are given gratis with the hide, which is the only value attributed to the beast. A horse was sold here for a dollar; and a beast chosen out of a herd of 4 or 500 for four rials. This trade in hides is the grand branch of commerce at Buenos Ayres; a finer country for its fertility in fish, and all kinds of game, cannot be conceived.

The city of Buenos Ayres is 77 leagues from Cape Santa Maria, which lies on the N. coast near the entrance of the river of Plate. The city is built near Cape Blanco, on the S. side of Rio de la Plata, 50 miles from the mouth of that river, and is called Buenos Ayres from its fine air. The cathedral is a spacious and elegant structure. The chapter is composed of the bishop, dean, archdeacon, and two canons. Here are several convents, and a royal chapel in the castle, where the governor resides. The principal square is very large, and built near the little river. Like most towns situated on rivers, its breadth is not proportioned to its length. The front answering to the square is the castle where the governor constantly resides, and with the other forts has 1000 regular troops.

The houses formerly of mud-walls, thatched with straw and very low, are now much improved; some being of chalk, and others of brick, having one story besides the ground-floor, and most of them tiled. The number of houses are about 4000. The inhabitants 16,000, one fourth of whom are whites. There is a small church at the farther end of the city for the Indians. With regard to the economical government and magistracy, it corresponds with the other places in South America under the Spanish jurisdiction. The climate here is very little different from that of Spain: and both American and European fruits arrive to great perfection here; and in great plenty. There are indeed violent tempests of winds and rains, accompanied with dreadful thunders and lightnings, as fill the inhabitants, though used to them, with terror and consternation; but in summer the excessive heats are mitigated by gentle breezes, which constantly begin at 8 or 9 in the morning. The city is surrounded by a spacious and pleasant country, free from any obstruction to the sight: and from those delightful plains, the inhabitants are furnished with such a plenty of cattle, that there is no place in the universe where meat is better, or cheaper, as has been observed above.

The farthest bay to the E. is called Maldonade, 9 leagues from Cape Santa Maria; the other bay is called Montebideo, from a mountain which overlooks it about 20 leagues from the cape. Within the government of Buenos Ayres are three other cities, Santa Fee, Las Conentas, and Monte Video. Part of the towns of the missions of Paraguay belong to the diocese of Buenos Ayres; those which formerly belonged to the government of Paraguay having been separated from it. The ecclesiastical government prevails here, the missionaries being absolute masters of the Paraguayan provinces will not permit the natives to come nearer Buenos Ayres than 7 or 8 miles; and for the same reason will not permit any of the Spaniards to settle within their missions, which extend above 600 miles up the river: they also prohibit merchants who trade hither to stay longer than two or three days. It is said that these precautions are used by the Jesuits to conceal their vast wealth from the curiosity of the Spanish monarchy, through the means of the prying laity, in a country which abounds in gold, and of being witnesses of their luxury and corruption. It is said they train the native Indians to the use of arms, and can bring 40,000 horse into the field, beside foot.

The commerce of Buenos Ayres is very extensive, and indeed such a commerce as no other port in the Spanish West Indies can boast; for hither come from the most distant provinces in the Spanish empire, the most valuable commodities, in order to be exchanged for European goods; such as Vigona wool from Peru, copper from Coquimbo, gold from Chili, and silver from Potosi. From the towns of Corientes and Paraguay, the former 250, the latter 500 leagues from Buenos Ayres, are brought hither the finest tobacco, sugars, cotton, thread, yellow wax, and cotton cloth, most of which is used at Buenos Ayres by the slaves and other domestics; and from Paraguay, the herb so called and so highly valued, being a kind of tea drank all over South America by the better sort, which one branch is computed to amount to a million of pieces of eight annually, all paid in goods, no money being allowed to pass here. These goods are mostly European, and consist in knives, guns, scissars, ribands, taffaties, silk stockings, English hats, English baize and coarse cloth: all these merchandizes are carried through this vast extent of country, in little waggons, though between Corientes and in this place there are no less than 6 great rivers, in passing which the cattle are trained to swim, and the goods are passed over in floats. The commerce between Peru and Buenos Ayres is chiefly for cattle and mules. Such as are concerned in the former, go first to the governor, and ask his leave to drive a herd of cattle into Peru, which is never refused when backed by a present of some thousand pieces of eight. The next thing is to take 30 or 40,000 wild cows out of the king's pastures, which is performed by persons who follow that business for for a livelihood, and who deliver these creatures at about 3 pieces of eight per head, about 15 shillings. At that rate 30,000 cattle may come to near 100,000 pieces of eight, and at market they may possibly bring about 300,000 pieces.

The commerce of mules is carried on by factors, which are sent by the merchants of Peru, who obtain the governor's licence by a considerable present; and then address themselves to the natives and inhabitants, specifying the number and times when they shall be delivered. At the appointed times they receive their marks, and stamp them with a hot iron on the shoulders, being from that time to be maintained at their expence. These cost about 3 or 4 pieces of eight each, and are driven by pretty quick journeys to Salta, about two thirds of the way to Potosi. There they winter, and are fatted with great care. When they are in full flesh they drive them to Potosi, where they are sold for from 7 to 9 pieces of eight per head; but such as are driven to Peru or farther, bring 40 or 50 pieces of eight, and sometimes come to 100. The trade carried on between this place and Europe should be only by the king's ships from Spain, but besides this there is carried on a contraband trade to England and Spain; but there is another with the Portuguese, who possess the opposite shore of Rio de la Plata by means of little vessels, under cover of sending their own commodities, but really European goods. Buenos Ayres, by its distance from the sea, labours under many inconveniences, which is augmented by the dangerous navigation of the Rio de la Plata river, and the rocks and shoals which prevent ships of burden from coming up to it; to remedy which a settlement has been founded on an excellent harbour in the bay of Maldonado, near the mouth of the great river. This, which may be considered at present as the port of Buenos Ayres, will in all probability soon become its rival, and the staple of the trade of Paraguay. Lat. 34. 35, S. Long. 58, 26, W.

BUG, a river which rises in Red Ruffia, Poland, runs N. to Bresse, and then turning W. falls into the Weiffel, or Vistula, below Warsaw.

BUGDEN, a village of Huntingdonshire, where is a palace of the bishop of Lincoln, which, with the gardens, is surrounded with a very deep moat full of water.

BUGEY, a territory and bailiwick, in the government of Burgundy, in France; it is separated on the E. from Savoy by the Rhone; on the S. from Dauphiny by the same river; on the W. from La Bresse by the river Ain; and on the N. by the county of Gex, and the Franche Comté. From Pont d'Ain to Seiffel, it is about 16 leagues long; and from Dortans to Port de Loyette, 10 broad. It includes not only Bugey Proper, but Vatomney and La Michaille. It was anciently a part of the Burgundian kingdom; of which the inhabitants of Savoy made themselves masters by degrees, and possessed it till 1601, when it was ceded to France by the treaty of Lyons; some lordships on the side of the Rhone excepted. It has its own provincial states, and assemblies of these and of the nobility.

BUGIA, a kingdom of Africa, now a province to Algiers in Barbary. It is bounded on the N. by the Mediterranean sea, on the S. by Biledulgarid, on the W. by the province of Algiers, and on the E. by that of Constantine.

BUGIA, a strong populous sea-port town of Africa, in the kingdom of Algiers, seated at the mouth of the river Major, on a bay of the Mediterranean Sea. It has a strong castle, which, however, was not able to defend the shipping against sir Edward Spragge, who took and destroyed several Algerine men of war under its walls in 1671. It is 75 miles E. of Algiers. Long. 47, 8, E. Lat. 36, 34, N.

BUGIE, a port-town of Egypt, in Africa, on the W. coast of the Red Sea, nearly opposite to Ziden, the part belonging to Mecca, and about 110 miles W. of it, in lat. 20, 15, N. Long. 36, 7, E.

BUHL, a small fortress upon the lines of Stollhoffen, in Suabia, in Germany, lying 17 miles N. E. of Strasburg, in Alsace. Lat. 48, 50, N. Long. 29, 25, E.

BUITRAGO, a town of Algarria, in New Castile, in Spain. It stands on a rock, and is fortified both by nature and art.

BUILTH, or BEULT, a town of South Wales, in Brecknockshire, pleasantly seated on the river Wye, over which there is a wooden bridge into Radnorshire. It is at present but a small place, though it has two markets, on Mondays and Saturdays, and three fairs on June 27, October 2, and December 6, for sheep, horned cattle, and horses. It is 10 miles N. of Brecknock, and 157 W. by N. of London. Long. 3, 10, W. Lat. 52, 8, N.

BUIS, or BUY, the capital of the barony of Menoillon, in the Upper Delphinat, and government of Dauphiny, in France. It lies on the river Orefe and confines of Provence. It is the seat of a royal jurisdiction, and lies 30 miles S. of Die. Lat. 44, 25, N. Long. 5, 20, E.

BUKARI, or BUKARIZA, a small, but pretty town, belonging to the district of Zengh, in Hungarian Dalmatia. It has a harbour: and hence the neighbouring sea takes the name of Golfo di Bukariza. Here great numbers of cattle are shipped for Italy.

BUCKHARIA. See BOKHARA.

BULAC, a town of Egypt, in Africa. It is situated on the E. shore of the Nile, and two miles W. of Grand Cairo, to which city it is the port-town. It contains about 4000 families; here all vessels, going up or down, make some stay, and it is a place of considerable trade. At this town the banks of the Nile are annually cut, in order to fill the canals and overflow the neighbouring grounds, from which arises all their fertility, either for grass or corn. Lat. 30, 16, N. Long. 31, 57, E.

BULAM, an island of Africa, near the coast of Guinea, to the eastward of the island of Bisagos, with a good soil, but no inhabitants.

BULGAR, the capital of the ancient Bulgaria, now in ruins. It lies in the government of Cassan, not far from the river Kama, about 70 wersts, or 120 miles S. E. of the city of the latter name, in Asiatic Russia. As Peter I. took the field against the Persians in 1722, he saw these remains, and ordered several Armenian and Turkish inscriptions found here to be taken down in writing, and translated into the Russian language. This country is divided into Great or Asiatic Bulgaria, and Little or European Bulgaria.

BULGARIA, a province of European Turkey, or Turkish Illyrium. It is bounded on the N. by the Danube, on the E. by the Black-sea, on the S. by Mount Hæmus, which divides it from Romania or Rumelia, and on the W. by Servia. Its greatest length from E. to W. is about 128 miles, and its breadth from N. to S. about 180. It takes its name from the Bulgares, a people of Sarmatia, and was formerly the lower part of Mœsia. The Danube, along which this country extends itself about 80 miles, had anciently, near Ariopolis, the name of Ister. Besides this is the river Ischa or Ischar, that rises in mount Hæmus, and falls into the Danube near Nicopolis. At the foot of the mountain, dividing Bulgaria from Servia, is a luke-warm bath, the water of which springs out in a stream about the size of a man's body; but about 60 paces from hence, in the same valley, is a spring entirely clear, and as cold as ice. Both yield salt-petre and sulphur as is evident from the smell. On this mountain is a Greek convent of the order St. Basil.

Upon the confines of Servia, between Mount Suha and the river Nissava, are several warm baths of sulphurous water, which issue from the mountains, and is quite tinged by the red sand and stones over which it passes. At the foot of Mount Witoscha, which lies a few miles beyond Sophia, towards the confines of Romania, are also four warm baths, very much celebrated in these parts; and on the mountain are some villages, arable land, pasture grounds, and vineyards; together with iron mines.

The country in general is very mountainous, but uncommonly fertile in the vallies and plains; consequently producing great exuberance of grain and wine. Even the mountains are not barren, yielding especially fine pasture. For instance, Mount Stara Plamina, which extends itself towards Widin, though waste at the top, is very fruitful towards the middle and bottom.

B U

Among the natural curiosities of this province, are the great numbers of large eagles to be met with in the neighbourhood of Babadagi. The inhabitants, who had formerly rendered themselves famous for their warlike achievements, employ themselves at present in husbandry, breeding of cattle, of which they have vast herds, and their traffic. Their Slavonian language is to be distinguished in some measure by the pronunciation only, from the Servian. They are partly of the Greek, and partly of the Mahometan religion, with some few Jews intermixed. Those of the Greek church have a patriarch, but this title the other patriarchs do not allow him; and three archbishops. The country is governed by four sangiacs, and consequently divided into four sangiacates. Its capital is Nicopolis.

BULGARIA, (the Great,) lies in Russia, and was conquered from the Tartars. But we know little of their country, only the names of the inhabitants, which are as barbarous as their manners. See BULGAR.

BULLS, (bay of,) or BABOUL-BAY, a noted bay in Newfoundland, a little to the southward of St. John's harbour on the east of that island. It has 14 fathom water, and is very safe, being land-locked. The only danger is a rock, 20 yards from Bread-and-Cheese point, and another with 9 feet water off Magotty Cove. Lat. 50, 50. Long. 57, 10.

BULLES, a small town in the third sub-government belonging to the Isle of France. It has a royal provostship, which is subject to the bailiwick of Clermont. Here they manufacture fine linen. It lies four leagues E. of Beauvais.

BULNESE, which stands on a small promontory on the N. W. of Carlisle, Cumberland, was the old town, by the Romans called Blatun Bulgium, probably from the British word Bulge, which signifies a breaking in, as the sea there doth. From this place, as the utmost limit of the province of Britain, Antoninus begins his Itinerary. It is but a small village; yet has a fort to testify its antiquity, besides the tracts of streets, and pieces of old walls, which frequently appear as they plough the fields. It was once the head town of a large manor, containing many hamlets, as Glaston, Drumbugh, &c. and it still remains the mother church. At 1 mile distance N. begins the famous Picts wall; and a little down the Frith is Drumbugh-castle.

BUMAN'S-HOLE, a remarkable cave in the duchy of Brunswick, in Germany, lying between Blanckenburg and Elbingerode. It has a narrow entrance entrance, but none have found the end of it; though some miners affirm, that they have gone into it as far as Goslar, which is 20 miles.

BUNALIN, or BANNABAT, a borough of King's county, in the province of Leinster, in Ireland. It lies on the river Shannon, and sends two members to the Irish parliament.

BUND, the Obern, the Goteshaus, and the Zeyngerichte, are large districts in Switzerland, on the borders towards Italy.

BUNDE, a small town in the county of Ravensburg, where there is a considerable trade in yarn and coarse linen. Near this town in 1748, a medicinal spring was discovered.

BUNGAY, Suffolk, 101 miles from London. It had a nunnery, a priory, and a castle in the reign of king Stephen, which, though demolished by Henry III. its ruins are remaining. On the 1st of March, 1689, this town was nearly destroyed by fire, to the loss of 30,000*l.* but it has since been rebuilt. Here are two parish-churches, and a grammar-school. Its market is on Thursday. Fairs May 14, and Sept. 25. The river Waveny, by which it is almost encompassed, is navigable from hence to Yarmouth, and is a great benefit to its trade. It has a fine cold-bath, a vineyard, and a physic-garden.

BUNIVA, a mountain of Greece, between Theffaly and Achaia, extending as far as the Gulph of Zeiton. The ancient name was Oeta, and is famous for the narrow pass, called 'the Thermopyles, and for the death of Hercules.

BUNKER'S-HILL. See CHARLES-TOWN.

BUNROTTY, a market and fair town belonging to the county of Clare, and province of Connaught, in Ireland. With a strong castle. It lies near the Shannon.

BUNTINGFORD, Hertfordshire, 32 miles from London, is a small town on the ford of the little river Rib, and upon Ermine-street, in the post-road to Cambridge, and to the north, being a chapelry to Layston, though situated in that, and three other parishes, and having a handsome chapel of brick, which was finished in 1626. Edward III. granted it a market in the highway on Saturday, and fair on the day and eve of St. Peter and Paul. The town stands in the manor of Cornbury, which Henry VIII. gave a market in the high-street every Monday, and fairs on June 29, and Nov. 30. Here is a handsome alms-house for four ancient men, and as many ancient women, that had lived handsomely and were reduced by misfortune. It has also a school-house built in 1630, to teach 7 poor children, and a free-school.

BUNZLAW. See BOLESTAFF.

BUOY of the Nore, a place in the mouth of the Thames, where a buoy is fixed for directing seafaring people to avoid a dangerous shallow near it.

B U

BUQUOY, a borough giving title of count, in the bailiwick of Arras, belonging to the county of Artois, and government of the latter name and of Picardy, in France. It lies 9 miles W. of Ba-peaume. Lat. 15, 0, N. Long. 2, 40, E.

BURAMOS Islands are 3 isles lying at the mouth of St. Dominic river on the coast of Nigritia, Africa, towards the E. side of it, the first of which has peculiarly the name of three islands, because looking as if so, though they are little better than gravelly rocks. Yet they are inhabited by Gourmet blacks, who have cast off subjection to the Portuguese, and relapsed into Paganism. There they cultivate cotton, and make their sort of cloth, which they sell to the negroes of the continent; but allow none to come on their islands, having canoes to carry on their trade. The channel they cross is called the Bot.

BURDAH, a town of Negroland, in Africa, the residence of the king of Tomany, who is a Munding. It lies about 11 miles E. of Baffy, and about 10 S. of the river Gambia, where is a port or landing-place called Cassinanda.

BURA, a small river, which flows S. of the confines of Siberia, and on the banks of which a treaty was settled between the Chinese and Russians 1727. It falls into the lake Baikal.

BURBECK, a river in Westmoreland, which runs into the Lune at Whinfield-hill.

BUREN, a town with a wall and ditch, belonging to the quarter of Nimeguen, in Dutch Guelderland, one of the Seven United Provinces. It is the capital of a territory of the same name, situated on the river Ling, and gives title of count to the prince of Orange. It lies 16 miles W. of Nimeguen. Lat. 52, 10, N. Long. 5, 20, E.

BUREN, a town belonging to the bishopric of Paderborn, and circle of Westphalia, in Germany. The Swedes burnt it in 1636, but it has been since rebuilt. It lies 5 miles S. of Paderborn. Lat. 51, 35, N. Long. 8, 25, E.

BURES, or BUERS, a place in Suffolk, where is a good bridge on the river Stour. Camden's Annotator supposes it to be the Burum and Barva where king Edmund was drowned. In 1733 the spire of its church steeple was burnt by lightning, and the bells melted down. Here a fair holds annually on Holy Thursday.

BURFORD, a bailiwick-town of Oxfordshire, on the river Windrush. Its market, which is on Saturday, is noted for saddles; and the 7 downs near it is much frequented for horse-races. In 685 a synod was convened here against the error of the British churches in observing Easter. Its annual fair is held on July 5, and lies 15 miles W. of Oxford, having had the same privileges with this city, but lost them all; and 58 N. W. of London.

BURG,

B U

BURG, a town seated on the isle in the Jericho circle, Madgeburg; containing an ecclesiastical inspection, with two Lutheran churches, one German church, and one for the Calvinist French. Here are some good woollen manufactures, and the town has suffered several times by fire.

BURG, a town of Zutphen, one of the Seven United Provinces of Holland. It stands on the old Ifsel, about 18 miles E. of Nimeguen. Lat. 52, 2, N. Long. 6, 10, E. See BORG.

BURGARA, or BURGERA, a port-town of Cananor, a province on the Malabar coast, in Asia. It lies in the dominions of Ballahore Burgarie, who keeps cruisers, from October to May, to make prize of all trading vessels between Damaon and Cape Comorin, that have not his pass, for which they pay an acknowledgement. It lies 3 miles S. of Cananor. This country produces pepper, and the best cardamums.

BURGUS, or BERGASE, a famous market-town of Romania, a province of Turkey, in Europe, where is a caravanserai or public inn for the accommodation of travellers.

BURGAW, (Marquissate of), a country of Suabia, in Germany, subject to the house of Austria. It is situated between the bishopric of Augsbuurg and the Danube; and is about 30 miles long, and the same in breadth. It was over-run by the French and Bavarians in 1703; but after the glorious victory of Hochstet they were obliged to quit it.

The capital of the same name stands on the river Mindel; and has an old castle; 20 miles W. of Augsbuurg, in lat. 48, 30, N. Long. 10, 20, E.

BURGDORF, a town in a bailiwick of the same name, seated on the Aue, in Lunenburg Zell. It is walled and moated, as is also its castle. Duke Otho in 1422 took it from the bishopric of Hildesheim, and fortified it. In 1519, during the Hildesheim war it was destroyed, but afterwards rebuilt; in 1632, the Imperialists burnt the castle, which was repaired in 1650, since which the dukes have held their private conferences here. The town has about 200 houses, and a superintendancy.

BERGERDORFF, called corruptly by the French Bertoud, formerly a village, but now a considerable walled city, and a bailiwick, of the canton of Bern, in Switzerland. Here is a castle, where the avoyer resides; also a little college for youth. It stands on the top of a hill; and just by is the river Emma, with a stone-bridge over it, whose inundations frequently make dreadful havoc. At Imfauis, near Bergerdorf, is a sulphureous spring for bathing. The town lies about 4 leagues N. of the city of Bern.

BURGH, Lincolnshire, between Saltfleet and Wainfleet, 127 miles from London, has a market on Thursday. Fairs, May 12, August 10, and October 2. It has a charity-school.

B U

BURGH, a village in the Peak of Derbyshire, not far from Castleton. It was frequented by the Romans on account of its baths; and here is a Roman causeway leading from hence to the neighbouring old castle on a hill.

BURGH, (on the Sands,) a place in Cumberland, not far from Carlisle to the W. where a square pillar, nine yards and a half high, is erected as a monument for King Edward I. who died here in his camp, anno 1307, as he was marching against the Scots. On three sides are Latin inscriptions.

BURGHHAUN, a town with a citadel, seated on the river Haun, in the bishopric of Fulda, in which is a Lutheran church, and one for the Catholics, founded in 1714. This town came to Fulda, by exchange, in 1692.

BURGH-CASTLE, a fortress at the mouth of Waveny, in the N. E. part of Suffolk, a place of considerable note in the time of the Romans, as a fort and station, and probably Garionotum. Its walls to the E. N. and S. are still standing, with round towers, and the river defended it to the W. The materials are of flint and Roman bricks.

BURGLES, a town of Transylvania, in the kingdom of Hungary. It lies 30 miles N. of Clausenburg, and is subject to the house of Austria, Lat. 47, 40, N. Long. 22, 40, N.

BURGO, (de Oisma,) a borough of Old Castile, in Spain. It lies on the other side of the river Douro, and opposite to the city of Oisma.

BURGOS, the capital city of Old Castile, in Spain. It was built in the 9th or 10th century, out of the ruins of Auca, as appears from its neighbouring mountains retaining the name of Aucani. It is situated on a mountain, from which it extends itself into the plain as far as the little rapid river Arlancon, over which it has a good bridge, which leads to a beautiful gate, adorned with statues of several kings of Spain; this river, with the river Arlanza, waters the plain all round, and it is encompassed with still higher mountains. It is a large place, but irregularly built, with narrow and crooked streets, some few excepted. Such is the intemperature of the air, that a Spanish proverb says, "Bugos has nine months of winter, and the other three of hell." On the other hand, here are fine open squares, fountains, and great numbers of handsome public buildings, and palaces. To its archbishop, whose annual revenue is 40,000 ducats, the prelates of Pamplona, Calahorra, and Palencia are suffragans. The cathedral is a large and beautiful structure. Here are about 1000 families in 15 parishes, with 5 hospitals, among which is a large one for pilgrims; 6 chapels, a college, 10 monasteries, and 9 nunneries, one of which is of the order of St. Bernard, and the abbess is a lady of the first quality, taking place of all but the royal family.

Burgos, the Capital of Old Castile in Spain.

mily, with a revenue of 80,000 ducats per annum. Another nunnery of Augustines has a very large crucifix in a splendid chapel, to which a particular veneration is paid. On the top of the mountain is a citadel, which defends the town; and most of the convents and hospitals are in the suburb of Bega. The inhabitants here carry on a greater number of trades and manufactures than is common in the other great cities of Spain; and the magistracy are intent upon promoting commerce, and all kinds of industry. The gentry both cultivate the arts and sciences themselves, and are also great lovers of learned men. It lies 110 miles N. of Madrid; in lat. 42, 40, N. Long. 4, 5, W.

BURGUNDY, in French Bourgogne, from the Bourguignons, in Latin Burgundi, who about the 5th century settled in Swisserland, and a part of the Franche Comte. From these parts they spread still farther towards the rivers Rhone and Saone, and erected a kingdom themselves; of which the Frank or Franconian kings gradually made themselves masters.

In succeeding times, Burgundy, with regard to Mount Jura, now called Mount St. Claude, was divided into Burgundy beyond Jura, or Upper Burgundy, and Burgundy on this side Jura, or Lower Burgundy. But not to enter into a detail of the several hands through which this duchy passed, Lewis XI. king of France, seized upon it about the year 1491, and annexed it to his crown; and notwithstanding the repeated remonstrances made since by the house of Austria, who claim Burgundy, France still keeps possession of it. At present it forms a government of that crown, which includes the dukedom of Bourgogne Proper, La Bresse, Le Bugey, and the bailiwick of Gex.

Burgundy is bounded on the north by Champagne; on the east by Franche Comte; on the south by Lyonnais; and on the west by Bourbonnois and Nivernois. From west to east it extends upwards of 30 French leagues, and from south to north about 45. It is very fertile in grain, and produces abundance of fruit; but especially an excellent wine, of which that from Nuis, Chambertin, Beze, Coulange, Chassym, Beaune, and Volenoi, is preferable to all others. The rivers which rise in this country are the Seine, the Dehune, which falls into the Saone, and the Brebince issuing from the lake of Longpendu; the Armançon, of which a proverbial saying goes, "A bad river; but good fish;" the Ouche and Tille, which run into the Saone: this last river come from Lorraine, and falls into the Rhone near Lyons. Among the four mineral springs in this county, those of Bourbon-Lancy and Sante Reine are the most celebrated. In the district of Bresse, called La Montagne and Revermont, are subterraneous lakes. Near Pono-rain, about three French leagues from Auxerre, fine ore is found. In this government are four bishoprics. The bailiwicks and provincial courts are under the parliament of Dijon, except the provincial courts of Maçon and Auxerre, with the bailiwick of Bar, which are subject to the parliament of Paris.

The states, consisting of the deputies and representatives of the clergy and nobility of the towns, ordinarily assemble every three years, by order of his majesty, in order to find out the taxes for the king. The governor resides at Dijon: he has six general-lieutenants; under the first, are the Upper bailiwicks of Dijon, Chatellon, and Bar on the Seine; under the second is the provincial court of Chalon; under the third that of Maçon; under the fourth Autunois, to which belong the country-courts of Auxerre, Autun, Semur in Auxois, with the county of Charolles; under the fifth is Charollois; and under the sixth Bresse, Bugey, Valromey, and the territory of Gex. Here are also six sub-stadtholders for Dijon, Chalon, Maçon, Autun, Charolles, and Bresse; one for each. The bailiwicks and territories of which this government consists, are the 12 following; namely, Dijonnois, La Montagne, L'Auxerrois, L'Auxois, L'Autunois, Briennois, this county of Charallois, Le Chalonois, Le Maçonnois, La Bresse, Le Bugey, and the territory of Gex. In the whole province are no universities: but several colleges, where polite literature, philosophy, and even divinity are taught.

BURGUNDY, (Upper,) the same with Franche Comte, so called as having been a part of the kingdom of the first name. See FRANCHE COMTE.

BURICH, a small fortified town belonging to the duchy of Cleves, a subdivision of Westphalia, in Germany. It lies about a mile from the Rhine, opposite to Wesel, and subject to the king of Prussia, as elector of Brandenburg. Lat. 51, 35, N. Long. 6, 5, E.

BURLEIGH-HOUSE, a noble palace of the earl of Exeter, in Northamptonshire, and in the neighbourhood of Stamford. It stands on an eminence, and commands a prospect of 30 miles over the fens. It looks more like a town than a house, with lofty towers and pinnacles. It has fine paintings, some of which are by Varrio.

BURLINGTON, or BIRDLINGTON, a good market-town in the West Riding of Yorkshire. It lies on a creek of the sea, has a safe harbour, and good quay, much frequented by the colliers, and a pretty trade. Its bay of the same name was called Sinus Salutaris by the ancient navigators. The weekly market here is on Saturday. The fairs are on Monday before Whitsuntide, and October 21. It has had several acts for the repair of its piers; the last of which was in 1723. A little to the north-north east is a cape called Flamborough head. The town lies 37 miles N. E. of York city. Lat. 54. 0. Long. 0. 8. W.

BURLINGTON, (New), the capital of New Jersey in North America. It stands on an island in Delawar river, where are quays for vessels of burthen, and much resorted to. The courts of justice and assembly of the province meet here. The houses are mostly of brick, and well built: it has plenty of provisions in its market. It has two good bridges over the river, called London and York bridges. It has communication with Philadelphia and the ocean by the river Salem, which falls into Delawar-bay. It lies 20 miles N. of Philadelphia, in lat. 40, 40, N. Long. 74. 10, W.

BURNHAMS, (the Sevens), so many small towns of the same name in Norfolk, on and near the sea-coast; they lie N. W. of Walsingham, and are employed in the trade of corn. That called Burnham market is held on Saturday; and has fairs, on March 15, and August 1; and has a harbour for ships. Burnham-deepdale is noted for its salt-marshes, so very serviceable for sheep. On the shore are tumuli, as supposed, of the Saxons and Danes who were killed thereabouts. The Burnhams lie 25 miles N. W. of Norwich. Besides these already mentioned, are other places of the same name. 1. In Somersetshire, where a fair is held on Trinity-Monday. 2. In Buckinghamshire, February 25, and May 1. And, 3. in the marshes of Essex is a village of the same name, where fairs are held, on April 25, and September 4.

BURNING-WELL is about a mile and a half from Wigan in Lancashire; upon the emptying of which a sulphureous vapour bursts out, which makes the water bubble up, and takes fire from a candle: by the heat of it eggs, meat, &c. may be boiled, though the water itself is cold. But the same water out of the well will not burn, nor will the mud of it take fire.

BURNLEY, a market-town in the eastern part of Lancashire, and at the foot of the mountains, where several Roman coins have been dug up. And here are fairs on March 6, Easter-eve, May 13, July 10, and October 11.

BURRA, one of the northern isles of Scotland, called the Orcades, or Orkneys. It is 3 miles in length, and 1 in breadth; fruitful in corn, but especially pasturage; and affords excellent fuel called peat. This isle abounds with rabbits; and has a chapel of ease belonging to the parish of South Ronaldsay; from the isle of which name it lies about 3 miles.

BURRAY, one of the Shetland isles in Scotland, 3 miles in length: it has good pasturage, and the coasts abound with fish. In it is a church.

BURRIANA, a town of Valencia in Spain. It lies on the sea, in a fruitful plain.

B U

BURRIUM, or Usk, a village of Monmouthshire, where fairs are held, on Monday after Trinity-Sunday, and October 18.

BURRIS, a small town in the county of Carlow, on a branch of the Barrow, over which it has a bridge.

BURRASSAKANE, a post-town in the county of Tipperary.

BURSTALL, a small town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, where broad-cloth is made, so called in contradistinction to their kerseys and druggets; but in London they have the denomination of narrows, when compared with the broad cloths of Wilts, Gloucester, Somerset, and Devonshire. This place is famous for dying; and here also is made a cloth in imitation of Gloucester whites, which, if not so fine, yet is of as good a colour.

BURSA. See PRUSA.

BURTON, or BARTON, a large straggling market-town of Lindsey, a subdivision of Lincolnshire. It lies on the eastern banks or higher parts of the Trent. Here is the common, but dangerous ferry over the Humber to Hull. It has two churches; one of which is so low, with regard to the precipice under which it stands, that one may almost leap from hence upon its steeple. It has several mills, and the houses are pleasantly intermixed with trees. Its weekly market is on Monday, and fair on June 13. It lies on the S. shore of the Humber, 14 miles from Grimsby, 25 N. of Lincoln, and 140 of London.

BURTON upon Trent, and on the N. side of this river, a market-town of Staffordshire. Here is a noble free-stone bridge of 34 arches, and 1545 feet long; where the Trent divides itself into three channels. Near the decayed abbey of Benedictines, whose abbot, being mitred, sat in parliament, is the parish-church, between which and the bridge lies the town; consisting principally of one street. This place is famous for its fine ale, which is distinguished by the name of the town; and here is carried on a good manufacture of cloth. Barges are drawn up hither with a full stream, in a deep channel. Near this place, between the Trent, Dove, and Blith, is the large forest of Needwood, with several parks in it, where is frequent hunting, and also horse-races. The weekly market here is on Tuesday, and its fairs on April 5, Holy-Thurs-day, July 16, and October 29. Burton lies 18 miles E. of Stafford, and 123 from London.

BURTON-LAZARS, so called from its hospital of the Augustine order, to the master of which all the inferior lazar-houses in England were subject, as he was to that of Jerusalem. It was founded in the reign of Henry I. for such persons as had the leprosy or elephantiasis, an infection which ran then over all England; and is thought to have come originally from Egypt, though it does not appear that that the Gypsies among us, who are supposed to be a progeny from hence, have any such distemper peculiar to themselves.

BURTON, a market-town of Westmoreland. It lies 30 miles S. W. of Appleby.

BURWAK-EAN (District), island in the south province of the Algerine territories, lies 3 leagues to S. of Medea; and is so named from the abundance of the Burwack or Kingspear which it produceth. Those of El Elma are the principal Arabs of this district, which is remarkable for a hot bath, called Hammon el Elma, and for the ruins of a large city known by the name of the Herba, the Tigris probably of the ancients.

BURWASH, a place in Suffex, where fairs are held, on May 12, and September 4.

BURWELL, a village in Cambridgeshire, remarkable for its fire in 1727 when 120 persons were burnt.

BURY, a small market-town of Lancashire, on the river Irwell, and at the foot of the mountains. It is the utmost boundary of the fustian manufacture. Here, and in the neighbouring villages, is a considerable trade in coarse goods, called half-thicks and kerseys, for which there is a very great market at Bury, which is held on Thursday. Its annual fairs are on February 22 and April 22, for horned cattle, horses, and woollen-cloth. It lies 30 miles S. E. of Lancaster.

BURY, (St. EDMUND'S), Suffolk, 10 miles from Newmarket, and 76 from London, where was an abbey, founded in honour of St. Edmund, king of the East Angles, who was crowned here, and after being martyred by the Danes, was buried here. It is governed by an alderman, 12 capital burgesses, and 24 common-council. It is well built, much frequented by the gentry, and has 2 fine noble parish churches, both in one churchyard, with a grammar-school, founded by Edward VI. Its markets are Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday. A fair on October 7, which lasts a fortnight, during which there is raffling every afternoon, with a play in the evening, from whence the company repair to an assembly. For its good air, beautiful situation and prospect, it is called the Montpellier of England. The river Bourn or Dark, that runs on the E. side of it is navigable from Lynn to Farnham, which is but one mile off. The chief public buildings are the guild-hall, wool-hall, and shire-house, besides the abbey-gate, which is still a fine monument of what the abbey was once. Spinning is almost the only manufacture here. This town was burnt by Sueno the Dane. Stow says it enjoyed the privilege of a mint in the reign of king John. This is the usual place for the affizes and quarter-sessions: and here are 3 charity-schools. Including the suburbs, it is above 1 mile from E. to W. and near 2 miles from S. to N. and contains 5 wards, 5 gates, and 34 streets, which are strait, spacious, well-paved, and generally meet one another at right angles. St. Mary's, which is much the oldest church, was first built in 1005, and rebuilt in 1430. St. James's was not quite finished till the Reformation, at which time there were 5 hospitals, 1 college, and above 40 churches and chapels. They are both remarkable for their symmetry, large, beautiful windows, neat pillars, and noble roofs. This place has been famous for several conventions of the nobility and parliament. The barons made their league here against king John. Here was a parliament in the reign of Henry III. and another in that of Edward I. In that of Edward III. the townsmen broke open the abbey, carried off its treasures, books, and charters, and made the abbot and monks their prisoners, till they had sealed a charter of incorporation for the town, and given them the custody of all the town-gates, and the wardship of all its orphans; but 19 of the rioters were executed, all the writings that had been extorted from the abbot made void, and the town fined 60,000l.

In the reign of Henry VI. a parliament met here, when Humphrey duke of Gloucester, who had been regent during his minority, was basely murdered here, which gave the first occasion to the war between the houses of York and Lancaster. In Edward the VIth's time, here were reckoned about 3000 house-keepers, and in that of queen Elizabeth 4000 communicants. They petitioned for the privilege of sending members to parliament, but could not obtain it till it was conferred on them by Charles I. who also granted them their charter of incorporation; and 1608, when several hundreds of their houses were burnt down, they had a grant from the crown of great quantities of timber to rebuild them. In 1636 this town was so depopulated by a plague, that grass grew in the streets. Here is an hospital or work-house for 30 boys and girls, which was formerly a Jewish synagogue, who were very numerous here till 1179, when, for murdering a boy in derision of Christ's crucifixion, and for the like offences elsewhere, they were banished the kingdom. Some few years since a body, supposed to be Lionel's duke of Clarence, third son of Edward III. was found by some workmen at this place entire.

BUSCHWEILER, a bailiwick belonging to the lordship of Lichtenber and Ochsenstein, in Lower Alsace, now belonging to France.

Of the same name is the best town in it, where there is a handsome castle.

BUSHY-HEATH, a spacious common 2 miles from Edgware in Hertfordshire, on a small ascent by the great road, after leaving the Street-way, from which there is a very agreeable prospect. On the right it commands a view far beyond St. Alban's; on the left, the W. end of London, Westminster-abbey, and the parliament-house, Hamstead intercepting.

cepting the body of the city. More to the S. is seen Hampton-court, and S. W. is Windsor; between both which are those beautiful parts of Middlesex and Surry, on the banks of the Thames.

BUSIN, a fine castle belonging to the banat of Croatia and county of the latter name, on the farther side of the Save, in Hungarian Illyrium. It stands about a mile from the river Unna.

BUSIRIS, an ancient city in the Delta of Lower Egypt, in Africa, and on the western side of the most eastern branch of the Nile, hence called Fluvius Busiriens. But now it has dwindled into a village called Aboasir, a little above Semenour, which last rose out of its ruins. Busiris is supposed to be the Pathros mentioned in Scripture, the Septuagint's Phatures. Not far from it stands the ancient town of Plinthine, since the Arab-tower, on a bay of the same name, from which town the ancients measured the length of Egypt up to Serbonides-lake.

BUSKINSKAJA, a sloboda or place fortified with timber or pallisadoes, belonging to the province of Isetisch and Asiatic part of Russia, in Siberia, as a defence against the Baskirs, Calmucs, &c.

BUSSETTO, a town of Stato Pallavicino, a territory belonging to the duchy of Parma and Placentia, in Upper Italy. It is situated on the river Orgina.

BUSSI, or BOISSI, an island lying S. E. of the mouth of Casamanza river, an arm of the Gambia, in Negroland, in Africa. It is 35 leagues in circuit, and seems covered with trees; from it run several rivulets. The inhabitants are Papells, with whom it is not very safe to trade, as they are treacherous, and great robbers; yet oxen and palm-nuts may be bought of them. In this island are 2 harbours or roads, where is secure anchorage. The northern one is called the Old Port, and the southern the New. The island is divided from the mainland by a channel or river, which Labat calls Geves; to the N. of which, on the mainland, dwell a Negro nation, called BALANTES, which see.

BUSSELTON, a place about 4 miles from Tichfield, and in the neighbourhood of Portsmouth, in Hants, where is a river narrow in its breadth, but so deep as to carry the largest ships. Here is a yard for building men of war, on account of the safety of the creek, and the plenty of timber in the country behind it.

BUSTARD River, in the province of Quebec, which runs into the river St. Laurence, in a bay of the same name. It runs a great way inland, and has communication with several lakes, and at its mouth lie the Oziers Islands. Long. 68, 5. Lat. 49, 20.

B U

BUTE, (Shire of), belongs to the western Highlands of Scotland, and comprehends the island of the same name, and that of Arran, both which are of the Hebrides or Western isles, and lie in the frith of Clyde. The shire of Bute formerly sent 2 members to the Scottish parliament; but is now, and ever since the Union, joined with Cathness, in sending one member to the parliament of Great Britain alternately. Bute Island, lying N. W. and S. E. longitudinally, is separated by two straits, not above half a mile from Cowall in Argyleshire, one end forming a kind of indenture into the latter, which lies N. of it, 6 miles W. of the coast of Cunningham and Renfrew, and 8 from Arran, which is situated between this and the frith-mouth. Buchanan makes Buté, Buithe, or Boot, 8 miles long, and 4 broad. Bishop Lesley says it is 10, and Templeman 12 miles in length, with an area of 27 square miles. Its northern parts are mountainous: but affords good pasturage, and some wood: the other parts produce oats, barley, and pease. Here is a quarry of red stone; and that called the hectic-stone is found in many places. The climate is healthy; and consequently the inhabitants live to a great age. It is observed, that every sixth or seventh year they are visited periodically with the small-pox. The people in general speak Erse; and the gentlemen, and such as have had education, English. On the coast is a herring and cod fishery. The principal place in this island and shire is Rothsay. To the E. of Bute, and close on the coast of Cunningham, are two isles, called Great and Little Cumbries; but these seem not to be in this shire.

BUTE, a county in North Carolina, in the district of Halifax, to which it is the W. boundary.

BUTRINTO, the Buthiotum of the ancients, once a considerable city of Epirus, belonging to Albania, a province of European Turkey. It lies on a gulph of the same name, in the mouth of the Adriatic sea, opposite to the town and island of Corfu, 35 miles from Chimera to the S. E. and 60 from Larta to the N. W. It is subject to Venice; but is now a mean place, whose inhabitants are principally fishermen, there being a good fishery in the bay. It is the see of a bishop, who is a suffragan to the metropolitan of Janina. Lat. 39, 45, N. Long. 20, 40, E.

BUTTEVANT, otherwise BOTHON, and by Spencer Kilneinullagh, a town on the Mulla, in the county of Cork, Ireland. There are still to be seen the remains of a wall which surrounded this town, as also the remains of the sumptuous abbey of Friars Minors, founded by David de Barry, in the reign of Edward I. whose tomb is now to be seen in the choir. On the N. W. side of the abbey stands a ruined tower, said to have been built by an an earl of Desmond, and is called Cellon. On each hand of the W. entrance of the abbey are two huge piles of skulls, brought hither after the battle of Knockmoss, which was fought about 5 miles from hence. Near this abbey stands another ruin, said to have been a nunnery dedicated to St. Owen or to St. John the Baptist. The name of this place, according to tradition, takes its rise from a word given in a battle fought here by David de Barry, who defeated the Mac Cartys, and cried out, "Boutez en avant", i. e. "push forward;" which is the present motto of the Barrymore family, who take the title of viscount from this place. Here is a free-school; and to the east of the town stands the ruins of lord Barry's castle, within the court of which is now a good modern house. The church, which is modern, stands a little to the east, and the remains of two others are still visible in the churchyard. The habitations here are very wretched; and Spencer says the old town was destroyed in the reign of Edward IV. by Murrrough O'Brien.

BUTTON'S-BAY. See HUDSON'S-BAY. This is the northern part of Hudson's straits, in North America, through which Sir Thomas Button attempted the discovery of a N. W. passage into Asia, after the miscarrying of Hudson in it. But he lost his ship, and came back in a sloop which he built in the country. It lies between lat. 60 and 66, N. and between long. 80 and 100, W.

BUTZBACH, from the Bucino bantes, a small, but neat town of the Wetteraw, in Germany. It is situated between Frankfort on the Maine, and Geissen, at the foot of a ridge of mountains called the Höhe, which, beginning at the monastery of Loach, on the Rhine, separate Rhingaw from Catzenelletogen, and extend themselves to this place. Near the road leading from hence to Geissen, are ruins of walls and forts, where medals and coins are found, that shew Attila and his Huns to have encamped here. The wine produced from the neighbouring hills is strong, but palatable. Their mines of lead and iron are exhausted. In 1760, the French, who had possessed themselves of this town, were drove out by the Hanoverians.

BUTZOW, a considerable town and fort belonging to the duchy of Mecklenburg, in Germany. It lies on the river Warna, and in the road from Rostock to Schwerin. Its see was secularized by the treaty of Munster, and given to the duke. Some French refugees set up several manufactures here; and it was formerly the residence of the bishops of Schwern. In 1697 and 1716 it was destroyed by fire.

BUXAR, a large extensive plain near Patna, in Bengal, on which, in 1764, Sujah Dowlah was defeated by the British forces with great loss.

BUXTEAD, a place in Suffex, where is a fair on June 30.

B R

BUXTEHUDE, a small town on the Ete in the duchy of Bremen, with only one church at present. Its fortifications were razed in 1682.

BUXTON, in Derbyshire, one of the wonders of the High-peak, having 9 wells that rise near the source of the river Wye, whose waters were noted in the time of the Romans. They are hot and sulphureous; yet not fetid, but palatable, and are eminent for creating an appetite, opening obstructions, and, if bathed in, are of good effect in scorbutic rheumatisms, nervous distempers, &c. The building for the bath was erected by George earl of Shrewsbury. Mary queen of Scots was here for some time. This place is 18 miles from Manchester. It stands in an open healthy country, has a variety of fine views, and a beautiful down, to take the air on. Here is a handsome large house for the reception of strangers, built by the late duke of Devonshire. The bath water is exceeding clear, of a blood-warm temper, and will admit 20 people at a time. The pump was given by Sir Thomas Delves, who received a cure here. The Roman road, called Bath-gate, runs from hence 7 miles to Burgh.

BUY, or BUYS, the principal place and seat of a royal jurisdiction, belonging to the territory in the Upper Delphinate, called the Baronies, in the government of Dauphiny, in France. It lies on the river Oreze, and confines of Provence, 30 miles S. of Die. Lat. 44, 25, N. Long. 5, 20, E.

BUZARA, a long ridge of mountains in Numidia, supposed to be that at present called the Sahara, in the E. province of Algiers.

BYER, one of the Scilly isles. See SCILLY.

BYGLAND, a large lake belonging to the priory of Nidenas, in the diocese of Christiansand, in Norway. It is formed by the considerable river Otteraae, and lies westward of Byglefield. The same river has a waterfall in it, called Fennie, lying in the parish of Esje.

BYHURT, a town on the river Senaga, in New Guinea, almost opposite to the island of St. Lewis.

BYLAN, a town 8 miles from Scanderoon, and between that and Antioch.

BYRCHOVER, a place in the Peak of Derbyshire, where are the tottering-stones which stand on a hard rock; one of which, said to be four yards high, and twelve round, stands upon a point so equally poised as to be readily moved with a finger.

BYRU, or BRUKA, a town of Quito in Peru, in South America. It consists of houses, inhabited by Spaniards, Indians, Mulattoes, and Mestizoes. About half a league north of it is a small stream, from which several trenches are cut for watering the grounds: so that the lands are equally fertile.

fertile with those about Truxillo, from which it is 10 leagues distant. Lat. 8, 20, S.

BYRON'S ISLE, one of the new discoveries in the Pacific Ocean, first seen by commodore Byron, on July 2, 1765. It is situated in lat. 1, 18, S. Long. 173, 46, W. It is low and flat, abounding with cocoa-nut and other trees. The natives are remarkably active, and are most excellent swimmers. They are of a bright copper colour, with regular and cheerful features, and are CAAGUA, according to Techo, a populous country in the mid-way between the province of Tape, in Paraguay, and the Atlantic Sea.

CAANA, a handsome town of Egypt, on the eastern bank of the river Nile, whence they transport corn and pulse to Mecca. Several fine monuments, covered with hieroglyphical characters, are found here. It is 320 miles S. of Cairo. Long. 32, 23, E. Lat. 24, 30, N.

CABACON, a town of Leon, in Spain, on a mountain with a fort, on the river Pisuerga.

CABALLIO, or CABELLIO, a town of the Cavares, in Gallia Narbonnenses, situated on the Druentia. One of the Latin colonies, in the Notitiæ called Civitas Cabellicorum. Now Cavaillon in Provence. See CAVAILLON.

CABALLINUS, a very clear fountain of mount Helicon, in Bœotia; called Hippocrene by the Greeks, because opened by Pegasus, on striking the rock with his hoof, and hence called Pegasus.

CABARDEI, a city of Cabardinia, a province lying southwards of the eastern part of Circassia, in Asiatic Turkey.

CABAREI, a city and the capital of the province of Cabardinia, in Georgia, in Asiatic Turkey, on the N. of Mount Caucasus, and southward of the E. part of Circassia.

CABECA (de Vide), a small sea-port town of Alentejo in Portugal, with good walls, and a strong castle. W. Long. 6, 43. N. Lat. 39, 0.

C A

CABECEIRAS DE BASTO, a district of Guimaraens, in the province of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal; to which belong 19 parishes.

CABENDA, or CABINDE, lies in E. long. 12. S. lat. 4. being a port town of Congo, in Africa, situated on the sea coast, 100 miles S. E. of Loango, subject to Portugal. Many of the blacks of Cabenda, who dwell near the shore, speak some English, and are commonly called Partadors, being a sort of brokers to the natives up the inland, to whom they repair, when any ships are in the bay, and bring merchants down aboard, or to the factory, and there usually buy and sell for them. The Bay of Cabenda lies very convenient for trade, wooding, and watering.

CABERA, anciently CAPRARIA, an island on the S. side of Majorca, in the Mediterranean, and opposite to Cape Salinas, from which it is distant about 7 or 8 miles. It is entirely mountainous and uninhabited, and is noted for shipwrecks. Here is a large and secure harbour, the entrance into which is towards Majorca. It is defended by a castle, where a small garrison is kept. This island is an usual place for banishment.

CABES, or GABES, a town of Africa, in the kingdom of Tunis, seated on a river near the gulph of the same name. E. Long. 10, 55. N. Lat. 33, 40.

CABETERRA, an inland gold-coast country of Guinea, between Acanni and Saboe.

CABEZZO,

CABEZZO, a province of the kingdom of Angola, in Africa; having Oacco on the N. Lubolo on the S. the Coanza on the N. E. and the Reinba on the S. W. It is populous, and well stored with cattle, &c. and hath a mine of iron on a mountain, thence called the Iron Mountain, which yields great quantities of that metal; and this the Portuguese have taught the natives to manufacture. This province is watered by a river called, Rio Longo, and other small rivulets, lakes, &c. The trees here are vastly large; and they have one sort not unlike our apple-trees, the bark of which being slashed with a knife, yields an odoriferous resin, of the colour and consistency of wax, and very medicinal in its nature, only a little too hot for Europeans, unless qualified by some cooling drug.

CABIRA, a city of Pontus, memorable for the defeat of Mithridates by Lucullus.

CABISTRA, a city of Cappadocia, mentioned by Tully in his Letters, lib. xv. epif. 11. and lib. i. epif. 18.

CABO DE ISTRIA, the capital town of the province of Istria, in the territory of Venice; and the see of a bishop. It is seated on a small island in the gulph of Venice, and is joined to the mainland by draw-bridges. E. Long. 14, 22. N. Lat. 45, 49.

CABO, or KABO, a kingdom of Negroland, in Africa: so called by the Portuguese, probably from a cape formed here by the main-land, near the mouth of the river Gelves. The king's residence is about 10 leagues E. of the town of Gelves.

CABRA, a town of Africa, in the kingdom of Tombut. It is a large place, but without walls, and is seated on the river Niger, 12 miles from Tombut. The houses are built in the shape of bells, the walls are stakes or hurdles, plastered over with clay, and the covering of reeds. They make a great deal of cotton-cloth themselves; but woollen-cloths and stuffs are brought from Barbary. The people are Mahometans; it is governed by a viceroy, and is 900 miles N. of Algiers. Long. 0, 50, E. Lat. 14, 10, N.

CABRAS. At the N. point of the Isle of St. Tome, (on the coast of S. Guinea) close by the shore, lies the little Isle de Cabras, or Goat-Island, so called from the vast number of goats on it. The channel between is very dead, and the isle very high, and full of wild lemon-trees.

CABUL, or CABOULISTAN, a kingdom or province of Indostan, in Asia. It lies N. W. of Attock, and is the boundary of the Mogul on that side; it has Tartary on the N. part of Cassimere on the E. Persia on the W. and Hajaçan on the S. It is reckoned 250 miles every way. The Nilab, which falls into the Indus, and reckoned one of its sources, rises here; as does Behat, which falls into the Nilab. It is a cold barren country for the most part, and subject to great winds; yet some of its valleys are fruitful, and yield good pasturage for their horses and camels, which are numerous and fine. It abounds with little towns and villages; and on the roads are strong houses, with guards of soldiers for the security of travellers between this and Persia, from the robbers of the Augan mountains. Most of the natives are Pagans, and frequent their temples with extraordinary devotion every full moon in February. They think it meritorious to dig wells and build houses for accommodating travellers. They have among them abundance of Banian physicians. Here is plenty of provisions; and they have a good trade with Persia, Tartary, China, and the Indies. They buy 60,000 horses of the Usbeck Tartars every year, the greatest part of which they send over to India; and deal much in drugs growing in the mountains, where are iron mines and canes; both which supply their manufactures of halberds and lances.

CABUL, the capital of the last-mentioned province of the same name; it has its appellation from the fruit mirebalans, called Cabouly by the Indians, which, with many other drugs and aromatic trees, grow in the neighbouring mountains. It is well-fortified, and has two good castles, besides palaces and many spacious caravanseras; it being the thoroughfare between Persia and Lahor. This place and province, which formerly belonged to Persia, were ceded in 1733 to Kouli Khan, by the Mogul, on the former quitting the rest of his conquests in India. It lies 110 miles E. of Candahor, in Persia. Lat. 33, 30, N. Long. 69, 12, E.

CABUL, (the land of). I. Kings ix. 10-13.

CACABELOS, a town of Leon, in Spain. It lies in a valley between high mountains surrounding it.

CACERES, a town in Spanish Estremadura, on the river Sabor, and is well known for its fine wool. Lat. 39, 16, N. Long. 6, 45, W.

CACERES-DE-CAMARINHA, a town of Asia, in the isle of Luzon, with a bishop's see, and subject to Spain. Long. 124, 50, E. Lat. 14, 15, N.

CACHAO, a city of the province of that name, in the kingdom of Tonquin in Asia, situated in E. Long. 105, 0. N. Lat. 21, 30, at about 80 leagues distance from the sea. It is prodigiously crowded with people, inasmuch that the streets are hardly passable, especially on market-days. These vast crowds, however, come mostly from the neighbouring villages; upon which account these villages have been allowed their halls in particular parts of the city, where they bring and dispose of their wares. The town itself, though the metropolis of the whole Tonquinese kingdom, hath neither walls or fortifications. The principal streets are wide and airy, but the rest of them narrow and ill-paved; and, and, except the palace royal and arsenal, the town hath little else worth notice. The houses are low and mean, mostly built of wood and clay, and not above one story high.

Besides this palace, the ruins of one still more magnificent are to be observed, and are called Libatvia. The circumference is said to have been betwixt 6 and 7 miles: some arches, porticoes, and other ornaments, are still remaining; from which, and some of its courts paved with marble, it may be concluded to have been as magnificent a structure as any of the eastern parts can shew. The English factory is situated on the north side of the city, fronting the river Song-koy. It is a handsome low built house. Adjoining to it, on the south side, is the Danish factory, which is neither so large nor so handsome. Some curious observations have been communicated to the Royal Society concerning differences between the tides of those seas and those of Europe, viz. that on the Tonquinese coast ebbs and flows but once in 24 hours.

CACHAO, or KACHO, a town of Meli, in Negroland, in Africa, a Portuguese colony, on the river St. Domingo, or of the same name, which falls into the sea about 20 leagues below it. It is encompassed on the land-side with a strong palisado terraced, and defended by some batteries against the neighbouring natives; who, except those living in the place, often fall out with the Portuguese, and neither give nor expect quarter. Here is a Portuguese church, and convent of Capuchins. The spiritual government is administered by a grand vicar, sent thither by the bishop of St. Jago, one of the Cape de Verd islands. Most of the Portuguese here are Mulattoes, and so black as to be scarce distinguishable from the negroes. They carry on a great trade in wax and slaves. The river is a quarter of a league broad before the town, and so deep that the largest vessels might come up, did not a dangerous bar stop its mouth. The tide flows upwards of 30 leagues above Cachao. Its N. bank is covered with mangroves, beyond which are the finest trees in all Africa, for thickness, height, and goodness.

CACHIAN, a royal seat in the province of the same name, belonging to CochinChina in the East Indies, in Asia. It is resorted to by the Chinese for trade. It lies 35 S. E. of Faifo, on the bay of Tonquin, and between 6 and 7 leagues from Turon.

CACHIMAYO, a large river in Peru, South America, which falls into the Ocean within 2 leagues of La Plata.

CACONGO, a maritime kingdom, or province of Lower Guinea, in Africa. It has the sea on the W. the river Loango-Louise on the N. towards the S. and S. E. it is bounded by the kingdom of Angoy, and the river Sonbu; eastward it extends from the coast two days journey beyond the capital city, which is also called Cacongô, and is but few miles from sea. It is well built and situated, and abundant with provisions. The river Cacongô runs quite across the kingdom, and after a course of 25 or 30 leagues falls into sea in S. Lat. 5, 0. To S. of the river 4 miles from the coast is the village Malamba, where the sea making a gulph affords safe road for shipping. The country is mountainous and woody, not fertile nor well tilled. The natives are false, changeable, turbulent, and quarrelsome, yet cowards. All the trade is at Malemba, where the Dutch and Portuguese sell some sorts of cloth, iron ware, &c. which the Cacongese sell farther up the country, and have slaves in exchange. In about 1685, father Leonard, a black priest, in a few days, as Merolla reports, baptized above 5000 children.

CACORLA, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, seated on the rivulet Vega, between two mountains, about 2 miles from the source of the Guadalquivir, on the frontiers of the kingdom of Granada. Long. 1, 55, E. Lat. 37, 56, N.

CADHULSO, a neat, but small town of New Castile, in Spain, surrounded with fine gardens and groves.

CADAN, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Zatz, seated on the northern bank of the river Egra, in E. long. 13, 34. N. Lat. 50, 20.

CADAVAL, a place belonging to Torres Vedras, in Portuguese Estremadura. It contains only 350 inhabitants, with a district of 8 parishes.

CADEA, or THE LEAGUE OF THE HOUSE OF GOD, is one of these that compose the republic of the Grisons, and the most powerful and extensive of them all. It contains the bishopric of Coire, the great valley of Engadine, and that of Bragaille, or Pregel. Of the 11 great, or 21 small communities, there are but two that speak the German language: that of the rest is called the Rhetic, and is a dialect of the Italian. The Protestant religion is the most predominant in this league, which is allied to the Seven Swiss Cantons, ever since the year 1498. Coire is the capital town.

CADENAC, a very old town of Upper Quercy, in the territory of the latter name, belonging to Guyenne Proper, in the government of Guyenne and Gascony, in France. It stands upon a steep rock, which is almost surrounded by the river Lot.

CADENET, a town of France, in Provence, and in the viguerie of Apt, 28 miles S. E. of Avignon, and 10 S. of Apt. Long. 5, 30, E. Lat. 43, 40, N.

CADEROUSSE, a town in the jurisdiction of Carpentras, and county of Venaissin, belonging to the state of Avignon, and surrounded by Provence, in France. It lies on the Rhone; and is also the seat of a provincial judge.

CADESH

View of CADIZ in SPAIN from the West.

CADESH-BARNEAH, the 15th encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness after their coming out of Egypt.

CADESH and SHUR, were the names of two deserts, the last of which the Israelites entered after passing the Red Sea; and is the same which is afterwards called Etham.

CADILLAC, a town of Bourdelois and Guyenne Proper, in the government of the former name and of Gascony, in France; situated on the Garonne, and is the principal place of the county of Benagues. Here is a fine castle or seat, a collegiate church, and a convent.

CADIZ, by the Romans called Gades, by the Phœnicians Gadir or Gaddir; some of the ancients have given it the name of Tartessus. The Tyrians first built it; and after them it was possessed by the Carthaginians, from whom it came under the dominion of the Romans. It is a famous trading city of Andalusia, in Spain, lying on the N. W. extremity of the long and irregular neck of land of an island which extends itself from S. E. to N. W. the eastern part of which is now called Cadiz, and the S. E. part the island of Leon. It is joined to the mainland, from which only a narrow channel or arm of the sea separates it, by means of the bridge Suaco, both ends of this being defended by redoubts, and other works thrown up of earth. The island, from fort St. Catalina to the island of St. Pedro, is five miles long, and from the S. point near the latter, to the N. point just by the above-mentioned bridge, almost two miles broad. It produces little corn, but the best Spanish wine; and upon it are some pasture-grounds, and on the side of the harbour great quantities of salt are made. The neck of land which extends itself from the island, terminates in two head-lands, the principal and most westerly of which is called St. Sebastian.

The city of Cadiz is pretty large in circuit; yet all the large end of the neck of land is not built upon, and the delightful west-side, which is called Sancto Campo or the Church-court, is almost uninhabited, the only building upon it being a spacious hospital, and two chapels, on account of its being not so commodious for the landing of merchandize, as the east-side.

Most of the streets of Cadiz are narrow, crooked, indifferently paved, and very dirty; but some of them are broad, straight, and well-paved. The houses are generally between three and four stories high; nearly all of them have a quadrangular area, and several of these are very handsome. The city is in want of fresh-water: and in it are reckoned 13 convents; among which is a college, said to be the finest in all Andalusia; yet has but one parish-church, which is the cathedral; though the number of its ordinary inhabitants amounts to 40,000, and it contains about 5000 houses. Its bishop is a suffragan to the metropolitan of Seville, with an annual revenue of 12,000 ducats: his diocese consists of but 14 parishes. Here is the royal audience of the Indies, or the Indian board of trade; removed hither from Seville. Both before and after the arrival of the Spanish ships from America, and their sailing from Cadiz thither again, this place is very brisk and stirring, from the great number of strangers who come hither for the sake of trade, and said to amount to 50,000. It is the center of all the American trade, to which port the English, French, Dutch, and Italian merchants send their goods, which Spanish factors, in their respective names, put on board the ships for America. Besides these just mentioned, all others, who trade by sea, have their agents, correspondents, and commissioners, at Cadiz; and the consuls of the aforesaid nations make a considerable figure here.

Here the Spaniards have their principal arsenals of maritime stores, and here also they build most of their men of war; their docks, &c. being the best in Spain.

The harbour and bay is very fine and spacious; and for the defence and entrance into it, has not only fort Matagorda, but also fort Puntal, lying opposite to it upon a point of the neck of land on which Cadiz stands. Between them and the points of land on which the two forts stand, the entrance into the harbour is about 500 fathoms broad. At ebb-tide a great part of the harbour, which is said to be 10 French leagues in circuit, lies dry. The outer and furthest bay, which begins between Rota and St. Sebastian, and which extends itself to Puerto de Santa Maria, is divided into two parts by the rocks Los Pueros and Diamante.

Cadiz is surrounded with walls and irregular bastions, as the situation of the ground would admit of. There is no approaching to the S. side, by reason of its high and steep shore. At present it is dangerous landing on the N. side, as here are sandbanks and rocks under water: but on the S. W. side there is a landing-place, at which stands a small fort called St. Catalina. Towards the S. W. point is a ridge of rocks, which at the time of flood are partly covered with water. The outermost of these is a small island, upon which is a watch-tower and lighthouse, together with two chapels; as also fort St. Sebastian stands there.

As Cadiz then can be no where attempted, but at the narrowest part of the neck of land lying between it and the S. E. part of the isle of Leon. This has also been fortified: but in 1596, the English, under the earl of Essex, landing on the island, took and burnt the town, having plundered it of immense treasure, and destroyed the galleons in the harbour; after which they quitted the place. But in 1702, the duke of Ormond attacked it without success. There were formerly two wonderful springs at Cadiz, the temple of Hercules, and two brazen pillars, &c. There was likewise a small island in the bay, where were houses of pleasure. Cadiz lies 40 miles from Gibraltar. Lat. 36, 34. N. Long. 5, 56 W.

CADOLZBURG, a considerable market-town with a strong citadel, in the principality of Onolzbach.

CADORE IL CADORINO, a small territory and subdivision of the marquisate of Trevigiana, in the Venetian dominions, in Upper Italy, bounded on the N. by Brixen; on the E. by Friuli; on the S. by Belunese; and on the W. by Trentin. Its capital is of the same name, or Piava di Cadore, a small city lying on the E. side of the river Piave, S. of the Orfina, and N. of the Botia, both which fall into it.

CADSANO, an island on the coast of Dutch Flanders, in the Netherlands, at the mouth of the river Scheld.

CADURCI, CADURCUM, CADUREUS, and CADURX, a town of the Cadurci, a people of Aquitania; situated between the rivers Oldus running from the north, and the Tarnis from the south, and falling into the Garumna, now Cahors; capital of the territory of the Querci, in Guienne. A part of the Cadurci, to the south next the Tarnis, were called Eleutheri.

CADUSII, a people of Media Atropatene, situated to the west in the mountains, and reaching to the Caspian sea; between whom and the Medes, perpetual war and enmity continued down to the time of Cyrus.

CADYTIS. Herodotus making mention of Pharoah Necho's expedition against the king of Assyria, saith, that after the victory obtained by him, he took the great city Cadytis, which he describes to be a mountainous city of Palestine, of the bigness of Sardis in Lydia. By which description Cadytis could be no other than Jerusalem.

CAEGWRLEY, a village of North Wales, in Flintshire, 7 miles S. by W. of Chester; with four fairs, on Shrove Tuesday, May 16, August 12, and October 27.

CAEN, (Le Campagne de), a subdivision of Lower Normandy, in the government of the latter name, in France. It extends itself as far as Falaise, a town in the Marches.

Of the same name is the only city in it, in Latin called Cadamum, anciently Catheim, i. e. the dwelling-place of war, or of the Cadete. It is situated near the confluence of the rivers Orne and Odon, in a valley between two large meadows. The united stream of the aforesaid rivers divides it into the Upper and Lower town, between which there is a communication by means of the bridges of St. James and St. Peter; on the latter of which stands a handsome townhouse, with four turrets. It is the second city in Normandy, and the seat of an intendency, election, forest-district, prevot of the marshalsea, provincial jurisdiction, bailiwick, admiralty, and salt-granary. Here also is an university, founded in 1452, and an academy of sciences, erected by Lewis XIV. in 1706. It has two large suburbs, 12 parish-churches, and a collegiate one, 14 convents, a school, a general hospital, besides another for incurables, and two abbeys. The greatest trade of this city, and its election consists in cloth and fine linen, having a communication with the English channel, which lies 7 miles N. of it, and vessels of some burthen being able to come up as far as St. James's bridge. The inhabitants are reckoned at 40,000, and it is the see of a bishop.

The Upper town is defended by a castle, (built by the English,) on a rock very well fortified; and the Lower town is quite surrounded with water. In the year 1063, a council was held here by Maurice, archbishop of Rouen, in the presence of William the Conqueror, who was interred in the abbey of St. Stephen, which he had founded. It lies 100 miles west of Paris. Lat. 49, 11, N. Long. 16, W.

CÆNINA, was situated on the confines of Latium, and the country of the Sabines; whence some make it a city of the Sabines, and others of ancient Latium.

CAER-CARODOCK, Salop, a hill near the conflux of the Clun on the Temd, where are still some vestiges of the fortifications erected by the famous British king Caractacus, and gallantly defended by him against Ostorius and the Roman legions, but at last he took it; for which the senate of Rome decreed him a triumph. This place, in some maps is called Cradock-Hill.

CAERDIFF, or CARDIFF, in British Caerdydh, a trading town of Glamorganshire, in South Wales. It lies on the river Tavy or Taaff, over which it has a bridge. The neighbouring country is fruitful; and 4 miles below the town is a commodious haven on the sea, from which small vessels come up to the bridge. It has two suburbs, and a spacious strong castle on the W. side of the town, where Robert, the Conqueror's eldest son, was kept prisoner, till he died, his brother William Rufus having put out his eyes. Within the circuit of its walls are two parishes, and but one church. It is governed by two bailiffs, who return one member to parliament; and the town enjoys several privileges. Its weekly markets are on Wednesday and Saturday; and the fairs are on the second Wednesday in March, June 20, September 8, and November 30. It lies two miles S. E. of Landaff. Lat. 51, 31, N. Long. 3, 14, W.

CÆRE,

C A

CÆRE, a town of Etruria, the royal residence of Mezentius. Its ancient name was Argyllæ. In Strabo's time not the least vestige of it remained, except the baths called Cæretana. From this town the Roman Cenfor's tables were called Cæritas Tabulæ.

CAERLON, in Monmouthshire, 131 miles from London, has a wooden bridge over the Usk, where it has a harbour for barges. It was formerly the station of a Roman legion, as the name imports; had 3 churches, an university, and the see of a bishop, removed afterwards to St. David's. Its walls were built by the Romans with brick, about 3 miles in compass; it had many elegant structures; besides, baths, coins, and other Roman antiquities, are frequently found here. It is said to have extended heretofore to St. Gilians, and is supposed to have been a very strong place in the reign of Henry II. when it defended itself a long time against the English; and according to Giraldus, it had then many footsteps of its ancient grandeur, but it is now become a small inconsiderable town, with a market on Thursday, and fairs on Wednesday before Easter, May 1, July 20, Sept. 21.

CAERMARTHEN, in British Kaer-vyrdhin, Ptolemy's Maridunum, and Antoninus's Muridunum, an ancient and very handsome town, and the capital of the shire of the same name, in South Wales. It lies upon the river Towy, with a bridge over it, and navigable by vessels of 100 tons quite up to the town, where is a commodious quay. It is governed by a mayor, who returns one member to parliament. It is populous, and drives a very considerable trade. Its strong castle now in ruins, is used as a town jail, and a town-hall has lately been erected.

About a mile from the town on the road side, and almost opposite to the bishop of St. David's palace, is Merlin's grove. The people in and about this town are reckoned the wealthiest and politest in all Wales, as its air is the best, and soil the most fruitful. The markets are on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday; and fairs June 23, August 1, September 28, and November 3. It lies 170 miles W. of London. Lat. 52. 2. Long. 4. 24.

CAERMARTHENSHIRE, a county in South Wales, the most fruitful and level in all the principality, producing grain, cattle, salmon, wool, pit-coal, and fine lead. It contains about 700,000 acres, 87 parishes, 8 towns, and near 17,000 inhabitants, and 28 rivers, great and small. It sends two members to parliament; one for the shire, and the other for Caermarthen-town, and lies in the diocese of St. David's. It is bounded on the east by the shires of Brecknock and Glamorgan, by the Severn sea or St. George's channel on the south, by Pembrokehire on the west, and Cardiganhire on the north, from which it is separated by the river Teivy. Its principal rivers are the Towy, Cothy, and Tave. The Towy abounding with salmon, comes into the N. E. side of this county from that of Cardigan, where it rises; and after a S. and S. W. course, falls into the English channel eight miles below Caermarthen. The Cothy rises on the N. side of the county, and runs S. mostly, till its junction with the Towy five miles above Caermarthen. The Tave or Teivy has its source in Cardiganhire; but soon becomes the boundary betwixt that county and this, the N. W. side of which it waters, till joined by the Reach, after which it divides this county from Pembrokehire.

CAERNARVON, in N. Wales, a county town, about 7 miles S. W. from Bangor, and 251 N. W. of London. It had a strong castle, which is now in ruins, and has one church. It is a handsome town, of which the constable of the castle is always mayor of the town by his patent; besides whom there is always an alderman, 2 bailiffs, a town clerk, &c. It was built by Edward I. to secure a passage into the isle of Anglesey, and Edward II. the 1st English prince of Wales, was born here; which was an artifice of his father's to oblige the Welch, who were willing to live in subjection to a prince that was a native. The chancery and exchequer for N. Wales was established formerly in this town, which, though but small, is neatly built, and very populous. It is a place of considerable strength by nature as well as art: for it is surrounded on all sides (except the East) by two rivers and the sea. It enjoys several immunities, and sends one member to parliament. Fairs on Feb. 25, May 16, Aug. 4, and Dec. 5. Market on Saturday. Lat. 53. 10. Long. 4. 21.

CAERNARVON-BAY, lies between two points at the S. entrance of the channel, running between the main-land and Anglesey. Here is a tolerable harbour; and though it has a bar where there is but from 7 to 8 feet at low-water, yet the tide rises so high, that at half flood any ships may go in or out. In the bay off the bar, is very good anchoring in 5 to 15 fathoms water.

CAERNARVONSHIRE, in British Sir (tyr) Caernarvon, one of the counties of N. Wales, formerly called Snowden-forest, in Latin, Snoudonia. It is bounded on the S. by Merionethshire and the Irish sea, on the E. by Denbighshire, from which the river Conway parts it; the Irish sea washes it on the W. and N. and it lies opposite to Anglesey on the N. W. Its length from Conway river in the E. to Lheny river in the W. is computed at 20 miles; and breadth from Penwenke-point to Ormeshead-point in the N. at about 40; though these dimensions are variously given. It is computed to have an area 370,000 acres, 68 parishes, one city, one borough, and six market-towns, with above 16,000 inhabitants. The air is sharp; and the country country is so encumbered, especially in the middle, with dreadful rocks and vast mountains, the tops of which in many of them are covered with snow 7 or 8 months in the year: so that this was the last county which was brought under the English dominion.

Notwithstanding its mountainous situation, the soil in several parts is tolerably fertile, especially in barley; and great herds of cattle, with flocks of sheep and goats, are bred on the mountains. That part of it towards Ireland, is so fruitful and populous as to yield to few shires in North Wales. Its rivers and sea-coast abound with fish. In the mountainous tracks are computed no less than 50 or 60 lakes, from most of which issue rivers. The most remarkable mountain next to Snowden, and one of the most noted in all Wales, is Pen-maen-mawr (Bun-maen-mohre) in the N. angle of this shire, where it hangs perpendicularly over the sea at a vast height; and in the narrow passage on the other side are dreadful rocks. On the side next the sea a wall has been built breast-high, and a road cut out of the rock 7 feet wide. From this mountain the country opens into a plain, extending as far as the river Conway, the eastern limit of the shire, which issues from a lake of the same name, on the S. E. side: and though its whole course is but 12 miles, it receives so many brooks and streams from the hills of Snowden, as to carry ships of some burthen. It produces not only fish, but large pearls found in a muscle. The shire lies in the diocese of Bangor, and sends one member to parliament, besides another for the shire-town above-mentioned.

CAERPHYLLY-CASTLE, in Glamorgan-shire, South-Wales, one of the noblest ruins in the whole island, built in 1221: it was larger than any castle in England, Windsor alone excepted. One half of a round tower has fallen quite down; but the other over-hangs its basis more than 9 feet, so as to be as great a curiosity as the leaning tower of Pisa in Italy. Here five fairs are held, on March 25, Thursday after Trinity, July 19, August 14, and Thursday before Christmas. It lies 122 miles from London.

CAERVORRAN, Northumberland, on the N. side of the Picts wall, is supposed to be the Glanoventa, where the Romans placed a garrison for the defence of the marshes. Near this place the wall was built higher and firmer than elsewhere. On the descent of a hill, on the other side the wall, over against this town, is to be seen a draught of a square Roman fort.

CAERWENT, 4 miles from Chepstow, now a village, but supposed to have been the Venta Silurum of Antoninus, from Roman coins, &c. often found here. In July, 1777, a beautiful mosaic pavement was found here, 21 feet 6 inches long and 18 feet 4 inches broad, and said to be superior to any on this side of the Alps. The proprietor has erected a stone building over it.

CAERWYS, the only market-town of Flint-shire, in North Wales, betwixt St. Asaph and Flint, about 4 miles W. of the latter. At this place was held the last session of the poets, musicians, and bards, by royal authority, in the 9th of queen Elizabeth; a commission being directed to William Mostyn, &c. importing, that his ancestors had the right of bestowing the silver harp on the person judged the most worthy by the commissioners. Its weekly market is on Tuesday. It lies 155 miles from London.

CÆSAREA, the name of several ancient cities, particularly one on the coast of Phenice. It was very conveniently situated for trade; but had a very dangerous harbour, so that no ships could be safe in it when the wind was at S. W. Herod the Great, king of Judea, remedied this inconveincy at an immense expence and labour, making it one of the most convenient havens on that coast. He also beautified it with many buildings, and bestowed 12 years in the finishing and adorning it.

CÆSARODUNUM, a town of the Turones in Celtic Gaul; now Tours, the capital of Touraine. See TOURS.

CÆSAROMAGUS, a town of the Trinobantes in Britain; by some supposed to be Chelmsford, by others Brentford, and by others Burset.

CÆSENA, a town of Gallia Cispadana, situated on the rivers Ifapis and Rubicon; now Casena, which see.

CÆSIA SYLVA, a wood in Germany, part of the great Sylva Hercynia, situated partly in the duchy of Cleves, and partly in Westphalia between Wesel and Kesfield.

CÆTOBRIX, a town of Lusitania, near the mouth of the Tagus, now extinct. It had its name from its fishery, and there are still fish ponds on the shore done with plaster.

CAFFA, a city and port-town of European Turkey. It stands on the S. E. part of Crim Tartary, and is surrounded with very strong walls. On the S. side is a castle, the residence of a basha: also another defended with great guns. The place is inhabited by Mahometans, Turks, Tartars, and some Christians, of which the Armenians are the most numerous. The houses are but small, and built all of earth: so that there is not a stone-structure in the city, except 8 churches built by the Genoese, to whom it was formerly subject, but taken from them by Mahomed II. in 1574. The Russians took it in 1771, but gave it up again. It has the best trade in the country, which consists in fish and caviar from the Palus Maëotis, and from thence transported into Europe, and even the Indies. They also export corn, butter, reckoned the best in all Turkey, and salt; with which they furnish furnish Constantinople and other places. The soil about Caffa is dry, nor is the water good: but the air is very pure; and in this town is plenty of all sorts of provisions brought from the neighbouring villages. The road of Caffa is sheltered from all the winds but the N. and S. E. and ships lie very safe near the shore in 10 or 12 fathoms water. The strait of Caffa, anciently Bosphorus Cimmerius and Fretum Mæoticum, is that channel which joins the Palus Mæotis to the Euxine sea. It is not above 15 miles long, and is very narrow, especially towards the Black sea. Lat. 47, 20, N. Long. 37, 20, E.

CAFRERIA, or country of the Cafres, a very large track in the southernmost parts of Africa. It lies in the form of a crescent, about the inland country of Monomotapa. It begins at Cape Negro, extending itself from thence south-easterly to the river Del Spiritu Sancto, which separates it on the N. E. from Monomotapa. Higher up, towards the E. it is divided by a long ridge of mountains, called by the natives The Back-bone of the World, which divides it also from Zanguebar. On the N. it extends itself almost to the equator, where it confines on the kingdom of Makoko, and on the N. W. it has Lower Guinea, with the kingdom of Benguela. The inhabitants are a barbarous sort of infidels, for which reason the Arabs call them and all those nations Cafres who are not Mahometans. They are principally Hottentots; but the sea-coast is subject to the Dutch, who have built a town and castle near the most southernly head-land, called the Cape of Good Hope. It lies between lat. 35 S. and the tropic of Capricorn, having the Indian and Atlantic oceans on the E. S. and W. Cafferia is subdivided into, 1. The kingdom of Mataman. 2. The country of the Hottentots Proper. 3. The eastern coast up to the river Del Spiritu Sancto, containing Terra de Natal, and Terra des Fumos. 4. The inland countries between Mataman and Monomotapan.

CAGEAN, or CAGAYAN, a province of the island of Luzon, or Manila, in the East Indies. It is the largest in the island. The principal city is called New Segovia, and 15 leagues eastwards from this city lies Cape Bajador. Doubling that cape, and coasting along 20 leagues from N. to S. the province of Cagean ends, and that of Illocos begins. The peaceable Cageans, who pay tribute, are about 9000; but there are a great many not subdued. The whole province is fruitful; the men apply themselves to agriculture, and are of a martial disposition; and the women apply to several works in cotton. The mountains afford food for a vast number of bees; in consequence of which wax is so plenty, that all the poor burn it instead of oil. On the mountains there is abundance of brasil, ebony, and other valuable woods. In the woods are store of wild beasts, as boars; but not so good as those of Europe. There are also abundance of deer, which they kill for their skins and horns to sell to the Chinese.

CAGLI, a small, but ancient city, belonging to the duchy of Urbino, in the Ecclesiastical State and Middle Division of Italy. It is the see of a bishop under the metropolitan of Urbino, and lies in a plain at the foot of the Appenines, a little above the junction of the small river Baoso with the Cautiano. On the former is an ancient Roman bridge. This place stands on the Via Flaminia, S. of Urbino. Lat. 43, 15, N. Long. 14, 10, E.

CAGLIARI (Cape), the southern division of the island of Sardinia, in Upper Italy. To which belongs CAGLIARI, CALARI, anciently CARALIS, the capital of all Sardinia, the seat of the viceroy, an archbishopric, and university. It lies on a large bay of the same name, has a secure harbour, capable of receiving a vast many ships of burthen, and besides other works, has a castle. The place is divided into the High and Low town. In the higher is the stately cathedral, covered with marble. The Upper town is surrounded with a wall, and is well-built; but the Lower standing on the sea-shore is generally dirty, and but poorly inhabited. Here are four parishes, including the cathedral, 22 monasteries, and 3 suburbs. Near two parts of the bay are inclosed by a sand-bank; besides which, there is a mole to the S. surrounded by a wall towards the sea, on which is a battery of 12 cannon. Here is a castle commanded by a particular governor.

In 1708 the English took this place, with the whole island, and gave it to the then nominal king of Spain, Charles III. afterwards the emperor Charles VI. but it was retaken by the Spaniards in 1717, and two years afterwards it was ceded by a treaty to the duke of Savoy, together with part of the Milanese, in lieu of Sicily given to Don Carlos, whence he has the title of king of Sardinia. Lat. 39, 7, N. Long. 9, 14, E.

CAGNY. See BOUFLERS.

CAHORS, in Latin Cadurcum, anciently Devona or Dibona, the capital of Quercy, a district of Guyenne Proper, in the government of the former name, and Gascony, in France. It lies in Upper Quercy, on the river Lot, which surrounds it almost on every side, and is partly on a rock. It is the see of a bishop, the seat of an election, provincial jurisdiction dependent on the parliament of Toulouse: but it is indifferently built. Its bishop styles himself count of Cahors, is a suffragan to the metropolitan of Albi, has a diocese of 800 parishes and chapels of ease, with a yearly revenue of 45,000 livres, and he pays the court of Rome a tax of 1000 florins. This was the birth place of pope pope John XXII. who founded a university here in 1332; but in 1751 the king dissolved it quite; and of the three colleges, one was converted to a town house, and the other two given to the Jesuits. Lat. 44, 25, N. Long. 1, 32, E.

CAJANA, a fief or independency of East Bothnia in Finland, in Sweden. To which belongs, CAJANA, or CAJANEBO, a town, near which is the castle called Cajaneborg; but demolished by capitulation in 1716. It is surrounded by the roaring water of Pyha, in which is a dreadful cataract hard by. It is ranked as the 102d town in the general diet, and lies on the N. E. part of the lake Cajana. Lat. 64, 13, N. Long. 27, 49, E.

CAIAZZO, anciently Calatia, a small city in the territory of di Lavoro, a province of Naples, in Lower Italy. It is the see of a bishop, under the metropolitan of Capua, has five churches two convents, and two hospitals. It stands on a mountain near the river Voltorno, and has a strong castle; but daily declines, and is 16 miles N. E. of Naples. Lat. 41, 15, N. Long. 27, 9, E.

CAIFUM, a city of Honan, a province of China on the Crocens. It lies 350 miles N. W. of Nankin, in lat. 35, 17, N. long. 113, 39, E. The overflowing of the river Huang, about a league and a half off, by cutting its dam, we are told overthrew the houses in this town, anno 1642, and drowned, says the Dutch account, 300,000 inhabitants.

CALLE, a kingdom in Macassar, or Celebes, in the East Indies, in 1 degree and a half of S. lat. It is a noble bay, says Navarette, above 3 leagues in length, and 2 in breadth. In this country continues that father, men and women are clad in nothing but paper; and that not being lasting, the women are always working at it very curiously. It is made of the rind of a small tree we saw there, which they beat with a stone curiously wrought, and make as they please, coarse, indifferent, or very fine. They dye it of all colours, and 20 paces off it looks like fine tabby. A deal of it is carried to Manilla and Macao, where I have seen curious tent beds of it.

CAIMAN, a cluster of islands so called, in the Atlantic ocean, in N. America, and lying near Jamaica, where is a considerable fishery of turtle, lie in lat. 21, 10, N. and between long. 81, 86, W. See CAYMANS.

CAINSHAM, or KAINSHAM, a market-town of Somersetshire, famous once for its abbey, as well as for its having been the seat of the Canji. It lies on a small river that runs into the Avon, and extends itself to the junction of both. It is built on a rock: in the river are produced multitudes of little eels about spring, which the people catch when two inches long: and, after boiling, make up into small cakes, called elver-cakes, for sale, which are disposed of at Bath and Bristol. These, when fried, and eaten with butter, prove very delicious fare. It lies 4 miles from Bristol and 6 from Bath.

CAIRO, or GRAND CAIRO, the capital of Egypt, situated in a plain at the foot of a mountain, in E. long. 31, 31, N. lat. 30, 0. It was founded by Jawhar, a Magrebian general, in the year of the Hegira 358. He had laid the foundations of it under the horoscope of Mars; and for that reason gave his new city the name of Al Kahirah, or the victorious, an epithet applied by the Arab astronomers to that planet. In 362 it became the residence of the khalifs of Egypt, and of consequence the capital of that country, and has ever since continued to be so. It is divided into the New and Old cities. Old Cairo is on the eastern side of the river Nile, and is now almost uninhabited. The New, which is properly Cairo, is seated on a sandy plain, about two miles and a half from the old city. It stands on the western side of the Nile, from which it is not three quarters of a mile distant. It is extended along the mountain on which the castle is built, for the sake of which it was removed hither, in order, as some pretend, to be under its protection. However, the change is much for the worse, as well with regard to air as water, and the pleasantness of the prospect. Bulack may be called the port of Cairo; for it stands on the bank of the Nile, about a mile and a half from it, and all the corn and other commodities are landed there before they are brought to the city. Some travellers have made Cairo of a most enormous magnitude, by taking in the old city Bulack, and the new; the real circumference of it, however, is not above 10 miles, but it is extremely populous.

The first thing that strikes a traveller is the narrowness of the streets, and the appearance of the houses. These are so daubed with mud on the outside, that you would think they were built with nothing else. Besides, as the streets are unpaved, and always full of people, the walking in them is very inconvenient, especially to strangers. To remedy this, there are a great number of asses, which always stand ready to be hired for a trifle, that is a penny a mile. The owners drive them along, and give notice to the croud to make way. And here it may be observed, that the Christians in this, as well as other parts of the Turkish dominions, are not permitted to ride upon horses. The number of the inhabitants can only be guessed at; but we may conclude it to be very great, because, in some years the plague has carried off 200,000, without their being much missed. The houses are from one to two or three stories high, and flat at the top; where they take the air, and often sleep all night. The better sort of these have a court on the inside like a college. The common run of houses have very little room, and even among great people it is usual for 20 or 30 to lie in the same hall. Some houses will hold 300 persons of both sexes, among whom are 20 or 30 slaves, and those of ordinary rank have generally 3 or 4.

There is a canal, called Halis, which runs along the city from one end to the other, with houses on each side, which make a large straight street. Besides this, there are several lakes, which are called birs in the language of the country. The principal of these, which is near the castle, is 500 paces in diameter. The most elegant houses in the city are built on its banks; but what is extraordinary, 8 months in the year it contains water, and the other four it appears with a charming verdure. When there is water sufficient, it is always full of gilded boats, barges, and barks, in which people of condition take their pleasure towards night, at which time there are curious fire-works, and variety of music.

New Cairo is surrounded with walls built with stone, on which are handsome battlements, and at the distance of every hundred paces there are very fine towers, which have room for a great number of people. The walls were never very high, and are in many places gone to ruin. The basha lives in the castle, which was built by Saladine 700 years ago. It stands in the middle of the famous mountain Moketan, which terminates in this place, after it had accompanied the Nile from Ethiopia hither. This castle is the only place of defense in Egypt; and yet the Turks take no notice of its falling, inasmuch that in process of time it will become a heap of rubbish. The principal part in it is a magnificent hall, environed with 12 columns of granite, of a prodigious height and thickness, which sustain an open dome, under which Saladine distributed justice to his subjects. Round this dome there is an inscription in relievo, which determines the date and by whom it was built. From this place the whole city of Cairo may be seen, and above 30 miles along the Nile, with the fruitful plains that lie near it, as well as the mosques, pyramids, villages, and gardens, with which these fields are covered. These granite pillars were the work of antiquity, for they were got out of the ruins of Alexandria. There are likewise in the mosques and in the principal houses no less than 40,000 more, besides great magazines, where all kinds are to be had at very low rates. A janizary happened to find 5 in his garden, as large as those in the castle; but could not find any machine of strength sufficient to move them, and therefore had them sawed in pieces to make mill-stones. It is believed that there have been 30 or 40,000 of these pillars brought from Alexandria, where there are yet many more to be had. The gates of Cairo are 3, which are very fine and magnificent.

There are about 300 public mosques in this city, some of which have 6 minarets. The mosque of Ashar hath several buildings adjoining, which were once a famous university, and 14,000 scholars and students were maintained on the foundation; but has now not above 1400, and those are only taught to read and write. All the mosques are built upon the same plan, and differ only in magnitude. The entrance is through the principal gate into a large square, open on the top, but well paved. Round this are covered galleries, supported by pillars; under which they say their prayers, in the shade. On one side of the square there are particular places with basins of water, for the convenience of performing the ablutions enjoined by the Koran. The most remarkable part of the mosque, besides the minaret, is the dome. This is often bold, well proportioned, and of an astonishing magnitude. The inside stones are carved like lace, flowers, and melons. They are built so firm, and with such art, that they will last 600 or 700 years. About the outward circumference there are large Arabic inscriptions, in relievo, which may be read by those who stand below, though they are sometimes of a wonderful height.

The khanes or caravanseras are numerous and large, with a court in the middle, like their houses. Some are several stories high, and are always full of people and merchandise. The Nobians, the Abyssinians, and other African nations, which come to Cairo, have one to themselves, where they always meet with lodging. Here they are secure from insults, and their effects are all safe. Besides these, there is a bazar, or market, where all sorts of goods are sold. This is in a long broad street; and yet the crowd is so great, you can hardly pass along. At the end of this street is another short one, but pretty broad, with shops full of the best sort of goods, and valuable merchandise. At the end of this street there is a great khane, where all sorts of white slaves are to be sold. Farther than this is another khane, where a great number of blacks, of both sexes, are exposed to sale. Not far from the best market-place is an hospital, and a mosque for mad people. They also receive and maintain sick people into this hospital, but they are poorly looked after.

Old Cairo has scarce any thing remarkable but the granaries of Joseph; which are nothing but a high wall, lately built, which includes a square spot of ground, where they deposit wheat, barley, and other grain, which is a tribute to the basha, paid by the owners of land. This has no other covering but the heavens, and therefore the birds are always sure to have their share. There is likewise a tolerably rably handsome church, which is made use of by the Copts, who are Christians and the original inhabitants of Egypt. Joseph's-well is in the castle, and was made by king Mohammed about 700 years ago. It is called Joseph's-well, because they attribute every thing extraordinary to that remarkable person. It is cut in a rock, and is 280 feet in depth. The water is drawn up to the top by means of oxen, placed on platforms, at proper distances, which turn about the machines that raise it. The descent is so sloping, that, though there are no steps, the oxen can descend and ascend with ease.

The river Nile, to which not only Cairo, but all Egypt is so much indebted, is now known to have its rise in Abyssinia. The increase of the Nile generally begins in May, and in June they commonly proclaim about the city how much it is risen. Over against Old Cairo the basha has a house, wherein the water enters to a column, which has lines at the distance of every inch, and marks at every 2 feet as far as 30. When the water rises to 22 feet, it is thought to be of sufficient height; when it rises much higher, it does a great deal of mischief. There is much pomp and ceremony used in letting the water into the canal, or hali, above-mentioned. The basha gives the first stroke towards the removal of the dike or dam. When the water has filled the canal and lakes in the city, and the numerous cisterns that are in the mosques and private houses, it is let into a vast plain, to the N. E. the extent of which is 50 miles. When the country is covered with water, it is no unpleasant sight to view the towns appearing like little islands, and the people passing and repassing in boats.

The inhabitants of Cairo, are a mixture of Moors, Turks, Jews, Greeks, and Copts, or Coptis. The only difference between the habit of the Moors and Coptis is their turbans; those of the Moors being white, and of the Coptis white striped with blue. The common people generally wear a long black loose frock, sewed together all down before. The Jews wear a frock of the same fashion, made of cloth; and their caps are like a high crowned hat, without brims, covered with the same cloth, but not so taper. The Jewish women's are not very unlike the men's, but more light and long. The Greeks are habited like the Turks, only their turbans differ.

Provisions of all kinds are exceeding plenty; for 20 eggs may be bought for a parrak, or penny, and bread is six times as cheap as with us. They have almost all sorts of flesh and fish; and in particular have tame buffaloes, which are very useful. They bring goats into the streets in great numbers, to sell their milk. Their gardens are well stocked with fruit-trees of various kinds, as well as roots, herbs, melons, and cucumbers. The most common flesh meat is mutton. The goats are very beautiful, and have ears 2 feet in length, but their flesh is in no great esteem. It lies about 100 miles S. of the mouth of the Nile, and is said to contain 1,000,000 souls, 30 or 40 people frequently dwelling in one house. Lat. 30, 2, N. Long. 31, 31, E.

CAIROAN, a town of Tunis in Africa; once the capital of a kingdom of the same name, but now only of a province, on the river Magrida. The province of the same name with it, particularly in its neighbourhood, is a barren desert, producing neither grain nor fruit; so that they are supplied with provisions from the neighbouring cities on the coast, either by land or sea: and it is in no less want of water, excepting what rain they save in cisterns. This place was once a famous university; but hath been so plundered by the wild Arabs, as now to be inhabited mostly by poor people, who are principally employed in dressing of lamb-skins. It hath a good large suburb; and is now more famous as the seat of Mahomet's vicar, and on that account esteemed so holy that the great men take off their stockings when they enter it. It lies 80 miles S. of Tunis city. Lat. 36, 5, N. Long. 9, 12, E.

CAISTER, a place in Lincolnshire, where fairs are kept, on June 1, and October 23.

CAITHNESS, otherwise the SHIRE of WEICK, is the most northern county of all Scotland; bounded on the east by the ocean, by Strathnaver and Sutherland on the south and south-west; from thence it is divided by the mountain Orde, and a continued ridge of hills as far as Knockfin, then by the whole course of the river Hallowdale. On the north it is washed by the Pentland or Partland frith, which flows between this county and the Orkneys. It extends 35 miles from north to south, and about 20 from east to west. The coast is rocky, and remarkable for a number of bays and promontories. Dunnot-head is a peninsula about a mile broad, and 7 in compass; affording several lakes, good pasture, excellent mill-stones, and a lead-mine. Scribister-bay, on the N. W. is a good harbour, where ships may ride securely. Rice-bay, on the east side, extends 3 miles in breadth; but is of dangerous access, on account of some sunk rocks at the entrance. At the bottom of this bay appear the ruins of 2 strong castles, the seat of the earl of Caithness, called Castle Sinclair, and Gernego, joined to each other by a draw-bridge. Duncan's-bay, otherwise called Dunby-head, is the north-east point of Caithness, and the extremest promontory in Britain. At this place, the breadth of the frith does not exceed 12 miles, and in the neighbourhood is the ordinary ferry to the Orkneys. The sea in this place is very impetuous, being in continual agitation from violent counter-tides, currents, and vortices. The only island belonging to this county is that of Stromma, in the Pentland frith, at the distance of 2 miles from the main land.

The county of Caithness, though chiefly mountainous, flattens towards the sea-coast, where the ground is arable, and produces good harvests of oats and barley, sufficient for the natives, and yielding a superplus for exportation; but the soil being generally a moist clay, and the climate cold, the harvest is late, and the corn counted inferior in quality to that which is raised in the neighbouring counties. Indeed, the country is better adapted for pasture, and as such is turned to the best advantage. Caithness is well watered with small rivers, brooks, lakes, and fountains, and affords a few woods of birch, but is in general bare of trees; and even those the inhabitants plant, are stunted in their growth. Lead is found at Den-net, copper at Old-Urk, and iron ore at several places; but these advantages are not improved. The air of Caithness is temperate, though in the latitude of 58, where the longest day in summer is computed at 18 hours; and when the sun sets, he makes so small an arch of a circle below the horizon, that the people enjoy a twilight until he rises again. The fuel used by the inhabitants of Caithness consists of peat and turf, which the ground yields in great plenty. The forest of Moravins and Berridale afford abundance of red deer and roe-bucks: the country is well stored with hares, rabbits, grouse, heathcocks, plover, and all sorts of game, comprehending a bird called snow-fleet, about the size of a sparrow, exceedingly fat and delicious, that comes hither in large flights about the middle of February, and takes its departure in April. The hills are covered with sheep and black cattle; so numerous, that a fat cow has been sold at market for 4s. sterling. The rocks along the coasts are frequented by eagles, hawks, and all manner of sea-fowl, whose eggs and young are taken in vast quantities by the natives. The rivers and lakes abound with trout, salmon, and eels.

Divers obelisks and ancient monuments appear in this district, and several Romish chapels are still standing. Caithness is well peopled with a race of hardy inhabitants, who employ themselves chiefly in fishing, and breeding sheep and black cattle: they are even remarkably industrious; for between Weick and Dumbith, one continued track of rugged rocks, extending 12 miles, they have forced several little harbours for their fishing boats, and cut artificial steps from the beach to the top of the rocks, where they have erected houses, in which they cure and dry the fish for market.

According to Mr. Pennant, this county is supposed to send out in some years 2200 head of black cattle, but in bad seasons the farmer kills and salts great numbers for sale. Great numbers of swine are also reared here. Here are neither barns nor granaries; the corn is threshed out, and preserved in the chaff in byks; which are stacks, in the shape of bee-hives, thatched quite round, where it will keep good for 2 years. Vast numbers of salmon are taken at Castle-hill, Den-net, Weick and Thurso. A miraculous draught at this last place is still talked of, not less than 2500 being taken at one tide within the memory of man; and Dr. Smollet informs us, that, in the neighbourhood, above 300 good salmon have been taken at one draught of the net. In the month of November, great numbers of seals are taken in the caverns that open into the sea, and run some hundreds of yards under ground. The entrance of the caverns is narrow, but the inside lofty and spacious. The seal-hunters enter these in small boats with torches, which they light as soon as they land, and then with loud shouts alarm the animals, which they kill with clubs as they attempt to pass. This is a hazardous employment; for should the wind blow hard from sea, these adventurers are inevitably lost. Much limestone is found in this country. The common people are kept in great servitude, and most of their time is given to the lairds, an invincible impediment to the prosperity of the country. The women are also condemned to a shameful drudgery; it not being uncommon to see them trudging in droves of 60 or 70 to the fields with baskets of dung on their backs, which are filled at pleasure from the dung-hills by their lords and masters with their pitch-forks. The last private war in Scotland was occasioned by a dispute relating to this county. An earl of Breadalbane married an heiress of Caithness: the inhabitants would not admit her title, but set up another person in opposition; but being defeated, he gained the country. Caithness sends a member to parliament alternately with the shire of Bute.

CAKET, or GUAGETIA, a province in East Georgia, or Gurgistan, in Asia, was the ancient Iberia, and extends far into Mount Caucasus, and had formerly a good number of stately large cities, which have been ruined by wars between Turkey and Persia, save its capital, Caket. Since the time of its king Tamuras, 1659, it has been solely subject to Persia, and governed by a viceroy. But the successors of Tamuras have obtained that dignity by turning Mahomedans. The two chief places are Caket and Zagan.

CAKET, about 90 miles N. from Tefflis, and 40 from Zagan; E. Long. 47. 22. Lat. 43. 48. once the capital of the foregoing little kingdom, was a flourishing city till it fell under the dominion of Persia, since which it is much decayed in grandeur, traffic, &c. and hath now nothing remarkable but a fine large church, dedicated to St. George.

CALABAR, or CALBARY, territory on the coast of South Guinea, lies on or about the river, by the Portuguese called Rio Real, from the town of that name on the river, which runs up-land N. W. a great way, but navigable only by sloops and yatches, the bottom being very uneven. New Calabar town lies on an island close to the main, N. of a rivulet into Rio-Real, and is the chief place for trade of the Dutch, containing 309 houses, pallisaded about after their fashion, having on the north a large swampy ground, which the tide often overflows.

CALABRIA, (the ancient,) also called Mosapia, was quite different from the modern, which is divided into the Hither and Farther, or Calabria Citra and Ultra, as the natives call it. These lie towards the southern boundaries of Lower Italy, and are part of Græcia Magna, formerly inhabited by the Brutii, and now two provinces of the kingdom of Naples; the eldest son of that crown being stiled duke of Calabria in general. It is bounded to the N. by the Basilicate; has the gulph of Tarento and Ionian sea to the E. the Tyrrhenian sea to the W. and that of Sicily to the S. That called the Hither Calabria lies nearer Naples, and N. W. of the other, and therefore stiled the Higher, as the other is the Lower Calabria. The former, anciently called the Valley of Cræte, abounds in good fruits, grain, wine, fine oil, flax, hemp, sugar, rice, saffron, honey, salt, cotton, and silk. Here are gathered great quantities of manna, preferable to that of any other country. Here are also mines of gold, silver, and iron, which are worked: likewise sulphur, alabaster and rock-crystal, are found here. The Farther Calabria, anciently Terra Jordana, is of the same fertility with the former. The strait called Il Canale, or Il Faro di Messina, divides it from the island of Sicily. Many cities, &c. were destroyed in 1638, in this province by earthquakes.

CALAH, anciently Allap, a town of Bene-araxid, a province of Africa. It stands on the declivity of a hill, between two high mountains, having good walls round it, flanked with towers like a fortress.

CALAHORRA, a city of Old Castile, in Spain. It was anciently called Calaguris: of the latter name were two, Nascia or Julia, and Calaguris Fibulænsis, on the opposite side of the river Cidazo, and not from the Ebro. Calahorra lies on a little hill, is walled round, has 4 gates, 2000 houses, three parishes, two monasteries, a nunnery, 8 chapels, and 4 squares. It is the see of a bishop, under the metropolitan of Burgos. His diocese contains 1013 parishes, with a revenue of 20,000 ducats a year. This city is famous for the siege it held out against Afranius, Pompey's general, till the citizens were forced to eat one another. Hence came the proverbial saying of Fames Calagurina. It lies 60 miles N. W. of Saragossa. Lat. 42. 25. N. Long. 2. 7. W.

CALAIS, in Latin, Calerum, a fortified town in the county of Oye, a subdivision of the reconquered territory, in the government of Picardy and Artois, in France. It lies in a marshy plain, with a harbour on the English channel, on the strait called Pas de Calais, which is 22 English miles broad, to Dover in Kent, between both which places go two packet-boats every week in time of peace. It is the capital of the aforesaid country, and the seat of a bailiwick, under the parliament of Paris. The figure of the town, including the citadel, is an oblong square; the long sides are about 220 perches long, and the two shorter 90. One of the larger sides lie towards the sea, and is very well fortified; the other towards the land, has bastions lined with stones, covered with half-moons and deep ditches, about ten perches broad, which can be filled with sea or fresh water.

The short side, opposite to fort Nieule, is defended by being laid under water: the other, called the attack of Gravelines, is still better fortified. The whole city is surrounded with a good covered way, and in less than 24 hours may be all laid under water. The citadel, lying on the W. side of Calais, is one of the greatest ever built; besides its ancient circuit and ditches. De Ville surrounded it with a new inclosure, which is fortified with 3 irregular bastions. It commands not only the city and port, but also the whole adjacent country, besides a fortress defending the mouth of the harbour. There is only one passage to the town, which is over Nieule-bridge. Ships enter into the port by means of a long canal, made in 1681, by order of Lewis XIV. between two moles; at the head of which are two horn-works, defended each by a half-moon, and surrounded with a wall, a deep ditch, and a covered way, after Vauban's manner. This port has several inconveniencies, for no ship can enter it without danger, whether along the E. or W. mole. In the town is a fine parish-church, and also in the suburb St. Pierre, is another church; besides here are 4 convents, 2 communities for the instructing of youth, and two hospitals. The streets are straight and well paved, and up and down the town are several new-fashioned houses. The stately arsenal, built by cardinal Richlieu, has a fine bronze statue of that prelate in its area. They drive a trade in this town in wine, brandy, salt, flax, horses and butter. For the promoting of which the aforesaid canal is very serviceable; and by means of it one can go commodiously by water to St. Omer, Gravelines, Dunkirk, Bergues, and Ypres. To the government of Calais belong 24 parishes, and it is free of all duties. But on the other hand, it must be at some considerable expence for keeping up the fortifications, and the canal which runs through the middle of the country. Here is a particular governor, under-governor, mayor, mayor, &c. Edward III. king of England, besieged and took Calais in the year 1346. The English continued masters of it 211 years, namely till 1558, when the Duke of Guise re-took it. In 1594 it was taken by the Spaniards, who restored it to king Henry IV. by the treaty of Vervius in 1598. It was bombarded by the English in 1624, and the two following years.

Calais, in coming from the sea, appears like an island with two or three steeples, one much larger than the others. The entry into the harbour is formed by two good jetties of wood; that which is on the W. side is 365 fathoms long; 66 fathoms of the other are built of stone with a parapet; the remaining part is of wood carried 407 fathoms into the sea. The ends of the jetties lie S. E. and N. W. and to the east of them there is a bank which makes it a very difficult matter to get into the harbour. The harbour itself lies E. and W. as the town does, and at the E. end of it there is a basin, called the Paradise, inclosed with quays and a jetty of wood, wherein there is room for 30 vessels of 150 tons. The rest of the harbour can contain about 160 ships of different sizes, frigates of 18 or 20 guns.

In consequence of a regulation observed since the 21st of Nov. 1772, as soon as there are 8 or 9 feet feet water in the harbour of Calais, notice is given of it by a flag in the day time, and a lanthorn during the night, placed on the jetty heads, which are gradually hoisted according to the progressive rising of the water; the same was observed in the harbour of Dover before the hostilities.

The road of Calais lies at a considerable distance to the N. W. of the harbour; it is sheltered by a sand-bank, which begins a little to the westward of fort Lapin, and gradually lessens till it ends in a point over against fort Vert. Ships may anchor near this bank in 10, 12, 15, or 18 fathoms water, when the tide is at the lowest: the ground is gravel mixed with mud, which makes excellent anchorage. Calais lies 143 miles N. of Paris. Lat. 50, 57, N. Long. 1, 55, W.

CALAMATA, a populous town of Belvidera, a subdivision of the Morea, in European Turkey, on the river Panisus. It is an open place, belonging to the Venetians, who took it in 1685; but it was recovered from them afterwards by the Turks. It is 8 miles from the sea. Lat. 35, 48, N. Long. 46, 38, E.

CALAMIANES, an island of Asia, in the East Indies, between Borneo and the Philippines.

CALAMINTHA, was a town of Lybia, (probably Mauritania,) taken notice of by Herodotus and Hecateus, whose situation is unknown.

CALAMO, or CALAMINE, an island of the Archipelago, near the coast of Asia. It has a town of the same name, and is subject to the Turks.

CALAMOS, of Pliny, is now the small village Kalemoni, situate between the ruins of ancient Trieris and Tripoly, in Phœnice.

CALATA BELLOTA, in Val di Mazara, in Sicily, is situated on a river of that name, at the foot of a hill, a small distance east of the west coast, about 15 miles N. W. of Gergenti, 10 E. of Xacca, and 26 S. E. of Mazara; E. long. 13, 27. lat. 37, 31.

CALATA FIMI, in the same Val, stands between Mazara on the S. and Castel de Mare, N. about 12 miles from the latter, 20 from the former; E. long. 13, 18. lat. 30, 0. It is surrounded with high mountains, and near it are seen the ruins of Locaricum, or Longaticum.

CALATA NISSETA, or the CASTLE OF WOMEN, is an inland town of Val di Noto, in Sicily, on the confines of that of Mazara, and situated on a hill near the river Salfo, 20 miles N. of Alicata.

CALATYUD, a large city of Aragon, in Spain, at the foot of a delightful high hill, near the confluence of the rivers Xalon and Xihoea. It is walled, and has many towers, being divided into 13 parishes, with 11 monasteries, and 4 nunneries. The Romans called it Bilbilis, which was the birth place of Martial, out of the ruins of which this present Calatayud was built, not far off; and the Bilbiline steel was formerly famous in Europe. The valley where it stands abounds in grain, wine, oil and fruit. Lat. 41, 15, N. Long. 2, 15, W.

CALATA XIBETA, a town situated about the middle of the same island, and in the same Val, on the confines of Val de Demoni and Mazara. It stands among the mountains, near the springs of the river Dataino, in the neighbourhood of Castro Giovami, or Enna.

CALATRAVA, a town of La Mancha, a subdivision of New Castile, in Spain, on the river Guadiana; and gives name to an order of Spanish knights, which was instituted on some persons of quality, for defending this place against the Moors. Lat. 39, 5, N. Long. 4, 20, W.

CALAURIA, an island of Greece in the Saronic bay, over against the port of Troezen, at the distance of 40 stadia. It was 30 stadia in compass, and had a temple of Neptune held in great veneration. It was also an asylum, and the place of the convention or assembly of the 7 cities of the Amphictyons. To this place Demosthenes went twice into banishment.

CALBARY, a territory, river, and village of Africa, in the kingdom of Benin. The Dutch carry on a considerable trade here.

CALBEN, a town of Germany, in the Old Marche of Brandenburg, between Domitz and Magdeburg, 32 miles from each, with a good castle.

CALCADA, or SANTA DOMINGO DE LA CALZADA, a city of Old Castile, in Spain, at the foot of a mountain, near the little river Laglera, in a pleasant and fruitful plain. Lat. 42, 36, N. Long. 3, 12, W.

CALCAR, a town in the duchy of Cleves, with a seat and voice at the provincial diets, a church and a monastery of Dominicans. In 1409, and 1647, it suffered by fires, and taken by the Spaniards in 1598, in 1639 by the Imperialists, who fortified it, in 1646 by the Hessians; and was stripped of its fortifications in 1645.

CALCAYLARES, a jurisdiction in Peru, beginning 4 leagues W. of the city of Cusco, in the audience of Lima, in America. The air every where excels that of all the other provinces, producing an exuberance of all kinds of grain and fruit. In the hottest parts, called Lares, were formerly very large sugar-plantations, which instead of 60 or 80,000 arobas, now yield less than 30, for want of hands to cultivate the canes. But that sugar is of such an excellent kind, that without any other preparation than that usual in the country, it equals the refined sugar in Europe.

CALCEDON. See CHALCEDON.

CALCINATO, a town of the Bresciano, a territory belonging to the Venetian dominions; in Upper Italy, on the river Ohiese, between Brescia to the W. and Castiglione to the E. Here the French and Spaniards, commanded by the duke of Vendosme, defeated the Imperialists in 1706.

CALCOLANG, a town of Travancour, a province of Malabar, and Mogul empire, in Asia. It stands on a hill, has inaccessible mountains on one side, and on the other a wall 24 feet high. It is 3 leagues from Tegnopatan, and 12 from Coulcan.

CALCUTTA. See WILLIAM'S FORT.

CALDEY-ISLAND, near the shore, on the coast of Pembroke-shire.

CALDER, a river of Yorkshire, which joins the Aire a little above Castle-Bradford-Bridge, both which have been made navigable at the expence of several private merchants only; by which means a communication has been opened from Leeds and Wakefield to York and Hull; to the latter of which places the woollen manufactures are carried, and there shipped for Holland, Bremen, Hamburg, and the Baltic; besides, an act passed in 1740, for continuing the navigation of the Calder from Wakefield to Ealand and Halifax, and other acts for mending the roads thereabouts. At Sorby the Calder is a considerable stream, formed by several neighbouring brooks from the hills; the head of which may be reckoned at Wakefield, as there it begins to be navigable; and over it here is a stately stone-bridge of many large arches: and Hutherfield is the first noted town this river comes to.

C A

CALDUS, a town belonging to the audience of Alenquer, in Portuguese Estremadura, on the sea, has 800 inhabitants, and is celebrated for its baths, which are said to eradicate utterly all venereal diseases.

CALDERA, a little bay N. W. of Porto Bello in South America, which see.

CALEDONIA. See SCOTLAND.

NEW CALEDONIA, an island in the South-Sea, lately discovered by captain Cook, and, next to New Holland and New Zealand, is the largest island that hath yet been discovered in that sea. It extends from 19, 37, to 22, 30, S. lat. and from 163, 37, to 167, 14, E. long. Its length from north-west to south-east is about 80 leagues; but its greatest breadth does not exceed 10 leagues. This island is diversified by hills and valleys of various size and extent. From the hills issue abundance of rivulets, which contribute to fertilize the plains. Along its north-east shore the land is flat; and being well watered, and cultivated by the inhabitants after their manner, appeared to great advantage to captain Cook's people. Was it not, indeed, for those fertile spots on the plains, the whole country might be called a dreary waste: the mountains and higher parts of the land are in general incapable of cultivation. They consist chiefly of rocks, many of which are full of mundic; the little soil that is upon them is scorched and burnt up by the sun; it is, however, covered with coarse grals and other plants, and here and there covered with trees and shrubs. The country in general bears a great resemblance to those parts of New South Wales which lie under the same parallel of latitude. Several of its natural productions are the same, and the woods are without underwood as well as in that country. The whole coast seems to be surrounded by reefs and shoals, which render all access to it extremely dangerous; but at the same time guard the coasts against the attacks of the wind and sea; rendering it easily navigable along the coast by canoes, and causing it to abound with fish. Every part of the coast seems to be inhabited; the plantations in the plains are laid out with great judgment, and cultivated with much labour. They begin their cultivation by setting fire to the grals, &c. with which the ground is covered, but have no notion of preserving its vigour by manure; they, however, recruit it by letting it lie for some years untouched.

On the beach was found a large irregular mass of rock, no less than a cube of 10 feet, consisting of a close-grained stone speckled full of granates somewhat bigger than pins heads, from whence it seems probable that some valuable minerals may be found on this island. It differs from all the other islands yet discovered in the South Sea, by being entirely entirely destitute of volcanic productions. Several plants of a new species were found here; and a few young bread-fruit trees, not then sufficiently grown to bear fruit, seemed to have come up without culture: plantains and sugar-canes are here in small quantity; and the cocoa-nut trees are small and thinly planted. A new species of passion-flower was likewise met with, which was never known to grow wild any where but in America. Several caputi (melaleuca) trees were also found in flower. Musketos here are very numerous. A great variety of birds were seen of different classes, which were for the most part entirely new; particularly a beautiful species of parrot before unknown to zoologists. A new species of fish, of the genus called by Linnaeus tetraodon, was caught here. Abundance of turtle was seen here. The natives had not the least notion of goats, hogs, dogs, or cats, and had not even a name for any of them.

The inhabitants are very stout, tall, and in general well proportioned; their features mild; their beards and hair black, and strongly frizzled, so as to be somewhat woolly in some individuals: their colour is swarthy, or a dark chestnut brown. A few were seen who measured 6 feet 4 inches. They are remarkably courteous, not at all addicted to pilfering and stealing; in which character of honesty they are singular, all the other nations in the South Sea being remarkably thievish. Some wear their hair long, and tie it up to the crown of their heads; others suffer only a large lock to grow on each side, which they tie up in clubs; many others, as well as all the women, wear it cropt short. Some had a kind of concave cylindrical stiff black cap, which appeared to be a great ornament among them, and was supposed to be worn only by the chiefs and warriors. A large sheet of strong paper, whenever they got one in exchange, was commonly applied to this purpose. The men go naked; only tying a string round their middle, and another round their neck. A little piece of a brown cloth made of the bark of a fig-tree, sometimes tucked up to the belt, and sometimes pendulous, scarcely deserves the name of a covering, nor indeed does it seem at all intended for that purpose. Coarse garments were seen among them made of a sort of matting; but they seemed never to wear them, except when in their canoes and unemployed. The women seemed to be in a servile state; those who had children carried them on their backs in a kind of fatchel. The women also were seen to dig up the earth in order to plant it. They are in general of a dark chestnut, and sometimes mahogany brown; their stature middle-sized, some being rather tall, and their whole form rather stout, and somewhat clumsy. Their dress is the most disfiguring that can be imagined, and gives them thick a squat shape. There was not a single instance, during the ship's stay in this island, of the women permitting any indecent familiarity with an European. The general ornaments of both sexes are ear-rings of tortoise shells; necklaces, or amulets, made both of shells and stones; and bracelets made of large shells which they wear above the elbows.

The houses, or huts, in New Caledonia, are circular, something like a bee-hive, and full as close and warm; the entrance is by a small door, or long square hole, just big enough to admit a man bent double: the side walls are about 4 feet and a half high; but the roof is lofty, and peaked to a point at the top, above which is a post or stick of wood, which is generally ornamented either with carving, or shells, or both. The framing is of small spars, reeds, &c. and both sides and roof are thick, and close covered with thatch made of coarse long grass. In the inside of the house are set up posts, to which cross spars are fastened, and platforms made, for the conveniency of laying any thing on. Some houses have two floors, one above another; the floor is laid with dry grass, and here and there mats are spread for the principal people to sit or sleep on. In these houses there was no passage for the smoke but through the door: probably the smoke is intended to drive out the mosketos which swarm here.

The canoes used here are very heavy clumsy vessels; they are made of two trees hollowed out, having a raised gunnel about 2 inches high, and closed at each end with a bulk head of the same height; so that the whole is like a long square trough, about 3 feet shorter than the body of the canoe. Two canoes thus fitted are fastened to each other about 3 feet asunder, by means of cross spars, which project about a foot over each side. Over these is laid a deck or heavy platform made of plank and small round spars, on which they have a fire-hearth, and generally a fire burning; they are navigated by one or two latteen sails, extended to a small latteen yard, the end of which is fixed in a notch or hole in the deck.

Notwithstanding the inoffensive disposition of the inhabitants of New Caledonia, they are well provided with offensive weapons; as clubs, spears, darts, and slings for throwing stones. Bows and arrows are wholly unknown among them. Their language bears no affinity to that spoken in the other South Sea islands, the word arrekee, and one or two more excepted. This is the more extraordinary, as different dialects of one language were spoken not only in the easterly islands, but at New Zealand. A musical instrument, a kind of whistle, was procured here. It was a little polished piece of brown wood about 2 inches long, shaped like a bell, though apparently solid, with a rope fixed at the small end; two holes were made in it near the base, and another near the insertion of the rope, all which communicated with each other; and by blowing blowing in the uppermost, a shrill sound, like whistling, was produced: no other instrument was seen among them that had the least relation to music. Here they bury their dead in the ground. The grave of a chief, who had been slain in battle here, resembled a large mole-hill, and was decorated with spears, darts, paddles, &c. all stuck upright in the ground round about it. Lieutenant Pickersgill was shewed a chief, whom they named Tea-booma, and stiled their arrekee, or king; but nothing farther is known of their government, and nothing at all of their religion.

CALENBERG, a principality belonging to the duchy of Brunswick, containing 19 cities and 17 towns, which will be mentioned under their proper names.

CALEPIO, one of 6 valleys opposite to Bergamo, in the province of Bergamasco, belonging to the Venetian dominions, in Upper Italy.

Of the same name is a town on the river Oglio, near the confines of Bresciano, 3 miles from Iseo lake, and 12 from Bergamo.

CALES, anciently a municipal city in Campania, noted for its producing good wine.

CALES. See CADIZ.

CALETES, a people of Gallia Celtica, on the confines of Belgica, now called Le Paix de Caux, in Normandy.

CALETHOR, a place on the Coromandel coast, and empire of the Mogul in Asia, noted for a plant used in dying. It lies about a day's sail N. of Palicate, where the English had a small factory.

CALETURE, a fort on the island of Ceylon, at the mouth of a river of the same name. The Dutch took it in 1655, but were obliged to quit it. E. Long. 80, 51. N. lat. 6, 38.

CALF OF MAN, a little island so called, lying before the S. promontory of the Isle of Man, in the Irish sea. It is about 3 miles in circuit, and separated from the Isle of Man by a channel of about 2 furlongs. It is noted for abundance of puffins at one time of the year, and for those ducks and drakes by the English called barnacles, and by the Scots clakes, or Solan-geese; though the latter in Scotland are quite another kind. The puffins breed in the rabbit-burrows, and the young are ready to fly about the middle of August, when great numbers of them are taken, and few years not less than 4 or 5000. The old ones leave their young all day, and fly out to the main sea, where, having digested their prey in their stomachs, they disgorge it on their return late at night into those of their young, where nothing is found but a digested oil and leaves of sorrel, so as to be almost a lump of fat. Some pickle them with wine, spice, and other ingredients, and send them abroad for presents: but the greatest part are consumed at home. About the rocks of this little island breed incredible numbers of all sorts of sea-fowl.

GALI, a town of South America, in Popayan, and in the valley of the same name, seated on the river Cauca. The governor of the province generally resides there. Long. 78, 5. W. Lat. 3, 15, N.

CALICOULAN, or QUILON, a town on the Malabar coast, and Mogul empire, in Asia. It lies 150 miles S. of Calicut, where the Dutch have a factory. Lat. 9, 3, N. Long. 75, 10, E.

CALICUT, a country of Malabar and Mogul empire, in Asia. Its sovereign, stiled Samorin, or emperor, is the most potent of all the Malabar princes, and has the best trade in his country. It abounds in pepper, betel, cocoa-trees, sandal-wood, iron, cassia-wood, and timber for building. They have much cotton, plenty of precious stones; and they make cotton-cloth and tapestry. The principal city and seat of the Samorin's palace is of the same name. It was the first place the Portuguese landed at in 1498, when they found the way to India by the Cape of Good Hope. From hence the English export to Tellichery what pepper and Indian goods they can procure. The French settled a factory here in 1698. This is a large straggling place, situated on an open shore, and the harbour clogged with shelves; so that European ships are forced to ride at anchor in the road. About 2 leagues to the S. is the river Baypore, capable of receiving ships of 3 or 400 tons, with a small island half a mile from its mouth, which defends it from the huge swell brought on that coast by the S. W. monsoons. Calicut lies 322 S. W. of Fort St. George. Lat. 11, 20, N. Long. 75, 0.

CALIES, or CALIUS, a small town on a rivulet which runs into the river Drage, in the New Mark of Brandenburg. It stands in the royal prefecture of Balster, which was formerly held as a fief by the Gunsterberge family. The town is noted for woollen weavers, and is partly under the jurisdiction of the above-mentioned family. It was consumed by fire in 1577.

CALLA-SUSANG. See BOUTON.

CALIFORNIA, the most northerly of all the Spanish dominions on the continent of America, is sometimes distinguished by the names of New Albion, and the Islas Carabiras: but the most ancient appellation is California; a word probably owing to some accident, or to some words spoken by the Indians and misunderstood by the Spaniards. For a long time California was thought to be an island; but father Cains, a German Jesuit, discovered it to be a peninsula, joining to the coast of New Mexico and the southern parts of America. This peninsula extends from Cape St. Sebastian, lying in north latitude 43, 30, to Cape St. Lucar, which lies in north latitude 22, 32. It is divided from New Mexico

Mexico by the gulph, or as some call it, the lake of California, or Vermillion sea, on the E. on the N. by that part of the continent of North America which is least known; and on the W. and S. by the Pacific Ocean or great South sea. The coasts, especially towards the Vermillion sea, are covered with inhabited islands, on some of which the Jesuits have established settlements, such as St. Clement, Paxaros, St. Anne, Cedars (so called from the great number of these trees it produces,) St. Joseph, and a multitude of others. But the islands best known are three lying off Cape St. Lucar, towards the Mexican coast. These are called Les Tres Marias, (the three Maries.) They are but small, have good wood and water, salt-pits, and abundance of game.

As California lies altogether within the temperate zone, the natives are neither chilled with cold nor scorched with heat; and indeed the improvements in agriculture made by the Jesuits afford strong proofs of the excellency of the climate. In some places the air is extremely hot and dry; and the earth wild, rugged, and barren. In a country stretching about 800 miles in length, there must be considerable variations of soil and climate; and indeed we find, from good authority, that California produces some of the most beautiful lawns, as well as many of the most inhospitable deserts, in the universe. Upon the whole, although California is rather rough and craggy, we are assured by the Jesuit Vinegas, and other good writers, that with due culture it furnishes every necessary and conveniency of life; and that, even where the atmosphere is hottest, vapours rising from the sea, and dispersed by pleasant breezes, render it of a moderate temperature.

The peninsula of California is now stocked with all sorts of domestic animals known in Spain and Mexico. Horses, mules, asses, oxen, sheep, hogs, goats, and all other quadrupeds imported, thrive and increase in this country. Among the native animals is a species of deer of the size of a young heifer, and greatly resembling it in shape. Father Torquemado describes a creature, which he calls a species of large bear, something like a buffalo, of the size of a deer, and nearly of the figure of a stag. With regard to birds, we have but an imperfect account; only, in general, Father Venegas tells us, that the coast is plentifully stored with peacocks, bustards, geese, cranes, and most of the birds common in other parts of the world. The quantity of fish which resort to these coasts are incredible. Salmon, turbot, barbel, skate, mackrel, &c. are caught here with very little trouble; together with pearl oysters, common oysters, lobsters, and a variety of exquisite shell-fish. Plenty of turtle are also caught on the coasts. On the South sea coasts are some shell-fish peculiar to it, and perhaps the most beautiful in the world. The fame of California for pearls soon drew forth great numbers of adventurers, who searched every part of the gulph, and are still employed in that work: the hoshias, or beds of oysters, may be seen in three or four fathom water, almost as plain as if they were on the surface.

No large timber hath yet been discovered. A species of manna is found in this country, which, according to the accounts of the Jesuits, has all the sweetness of refined sugar without its whiteness.

The Californians are well made, and very strong. They are extremely pusillanimous, inconstant, stupid, and even insensible. Before the Europeans penetrated into California, the natives had no form of religion. Each nation was then an assemblage of cottages more or less numerous, that were all mutually confederated by alliances, but without any chief. They were strangers even to filial obedience. No kind of dress was used by the men, but the women made use of some coverings. What mostly displayed their ingenuity was the construction of their fishing-nets, which are said by the Jesuits to have even exceeded in goodness those made in Europe. They were made by the women, of a coarse kind of flax, procured from some plants which grow there. Their houses were built of branches and leaves of trees; nay, many of them were only inclosures of earth and stone, raised half a yard high, without any covering; and even these were so small, that they could not stretch themselves at length in them. In winter they dwelt under ground in caves either natural or artificial.

In 1697, the Spaniards being discouraged by their losses and disappointments in attempting to settle this country, the Jesuits solicited and obtained permission to undertake the conquest of California. They arrived among the savages with curiosities that might amuse them, corn for their food, and clothes, for which they could not but perceive the necessity. The hatred these people bore the Spanish name could not support itself against these demonstrations of benevolence. They testified their acknowledgements as much as their want of sensibility and their inconstancy would permit them. These faults were partly overcome by the religious institutors, who pursued their project with a degree of warmth and resolution peculiar to the society. They made themselves carpenters, masons, weavers, and husbandmen; and by these means succeeded in imparting knowledge, and in some measure a taste for the useful arts, to this savage people, who have been all successively formed into one body. In 1745 they composed 43 villages, separated from each other by the barrenness of the soil, and the the want of water. The inhabitants of these small villages subsist principally on corn and pulse, which they cultivate; and on the fruits and domestic animals of Europe, the breeding of which last is an object of continual attention. They manufacture some coarse stuffs; and the necessaries they are in want of are purchased with pearls, and with wine nearly resembling that of Madeira, which they sell to the Mexicans and to the galleons.

In all California there are only two garrisons, each consisting of 30 men, and a soldier with every missionary. These troops were chosen by the legislators, though they were paid by the government. Were the court of Madrid to push their interest with half the zeal as the Jesuits did, California might become one of the most valuable of their acquisitions, on account of the pearls and other valuable articles of commerce which the country contains. At present the little Spanish town near Cape St. Lucar is made use of for no other purpose than as a place of refreshment for the Manila ships, and the chief residence of the missionaries. It was discovered by Cortez in 1536.

CALLAO, a strong town of South America, in Peru. It is the port of Lima, from which it is distant about 5 miles. The town is built on a low flat point of land on the sea-shore. It is fortified; but the fortifications were much damaged by the last great earthquake in 1746, and have not since been repaired. The town is not above 9 or 10 feet above the level of high-water mark; but the tide does not commonly rise or fall above 5 feet. The streets are drawn in a line; but are full of dust, which is very troublesome. In a square near the sea-side are the governor's house, the viceroy's palace, the parish-church, and a battery of 3 pieces of cannon. On the north side are the warehouses for the merchandise brought from Chili, Mexico, and other parts of Peru. The other churches are built with reeds, and covered with timber or clay, but they look tolerably neat. There are 5 monasteries and an hospital, though the number of families does not exceed 400. The trade of Callao is considerable; the watering easy, but the wood is a mile or two distant. Earthquakes are very frequent in these parts. W. long. 76, 15. S. lat. 12, 26.

CALLAS, a river of Eubœa.

CALLAT SHIMMAH, the Morfalach of modern sea charts, in the province of Algiers, remarkable for a mountain of salt.

CALLEGO, anciently Gallicus, a small river of Aragon in Spain; which rising out of Mount Gavas, runs by the county of Bigorre.

CALLEN, a town of Kilkenny, on a river of the same name, 12 miles S. W. of Kilkenny town, and sends two members to the Irish parliament. This place was taken by storm by Oliver Cromwell, and here are the ruins of three castles, and a Gothic church.

CALLIAQUA, a town and harbour at the S. W. end of St. Vincent, one of the Caribbee-islands. The harbour is the best in the island, and draws thither a great part of the trade, and the principal inhabitants of the island.

CALLIMACHA, in the island of Chios, or Scio, is the principal Mastich town, large, and populous, having 6 Greek churches and a nunnery, and 30 chapels in its neighbourhood.

CALLINGTON, or KALLINGTON, a village in Cornwall, 15 miles N. by W. of Falmouth, with 3 fairs, on May 4, September 19, and November 12, all for horses, oxen, sheep, cloth, and hops.

CALLIPOLIS, the name of several cities of antiquity, particularly one upon the Hellespont, next the Propontis, and opposite to Lampacus, in Asia. Now GALLIPOLI.

CALLOO, a fortress in the Netherlands, in the territory of Waes, on the river Scheld, subject to the house of Austria. The Dutch were defeated here by the Spaniards in 1638. E. long. 4, 10. N. lat. 51, 15.

CALMAR, a territory belonging to Smolandia, a subdivision of East-Gothland in Sweden. It lies opposite to Calmar-fund and the Baltic, containing 9 provincial districts, and the isle of Oeland.

CALMAR, a fine staple-town, belonging to the territory of the same name, and one of the oldest towns in the Gothic kingdom. It lies on the open sea, directly opposite to Oeland; and is built nearly of a circular form, with regular streets. It formerly had a different site, and contained several churches and convents. But after it was burnt in the time of queen Christiana, in 1647, it was removed towards the isle of Quarnholm. The castle of Calmar lies out in the Sund before the town, and is well fortified. It was formerly not only one of the strongest towns in the whole kingdom, but as dividing Scania and Blekingia from Sweden, was looked upon as a frontier place, and the key to the kingdom of Gothland. For which reason, in all wars, the Danes have strenuously attempted, and sometimes taken it. Here the famous treaty was signed which united Sweden and Norway to Denmark, in 1397. It is the see of a bishop, has an academy, a fine cathedral, a ship-dock, a commodious quay, and is surrounded with a royal chace. It exports deals, tar, and allum, and has good linen and woollen manufactures. It is remarkable, that here is a spring of fresh-water in the open sea. Lat. 56, 40, N. Long. 16, 27, E.

CALMUCS, wandering hordes, or tribes of Tartars, inhabiting the parts N. of the Caspian-sea. They sometimes put themselves under the protection of Russia, and visit Astracan and the adjacent country once or twice every year.

CALNE,

C A

CALNE, a river in Wiltshire, which runs into the West Avon near Chippenham.

CALNE, a borough-town of Wiltshire, a little place on a stony-hill, but very ancient, where a provincial synod was held in the year 997, for compromising the disputes between the secular clergy and monks, about celibacy. It sends two members to parliament; has a neat church, and charity-school for 40 boys; with a good market on Tuesday. Its fairs are on May 6, and August 2. Roman coins have been dug in this neighbourhood.

CALOBRA, the most considerable harbour of Majorca, belonging to Spain. It has a good entrance, and is surrounded with a fine country.

CALOW, a town of Upper Lusatia, belonging to the electorate of Saxony, in Germany. It has a great market for wool.

CALPE, a mountain of Andalusia, in Spain, at the foot of which stands Gibraltar. It was anciently one of Hercules' Pillars; as Abyla, now Ceuta, on the opposite shore of Africa, was the other. The rock of Calpe, which covers Gibraltar on the land-side, is half a league in height, and so steep as to be inaccessible.

CALPENTIN, an East-Indian island, 5 miles N. of Chilao. It is said to be 30 miles long and 3 broad. It lies close to the shore, producing only timber. The beetle which the Indians are so fond of chewing, is a great commodity here. Except fish and rice, the land affords nothing but what is wild: the soldiers here keep dogs to hunt buffalo's, sheep, &c. upon which they live. Without the fortification is a church.

CALVARY, a mountain near Jerusalem, in the Holy Land, where our Saviour suffered. The greatest part of it has since been walled in; and in the inclosure is the church of the Holy Sepulchre, surrounded with many chapels, small churches, and lodgings, inhabited by Greeks, Armenians, Syrians, Coptes, and Abyssinians.

CALVARY, a small town in the palatinate territory of Lithuania Proper, in a wood, on the Szelzup, about 5 miles from the Prussian confines. Here dwell 120 Christian, and 300 Jewish families; the latter of which carry on a very extensive trade.

CALVERT, so called from lord Baltimore's surname, one of the 6 western counties of Maryland, in North America. It lies on Delaware-bay, and borders on Charles county, from which, and that of Prince George, it is divided by the river Patuxent.

CALVES-ISLANDS, three islands so called, between Cape Clear, and the Main, Ireland. The largest of which contains about 44 acres.

CALVI, anciently CALES, a little episcopal town of the Terra di Lavoro, in the kingdom of Naples, and Lower Division of Italy, near the sea. Lat. 41, 15, N. Long. 14, 45, E.

Vol. I.—No. 30.

C A

CALVI, a town in the N. E. division of Corsica, in Upper Italy, with a harbour on a bay on the W. side of the island. It is defended by a castle upon a rock, with 5 bastions, and a Genoese garrison. It lies 40 miles S. W. of Bastia; in lat. 42, 31, N. Long. 9, 7, E.

CALVISSON, a town in the little territory of Vionage, a barony belonging to the provincial states, in the diocese of Nîmes, and government of Languedoc, in France.

CALW, a town on the Nagold, in the duchy of Wurtemberg, with a cloth manufacture, and a trading company. The castle was razed in 1600, and the town burnt in 1635 by the Imperialists, and in 1692 by the French.

CALYDON, a town of Etolia, situated 7 miles and a half from the sea, and divided by the river Evenus: the country was anciently called Æolis, from the Æolians, its inhabitants. This country was famous for the story of Meleager, and the Calidonian boar.

CALZADA, a town of Spain, in Old Castile, seated on the river Laglera, 40 miles W. of Calahorra. Long. 2, 47, W. Lat. 42, 12, N.

CAM, a river of England, which, rising in Hertfordshire, runs N. E. by Cambridge; which place takes its name from it, to the Isle of Ely, where it falls into the Ouse. In Gloucestershire another of the same name falls into the Severn.

CAM-ISLAND, one of the smaller Virgin Islands, in the West Indies. Lat. 18, 20. Long. 63, 25.

CAMA, one of the rivers in European Russia, which falls into the Wolga.

CAMAJORA, a fine strong town belonging to the republic of Lucca, in Upper Italy, on the frontiers of the principality of Massa.

CAMALET, commonly CADBURY-CASTLE, as lying in the village of North Cadbury; an old Roman fortification, on the highest ground of Somersetshire, and on the borders of Dorsetshire. Its entrance is defended by 6 or 7 ditches; and in the fourth, on the N. side, is a perennial spring, called king Arthur's well. Hereabouts abundance of Roman coins have been dug up, square stones, door-jambs, with hinges, &c. and near it rise the rivers of Somersetshire which run W. into the Severn bay, and that of Dorset, which runs eastward through Sturminster.

CAMALODUNUM, the name given by the Romans to the town of Old Malton, in Yorkshire.

CAMANA, a very large jurisdiction at some distance from the shore of the South sea, in the diocese of Arequipa, in South America. It contains many deserts, and extends eastward to the confines of the Cordillera. It is in some places nearly of the same temperature with that of Arequipa, and in others cold.

CAMARANA, an island of Arabia, in the Red sea, whose inhabitants are little and black. It is the best island in this sea, and has a coral and pearl fishery; N. Lat. 15, 0.

CAMARANA, anciently Camarina, was one of the richest cities in the island of Sicily, in Lower Italy. It lies in the Val di Noto: but only a tower of it remains, near which is Camarana-lake.

CAMARGUE, in Latin, Camaria, an island formed by the two main branches of the Rhone, near the city of Arles, in Lower Provence in France. It is the best and most fruitful part of this country, and intersected with several canals; but below it the rapidity of the stream stops its mouth with the sand it carries down. See ARLES.

CAMARONES, (river,) or Rio Camarones, by some called Jamoen, at which ends Guinea, and commences the lower or western Ethiopia. This river falls into the Ethiopian ocean, through a wide mouth, yet is only navigable for yatches, &c. with much difficulty.

CAMBAS, a village in Pembrokeshire 3 miles N. W. of Haverfordwest, with two fairs, on February 13, and Nov. 12, for cattle, horses, and sheep.

CAMBAYA, the same with Guzuratte, a kingdom in the Hither Peninsula of India, in Asia. See GUZURATTE.

Of the same name is a very large city belonging to that kingdom, and situated at the bottom of the gulph of Cambaya. It had formerly a considerable trade, which is now removed to Surat, 140 miles N. of it. It is subject to the Mogul. Lat. 23, 30, N. Long. 72, 21, E.

CAMBECK, a river in Cumberland.

CAMBODIA, or CAMBOYA, a kingdom of India, beyond the Ganges, in Asia. It extends from lat. 9, to 15, N. It is bounded by the kingdom of Laos on the N. Cochin China and Chiapa on the E. it has the Indian ocean on the S. and the bay of Siam on the W. It is annually overflowed in the rainy season, from June to October, as most countries are which lie within the tropic of Cancer, and N. of the equator. It produces rice and the fruits common to such parts.

Of the same name is its capital, near the W. shore of the river Mecon, and about 150 miles N. of its mouth. Lat. 10, 20, N. Long. 108, 0, E.

CAMBORN, a village in Cornwall near Redruth, with fairs on February 29, June 29, and November 11.

CAMBRA, (river,) in Africa. The Cambra and Senega, which divides the complexion of the people, fall out of the Niger. On one side of the Cambra they are of a dead ash-colour, lean, and small of stature; on the other, black negroes, tall, and well proportioned.

CAMBRAY, an archiepiscopal city, the capital of the Cambresis, in the Low Countries, seated on the Scheld. It is defended by good fortifications, and has a fort on the side of the river; and as the land is low on that side, they can lay the adjacent parts under water, by means of sluices. Its ditches are large and deep, and those of the citadel are cut into a rock. Clodion became master of Cambray in 445. The Danes burnt it afterwards; since which time it became a free imperial city. It has been the subject of contest betwixt the Emperors, the kings of France, and the earls of Flanders. The emperor Charles V. took possession of it in 1543. After this it was given to John of Montluc, by Henry III. of France, whom he created prince of Cambray: but the Spaniards took it from Montluc in 1593, which broke his heart. It continued under the dominion of the house of Austria till 1677, when the king of France became master of it, in whose hands it has continued ever since.

The buildings of Cambray are tolerably handsome, and the streets fine and spacious. The place or square for arms is of an extraordinary largeness, and capable of receiving the whole garrison in order of battle. The cathedral, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, is one of the finest in Europe. There are 9 parishes, 4 abbeys, and several convents for both sexes. The citadel is very advantageously situated on high ground, and commands the whole city. Cambray is one of the most opulent and commercial cities in the Low Countries; and makes every year a great number of pieces of cambric, with which the inhabitants drive a great trade. E. long. 3. 20. N. lat. 50, 11.

CAMBRESIS, (territory of,) one of the greater divisions of the government of French Flanders. It is bounded on the N. and E. by Hainault, on the W. by Artois, and on the S. by Picardy. From the village of Arleour to that of Chatillon on the Sambre, it is about 10 French leagues in length; and between 5 and 6 broad, but in some parts only between 2 and 3, in breadth.

It is a well inhabited country, is fruitful, and has states of its own. The whole province as well as the city was yielded to the French by the treaty of Nimeguen. It has excellent pastures, especially for horses and sheep; the wool of the latter is extremely fine, and much valued.

CAMBRIDGESHIRE, is bounded on the W. by Huntingdonshire and Bedfordshire; on the S. by Hertfordshire and Essex; on the N. by Lincolnshire; and on the E. by Norfolk and Suffolk. It extends about 40 miles in length from N. to S. 25 miles in breadth from E. to W. and 130 miles in circumference, containing near 570,000 acres. It is divided into 17 hundreds, in which are 1 city, 9 market-towns, 163 parishes, and about 17400 houses.

houses. It lies in the province of Canterbury, and diocese of Ely, except a small part, which is in the diocese of Norwich. A considerable tract of land in this county is distinguished by the name of the Isle of Ely. It consists of fenny ground, divided by innumerable channels and drains, and is part of a very spacious level, containing 300,000 acres of land, extending into Norfolk, Suffolk, Huntingdonshire, and Lincolnshire. The Isle of Ely is the N. division of the county and extends S. almost as far as Cambridge. The whole level, of which this is part, is bounded on one side by the sea, and on the others by uplands, which taken together, forms a rude kind of semicircle, resembling a horse-shoe.

In the Isle of Ely the air is damp, foul, and unwholesome; but in the S. E. parts of the county it is more pure and salubrious; the soil is also very different. In the Isle of Ely it is fenny and very spongy, yet affords excellent pasture. In the uplands to the S. E. the soil produces great plenty of bread, corn, and barley. The dry and barren parts have been greatly improved by sowing that called saint-foin, and holy-grass, from its having been first brought into Europe from Palestine. It sends 2 members to parliament.

CAMBRIDGE, the county-town, 15 miles from Newmarket, 16 from Huntingdon, and 52 from London, is situated on the banks of the Cam, which divides it into 2 parts that are joined by a stone-bridge, of 1 arch, called the Great Bridge, to distinguish it from one at the S. end called Small Bridge, that is continued over several divisions of the river; besides these, there is another belonging to the town, built of wood, called Gerrard's-Hofle Bridge, which crosses the river about the midway between the two other town bridges. The colleges have also their own private bridges, which lead to their gardens and noble walks, 2 of which are of wood and 4 of stone; one of the latter has lately been rebuilt in a very elegant taste, and is supposed to be the only one of the kind in England, and belongs to Trinity College. The ancient town was situated on the N. W. side of the river, on an elevated spot, containing near 30 acres, surrounded on all sides with a deep intrenchment, great part of which is still remaining. It was known to the Romans by the name of Camboritum, and was a nursery of learning in the earliest days of Christianity. The forum appears to have been on the S. W. side of the old city. Several Roman coins and other antiquities have been dug up here, and it is not improbable but St. Peter's church, (now in ruins,) was built on the foundation of a Roman temple. It suffered by the Danes, who kept a garrison here till Edward the Elder took it in 921, to keep the monks of Ely in subjection. William the Conqueror built a strong castle here, of which the gatehouse still remains, and is the county jail, which is almost surrounded with a more modern fortification, raised by the Oliverians in 1645. Within is an artificial mount, but of what antiquity is uncertain, from the top of which is a prospect of near 20 miles. Roger de Montgomery destroyed the town with fire and sword, to be revenged on king William Rufus; but Henry I. to repair its damages, granted it many privileges. It was often plundered in the barons wars by the outlaws from the Isle of Ely, till Henry III. secured it by a deep ditch.

The modern town is about 1 mile long, from S. to N. and about half a mile broad in the middle, diminishing at the extremities. The prospect of the town is remarkably good. It has 14 parish-churches, one of which is in ruins, and 2 others are without any towers, at one the bell (a small one) hangs to a tree in the church-yard, and at the other towerless church the bell hangs in a low wooden hut, that resembles a large centry-box. It contains above 1200 houses, but the private buildings are neither elegant or large, owing chiefly to their being held on college or corporation leases. It is governed by a mayor, high-steward, recorder, 13 aldermen, and 24 common-council-men, a town-clerk, &c. Its chief trade is water-carriage from hence to Downham, Lynn, Ely, &c. The Jews being encouraged to settle in England by William I. and II. were very populous here for several generations, and inhabited that street now called the Cury. They had a synagogue, since converted to a parish church, from the shape of its tower, called Round-church, though others are of opinion, that it was built by the Knights Templars, it bearing a resemblance to the Temple-church in London. In 1388, Richard II. held a parliament here. Wat Tyler and Jack Straw, in their rebellion against Richard II. burnt the university records in the market-place, which is situated in the middle of the town, and consists of 2 spacious oblong squares united together; at the top of the angle stands the shire-hall, lately erected at the expence of the county. Markets on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday. At the back of the shire-hall is the ancient town-hall and jail. At the west end of the market-place is the cross, and in the S. E. fronting the shire-hall, is a remarkable handsome stone conduit, to which water is conveyed by an aqueduct, which was the benefaction of the celebrated Hobson, a carrier, in the reign of king James I. who was a native of this place. A fine road for the benefit of the inhabitants and students was lately made for 4 miles from this town to Gogmagog-hills, pursuant to the will of Mr. Wortes. The late Dr. Addenbroke also left 4000*l.* towards building and furnishing an hospital for the cure of poor people gratis; of which charity the master master of Catharine-hall is trustee, which hospital has been erected at the S. E. end of the town. At a little distance from Bennet-college is the botanic garden of 5 acres, and a large house for the use of the governors, and the residence of the curator, given the university by the late Dr. Walker, who settled an estate on it towards its support. Its greatest glory is the university, not inferior to any in Christendom, which consists of 12 colleges and 4 halls, which have the same privileges as the colleges; and the whole body of the university, which is commonly about 1500, enjoys very great privileges, granted by several of our sovereigns; but it was James I. who impowered it to send 2 members to parliament, as the town had done from the first. The university is governed, 1. by a chancellor, who is always some nobleman, and may be changed every 3 years, or continued longer by the tacit consent of the university. 2. By a high-steward, chose by the senate, and holding his place by patent from the university. 3. By a vice-chancellor, who is the head of some college or hall, and chose yearly by the body of the university, the heads of the colleges naming two. 4. By 2 proctors, chose every year, according to the cicle of colleges and halls; as are two taxors, who with the proctors regulate the weights and measures, as clerks of markets. The proctors also inspect the behaviour of the scholars, who must not be out of their colleges after 9 o'clock at night. Here are also 2 moderators, 2 scrutators, a commissary, public orator, 2 librarians, a register, a school-keeper, 3 esquire beaules, and a yeoman beadle, 18 professors; and the caput, consisting of the vice-chancellor, a doctor of divinity, a doctor of laws, a doctor of physic, a regent, and a non-regent master of arts. Henry VI granted it the power to print all books of any kind within itself, a privilege which Oxford had not.

The Senate-house of the university is an elegant building of the Corinthian order, that cost near 16000l. building; where, on the N. side, is a fine statue of George I. erected in 1739, at the expence of the late lord Townshend; opposite to this on the N. side is another of George II. erected in 1765, at the expence of the late duke of Newcastle; at the E. end, on each side of the entrance are two others; one, the late duke of Somerset, after the Vandyke taste; the other, an Italian emblematical figure of Gloria. This is allowed to be the most superb room in England, is 101 feet long, 42 broad, and 32 high, and has a gallery which can contain 1000 persons. This building forms the N. side of a quadrangle, as the schools and public library do the W. the schools being on the ground floor, and the library over them, surrounding a small court. North of the philosophy school is the repository of Dr. Woodward's fossils, ores, shells, &c. The Doctor was a professor at Gresham college, London, died 1728, and left a sum of money to this university, for erecting a professorship for natural philosophy, with a provision of 150l. a year for ever. At the S. E. corner of this building is an elegant geometrical stone stair-case, which leads to the old library, and consists of 18 classes, at the end of which is an elegant square room in which are deposited the MSS. and a valuable cabinet of oriental books and curiosities, &c. &c. This room opens to two other rooms, containing 26 large classes, consisting of 30,000 volumes, presented the university by George I. being the entire collection of the late Dr. Moore, bishop of Ely, and purchased of the Doctor's executor by his Majesty for 6000 guineas; and his majesty gave the university 2000l. more to defray the expence of fitting up the apartments, and erecting classes for their reception: they consist of the first editions of the Greek and Latin classics and historians, and the greatest part of the works of the first printers; large collections of prints of the greatest masters; and a valuable MS. of the Gospels, and Acts of the Apostles, on vellum, in Greek and Latin capitals, given the university by Theodore Beza, and supposed to be as old as any MS. extant. The other part of the library has been rebuilt in an elegant manner, and forms the W. side of the intended quadrangle. The books, which are contained in the last room, are part of the old library augmented with a considerable number of the best modern books, several of which are presents from foreign sovereigns and eminent men. St Mary's church forms the E. side of this quadrangle: here the university have their public sermons, and the pulpit, which stands in the centre of the church, and faces the chancel, has no sounding board. In a grand gallery over part of the chancel is a seat for the chancellor, vice-chancellor, &c. George I. when he gave the books, also established a professor of modern history and modern languages in this university, with a salary of 400l. for himself and two persons under him, qualified to instruct in that branch, 20 scholars to be nominated by the king, each of which is obliged to learn two at least of the languages. A fellowship is founded at Magdalen college, appropriated to the gentlemen of Norfolk, and called, 'The Travelling Norfolk Fellowship'.

It is a just remark, that all the libraries in Cambridge, except that of King's college, are lending libraries; and those at Oxford are studying libraries. St. Peter's college is the most ancient, and the first on entering the town from London, consisting of two courts, separated by a cloister and gallery. The largest is 144 feet long, and 84 broad. The buildings in this court have been lately repaired in an elegant manner. The lesser court is divided by the chapel, which is a fine old building 54 feet long, 27 broad, and 27 high. This college was founded 1257. There are three colleges in Oxford which dispute the antiquity with this. Cambridge and Oxford were universities long before they were possessed of any colleges in their own right, the students then lodged and boarded with the townsmen, and they then hired hotels for their exercises and disputations. A hotel or hall, now denominated Pythagoras's school, situated on the W. side of the river, is one of the ancient hotels that remains undemolished, and in which Erasmus read his first Greek lectures in England. Clare-hall is on the bank of the river over which it has an elegant stone bridge, was founded 1326, consisting of one grand court 150 feet long and 111 broad. The front of this building that faces the fields has the appearance of a palace. Pembroke-hall is near St. Peter's college, and was founded in 1343, consists of 2 courts. It has an elegant chapel built by sir Christopher Wren. Corpus-Christi, or Bennet-college was founded in 1350, has but a mean appearance, but is possessed of a remarkably large collection of valuable and curious ancient manuscripts. Trinity-hall, on the N. of Clare-hall, near the river, was founded in 1351, is a remarkably neat building. Gonvil and Caius-college is near the middle of the town, N. of the Senate-house, has three courts, was founded 1348, and augmented 1557. King's college, the most noble foundation in Europe, was first endowed by Henry VI. The old court resembles a decayed castle more than a college. The new building is very magnificent, near 300 feet long. The chapel is one of the finest pieces of Gothic architecture now remaining in the world; is 304 feet long, 73 broad on the outside and 40 within, and 91 high, and yet not a single pillar to sustain its ponderous roofs, of which it has two; the first of stone most curiously carved, the other of wood covered with lead, between which is a vacancy of 10 feet. There is such a profusion of carvings both within and without as is no where to be equalled. Henry VII. enlarged it 188 feet in length, and Henry VIII. gave the elegant stalls and organ gallery with its inimitable carvings, where are the coats of arms of that king and those of Anne Boleyn quartered. He gave also the elegant fine painted glass windows, which are in fine preservation, and were permitted by Cromwell to be preserved when almost every other in England was destroyed, as he had a particular regard for this university, where he had his education, and the town, which he represented in parliament. In this chapel are put up the Spanish colours taken at the reduction of Manilla, by colonel Draper, a member of this college. It has an ancient stone-bridge over the Cam. Queen's-college, near the river, S. of King's, was founded 1448, consists of two courts, with a fine grove and gardens on both sides of the river, connected with each other and the college by two wooden bridges, one of which is a curious structure. Catharine-hall is E. of Queen's, and its principal front on the W. the most extensive and regular in the university. It contains only one court 180 feet long and 120 broad, and was founded in 1475. Jesus college is at the E. end of the town, surrounded by groves and gardens. The principal front faces the S. 180 feet long, regularly built and fashed; it was originally a Benedictine convent, and converted to the present use in 1576. Christ's college is opposite St. Andrew's church, the E. side of the town, founded by Henry VII's mother 1505. St. John's college was founded by the same lady 1809, on the site of a dissolved priory. It consists of three courts, and has a large library crowded with scarce and valuable books. To this college belongs a fine stone bridge over the river, which leads to their grand walks. Magdalen college is the only one that stands on the N. side of the river, near the great bridge, consists of two courts, and was founded in 1519. Trinity college is E. of the river, having St. John's college on the N. and Caius-college and Trinity hall on the S. It contains two large quadrangles, the first of which is 344 feet long, and 280 broad. It has two noble entrances, and on the N. side of it is the chapel 204 feet long, 34 broad, and 44 high. It has every noble ornament, and the much-admired statue of Sir Isaac Newton, who was a student in this college. The noble hall is above 100 feet long, 40 broad, and 50 high. The inner court is esteemed the finest in the university, and surpasses any in Oxford. It is very spacious and has an elegant cloister of lofty stone pillars, supporting grand apartments; on the W. is the library, the most elegant structure of the kind in the kingdom, 190 feet long, 40 broad, and 38 high within. Its entrance is by a staircase, the steps black marble, and the walls incrustured with ancient Roman monuments. The entrance into the library is by folding-doors at the N. end, and at the S. end is a fine statue of his present majesty; its inside appearance inexpressibly grand. The classes large, beautiful and noble, well stocked with books, manuscripts, &c. Its outside has every suitable embellishment, and was erected by sir Christopher Wren, at the expence of near 20,000l. Under this building is a spacious piazza of equal dimensions, out of which open 3 gates to a lawn which leads to the river, over which is a new elegant cycloidal bridge of 3 arches, that leads to extensive walks. In the middle is a remarkable vista. This college was founded on the site of two other colleges and a hall, in 1546, by Henry VIII. Emanuel-college is at the S. E. end of the town, consists of two courts, the principal of which is very neat, and was built on the site of a Dominican convent.

C A

Sidney-Suffex-college is in Bridge-street, whose hall is elegant, and chapel remarkable only for standing N. and S. as others do E. and W. The town has fairs on June 24, and August 14.

CAMBRIDGE, a town in the county of Middlesex, the province of Massachusetts-bay, in New-England, seated on the N. branch of Charles-river, 7 miles N. W. of Boston. It has several fine houses, but irregularly built, and its first name was Newton, which it changed to the present on account of its university, incorporated in 1650. This, with a college for Indians, but afterwards a printing-house, was burnt in 1764, and afterwards rebuilt. In 1775 it was converted into barracks. Lat. 42, 25. Long. 71, 11.

CAMBRILLA, a town of Catalonia in Spain, on the sea, in a fruitful and pleasant country.

CAMBRON, a village about 3 miles from Mons in Hainault, and belonging to the Austrian Netherlands; well known in queen Anne's wars, for the encampings of the armies here, which often made long marches to occupy this ground, on account of its advantageous situation. In this place is a fine Cistercian abbey.

CAMDEN, a town of Fredericksburg-township, on the N. side of the Wateree river, in South Carolina, which river running into the Santee enabled this town to carry on a considerable trade. It had a court-house, and provided a regiment of militia. Near here in 1780, the Americans were totally defeated by the British troops; who the year following burnt this town in their retreat before the Americans to Charles-town.

CAMDEN, a district in the back settlements of South Carolina.

CAMEL, a river in Cornwall.

CAMELFORD, an ancient borough of Cornwall, governed by a mayor, where the river Camel rises. In this place is neither chapel nor church, nor ever was. It was created a free-borough by Richard earl of Cornwall, who also granted it a market and a fair. Members of parliament first came from here in the 6th of Edward VI. Its market is on Friday, and fairs on Friday after March 10, May 26, July 17, and September 6.

CAMERET-BAY, in Brittany, forms the harbour of Brest.

CAMERINO, anciently Camerinum, the marquise of Ancona, in the Ecclesiastical State, and Middle Division of Italy. It is the see of a bishop, immediately subject to the pope. It lies at the foot of the Apennines on the Chiento, between Macerata and Spoleto, being 44 miles W. of Ancona.

CAMERON or CAMRON Cape, lies on the N. part of Honduras-bay in North America.

CAMIN, a city of ducal Pomerania in Germany. It stands on the E. side of the mouth of the Oder, and subject to the king of Prussia. In 1630, and 1709, it suffered much by fires. Lat. 54, 4. N. Long. 15, 46, E.

CAMINHIA, a small fortified town of Entre Douro e Minho, on the sea, near the mouth of the river Minho, where it forms an island, upon which is a fort and convent. It contains 1300 inhabitants. Lat. 41, 52, N. Long. 9, 20, W.

CAMISCHINKA, a river of European Russia, which falls into the Wolga.

CAMITZ, or CAMIENS, a populous, well-built, and fortified little city of Upper Lusatia, and electorate of Saxony, in Germany. Here is a manufacture of woollen and linen cloth. It lies 12 miles N. W. of Bauditz, and 18 E. of Dresden.

CAMLET, a river in Shropshire, which runs into the Severn.

CAMMA and GOBBI, two provinces of the kingdom of Loango in Africa. The inhabitants are continually at war with each other. The chief town of Gobbi lies about a day's journey from the sea. Their rivers abound with a variety of fish; but are infested with sea-horses. The principal commerce with the natives is in logwood, elephants teeth, and tails, the hair of which is highly valued, and used for several curious purposes.

CAMONICA, (valley of,) in Bresciano, belonging to the Venetian territories in Upper Italy. It lies between high mountains, and has a spacious plain, through which runs the river Oglio. It comprehends 80 parishes. In this valley are iron and copper mines.

CAMPAGNA, a little city, and see of a bishop, in the Hither Principate of Naples, in Lower Italy. It lies 35 miles S. E. of Naples city. Lat. 40, 45, N. Long. 15, 30, E.

CAMPAGNA di Roma, or the territory of Rome, in contradistinction from the Campagna of Naples. It was anciently called Latium, in the Middle Division of Italy, has indeed a rich and fruitful soil, but indifferently cultivated; being fenny, and the inhabitants lazy and poor: so that at harvest-time the peasants of Viterbo, Perugia, and the mountainous parts of St. Peter's Patrimony, come to help the few inhabitants of the Campagna to get in their corn. Most of the houses are built, not in the dry and warm plains, but purposely in the mountains, for the sake of the cool air in summer. This territory is bounded on the W. by St. Peter's Patrimony and the Tiber; on the N. by Sabina and the Anio; on the E. and S. E. by the Abruzzo, Otranto, and Terra di Lavoro, provinces of Naples. It extends itself from Rome upwards of 60 miles along the Mediterranean, to the frontiers of that kingdom. It is farther subdivided into Campagna Proper, lying on the N. side between the Anio, and ridge called Mons Lepinus, or now Montagne de Segni, a very mountainous track; and and into the southern or maritime side, called la Marina, which lies between the aforesaid mountains and the sea-coast, from E. to W. The waters of this territory are generally very good, especially those of the Tiber. Here also are two other rivers; namely the Numico and Astura, besides those which water the fenny lands of Pomptina, and are rather canals than running streams. Here are several lakes.

CAMPAGNE (de Caen), a subdivision of Lower Normandy, in the government of the latter name, in France. It extends itself as far as Falaise, and has but one town in it, namely Caen.

CAMPAGNE, a subdivision also of Upper Normandy, partly in the bailiwick of Rouen, and partly in that of Evreux. This is farther divided into Campagne de Neubourg and Campagne de St. André.

CAMPANA, a famous river of Chili, enters the sea at a place called El Ancon sin falida. The name was given this river because its two arms seem to form the shape of a bell.

CAMPBELTOWN, a royal burgh on the E. coast of Kintyre, a subdivision of Argyleshire, in Scotland, which, alternately with Air, Irwin, Rothsay, and Inverary, sends one member to the British parliament. It has a secure harbour or bay for shipping.

CAMPDEN, or CAMDEN, a borough of Gloucestershire, famous for its manufacture of stockings. Here are two charity-schools, and an alms-house; and the Saxon kings are said to have held a congress here, in 689, whether they should attack the Britons. Its market on Wednesday, and fairs on Ash-wednesday, April 23, July 25, and November 30. It lies 18 miles N. E. of Gloucester, and 87 W. of London.

CAMPEACHY, a town of S. America, in New-Spain, in the peninsula of Yucatan, on the western coast of the bay of Campeachy, defended by good walls and strong forts. It is not so rich nor trading a town as formerly, and is noted for logwood, though it does not grow very near it. It was taken by the English in 1659, by the Buccaneers in 1678, and by the freebooters of St. Domingo in 1685, who burnt it, and blew up the citadel. Long. 93, 7, W. Lat. 19, 20, N.

CAMPEN, a large city, and port of Overissel, one of the United Provinces; it stands low near the mouth of the Iffel or Zuyder-see; over the former of which is a bridge defended by a fort with bastions. It has 2 suburbs inhabited by fishermen. In 1673 the French exacted here 80,000 guilders for saving the town. Lat. 52, 35, N. Long. 5, 46, E.

CAMPIO-MAYOR, a town and modern fortification of Alentejo in Portugal, with 4 whole, and 5 half bastions, also 2 castles within a gun-shot of the place. It lies on a large plain. Its inhabitants amounted to 5300 souls. Lat. 38, 45, N. Long. 7, 25, W.

CAMPION, a town of the kingdom of Tanguth in Tartary, formerly remarkable for being a place through which the caravans passed in the road from Bukharia to China. E. long. 104, 53. N. lat. 40, 25.

CAMPLI, a small city of the Farther Abruzzo, and kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy. It is the see of a bishop, and stands at the foot of the Apennines, about 12 miles from the Adriatic sea. Lat. 43, 0, N. Long. 14, 25, E.

CAMPO BASSO, a town of Italy, in the Capitanata, which is rich and populous, and where there is held a famous fair.

CAMPO SANTO, a place of Italy, in the duchy of Modena, lying on the left bank of the river Panaro, and remarkable for a battle fought there in 1743, between the Spaniards and Austrians.

CAMUL, a town of Asia, on the eastern extremity of the kingdom of Cialus, on the frontiers of Tangut. E. long. 98, 5. N. lat. 37, 15.

CANAAN, or CHANAAN, has been successively known by several names; as, the Land of Israel, the Land of God, the Holy Land, and simply the Land; also, Judea or Judæa, Palæstine or Palestine, Syria Palæstina, Syria, Cæle-Syria, Idumæa, or Idumea, and Phœnicia or Phœnice. It was called the Land of Canaan, the Land of Israel, I. Sam. xiii. 9. II. Kin. vi. 23. Ezek. vii. 2. Mat. ii. 22, &c. It has also been sometimes called the Land of the Hebrews, the Land of the Jews, the Land of God, and then the Holy Land, first by the Jews, and secondly by Christians.

CANA, mentioned Josh. xix. 28. belonging to the tribe of Asher, lay not far from Sidon.

CANA of Galilee, (so called to distinguish it from the Cana foregoing), mentioned John ii. 1. lay within the tribe of Zebulon, not far from Nazareth.

CANADA, a province of North America, discovered by Cabot, in 1499, and is bounded by Esquimaux and Hudson's bay on the N. by the rivers of St. Lawrence, the Iroquois, or Five Indian nations, the Huron and Illinois lakes, on the E. and S. and by unknown lands on the W. It is situated between 61 and 81 degrees of W. long. and between 45 and 52 degrees of N. lat. being about 800 miles in length, and 200 in breadth. The French comprehended under the name of Canada a very large territory, taking into their claim part of New Scotland, New-England, and New-York, on the E. and to the W. extending it as far as the Pacific ocean. That part, however, which they were able to cultivate, and which bore the face of a colony, lay chiefly on the banks of St. Lawrence, and the numerous small rivers falling into that stream. This being reduced by the British arms in the last way, way, was confirmed to England by the peace of 1763, and called "the province of Quebec."

Our possessions in this part of America, consist of an immense inland country, communicating with the sea by the mouths of two great rivers, both of difficult and dangerous navigation at the entrance, and one of which is quite frozen for almost half the year, and covered with thick exhalations and fogs for the greater part of the rest.

The soil is various; it yields Indian corn very well in most parts, and very fine wheat in some; all sorts of herbs, which grow in Europe, flourish here. The greatest forests in the world are in the uncultivated parts of America, and a more magnificent sight than the woods of Canada cannot be imagined; the tops of the trees lose themselves in the clouds, and there is such a prodigious variety of species, that even among those, who have taken the most pains to know them, there is not perhaps one capable of describing half the number. The Indians hollow the red elms into canoes, some of which, made out of one piece will contain 20 persons; others are made of the bark, the different pieces of which they sew together with the inner rind, and daub over the seams with pitch, or rather a bituminous matter much resembling it, to prevent their leaking, and the ribs of these canoes, are made with the boughs of trees. This country likewise produces cherries and plums; it abounds in coals, and near Quebec is a fine lead-mine.

The air of Canada is so excessive cold from December to April, that the greatest rivers are frozen over, and the snow lies commonly from 4 to 6 feet deep on the ground, even in the southern parts of the province. This inconvenience, to which we may add the falls in the river St. Lawrence, below Montreal, which prevent vessels of any burthen from reaching that emporium of inland commerce, will always stop the communication, during the winter season, between Canada and the southern colonies, until roads are formed, that can be travelled without danger from the Indians.

They raise no staple commodity in this country, to answer their demands upon England, their trade with the Indians producing all their returns for that market. There are principally the furs of the beaver, and those of foxes and racoons, with deer-skins, and all the branches of the peltry. The nature of the climate, being severely cold for the most part, and the people manufacturing nothing, shew what the country wants from Europe; wine, brandy, cloths, chiefly coarse, linen, and wrought iron. The Indian trade requires brandy, tobacco, a sort of duffel blankets, guns, powder and ball, kettles, hatchets and tomahawks, with several toys and trinkets. The Indians supply the peltry, and we have traders, who in the manner of the original inhabitants, traversing the vast lakes and rivers that divide this country, in canoes of bark, with incredible industry and patience, carry their goods into the distant parts of America, and among nations entirely unknown to us. This again brings the market home to us, as the Indians are hereby habituated to trade with us. For this purpose, people from all parts, even from the distance of a 1000 miles, come in June to the fair at Montreal.

Quebec, the capital of this province, lies much nearer to the sea, from which, however, it is 150 leagues distant. The river, which from the sea hither is 10 or 12 miles broad narrows suddenly to about a mile wide.

The distance from Quebec to Montreal is about 150 miles, and the country on both sides the river is very well settled, and has an agreeable effect upon the eye. The farms lie pretty close all the way, several gentlemen's houses, neatly built, shew themselves at intervals, and there is all the appearance of a flourishing colony; but there are no towns or villages. It very much resembles the well settled parts of the colonies of Virginia and Maryland, where the planters are within themselves.

The river St. Lawrence is very extensive, and is the only one in this province on which we have settlements of any note; but if we look forward into futurity, there will appear nothing improbable in the conjecture, that this vast country, when the present unhappy differences shall no longer subsist, and when their mode of government shall be altered, will be enabled of itself to carry on a vast trade on those great seas of fresh water, which are collected within its own bosom. Here are 5 lakes, the smallest of which is a piece of sweet water greater than any of the other parts of the world; viz. lake Ontario, Erie, Huron, Michigan, and Superior, which contains several islands. These are all navigable, by any vessels, and they all communicate with one another, except that the passage between Erie and Ontario is interrupted by the stupendous cataract of Niagara.

The river St. Lawrence is the outlet of these lakes, by which they discharge themselves into the ocean. Forts are built at the several straits; by which these lakes communicate with each other, as well as where the last of them communicates with the river St. Lawrence.

In this northern part of the colonies we have only one settlement more that commands our attention; and, though a small one, is perhaps of the greatest consequence; and such is the island of Cape Breton. It is about 140 miles in length, full of mountains and lakes, and intersected by a vast number of creeks and bays, almost meeting each other on every side; which seems in general, both for the coast and inland, very much to resemble the coast and inland parts of most northern countries; so is Iceland; and Denmark and Sweden have such shores, such mountains, and such lakes. The soil is, however, in many places very fruitful, and in every part abounds with timber fit for all uses. In the earth are coal-pits, and on the shore one of the most valuable fisheries in the world. The only town on this island is Louisbourg, which stands upon one of the finest harbours in all America.

At the time Canada was first conquered by the English, the inhabitants were allowed the free exercise of their religion, and were permitted to enjoy all the privileges of the British laws and constitution; but, notwithstanding the most sacred promises to fulfil this agreement, our government soon after thought proper to renew the military government, to abolish trials by juries, and to make the Roman Catholic the established religion of these extensive territories. Thus a Protestant prince, limited in his government at home, became an absolute monarch over territories far more extensive than England, Wales, and Scotland united.

Canada's immense forests afford nourishment and shelter to various animals, such as stags, elks, deer, bears, foxes, martens, wild cats, and various other animals too numerous to be here inserted; but the beaver may be said to be the most valuable. The feathered inhabitants of the air, and the scaly tribe of the water, are here found in the greatest abundance, and many of them the same as we meet with in Europe.

CANANEA, a small oblong island, about 37 leagues from St. Vincent, S. lat. 25, W. long. 46, 50. spreads itself like a crescent before the coast of Brasil, over against the small bay formed by the mouth of the river Ararapira. It hath two or three villages, and a town of its own name. It has no other strength than its natural situation, which permits none but small vessels to come near it.

CANANOR, a province of the Malabar coast, and Mogul empire, in Asia. It is a very plentiful country. Of the same name is a town on the coast with a good harbour, about 240 miles E. of Goa, and 141 N. of Cochin. The Dutch have a fort here, which they took from the Portuguese in 1683, and also a factory: where they have but little trade, it being removed to Surat. There is a large town at the bottom of the bay, independent of them, and governed by a Mahometan rajah, who can bring 20,000 men into the field, and has a number of expert musqueteers and archers. Lat. 10, 5; N. Long. 75, 15, E.

CANARA, a province of Malabar, and Mogul empire, in Asia. Divided on the S. from that of Cananor by the river Cangerecora, and from Cuncan on the N. by the river Aliga, having the ocean on the W. and the kingdom of Bissnagar on the E. The country is very fertile in rice and other necessaries.

Here first began the custom of wives burning on the same pile with their husbands; and generally a lady governs in this province, and resides at Baydour, 2 days journey from the sea.

CANARY-ISLANDS, are situated in the Atlantic ocean, over against the empire of Morocco in Africa. They were formerly called the Fortunate Islands, on account of the temperate healthy air, and excellent fruits. The land is very fruitful, for both wheat and barley produce 130 for one. The cattle thrive well, and the woods are full of all sorts of game. The Canary singing birds are well known all over Europe. There are here sugar-canes in great abundance; but the Spaniards first planted vines here, from whence we have the wine called Canary or sack.

These islands were not entirely unknown to the ancients; but they were a long while forgot, till John de Bettencourt discovered them in 1402. It is said they were first inhabited by the Phœnicians, or Carthaginians, but on no certain foundation; nor could the inhabitants themselves tell from whence they were derived; on the contrary, they did not know there was any other country in the world. Their language, manners, and customs, had no resemblance to those of their neighbours. However, they were like the people on the coast of Barbary in complexion. They had no iron. After the discovery, the Spaniards soon got possession of them all, under whose dominion they are to this day, except Madeira, which belongs to the Portuguese. The inhabitants are chiefly Spaniards; there are some of the first people remaining, whom they call Guanches, who are somewhat civilized by their intercourse with the Spaniards. They are a hardy, active, bold people, and live on the mountains. Their chief food is goat's milk. Their complexions is tawny, and their noses flat. The Spanish vessels, when they sail for the West-Indies, always rendezvous at these islands, going and coming. Their number is 12. 1. Alegranza; 2. Canaria; 3. Ferro; 4. Fuerteventura; 5. Gomera; 6. Gratiota; 7. Lancerotta; 8. Madeira; 9. Palma; 10. Rocca; 11. Salvages; 12. Teneriff. W. long. 12, 21. N. lat. 27, 30, to 29, 30.

CANARY, (Great or Proper,) that from which the last mentioned cluster of African islands take their name, is about 150 miles in circuit. Its capital is of the like denomination, and called by the inhabitants Ciudad de Palmas. Here are caverns in which have been discovered burial places, containing many of the carcases of the ancient inhabitants, perfectly preserved, and hard as wood.

It abounds in melons, oranges, citrons, &c. fir, dragon, and palm-trees. The town lies on the S. S. E. part of the island, and about a league and and a half from the road, where is good anchoring, provided the ships do not come too near the town; the approach to which, rocks hid under water render dangerous. Its castle, on a mountain, is but a sorry one.

CANAVEZES, a town of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal, on the river Douro, has only 1900 inhabitants, though containing 6 parishes.

CANCALLE, a town of France, in Upper Brittany, by the sea-side, where there is a road. Here the British landed in 1758, in their way to St. Maloes, where they burnt a great number of ships in the harbour, and then retired without loss. This town was in their power; but they acted like generous enemies, and did no hurt to this nor any other on the coast. W. long. 6, 13. N. lat. 48, 41.

CANCHE, (La), in Latin Cancius, or Quentia, a river of Picardy, in France. It rises in Artois, is navigable near Montreuil, and below Etaples empties itself into the sea.

CANCHEUFU, a city of China, where are very ancient towers on the hills and mountains, which the Chinese call Patna. They are about 150 spans, or 112 feet high, some more. They end at top in a long stone cut in knots, and are hexagon or octagon, of 9 stories or cornices, and 6 windows to every one to look out on all sides. They vary in opinion as to their intent; but I am of opinion the main design was to beautify the city, they being mostly about the gates in sight of those that go in.

CANDA, a river in Cumberland, which runs into the Eden at Carlisle.

CANDAHOR, a province of Persia, in Asia, bounded by Sablestan to the S. the Mogul empire to the E. the country of Balk to the N. It has also part of the Mogul empire, with Segestan, on the S. and part of Corasan on the W. It is very mountainous; yet abundantly producing all necessaries, except towards Persia, on which side it is very barren.

CANDAHOR, the capital of the province of the same name last mentioned, on the confines of Persia to the E. and the Mogul's dominions to the W. Since 1650, the Persians made themselves masters of it, notwithstanding all the attempts of the Mogul to recover it; to whom it was subject before. This place is of the greater importance, as being fortified, it covers the Persian confines towards the Indies; and is the most frequented thoroughfare of the caravans from Persia to the Indies and back again. Lat. 33, 5, N. Long. 67, 10, E.

CANDIA, anciently Creta, Idæa, and Macaroneses, i. e. happy island, from its fertility and the purity of its air. It is one of the largest islands on the Mediterranean, lies on the coast of Greece, and is 70 miles long from E. to W. and in some places 15 broad. It has the Archipelago to the N. and lies exactly at the mouth of it; Asia Minor on the N. E. the Morea on the N. W. and Africa on the S. It is generally reckoned a part of Asia. Above half the island consists of nothing but barren and rocky mountains; the principal of which is the famous Mount Ida, now Psiloriti, occupying great part of the middle of it. It is only a huge rock, bearing neither trees nor grass, and covered with snow most part of the year. It produces nothing but the shrub buckthorn (tragacantha) which is famous for gum-tragacanth. 2. Sethia, or Lafthi, formerly Dicte, a part of the white mountain, now called Monte di Sfachia, from a neighbouring town of the latter name. The valleys and plains are uncommonly fruitful, yielding corn, excellent red and white wine, oil, silk, wool, honey, wax, &c. Here are several sorts of tame beasts, game and wild fowl, but no goats or wild beasts. The greatest part of the country is uncultivated, has no considerable streams; but many rivulets, of which Lethe is one of the largest. The inhabitants are Greeks (who have an archbishop,) Armenians, Turks, and Jews. After having been in the possession of the Venetians for above 400 years, the Turks invaded it in 1644; when, after 64 years, the former were obliged to cede it to them by the peace of 1699, with the reserve only of some fortresses, which they also took in 1715. While under the Venetians, it was divided into 4 districts; namely, Canea, Rettimo, Candia and Settia.

CANDIA, the present capital of the last mentioned island of the same name, lies on the N. side of it, upon the sea, in a plain at the foot of a mountain, and on the side of the ancient city of Heraclea, probably the same with Matium. By reason of the long siege which it sustained from 1645 to 1699 by the Turks, having in the interval been stormed it is said 56 times, and near 200,000 Turks killed under its walls, it has been entirely ruined; and consequently no more than the shadow of its former magnitude remains. Its harbour is choked up, and only used for boats. Here the Greek archbishop resides. It is in the possession of the Turks. Lat. 35, 18, N. Long. 25, 23, E.

CANDISH, a province of Indostan, in the East-Indies, Asia, bounded by Berar and part of Malva on the E. Chitor on the N. Guzarette on the W. and Ballagate on the S. from which it is separated by the river Tapti, which falls into the bay of Cambaya at Surat. It is subject to the great Mogul, and drives a considerable trade in cotton cloth. Its revenue is reckoned 1,388,125 l. sterling.

CANDY, a large kingdom of Asia, in the island of Ceylon. It contains about a quarter of the island; and as it is encompassed with high mountains, and covered with thick forests, through which the roads and paths are narrow and difficult, the king has them guarded, to prevent his subjects from going going into other countries. It is full of hills, from whence rivulets proceed which are full of fish; but as they run among the rocks, they are not fit for boats: however, the inhabitants are very dextrous in turning them to water their land, which is fruitful in rice, pulse, and hemp. The king is absolute, and his subjects are idolaters. The capital town is of the same name.

CANDY, the capital of the foregoing kingdom. It has been often burnt by the Portuguese, when they were masters of these coasts. The houses are poor and low, and badly furnished. E. long. 79, 12. N. lat. 7, 35.

CANEA, a strong and considerable town of the island of Candia, where a basha resides. It is inhabited by 1500 Turks, 2000 Greeks, some Jews, and a few French merchants, with their consul. The harbour is pretty good; but the fortifications are much out of repair. The environs of the town are admirable; being adorned with forests of olive-trees mixed with fields, vineyards, gardens, and brooks bordered with myrtle-trees and laurel-roses. The chief revenue of this town consists in oil-olive. E. long. 24, 15. N. lat. 35, 28.

CANELLE, or CANE-LAND, a large country in the island of Ceylon, called formerly the kingdom of Cota. It contains a great number of cantons, the principal of which are occupied by the Dutch. The chief riches of this country consists in cinnamon, of which there are large forests. There are five towns on the coast, some forts, and a great number of harbours: the rest of the country is inhabited by the natives; and there are several rich mines, from whence they get rubies, sapphires, topazes, cats-eyes, and several other precious stones.

CANETO, anciently Berteriac, a small but fortified town of the duchy of Mantua, in Upper Italy. It stands on the Oglio, was several times taken and retaken in former wars; and formerly were two great battles fought in its neighbourhood. It is now subject to the house of Austria, 12 miles S. W. of Mantua. Lat. 45, 0. N. Long. 10, 5, E.

CANEWDON, on the S. side of the Crouch, near Walsfleet, is a large parish where Canute kept his court. The manor-house has been double-trenched and fenced. Fair June 25.

CANG, a sea or gulph, between China and Tartary, in Asia, at the E. extremity of the great Chinese wall.

CANGOXIANA, a town on the southern coast of Ximo, a Japanese island, in Asia, of a commodious situation, and harbour, but with a dangerous entrance on account of rocks. Upon one of these is a noble castle seen at some distance off, to defend the road: at the mouth of the haven is a light-house on a high rock, which may be seen 20 miles off; and near it is a convenient road. In the town is kept a strong garrison, both for the defence of the port, and curbing its petty king. In the town are several fine buildings. About 4 miles N. W. is a mountain, said to be the highest known, next to Teneriff. Cangozima stands in lat. 31, 35, N. and long. 133, 16, E.

CANIGAU, the highest peak of the Pyrenean mountains, said by some to be 1440 fathoms above the level of the sea.

CANINA, the N. part of the ancient Epirus, a province of Greece, which now belongs to the Turks, and lies off the entrance of the gulph of Venice. The principal town is of the same name, and is seated on the sea-coast, 8 miles N. of Valona, at the foot of the mountains of Chimera. Long. 19, 25, E. Lat. 40, 55, N.

CANISCHA, formerly a strong fortress, in the county of Szalad and Farther Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It lies in a deep morass, not far from the Mur and Drau, and covers the frontiers of Stiria. In 1600 the Turks took it; though about 34 years before, they had besieged it unsuccessfully; as did the Imperialists in 1601. It has been thrice burnt: and in 1702 the emperor Leopold dismantled it; so that at present it is but an indifferent town.

CANNARES, a savage people of South America, in the audience of Quito, in Peru. They are handsome and well-made, though of a red copper complexion; and the country abounds in several sorts of game: if it was cultivated, it would produce grapes, wheat, and barley.

CANNE, anciently CANNÆ, though now an indifferent town of Bari, a province of the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy, is memorable in history for an important victory gained here in the year of Rome 538, by Hannibal, the Carthaginian general, over the Romans, under the consuls Paulus Æmilius, and Terentius Varro, the former of which was killed.

CANNES, a town belonging to the territorial bailiwick of Grasse, in Lower Provence, and government of the latter name, in France. It has a small harbour, and from it the neighbouring bay is denominated.

CANNEY, one of the western isles of Scotland, about half a mile from Rum. It is 2 miles long, and 1 broad; being surrounded with an high rock, but abounding in corn and pasturage, as do the coasts with cod and ling. In the N. extremity is a rock, where the needle of the compass is disordered upon any ships coming near it. On the N. E. side is good anchorage.

CANO, a kingdom of Africa, in Negroland, with a town of the same name. It is bounded by Zaara on the N. by the river Niger on the S. the kingdom of Agades on the W. and that of Cassina on the E. Some of the inhabitants are herdsmen, and others till the ground and dwell in villages. It produces corn, rice, and cotton. Here are also many defarts, and mountains covered with woods, in which are wild citrons and lemon-trees. The walls and houses of the town are made of clay, and the principal inhabitants are merchants. E. long. 16, 18. N. lat. 21, 5.

and

CANOBI, a town of the Milanese in Upper Italy, situated on the W. side of the Lago Maggiore, and about 30 miles W. of Como. Lat. 46, 10, N. Long. 8, 50, E.

CANOPUS, a city of Egypt at the mouth of the Nile, and built by Menelaus, in memory of his pilot, Canopus. It was the birth-place of Claudian the poet; but is now in ruins.

CANOSSA, a strong castle belonging to the duchy of Reggio, in the Modenese and Upper Division of Italy. Here formerly the famous countess Matilda gave shelter and entertainment to pope Gregory, where the emperor Henry IV. was obliged, in the bitterest cold weather, to stand for three days in the anti-court, bare-footed, and clad in penitentiary woollen-cloth, without tasting either meat or drink all the time, and with great effusion of tears intreating mercy, before the haughty prelate could be prevailed upon to receive him again into the bosom of the church.

CANSO, an island in Nova-Scotia, in which there is a very good harbour 3 leagues deep, and in it are several small islands. It forms two bays of safe anchorage. On the continent near it is a river, called Salmon-river, on account of the great quantity of that fish taken and cured here: it is believed to be the best fishery in the world of that sort. The town of Canso was burnt in 1744, by the the French from Cape Breton; but since our acquisition of Cape Breton in 1758, they are under no apprehension of the like danger. Lat. 45, 18. Long. 60, 50.

CANSTADT, a town on the E. side of the Neckar, in the duchy of Wurtemberg, with a cotton printing-house, and three salt-springs useful in several disorders. Near this town at a place called Berg, is a silk manufactory and a fine mineral spring.

CANTABRI, the ancient inhabitants of Biscay, in Spain, and who warred with the Romans 200 years before they were entirely subdued.

CANTABRIAN SEA. See the Bay of Biscay.

CANTAHEDY, a town of Coimbra and province of Beira, in Portugal, with a parish containing 1200 souls.

CANTAL, a mountain of Auvergne, in France, which is 984 fathoms high.

CANTAZARO, an episcopal town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and Hither Calabria. It is seated near the sea. Long. 7, 0, E. Lat. 38, 59, N.

CANTEBON, or LIAM, a town of Siam, in the East-Indies, in Asia. It lies near the gulph of Siam, and in the extreme S. E. part of this country, at the foot of one of the chains of mountains running from N. to S. that separate Siam from Cambodia.

CANTERA, or ALCANTARA, anciently Taurominius, one of the capital rivers of the kingdom of Sicily, in the Lower Division of Italy.

CANTERBURY, (Kent), the metropolitan see of England, and a city and county of itself, 56 miles from London, and 26 miles from Rochester, is said to have been built 900 years before the birth of Christ; but that the Romans were here 50 years before it, appears pretty certain, from Antoninus' Itinerary, from the Roman coins dug up in it, from the remains of a military-way, and from the great Roman causeways leading from hence to Dover and Lyme. Vortiger, king of the Britons, resided here after the Romans, and yielded it to the Saxons. It is governed by a mayor, recorder, sheriff, 12 aldermen, and 24 common-council-men, &c. The cathedral church was partly built by Ethelbert, the first Christian king of Kent, which Augustine converted from a heathen temple, and consecrated by the name of Christ-church, which was rifled and burnt in 1011, together with the rest of the city, by the Danes. King Canute, indeed, caused it to be repaired, and presented his crown of gold to it; but in 1043, it was again much defaced by fire; upon which Lanfrac, the archbishop, pulled it all down, rebuilt it, with the palace and monastery, and the church was new dedicated by the name of the Holy Trinity; but in the reign of Henry I. it was dedicated again, in the presence of the king and queen, and of David, king of Scots, many of the bishops and nobility of both realms, by the name of Christ church. In 1174 it was again destroyed by fire; but was begun to be rebuilt in the reign of Stephen, and not completed till that of Henry V. Before the Reformation it had 37 altars. Its middle tower is 235 feet in height. Seven kings, and many other great personages lie buried in this church, which is also celebrated for the shrine of Thomas à Becket, who was murdered here. Many French Protestants settled here, and brought with them the art of weaving silk, and established a manufactory. On the S. side of the city, at Dungeon-hill, are the ruins of a castle, said to have been built by William the Conqueror, in which is a court-house, rebuilt in 1730. The city had once an exchange, a mint, strong walls with many turrets, a deep ditch, and within it a great rampart. The two gates of St. Augustin's monastery next the town are still remaining, and are very stately. About this city are several thousand acres of hop-grounds; and this place is famous for excellent collars of fine brawn. Here are 6 wards, denominated from its 6 gates, 15 parish-churches. Northgate-church was rebuilt in 1773. A free-school, called the King's school, 3 others for 58 boys and 66 girls, and 7 hospitals, one of which is called Bridewell, that is a house of correction, and for the entertainment of poor townsmen's boys. At the West gate is a prison for criminals; and there is a gallows in the market-place, called Wincheap, because wines were there sold. Here is a sumptuous conduit, erected by archbishop Abbot. The city consists chiefly of 4 streets, which center at St. Andrew's-church, and is about 3 miles in circumference. Its market is Wednesday and Saturday, and a fair on September 29. The corporation affairs are transacted in rooms over the market-house. The river Stour runs through the city, over which is a bridge, rebuilt in 1769. The Jews were very numerous here, and gave the name of Jewry-street to that part where they resided. Hoys carry from this city to London great quantities of hops, corn, fruit, &c. weekly.

CANTERBURY, a town in Connecticut, New England, 1 mile E. of the river Thames, and 2 miles N. E. of Plainfield, both in Windham county.

CANTHELE, in Africa Propria, or territory of Carthage, was a Phœnician city.

CANTIN, (Cape); a promontory in the Atlantic ocean. It lies on the Morocco coast, in Africa. Lat. 33, 5, N. Long. 10, 3, W.

CANTIUM, a promontory of Britain, literally denoting a head-land, giving name to a territory called Cantium, now Kent. The promontory is now called the North Foreland.

CANTYRE, or KINTYR, the extremity of a country, or a head-land. It is a peninsula and subdivision of Argyleshire, in Scotland, lying W. of the isle of Arran, and E. of that of Illa. The utmost point of the land here facing Ireland, is called the Mull of Cantyre. Lat. 55, 22. Long. 5, 45.

CANTON, QUANG-TUNG, QUANG-CHEW, a province in China, named from its famed capital, adjoins on E. to Quangsi, having the Chinese ocean on the S. Hu-quang on the N. Fokien on the S. and Tung-king W. It is very considerable, not only for extent, almost 5 degrees latitude and 9 longitude, but for fertility, &c. The number of inhabitants are registered at 383,360 families, or 1,978,029 men. Its tribute in rice amounts to 1,017,772 sacks, and so in proportion do all other merchandizes, &c. The people are extraordinary industrious in manufactures, agriculture, commerce; and accordingly as rich. The soil yields 2 crops of corn, rice, &c. yearly, the greatest variety and plenty of this country's fruits, is needless to be specified, it enjoying such a warm healthy climate that the trees are always laden. Commerce extends to the most valuable merchandises, diamonds, pearls, &c. Gold, silver, &c. the products of the country, most curiously wrought for all uses. They are very expert in a kind of rice-manufacture, which they turn into all kinds of utensils, and bears a fine natural gloss, like pearl, without any additional varnish. They have a way of hatching eggs, especially of ducks, in ovens, (as they do in Egypt) or in dung, and potting them for use; as also of preserving them fresh all the year, not by salting, but covering them with a particular paste. We are told by Du Halde a curious singularity of such ducks, &c. The owners carry them in boats to the sea-side, at low water, to feed on oysters, cockles, and sea insects, where one drove intermixes with another, as a great number of boats is so employed: but as soon as the owner strikes on a basin, every flock returns to its own boat, as pigeons to their houses.

The coast abounds with commodious harbours, and the inlands are covered with cities, towns, villages, and both always employed in manufactures and commerce. Even the ozers, which grow in vast quantities, are used not only to make baskets, chairs, &c. but cables and other ropes for shipping. As it is a maritime province, and the most remote from court, its government is one of the most considerable. The Tzing-tu, or viceroy, keeps a vast number of soldiers to suppress highway-robbers, which would otherwise destroy commerce. It was anciently an independent monarchy. It is now divided into 10 inferior districts, Quang-chew, or Canton, Shaw-chew, Nang-yung, Whey-chew, Chau-chew, Chao-king, Kau-chew, Lyn-chew, Luy-chew, Kiung-chew: which have cities of the second and third ranks under them, to the number of 80, besides military cities and fortresses.

CANTON, QUANGTUNG, more properly QUANG-CHEW, metropolis of the preceding, 50 miles from the Indian ocean, upwards of 1000 S. of the capital city, Peking, E. long. from London, 112, 7. N. lat. 25, 20. It stands on a convenient large bay on the Chinese ocean, near the mouth of the river Ta-ha, which empties itself near it in that bay, and is not only one of the largest cities in China, computed with its suburbs above 20 miles in compass, but one of the richest, finest, most populous, and trading: the largest ships being brought quite to the fine canals surrounding it, and the port and it being perpetually thronged with vessels and merchants, merchandise and commodities, of all sorts, from all parts of Europe and of India. Canton may be properly said to be three cities, each surrounded with its own stately walls, yet so as the gates have communication; and the town makes a kind of square figure. In the neighbourhood is a large town, called Fo-shan, in which no less than 60,000 families are mostly employed in manufacturing goods for the city market. Canton is better filled with houses than most in China, having but few gardens in it. The streets are long and straight; and except some few of the finer sort, which are adorned with palaces, public buildings, triumphal arches, &c. narrow, but well paved and clean. The shops handsome, are furnished with all rich and curious wares, and mostly thronged with people. The harbour, and canals, are covered with an infinite number of boats, barges, &c. so close, they appear like a floating city. The number of people is computed at a million. To prevent disorders, every street has a gate at each end, shut up at night. The Mandarin governor has a noble palace, at one end of the most distant parts of the city, and seldom stirs out but with a retinue of at least 100 different officers, a number of insignia being carried before him; and he is borne in a high chair of state, like a throne, on 8 lusty fellows shoulders, a large canopy held over his head. He has under his jurisdiction 17 cities of the 2d and 3d rank. In the bay's mouth lies the peninsula of Macao.

CANTONS, the denomination given to the 13 United Provinces of Switzerland.

CANTZ, or CANTH, a town of Silesia, in Germany. It lies 7 miles W. of Breslaw, the capital. Lat. 51, 6, N. Long. 16, 40, E.

CANVEY, (isle of,) in Essex. It is Ptolomy's Connos, and the ancient Convenos, being 5 miles long from Hole-haven to Liegh, sometimes overflowed by the tide in the Thames, which river here is two miles over. It feeds vast numbers of sheep, that retreat at such times to the hills in it; and lies opposite to the anchoring-place, called the Hope, in that river. Here is a fair annually, on the 25th of June, for toys.

CANUBY, on the river Gambia, in the country of Tomany, Negroland, lies a few leagues from Yamamacunda. The port is on the S. side of the river, but the town for the same reasons as Yamamacunda, is transported over against it on the other side of the river.

CAOREI, in Latin, Caprulæ, a small and unhealthy city of Friuli, a province of Venice in Upper Italy. It stands on an island in one of the Lagoonas of the gulph of Venice, belonging to this republic, it is the see of a bishop, under the patriarch of Venice. It is 20 miles S. W. of Aquileia. Lat. 46, 5, N. Long. 13, 2, E.

CAPPACIO, an episcopal city of the Hither Principate and kingdom in Lower Italy. It lies 16 miles S. of Salerno. Lat. 40, 40, N. Long. 15, 20, E.

CAPALITA, a large town of N. America, and in the province of Guaxaca. The country round about it full of sheep, cattle, and excellent fruit.

CAPDENAC, a town of France, in Quercy, seated on a craggy rock, and almost surrounded by the river Lot.

C A

CAPE-ANGUILLE, the northernmost point of land in Newfoundland you can see after passing Cape-Ray. Between the two capes the land is low, and the shore forms a bay. Here a good salmon fishery, plenty of timber and conveniency for building ships.

CAPE-BRETON, a bourg of Maranim, a subdivision of Lannes in Gascony, in France; famous for its excellent wine.

CAPE. See Breton, Coast-castle, Verd, Points, Tres, and all that are not under cape under their proper names.

CAPEL, a large and flourishing borough, and noble district in the duchy of Sleswick, Denmark. It stands on the Sley. In its neighbourhood are taken the best herrings in this country.

CAPELLE, a town of Tierache, and government of Picardy, in Artois in France; it was formerly fortified, and taken by the Spaniards in 1636.

CAPERNAUM, one of the ten cities of Decapolis, once a famous mart of Palestine, on the river Jordan, and N. extremity of the lake of Tiberias, in the tribe of Naphtali; it was the place of our Saviour's habitation, but is now only a village of 8 or 10 fishermen's cottages.

CAPERQUIN, or CAPPAQUIN, a market-town belonging to the county of Waterford, and province of Munster in Ireland. It stands on the river called Black-water, opposite to Lismore, and 13 miles N. of Youghall. Lat. 52, 5, N. Long. 7, 50, W.

CAPIES, formerly a large town of Tripoli in Africa, on a bay of the same name, walled and defended by a stout fort. It made a considerable figure in the Roman times; but, being exposed to the Arabs, it is now poorly inhabited. The soil about it is very sandy and barren. Of the same name is a river in the kingdom of Tunis, which divides it from Tripoli.

CAPESTAN, a town of France, in Lower Languedoc, and in the diocese of Narbonne, near the river Aude and the royal canal. Long. 3, 5, E. Lat. 43, 35, N.

CAPITANATE, a part of the ancient Apulia, which see. It was called Apulia Daunia. Its present name it has from the Greeks, who sent to Apulia a governor called Catapan: one of whom made the Capitanate a distinct province. It belongs to the kingdom of Naples in Lower Italy, and is situated on the Adriatic sea to the N. E. It confines on the county of Molise to the N. W. and the Principate, Basilicate, and Bari, to the S. Its soil is dry and sandy, but breeds great numbers of cattle. In some parts on the coast they make salt. It has several lakes and considerable rivers.

CAPITANIA,

CAPITANIA, in geography, an appellation given to the 12 governments established by the Portuguese in the Brasils.

CAPO FINO, a large barren rock in the territory of the Genoese, with a castle on its eastern peak. Near it is a small harbour of the same name, 13 miles S. E. of Genoa.

CAPORN, (heath, or waste,) a royal forest in the capital bailiwick of Schaak, and circle of the latter name, in the kingdom of Prussia. In it are kept both rein-deer and roe-deer. In the middle of the road are 4 remarkable pillars, called those of the 4 brothers, on which probably were figures representing so many knights of the Teutonic order, who probably were murdered here.

CAPPADOCIA, in Asia, was known to the ancients by the name of Syria and Assyria. Whence it had its name Cappadocia is variously supposed. Anciently it comprised all that country between Mount Taurus and the Euxine sea; and was divided by the Persians into two satrapies or governments, by the Macedonians into two kingdoms, one called Cappadocia ad Taurum, (and Cappadocia Magna,) the other Cappadocia ad Pontum, or commonly Pontus. Cappadocia Magna, or Cappadocia properly so called, lies between 38 and 41 degrees of N. lat. and was bounded by Pontus N. Lycaronia, and part of Armenia Minor S. Galatia W. Euphrates and part of Armenia Minor E. The rivers the most noted were the Melas, Haylis, and the Iris, now Cafalmac.

This country produces excellent wines, and most fruits; and was formerly rich in mines of silver, brass, iron, alum, alabaster, crystal, jasper, and onyx-stone. Pliny adds, that in the reign of Nero was discovered here a stone hard as marble, and transparent, called Phengites. It abounds in horses, asses, and mules; and it is even said the mules there were not barren. The horses are still in great request. Some parts are very mountainous and barren, the Anti-taurus running through those provinces which borders on the two Armenias. In this part stands Mount Argæus, of such extraordinary height, that, some relate, one may see from its top both the Euxine and Mediterranean seas. As to the state of this nation in the early times we are quite in the dark. It was doubtless a province of the kingdom of Lydia, and after the overthrow of Cræsus passed to the Persians, to whom it paid tribute of 1500 horses, 2000 mules, and 50,000 sheep. The first king of Cappadocia we find in history is Pharnaces, a noble Persian, who, having saved Cyrus from a ravenous lion, running full speed against him hunting, was rewarded with his sister Atossa and kingdom of Cappadocia. This country, subdued by the Macedonians, was changed into a province, but restored to a kingdom by Ariathes III. and was so held till Ariathes VIII. the last of the royal race of Pharnaces. It was changed to a province under the Romans, and at the founding of the empire of Trebisonde, it fell to the Turks, who still possess it, and have divided it into 4 beglerbeglics, called Siwas, Trebisonde, Marasch, and Cogni. Cappadocia, after it had received Christianity, afforded very great and worthy men and martyrs, as well as some infamous and unworthy. Among the former are justly reckoned Gregory Nazianzen and Gregory Nyssen, and St. Basil; and among many martyrs of great faith and constancy, St. George, a tribune, or colonel of soldiers, under Dioclesian, was most celebrated in the churches both E. and W. and for that reason made patron of the order of the Garter by king Edward III.

CAPPADOCIA, in Egypt, is generally supposed by the Rabbins to be the Demyat, or Dami-etta, commonly confounded with Pelusium.

CAPPEL CUNNON, a village in Cardiganshire, in S. Wales, 15 miles E. by N. of Cardigan, with two fairs, on Holy Thursday, and the Thursday after Michaelmas, for cattle, horses, and sheep.

CAPRAOLA, an island in the sea of Tuscany, and Middle Division of Italy, 30 miles S. W. of Leghorn. Lat. 43. 15, N. Long. 11, 5, E.

CAPRARIA, one of the smaller Fortunate, or Canary Islands, said to abound with monstrous lizards.

CAPRI, (anciently Capræ), a city and island at the entrance of the gulph of Naples, E. long. 14, 50, N. Lat. 40, 45. The island is only 4 miles long, and 1 broad; the city is a bishop's see, situated on a high rock at the west end of the island. Capræ was anciently famous for the retreat of the emperor Tiberius for 7 years, during which he indulged himself in the most scandalous debaucheries. There stood a pharos on this island, which, a few days before the death of that emperor, was overthrown by an earthquake.

CAPSA, a large and strong town of Numidia, situated amidst vast deserts, waste, uncultivated, and full of serpents, where Jugurtha kept his treasure. In his time it was taken and rased by Marius, the Roman general, who put to death all the citizens capable of bearing arms, and sold the rest for slaves. It was, however, afterwards rebuilt by the Romans, and strongly fortified; but, on the decline of their empire, was taken and demolished a second time, by Occuba, a famous Arab general. The walls of the citadel are still remaining, and are monuments of the ancient glory and strength of Capsa. They are 24 fathoms in height, and 5 in thickness, built of large square stones, and have now acquired the solidity and firmness of a rock.

CAPUA, (New), a small city of Lavoro, in the kingdom of Naples, and Lower Division of Italy. It stands on the river Volturno; its fortifications fications are inconsiderable: but it has many fine houses and churches, with a noble cathedral, the see of an archbishop, who is the first in the kingdom. The ancient and highly celebrated Capua, which looked upon itself as equal to Rome and Carthage, stood 2 Italian miles from the present city; out of its ruins the town of St. Maria has been built: yet still about it are the ruins of many noble structures, particularly an amphitheatre. The adjacent country abounds so in wine and fruit, that it is easy to conceive how Hannibal's army became enervated by their staying here. Capua lies 6 miles E. of the sea, 15 N. E. of Naples, and 100 S. E. of Rome. Lat. 41, 20, N. Long. 15, 0, E.

CAPUL, one of the Philippine islands. Within the Indian Archipelago are Capul, and other little islands, which make the channel narrow, and the current so strong, that it sometimes hurries three-decked ships about 2 or 3 times. Capul is 3 leagues in compass, its soil fruitful, pleasant, and commodious. The Indians in it have good dwellings, after the manner of the Bisayas.

CARABAYA, a jurisdiction of Cusco, 60 leagues S. E. of it, in S. America. It extends above 50 leagues. The greatest part of it is cold; but its valleys are warm, producing cocoa, grain, fruit, pastures, &c. Here are several gold mines, particularly Aporama, the metal of which is 23 carats fine; and 2 famous lavatories. In this province is a river, which separates it from the mountains of the wild Indians, abounds greatly in gold, and from it the natives soon pay their tribute. Here are likewise silver mines.

CARACCAS, a district of Terra Firma in South America, belonging to the Spaniards. The coast is rocky and mountainous, interspersed with small fertile valleys; subjected at certain seasons of the year to dry N. W. winds, but blessed in general with a clear air and wholesome climate. A very great illicit trade is carried on by the English and Dutch with this province, notwithstanding all the vigilance of the Spaniards, who have Scouts perpetually employed, and breastworks raised in all the valleys. A vast number of cacao-trees are cultivated in this province; and it is reckoned that the crop of cacao produced here amounts to more than 300,000 fanegas of 110 pounds each. The country of Santa Fe consumes 20,000; Mexico a little more; the Canaries a small cargo; and Europe from 50 to 60,000. The cultivation of the plant employs 10 or 12,000 negroes. Such of them as have obtained their liberty have built a little town called Nirva, into which they will not admit any white people. The chief town is likewise called Caraccas, and is situated in N. lat. 10, 10. Dampier says it stands at a considerable distance from the sea; is large, wealthy, and populous; and extremely difficult of access, by reason of the steep and craggy hills over which an enemy must take his route. The commerce of this town, to which the bay of Guaira, at 2 leagues distance, serves for a harbour, was for a long time open to all the subjects of the Spanish monarchy, and is still so to the Americans; but the Europeans are not so well treated. In 1728 a company was formed at St. Sebastian, which obtained an exclusive right of maintaining connections with this part of the new world. Four or five ships, which they dispatch every year, sail from thence, but they return to Cadiz.

CARACHE, an island in Nigritia, Africa.

CARADIVA, an isle of Ceylon separated but by a river from that of Ourature, in the midst of which lies Fort Cays (or Ham's-Heel). From this isle the elephants are embarked by means of a bridge, and transported to Coromandel and Bengal; and it is supposed to produce the best saxe in the Indies.

CARADOCK, or CAER-CARADOCK, a large hill of Shropshire, at the conflux of the Clun and Teme, which was the scene of that memorable action between Ostorius the Roman, and Caractacus the Briton, as related by Tacitus. Several barrows and intrenchments to be seen there, and in the neighbourhood, are evident tokens of it.

CARAMANIA, a considerable province of Turkey, in Asia, th S. part of Natolia. Bajazet united it to his empire in 1488, and since that time it has remained in the possession of the Turks. Satalia was the capital, but is now much decayed.

CARAMANTA, a town of South America, and capital of a province of the same name in Terra Firma, and in the audience of Santa Fee. W. long. 72, 35. Lat. 5, 18. The province is extended on both sides the river Cauza: and is bounded on the N. by the district of Carthagena, on the E. by New Grenada, on the S. by Popayan, and on the W. by Popayan and the audience of Panama. It is a valley surrounded on every side by very high mountains.

CARANGAS, a jurisdiction of La Plata, in South America. It begins 70 leagues W. from Plata-city, extending about 50. The climate is cold, but abounds in cattle, and has a great number of silver-mines.

CARANSEBES, was formerly a fine and considerable city in the banat of Temeswaer, and circle on this side the Theiss, in Upper Hungary; it lies on the confluence of the Caran into the Temes, near the pass of the iron-gate into Transylvania. It was very flourishing, as being the great magazine for Turkish goods, carried from thence by land into the principality; but is now no more than a borough, between mountains.

CARASARA, a large town of Diarbekr Proper, in Asiatic Turkey, now subject to the Turks. In the neighbourhood are rooms cut into the solid rock, which at present serve only for shelter for those those free-booters that rob the caravans. It lies 72 miles W. of Mosul.

CARASU, a river of Natolia, which rises in Great Caramania, crosses part of Andula, and at length falls into the Mediterranean sea. The water of this river is so cold, that when Alexander the Great bathed in it, it threw him into a dangerous disease. The emperor Barbarossa was killed by it on his return from the Holy Land, in the year 1100.

CARASU MESTRO, anciently Nessus or Nessus, a river of Romania in European Turkey, which rising in Mount Rhodope, runs into the Ægean sea.

CARASUI, a famous lake in Bulgaria, and in the country of the Dobusian-Tartars. It is said to be 55 miles in circumference, and to contain several small islands. It is formed by a branch of the river Danube, not far from the place where it falls into the Black Sea.

CARAVACA, (St. Cruz de), a town of Murcia, in Spain. It lies on a little stream, which runs into the river Segura, and is walled and defended by a strong old castle. Here is a miraculous crucifix, to which there is a great resort of votaries. It contains 2000 families, in one parish, has 4 monasteries, and 2 nunneries.

CARBONARIA SYLVA, the ancient Carbonarian forest, was part of the Sylvan Arduenna, (the wood of Adenne,) in France, which extended (as we read in Cæsar,) from the Rhine to the Scheld, and the country of the Nervii, i. e. to Tournay.

CARBON, a considerable river of the Morea, in European Turkey. It was anciently called Alphæus.

CARCAL, on the coast of Coromandel, in the East-Indies, lies 2 leagues from Negapatan; where the Dutch erected a factory; but since they have been masters of Negapatan, the said factory has been disregarded. The chief commodities here are certain stuffs, especially those called Rambotyins.

CARCASSONE, a diocese of Lower Languedoc, in the government of the latter name, in France. It is a rich, though not a very fruitful country, on account of manufactures of all sorts of cloth, is full of mountains, hills, and little plains: and here one begins to see olive-trees. Of the same name is a very old town, its capital, which is divided by the river Aube into the Upper and Lower town. In the former is a strong castle, and the see of a bishop, under the metropolitan of Narbonne, with a diocese of 144 parishes, a yearly revenue of 35,000 livres; and he pays an assessment of 6000 florins to the court of Rome. The Lower town is new and well built, being the most regular city in all Languedoc. In this place are made fine and beautiful cloths. It lies 25 miles

W. of Narbonne. Lat. 43, 12, N. Long. 2, 25, E.

CARCELLA, a small but fortified place of Tavira, and province of Algarve, in Portugal. It stands on the sea, and has 600 inhabitants. Its castle is one of those borne in the king's arms.

CARCHEMISH, was a considerable town on the Mesopotamian side of the Euphrates, which Nebuchadnezzar took from Pharaoh Necho. It is thought the same with Circesium.

CARDANA, or CARDONA, a fine town of Catalonia, in Spain. It stands high upon the river Cardonero, is pretty well fortified, and the principal place of a duchy. It contains 400 families. In its neighbourhood is a profitable salt-mine, the mineral of which is transparent; the salt, when powdered is very white. It lies 40 miles N. W. of Barcelona. Lat. 41, 35, N. Long. 1, 24, E.

CARDIA, a city in the Thracian Chersonesus, was situated on the gulph of Melas, at the entrance into the peninsula, and according to Pliny was so called from its being built in the form of a heart, as the word in Greek implies.

CARDIFF, Glamorganshire, South Wales, is situated near the mouth of the river Taff or Tave, by which means the inhabitants are enabled to carry on a considerable trade, as the haven, which is very commodious, enables vessels to bring up their ladings. The town is large, well-built, and pretty populous. The remains of the old cathedral are very beautiful, in the Norman stile. The castle was built in the reign of William the Conqueror, by a Norman lord, who also fortified the town with a wall. In this castle died Robert, the eldest son of William I. after a tedious confinement. It sends a member to parliament, and is governed by the constable of the castle, or his deputy, 12 capital burgesses, a steward, town-clerk, and other inferior officers. The business of the county, such as the assizes, sessions, &c. is transacted here. Markets Wednesday and Saturday. Fairs June 29, Sept. 8, and Nov. 30.

CARDIGAN, in Latin, Abertievi, i. e. a town at the mouth of the river Tavy. It is the capital and assize town of the shire of the same name, in S. Wales, is large and populous, being governed by a mayor. Its river yields the best salmon in England; and over it is a good stone-bridge, leading into Pembroke-shire. This place drives a considerable trade in lead, &c. to Ireland and other parts. This, and 4 other boroughs in the county, elect a member to parliament. It lies 30 miles N. of Pembroke, and 170 W. of London. Its weekly market is on Saturday; and fairs on Feb. 13, April 5, Sept. 8, and Dec. 19. Lat. 52, 7. Long. 4, 40.

CARDIGAN-BAY, a very large gulph of the sea, in the shire of the same name in S. Wales; it bears far inland, stretching N. and S. from Cardigan-point to Barley-island, about 12 leagues due N. In it are several tide-havens, and places only fit for small vessels; and most of them are barred, with neither trade nor port: these are, King's-chapel, Aberarthy, Lanrusted, Aberdovy, Barmouth, and Landanog.

CARDIGANSHIRE, (South Wales), is bounded on the N. by a small part of Merionethshire and Montgomeryshire; on the E. by Radnorshire and Brecknockshire; on the S. by Caermarthenshire and Pembrokeshire; and on the W. by Cardigan-bay and St. George's-channel. It extends 42 miles in length, and 20 in breadth, and is divided into 5 hundreds, containing 6 market-towns, and 64 parishes. It lies in the diocese of St. David's, and sends two members to parliament, one for the county, and one for the town of Cardigan. The air is milder here than in most parts of Wales. To the S. and W. are plains fruitful in corn; but the N. and E. parts are a continued ridge of mountains, which, compared with the rest, are bleak and barren: yet in the worst parts of this county there are pastures in which are bred flocks of sheep, and large herds of cattle. Here is also plenty of tame and wild fowl: and near the rivers are found great numbers of otters. In the valleys are several lakes, and this country is well supplied with sea and river fish. However, coals and other fuel are scarce; but the mountains abound with veins of lead and silver ore; and their mines have been worked several times to an advantage. Its rivers are the Tave, Rydal, and the Istwyth.

CARDONNA. See CARDANA.

CARDUEL, a subdivision of Georgia in Asia; it lies between the Euxine and Caspian seas; and is partly possessed by the Turks, and partly by the Persians. The capital is Teflis.

CARELIA, a province conquered from Sweden by the Russians. It is also called the government of Wyburg, and consists of a part of the great duchy of Finland, which was ceded to the crown of Russia by that of Sweden. To it belongs a part of Finnish Carelia, also a part of Kexholm-fief; and, lastly, a part of Savolaxia. It is bounded on the S. by the gulph of Finland, and on the N. by Savolaxia.

CARENTAN, a town of Cotantin, in Lower Normandy, and government of the latter name, in France; it lies not far from the sea, on a bay of the English channel, at the mouth of a river of the same name; has some trade, as vessels of burthen can come up here at high tide. It has large suburbs, a strong castle, and walls surrounded with wet ditches. It has but one parish-church, a convent and hospital. The air here is unhealthy on account of the neighbouring morasses. It is situated 17 miles N. of Coutance. Lat. 49, 20, N. Long. 1, 16, W.

CARENTONE, one of the principal rivers of Normandy, in France, which rises in Lieven, and, after receiving the Cernant, falls into the Rille.

CARESEN, or CASSEEN, a sea-port town of Arabia Felix, in Asiatic Turkey, situated on the Indian ocean, 300 miles N. E. of Aden. Lat. 16, 5, N. Long. 52, 7, E.

CAREX, an island of Asia, in the Persian gulph, about 10 miles in circumference. It is 125 miles S. of Busserah.

CARFAGNANA, or CARFRIGNANO, (Valley of), a subdivision of the duchy of Modena, between it and Lucca, at the foot of the Apennines, in Upper Italy. It formerly belonged to the jurisdiction of Bologna; and still one part of it is subject to the great duke of Tuscany, and another to the republic of Lucca. The principal place in it, which is called Castell Nuovo di Carfagnana, is situated on the river Secchio.

CARGAPOL, a small town of a circle of the same name, in the province of Bielosersk, and government of Great Novogorod, in European Russia. It is situated on the lake Latfcha, 120 miles S. W. of Archangel. Lat. 63, 20, N. Long. 36, 15, E.

CARGUAIRASO, a mountain in the road between Guayaquil and Quito, in South America, and a little N. of Mount Chimberazo. It has several torrents and chasms in it; and one of the latter without water, which was occasioned by a violent earthquake.

CARIA, a province of Asiatic Turkey. It was anciently bounded on the N. by Ionia and the river Mæander; on the E. by Phrygia Major and Lycia, and on the S. and W. by the Ircarian sea.

CARIATI NUOVA, and CARIATI VECCHIA, two towns of the Hither Calabria, in the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy. They are 2 miles asunder. The New is on the gulph of Tarento, and the other S. W. of it. The latter is a bishopric, and also a principality belonging to the Spinelli family; 19 miles N. of San Severino. Lat. 39, 29, N. Long. 17, 20, E.

CARRIBEE ISLANDS, a cluster of islands situated in the Atlantic ocean, between 59 and 63 degrees of W. longitude, and between 11 and 18 degrees of N. latitude. They lie in the form of a bow or semicircle, stretching almost from the coast of Florida N. to near the river Oroonoke. Those that lie nearest the E. have been called the Windward Islands, the others the Leeward, on account of the winds blowing generally from the eastern point in those quarters. Abbé Raynal conjectures them to be the tops of very high mountains, formerly belonging to the continent, which have been changed into islands by some revolution that has laid laid the flat country under water. The direction of the Caribbee islands, beginning from Tobago, is nearly N. and N. N. W. This direction is continued, forming a line somewhat curved towards the N. W. and ending at Antigua. In this place the line becomes at once curved; and, extending itself in a straight direction to the W. and N. W. meets in its course with Porto Rico, St. Domingo, and Cuba, known by the name of the Leeward Islands, which are separated from each other by channels of various breadths. Some of these are 6, others 15 or 20 leagues broad; but in all of them the soundings are from 100 to 120 or 150 fathoms. Between Granada and St. Vincent's there is also a small archipelago of 30 leagues, in which the soundings are not above 10 fathoms. The mountains in the Caribbee islands run in the same direction as the islands themselves. The direction is so regular, that if we were to consider the tops of these mountains only, independent of their bases, they might be looked upon as a chain of hills belonging to the continent, of which Martinico would be the most north-westerly promontory. The springs of water which flow from the mountains in the Windward Islands, run all in the western parts of these islands. The whole eastern coast is without any running water.

The soil of the Caribbees consists mostly of a layer of clay or gravel of different thickness; under which is a bed of stone or rock. The nature of some of those soils is better adapted to vegetables than others. In those places where the clay is drier and more friable, and mixes with the leaves and remains of plants, a layer of earth is formed of greater depth than where the clay is moister. The sand or gravel has different properties, according to its peculiar nature; wherever it is less hard, less compact, and less porous, small pieces separate themselves from it, which, though dry, preserve a certain degree of coolness useful to vegetation. This soil is called in America, a pumice-stone soil. Wherever the clay and gravel do not go through such modifications, the soil becomes barren, as soon as the layer formed by the decomposition of the original plants is destroyed.

We need not here recount the particulars already mentioned under the article America, concerning the indolent and savage life of the inhabitants of these islands, but shall here only observe, that by a treaty concluded in January 1660, between the French and English, the Caribs were confined to the islands of St. Vincent's and Dominica, where all the scattered body of this people were united, and at that time did not exceed in number 6000 men.

As the Caribbee islands are all between the tropics, their inhabitants are exposed, allowing for the varieties resulting from difference of situation and soil, to a perpetual heat, which generally increases from the rising of the sun till an hour after noon, and then declines in proportion as the sun declines. The variations of the temperature of the air seem to depend rather on the wind than on the changes of the seasons. In those places where the wind does not blow, the air is excessively hot, and none but the easterly winds contribute to temper and refresh it. The branches of the trees, exposed to the influence of the latter, are forced round towards the west; but their roots are stronger, and more extended under the ground, towards the east than towards the west; and hence they are easily thrown down by strong west winds or hurricanes from that quarter. The easterly wind is scarce felt in the Caribbee islands before 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning, increases in proportion as the sun rises above the horizon, and decreases as it declines.

The rain also contributes to the temperature of the Caribbee islands, though not equally in them all. In those places where the easterly wind meets with nothing to oppose its progress, it dispels the clouds as they begin to rise, and causes them to break either in the woods or upon the mountains. But whenever the storms are too violent, or the blowing of the easterly wind is interrupted by the changeable and temporary effect of the southerly and westerly ones, it then begins to rain. In the other Caribbee islands, where this wind does not generally blow, the rains are so frequent and plentiful, especially in the winter season, which lasts from the middle of July to the middle of October, that, according to the most accurate observations, as much rain falls in one week as in our climates in a year. Instead of all those mild refreshing showers which fall in the European climates, the rains of the Caribbee islands are torrents, the sound of which might be mistaken for hail, were not that almost totally unknown under so burning a sky. These showers indeed refresh the air; but they occasion a dampness, the effects of which are not less disagreeable than fatal. The dead must be interred within a few hours after they have expired. Meat will not keep sweet above 24 hours. The fruits decay, whether they are gathered ripe or before their maturity. The bread must be made into biscuits, to prevent its growing mouldy. Common wines turn sour, and iron turns rusty, in a day's time. The seeds can only be preserved by constant attendance and care, till the proper season returns for sowing them.

When the Caribbee islands were first discovered, the corn that was conveyed there for the support of the Europeans, was so soon damaged, that it became necessary to send it out in the ears. This necessary precaution so much enhanced the price of it, it, that few were able to purchase it. Flour was then substituted in lieu of corn; which lowered indeed the expences of transport, but had this inconvenience, that it was sooner damaged. It was imagined by a merchant, that if the flour were entirely separated from the bran, it would have the double advantage of being cheaper, and keeping longer. He caused it therefore to be sifted, and put the finest flour into strong casks, and beat it close together with iron hammers, till it became so close a body that the air could scarcely penetrate it. This method was found to answer the purpose; and it may be kept for six months, a year, or longer, according to the degree of care taken in the preparation.

However troublesome these effects of the rains may be, it is attended with some others still more formidable: namely, frequent and dreadful earthquakes. Among the various shocks to which the Caribbee islands are exposed from the fury of the boisterous ocean, there is one distinguished by the name of raz de marée, or whirlpool. It constantly happens, once, twice, or thrice, from July to October, and always on the western coasts, because it takes place after the time of the westerly or southerly winds, or while they blow. The waves, which at a distance seem to advance gently within 400 or 500 yards, suddenly swell against the shore, as if acted upon in an oblique direction by some superior force, and break with the greatest impetuosity. The ships which are then upon the coast, or in the roads beyond it, unable either to keep their anchors, or to put to sea, are dashed to pieces against the land, and all on board most commonly perish. The hurricane is another terrible phenomenon in these islands, by which incredible damage is occasioned; but happily it occurs not often.

The produce of the Caribbee islands is exceedingly valuable to the Europeans, consisting of sugar, rum, molasses, indigo, &c. a particular account of which is given under the names of the respective islands as they occur in the order of the alphabet; and the following are those distinguished under this title; viz. St. Cruz, Anegada, Sombrero, Anguilla, St. Martin, St. Bartholomew, Barbuda, Saba, Eustatia, St. Christopher, Nevis, Antigua, Montserrat, Guadaloupe, Desiada, Mariagalante, Dominica, Martinico, St. Vincent, Barbadoes, and Grenada.

CARIBBIANA, the N. E. coast of Terra Firma, in South America. It has since been called Paria, and New Andalusia.

CARIGNAN, formerly Yvoy, Ipsch, in Latin, Epesium, or Eposium, a town belonging to the prévôté of the same name, in French Barrois; a subdivision of the government of Metz, in France.

CARIGNANO, a small, but fortified town, belonging to a principality of the same name in Pie-mont Proper, in Upper Italy. It stands on the Po, 7 miles S. of Turin. Lat. 44, 3, N. Long. 7, 25, E.

C A

CARINOLA, a little episcopal city of the Lavoro, a province of the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy. It is unhealthy, and lies 20 miles N. of the city of Naples. Lat. 41, 20, N. Long. 15, 10, E.

CARINTHIA, (duchy of,) belonging to the circle of Austria, in Germany. It is bounded on the N. by the archbishopric of Salzburg and Stiria, by part of the latter on the E. by the former and bishopric of Brixen on the W. and by Carniola and Friuli on the S. The country is mountainous and cold, yet has corn enough, but is supplied with wine by its neighbours. The Drave runs a cross it, and receives several rivers abounding with fish, as do its many lakes. The highest mountains are St. Ulrich's, St. Helen's, and St. Laurence's. It is divided into Upper and Lower Carinthia; the latter belonging to the house of Austria, and the former to the archbishop of Salzburg and bishop of Bamberg.

CARIPOUS, a people of S. America, inhabiting a country to the N. of the river of the Amazons. They are brisk, bold, and courageous, and very well disposed, considering they are savages.

CARISBROOK CASTLE, Isle of Wight, S. of Newport, the seat of the governor of the island, was built by the Saxons, and had once a monastery. Charles I. was kept a prisoner here 13 months. Here is a well that supplies the castle with water, 72 yards deep; and the water is drawn up by a large wheel turned by an ass, as a spit is by a dog. There was one in 1747 that had been 40 years in that service.

CARISTO, or CASTEL-ROSSO, anciently Carystus, an episcopal city of Negropont, one of the Archipelago islands, in European Turkey. It lies at the foot of Mount Oche, on the S. E. coast of the island, and is a populous place, with a commodious harbour. Not far from it were anciently marble quarries, where was found also amianthus or asbestos. It lies opposite to Andros.

About 4 or 5 miles to the N. E. is Cape d'Oro, or Figera, anciently Caphareum Pomontorium, quite surrounded with rocks.

CARLAT, a town, and the principal place of Carlates, a viscounty in Upper Auvergne, belonging to the prince of Monaco, and in the government of Auvergne, in France. It had formerly a strong castle.

CARLBERG, formerly Magnusberg, a fine and royal pleasure-house in Uplandia, in Sweden Proper, with gardens well laid out, and some pretty buildings.

It lies about a quarter of a mile to the west-ward of Nordermalm, on an arm of the Malar-lake.

Queen

C A

Queen Ulrica Eleanora, wife of Charles XI. erected an useful foundation here, for bringing up some orphans. Near the entrance into the castle is a marble statue of king Frederic.

In the adjacent little park is the fine house of Danienburg, upon an eminence.

CARLEBY, GAMLA, or OLD CARLEBY, a sea-town on the Bothnic gulph, in the S. division of Uleaborg-fief, and East Bothnia, in Finland Proper, a province of Sweden. It stands in a fruitful plain, and has a good harbour. Here ship-building is profitably carried on, and a considerable trade in tar. It is the 72d town in the order of the general diet, and about 70 miles from Ula to the S.

In spring and autumn, the peasants of these parts make salt from the sea-water, which by pouring a little four milk upon it in the refining-pan, turns immediately from a grey tinge to a colour as white as snow.

CARLEBY, NY, or NEW CARLEBY, another sea-town on the Bothnic gulph, in the N. division of Korsholm-fief, belonging to the same province and kingdom last mentioned. It stands on the river Lappojocki, which falls into the sea about a mile from the town. Here is also a good harbour, and a profitable trade in tar carried on. It is the 71st town in the general diet, and lies about 84 miles S. of Ula.

CARLEBY-LANGA, one of the largest villages in all Sweden, as the latter part of its name imports. It lies in Scamborg territory, in W. Gothland. Ragwald Knaphofde, king of the W. Goths, was slain in a famous battle fought here in the year 1132, and was buried near this place; whose grave-hillock, as well as many other tumuli, are still to be seen on the field.

CARLENTINI, a small city and fortrefs of the Val di Noto, in the island of Sicily, and Middle Division of Italy. It stands high, near Lentini, and is strong both by nature and art, on the road between Catana and Syracuse, about 30 miles from each.

CARLEON. See CAERLEON.

CARL-GUSTAVUS-STADT. See ESCHILSTUNA.

CARLINGFORD, a populous, though not large town, of Louth, and province of Ulster, in Ireland. It has a well-frequented market, having some merchants who have ships built here, which are employed in the coal-trade to Whitehaven, as also in the fishery. It sends 2 members to the Irish parliament.

At the mouth of the Newry, and on the S. side, is a large bay of the same name with the town, which is one of the best harbours in Ireland, where the road is exceeding good quite to the sea, as is also the harbour before the town. The river, though small, and not navigable far inland, is famous for being an important pass between the southern and northern counties, by a bridge and long narrow causey, over a great and unpassable bog. It lies 26 miles N. of Drogheda. Lat. 54. 5. N. Long. 6. 36. W.

CARLISLE, in Cumberland, 80 miles from Berwick, and 301 miles from London, an ancient city, said to have been founded by Luil, a petty king of the county, long before the Romans came into this island. They had a station here, but after their departure it was ruined by the Caledonians, &c. In 680, Egfrid, king of Northumberland, rebuilt and walled it round. It was again so shattered by the Danes and Norwegians, in the 8th and 9th centuries, that it lay in ruins for about 200 years, till William Rufus ordered the wall and castle to be repaired. Henry I. augmented its fortifications, and made it the see of a bishop. It was often besieged by the Scots, who took it in the reign of Stephen, and again in that of John; but Henry II. and III. recovered it. In 1292 it was burnt down, together with the cathedral and suburbs, to the number of 1300 houses. It has been a borough from the reign of Richard I. Edward I. held a parliament here. Edward II. granted it the royalty of Eden-water, in fee farm at 80l. a year, with liberty to build on the waste, and exemption from toll. It had charters from several succeeding kings, by some of which they are freed from that rent, and are granted the fishery in the river, with large commons of pasture, right of fairs and markets, with the manor, &c.

Its walls and castle were well repaired by Richard III. Henry VIII. built a strong citadel. It was taken by the rebels in 1745. It is situated between the conflux of 3 fine rivers, abounding with fish, viz. the Eden on the N. over which it has a bridge that is but 6 miles from Scotland, the Petteril on the E. and Caude on the W. It is a sea-port, though without ships or merchants, and is the key of England on the W. sea, which is here called the Solway-frith, as Berwick on Tweed is upon the E. sea. It is a wealthy, populous place, with well built houses and 3 gates in the walls, which are about 1 mile in compass, and broad enough for 3 men to walk on them a-breadth.

The revenues of the city are about 500l. a year, and the inhabitants of the city and suburbs are about 2000. It trades chiefly in fustians; is governed by a mayor, 12 aldermen, 24 common-councilmen, a sheriff, 2 bailiffs, &c. and the assizes and sessions are commonly held here. Its markets are on Wednesday and Saturday, and fairs on August 26, and September 19, and on the 1st and 2d Saturday after October 10. It has but 2 parish churches, one of which which stands in the body of the cathedral, which is in the middle of the city, inclosed by a wall. The west part of the cathedral suffered much during the civil wars, when the city was besieged. The Pic's wall, built by Severus, begins just below this town, and crosses this part of the island to New-castle upon Tyne. In 1771 and 1778 great damage was done here by floods.

CARLOS, (St.) isle of. See EASTER ISLE.

CARLOS, in the province of Veragua, in the audience of Guatemala, in New Spain, is a town on the South Sea coast, 45 miles S. W. from Santa Fé, in a large bay.

CARLOWITZ, a military town of the generalie of Slavonia in Hungarian Illyrium, where the Greek archbishop of Slavonia has his residence: it is famous not only for the peace concluded here in 1699, between the Turks and Imperialists, but for its red wine. It lies on the W. side of the Danube, 35 miles N. W. of Belgrade. Lat. 45, 25, N. Long. 20, 45, E.

CARLSBADT, (i. e. Charles' bath,) in Bohemia, 5 miles E. of Elnbogen, 65 W. of Prague, by Hubner called a royal city, has the river Toppel running through it, and dividing it into 2 parts. In 1604 it was almost burnt down. It had once a castle; but it is a dirty place, inhabited chiefly by armourers and other artificers in iron, who work vastly cheap and neat. It is however noted for its baths and medicinal waters, of which are two sorts, the Sproudel and the Muhlbadt, the first of which are boiling hot, the latter a little more than lukewarm. They derive their source from the middle of a river, formed by torrents from the neighbouring mountains, whose waters are extremely cold; yet the mineral waters are seen to smoke in the midst of it, and when they come into the fountains in town are excessive hot, and smell strong of minerals. They are both drank and bathed in, sometimes at the same time. They take name from emperor Charles IV. They are recommended particularly for the gravel and barrenness of women. But the method of using them is very disagreeable; for however hot the weather, one is to be shut up in a room heated with a stove, and take off to the equality of 30 chocolate cups, hotter than the waters of the King's or Queen's bath of our Bath, walking about much, and sweating great drops. People seldom stir out after this till 3 or 4 hours, and must walk all the rest of the day, to prevent sleeping, which after dinner is dangerous. These baths are frequented by numbers of foreigners, particularly the nobility and gentry of Austria, Bohemia, &c. And the Czar Peter the Great, took the waters here in September 1711 with good success. So that at the season Carlsbadt is superior to many great towns.

C A

CARLSCROON, or CARLSKRONA, in Latin, Caroli Corona, a fine staple town of Blekingia, in S. Gothland in Sweden, situated on the Baltic. Next to Stockholm, this is reckoned among the best towns in the kingdom. Part of it lies on the isle of Biorkholm, where is a lazaretto for sailors, and on Stubholm, where is the arsenal, &c. and on the wharf, where the fleet lies.

The small and great islands round the town, with the forests of oak, beech, and birch, render the situation very pleasant. It has 3 churches; the number of its inhabitants is computed at 5000. Here is a royal college of admiralty, also a dock which is separated from the town by a high stone-wall. The provincial governor resides here. The harbour lying between Asp-oe and Stork-oe, is so commodious, that the whole royal fleet may lie quite secure in it, and its entrance is defended by the citadel of Kongsholm and Drottningkiar. The dock is particularly remarkable; it is a large excavation made by art in a rock, about 80 feet deep, and from 300 to 450 feet long, where the royal fleet lies. It has a large opening towards the sea for the greatest ship of war to come in. It is shut up by 2 water-gates, at which time the cavity may be drained in 24 hours, and left a quite dry dock for repairing or careening any ship. When she is to come out again, the water may be let in through 2 openings in the said water-gates; before which is an engine to hinder the waves of the sea from beating against them with all their force. In 1779, a grand bason was formed here by Mr. Tunberg, reckoned one of the finest performances of the age. It contains 24 places in which ships may not only be kept dry, but may be taken out by letting in water at any time, which may be done with any one separately. This town is the 10th in the diet. Lat. 56, 20, N. Long. 15, 31, E.

CARLSBAGEN, a famous sluice finished in 1752, near Trolhatta, in the Gothic Elbe, in Sweden.

CARLSHAMN, in Latin, Caroli Portus, a staple town in the district of Brackne, and province of Blekingia, in S. Gothland, in Sweden. It was formerly called Christianshamn. On a rock, near the mouth of the river, is a fort which defends both the town and its commodious harbour.

Here are 2 churches, a woollen manufactory, and a wharf for shipping, and without the town is a copper-work. The number of its inhabitants may amount to above 1200. It is the 19th town in the general diet, and lies between Carlscroon and Ahuys, almost equally distant from each.

CARLINSEL, the name of 2 islands of Gothlandia, belonging to E. Gothland, in Sweden, where formerly was dug the marble with which all the churches of Gothland have been built. They are about a mile from the main-land.

CARLS-

C A

CARLSRUHE, a new town of the marquise of Baden, in Suabia, in Germany; where is a castle or palace, with spacious walks, gardens, &c. The whole is very beautifully disposed: though all the houses of the town as well as the Margrave's, are only of timber.

CARL TADT, in Latin, Carolo stadium, an inland town of Mellan district, and province of Wermelandia, in W. Gothland, in Sweden. It lies very commodiously, on the island Twingwalla, where the Clara-elbe empties itself into the Wener. It has upwards of 800 inhabitants, a superintendent, and a manufactory of cloth and other woollen stuffs, a good steel-yard, from which great quantities of iron are annually exported, together with a brisk trade. Not far from the town is a medicinal spring. Lat. 59, 44, N. Long. 13, 37, E.

CARLSTADT, commonly CARSTADT, a pretty town of the bishopric of Wurtzburg, in Franconia, in Germany. It lies on the river Mayne, 14 miles N. of Wurtzburg city. Lat. 50, 5, N. Long. 16, 5, E.

CARLSTAT, in Bremen, is rather a fortress than a town, on the river Geeste; which having filled its ditches, falls into the Weser, 31 miles N. W. of Bremen. It was founded by Charles king of Sweden, taken by the duke of Brunswick in 1676, and restored by the treaty of Fountainbleau 1679.

CARLSTEN, a considerable and secure fortress in the prefecture of Bahusia, and province of West Gothland, in Sweden. It stands on a high mountain, near Marstrand, and has a beautiful church. In 1719 the Danish admiral, Tordenskiold, took it, after having by a brisk fire from his ships made himself master of the neighbouring forts of Helvigsholm and Malapart, together with the town.

CARLSWERD, a fortress on Ekeholm, near Slitehamn, which is the best and largest harbour of all Gothlandia, a province of East Gothland, in Sweden.

CARLTON, in Norfolk, called also East-Carlton, or Carleton-Rode, lies N. E. of Old and New Buckenham. The town of Yarmouth being obliged to furnish the king with 100 herring pies, as soon as they came in season, sends them by the sheriffs of Norwich to the lord of this manor, who by the tenure, must carry them to the king.

CARMAGNOLE, a fortified town of the marquise of Saluzzo, a subdivision of Piemont, in Upper Italy. It has also a citadel, and lies on the Po, 14 miles S. of Turin. Lat. 44, 45, N. Long. 7, 36, E.

CARMANIA, in Persia, anciently divided into Carmania the Desert, and Carmania Proper. Carmania the Desert is bounded on the N. by Parthia,

C A

W. by Persis, E. by Drangiana, S. by Carmania Proper. Carmania Proper hath S. the Indian ocean, W. Persis and the gulph of Persia, E. Gedrosia, and N. Carmania the Desert. It contains the modern provinces of Chirman and Ormas.

CARMARTHEN. See CAERMARTHEN.

CARMEL, (Mount,) a mountain of Gallilee, in Palestine, in Asia. It lies on the Mediterranean, 12 miles W. of Nazareth. It is detached from the other mountains, is 30 miles in circuit, and surrounded with a great number of little hills and vallies, which are always green. Here is a Carmelite monastery.

Of the same name, or Rio de Carmel, is one of the two most considerable rivers of California, in New Mexico, in N. America.

CARMONA, city of, in Andalusia, in Spain. It is a small, but very old place, situated upon a hill, anciently called Carmo. The neighbouring land is uncommonly fruitful, especially in grain; it lies 19 miles E. of Seville. Lat. 37, 26, N. Long. 5, 36, W.

CARNAPOLE, or CARNOPOLY, a town of Marta, one of the provinces of the Malabar coast, in Asia. It lies on the S. part of the country, 15 miles N. of Coulan. The Dutch have a fort and small factory here.

CARNERO, a name given to that part of the gulph of Venice, which extends from the western coast of Istria to the island of Grossa, and the coast of Morlachia.

CARNIOLA (Duchy), by the Germans called Crain, in Austria, has Carinthia and part of Styria N. Istria and Gulph of Trieste S. the Alps, part of the Venetian dominions, and part of Carinthia W. and Slavonia and Croatia E. It is about 110 miles E. and W. and 45 from S. to N. containing 21 cities, 36 market-towns, 254 castles, and 4000 villages. It is a rocky mountainous tract, but has many large pleasant valleys, abounding with wine, oil, and corn. It takes name from the Carni, a branch of ancient Scythians. The modern inhabitants are a mixture of Germans, Italians, Slavonians; and the country people speak a mixt Slavonic, though in towns High-Dutch. They are all Roman Catholics. It has many good rivers, of which the chief are the Lauback, Save, and Gurck. To pass by its ancient history, the emperor Frederic, father of Maximilian, in 1452, erected it into a duchy, and gave it to the dukes of Austria-Habsburg, in whose right the present emperor now enjoys it. It is unequally divided into 4 parts, Carniola Proper, sub-divided into Higher and Lower; the Windischmarck, which is to E. of Lower Carniola and to W. of Croatia; and the little county of Goritz, or Goricia, of which Gradisca was formerly a part. To these some add Aquileia, Trieste, and St. Veit, because they belong also to the house of Austria; whereas only Carniola is in Germany, but these in Italy. The most remarkable places are Laubach, Crainburg, and Aversberg, in Carniola Proper; Metling and Rudolphus-Werd in the Windischmarck; Goritz, capital of its county; Gradiſch, capital also of its county.

and

CARNION, a place several times mentioned in the Maccabees, was a strong city, and difficult of access, in Gilead, Judæa.

CAROLINA, (North and South), Part of that vast track of land formerly called Florida, bounded on the N. by Virginia, on the S. by Georgia, on the W. by the Mississippi and Louisiana, and on the E. by the Atlantic ocean. It lies between the lat. of 33 and 37. Long. 76 and 91; and 700 miles long, and 330 broad. It is now divided into North and South Carolina.—Division of the province of South Carolina into districts:—Charles-town district includes all places between the N. branch of Santee river and Combahee-river and the sea, including the islands by a line drawn from Nelson's Ferry directly towards Marr's Bluff, on Savannah-river, until it intersects the swamp at the head of the S. branch of Combahee-river; Beaufort district includes all places to the southward of Combahee-river and the swamp aforesaid, between the sea, including the islands, and the said line to be continued from the main swamp aforesaid to Mathews's Bluff on Savannah-river; Orangeburgh district includes all places between Savannah, Santee, Congaree, and Broad rivers, the same line from Nelson's Ferry to Mathews's Bluff, and a direct line to be run from Silver Bluff, on Savannah river, to the mouth of Rocky-creek, on Saluda-river, and thence in the same course to Broad-river; George-town district includes all places between Santee-river aforesaid, the sea, and the line which divides the parishes of St. Mark from the parish of Prince-Frederic, which is continued in the same course across Pedee to the North-Carolina boundary; Camden district is bounded by the said line which divides the parishes of St. Mark and Prince Frederic, Santee, Congaree, and Broad rivers, and by a north-west line from the northernmost corner of Williamburgh townships to Lynch's creek, and from thence by that creek, and a line drawn from the head of that creek upon a course north, 30 degrees west, until it intersects the provincial line; Cheraws district is bounded by the said last-mentioned line, the provincial boundary, and the line dividing St. Mark's and Prince Frederic's parishes, which is continued until it intersects the northern provincial line. Ninety-six district extends to all other parts of the province not already described.

In these districts are the following counties: in South Carolina.—Charles-town, Berkeley, Granville, Craven, Colleton, Orangeburgh, Cheraws, Ninety-six, Camden, Saluda, New District. North Carolina is divided into districts as follows: Wilmington, which contains the counties of New-Hanover, Brunswick, Bladen, Onslow, Duplin, and Cumberland. Newbern contains the counties of Craven, Carteret, Beaufort, Hyde, Dobbs, and Pitt. Edenton contains the counties of Chowan, Perquimons, Pasquotank, Currituck, Bertie, Tyrrel, and Hertford. Halifax contains the counties of Northampton, Edgecombe, Bute, and Johnston. Hillsborough contains the counties of Orange, Granville, Chatham, and Wake. Salisbury contains the counties of Rowan, Mecklenburgh, Anson, Tryon, Surry, and Guildford.

Formerly the coast of North America was all called Virginia. The province properly so called, with Maryland and the Carolinas, was known by the name of South Virginia. By the Spaniards it was considered as part of Florida, which country they would have to extend from New Mexico to the Atlantic Ocean. They first discovered this large country; and, by their inhumanity to the natives, lost it. The Spaniards, no more than the French, paid any attention to this fine country, and left it to the enterprising English, who, in sir Walter Raleigh's time projected settlements there; yet, through some unaccountable caprice, it was not till the reign of Charles II. in 1633, that we entertained any formal notions of settling the country. In that year the lords Clarendon, Albemarle, Craven, Berkely, Ashley afterwards Shaftsbury, sir George Carteret, sir William Berkeley, and sir George Colleton, from all which the different counties, rivers, towns, &c. were called, obtained a charter for the property and jurisdiction of that country, from the 31st degree of N. latitude, to the 36th; and being invested with full power to settle and govern the country, they had a model of a constitution framed, and by a body of fundamental laws compiled by that famous philosopher, Mr. Lock. On this plan the proprietors stood in the place of the king, gave their assent or negative to all laws, appointed all officers, and bestowed all titles of dignity. In his turn, one always acted for the rest. In the province they appointed two other branches, in a good measure analogous to the legislature in England. They made three ranks, or rather classes, of nobility. The lowest was composed of those whom they called barons, and to whom they made grants of 12,000 acres of land. The next order had 24,000 acres, or two baronies, with the title of cashires, answering to our earls. The third had two cashireships, or 48,000 acres, and were called landgraves, analogous to dukes. This body formed the Upper-house, whose lands were not alienable by parcels: the Lower-house was formed of representatives from the several towns and counties. But the whole was not called, as in the other plantation, an assembly, but a parliament. They began their first settlement between the two navigable rivers, called Ashley and Cowpar, and laid the foundation of the capital city, called Charles-town, in honour of king Charles. They expended about 12,000*l.* in the first settlement; and observed what advantages other colonies derived from opening an harbour for refugees of all persuasions, they by doing so brought over a great number of dissenters, over whom the then government held a more severe hand than was consistent with the rules of true policy. These, however wise appointments, were in a manner frustrated by the disputes between the churchmen and dissenters, and also by violent oppressions over the Indians, which caused two destructive wars with them, in which they conquered those natives, as far as to the Apalachian mountains. The province then, by an act of parliament in England, was redemanded, and put under the protection of the crown; except the eighth part of the earl of Granville, which he reserved, the other proprietors accepting of about 24,000*l.* Carolina was divided into two distinct governments, South and North Carolina, in 1728; and in a little time firm peace was concluded between the English and the neighbouring Indians, the Cherokees and the Catambas, and since that time it has advanced with an astonishing rapidity. This is the only one of the provinces on the continent that is subject to hurricanes. The country where they have not cleared, is, in a manner, one forest of all kind of trees. But its chief produce, the beavers of Carolina, are destroyed here, as they are in Canada and elsewhere, by the encouragement the Indians received to kill them. As the land abounds with natural manure, or nitre, so it needs no cultivation in this respect; and what is strange, in its worst lands indigo grows to a great advantage. Their ground does not answer so well for wheat, which they are supplied with from New-York and Pennsylvania, in exchange for their fine rice, in which they are unrivalled.

The climate of these provinces is nearly alike, and much the same as that of Virginia; excepting that the summers are longer, and more intensely hot, and the winters shorter and milder; so that, though now and then a sudden cold comes on, the frosts are never strong enough to resist the noon-day warmth. The soil is various; near the sea it is marshy, lying low; and, indeed, the lands of Carolina are a perfect plain for 80 miles within land, scarcely a pebble being to be found; however, in proportion to the distance from the sea, their fertility increases, till they are exceeded by none, either for that or picturesque beauty. The chief productions are, indigo, olive, vine, hickory, oak, walnut, orange, citron, pine, cyprès, sassafras, cassia, and white mulberry trees for silk-worms:

farfaparilla, and pines yielding rosin, turpentine, tar, and pitch; also a tree distilling an oil very efficacious in the cure of wounds, and another yielding a balm nearly equal to that of Mecca; rice, tobacco, wheat, Indian-corn, barley, oats, pease, beans, hemp, flax, and cotton; great quantities of honey, of which are made excellent spirits, and mead as good as Malaga sack. The great staple commodities are indigo, rice, and produce of the pine. Indigo and rice S. Carolina has to herself; and, taking in N. Carolina, these two yield more pitch and tar than all the rest of the colonies. Rice formed once the staple of this province; and makes the greatest part of the food of all ranks of people in the southern parts of the new world. In the northern it is not so much in request; and this one branch is computed to be worth 150,000*l.* a year. It is paid great attention to in S. Carolina, where it is cultivated to a very considerable advantage, particularly at Charles-town. There are in the two provinces which compose Carolina, the following navigable rivers, and innumerable smaller ones; viz. Roanoke or Albemarle, Pamlico, Neus, Cape Fear or Clarendon, in N. Carolina; Pedee, Santee, in S. Carolina; all which, though swarming with fish, abound with troublesome cataracts, which impede navigation.

Along all these countries, the Atlantic Ocean itself is so shallow near the eastern coasts, that no large ships can approach them, but at a few places. In this division are the following capes: Hatteras, Look-out, and Fear. There are but few harbours, viz. Roanoke, and Pamlico, in North Carolina; Winyaw or George-town, Charles-town, and Port-Royal, in South Carolina; all whose rivers rise in the Apalachian mountains, and run into the Atlantic Ocean. On the back parts are the Cherokees, Yafous, Mobile, Apalachicola, Pearl rivers, &c. the two first of which fall into the Mississippi-river, the others into the Gulph of Mexico. North Carolina is not so wealthy as South, but it has more white people. Edenton was the capital of North Carolina, but it is now only a village; from these colonies some samples of silk have been produced, equal to the Italian; but the sudden changes from heat to cold, which sometimes happen here, disagree with the worms. The making of wine has been of late years introduced; and, with proper management, it is thought, cannot but succeed.

The value of the exports amounted, for some years past, to near half a million sterling annually. In the year 1734, the value of the exports was computed at little more than 100,000*l.* sterling. The number of vessels cleared out at the custom-house, in Charles-town, in 1772, was 431; in 1773, 507. In 1734, the number of vessels cleared out was 209; and in 1736, 217. In the year 1770, the number of dwelling-houses in Charles-town was 1292. In the same year, the number of white inhabitants, in Charles-town, was 5030. The number of negro and other slaves was 6276; free negroes, mulattoes, &c. 24. Total, 6300. The number of men in Charles town, (December, 1773,) on the militia muster-roll, was upwards of 1400, and the number of inhabitants is computed at 14,000. The number of men on the several militia muster-rolls throughout the province, in 1773, was about 13,000; and the total number of white inhabitants calculated to amount to about 65,000. In 1770 the number of negro and other slaves, exclusive of those in Charles-town, amounted to 75,452; free negroes, &c. 135; great numbers have been since imported, and the whole number of negroes, mulattoes, &c. now in the province, is estimated to be upwards of 120,000. The number computed by the Congress, in 1775, was 225,000 inhabitants. The sums necessary for defraying the annual expences of government, were raised by a poll-tax on slaves and free negroes, a tax on land, value of town-lots and buildings, monies at interest, or arising from annuities, stock in trade, and the profits of all faculties and professions, the clergy excepted, factorage and employment, and handicraft trades; which is called the general tax. In the law passed 1768, to raise the sum of 105,773*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* the proportions were as follows, being what are generally observed, viz. slaves and free negroes, the head 12*s.* 6*d.*; lands, the 100 acres 12*s.* 6*d.*; town-lots and buildings 6*s.* 3*d.* on every 100*l.* value; monies at interest 6*s.* 3*d.* the 100*l.*; annuities 25*s.* on every 100*l.*; stock in trade, profits of faculties and professions, &c. 6*s.* 3*d.* on every 100*l.* The general tax collected, viz. in 1769, was 146,199*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.* and the last collected, viz. in 1771, was 102,111*l.* 13*s.* 11*d.*

The annual expences of government in 1767, amounted to 151,317*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.* and in 1768, 104,440*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.* The stipends of the established clergy, parochial charges, &c. amounting to about 18,000*l.* per annum, are not included in the above sums, being charged to the general duty fund. The salary of the chief justice, assant judges, and attorney-general, now make an addition of 15,400*l.* per annum to the expences of government. In 1772, the produce of the several country duties was 97,804*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* but this was a larger sum than they had produced for some years preceding; the increase arose from the great number of negroes imported in that year. The amount of the poor-tax raised in Charles-town, in 1769, was 7000*l.* in the next year 8,000*l.* and in the two succeeding years 9000*l.* each year. The poor tax raised in the same manner as the general tax. In North Carolina the number of taxables in the year 1770, was upwards of 58,000; in 1774, 64,000.

The number of negroes and mulattoes is computed at about 10,000.

CAROLINE, or New Philippine islands, in the Indian ocean, in Asia. They lie between lat. 6 and 12 degrees N. and long. 127 and 138, E. The number of them is variously given. From an account in our Philosophical Transactions, they are said to be 32, and from another 87. The latter says, that they lie almost in the form of a crescent, from the Tropic of Cancer to the Equator, having the Old Philippines on the W. and the Ladroneas or Marianas islands on the E. and extending from lat. 2, S. to 17, N. and as many degrees of longitude.

CARPATHIAN Mountains, in Hungary, called Tatra in the language of the country. They wind about from the western frontiers of that kingdom towards the N. and are at the highest in the county of Zips: so that this peak may, in a clear day, be seen at Erlau in Hungary, and Warsaw in Poland. They divide both these kingdoms from each other. Their lowest parts are covered with common wood, the part above that with large trees, the next to that with scraggy stunted wood, and the peaks consist of frightful steep rocks, perpetually involved in snow; and between these are several lakes of clear water.

CARPENTER-LAND, a country of Asia, to the S. of New Guinea, and in New Holland, of which we know but little. The natives are all blacks, and paint their bodies; but whether for ornament or terror is uncertain. They have the worst features of any people in the world yet known: their hair is frizzled, and all that have been yet seen, want two fore-teeth. They live chiefly on shell-fish, which they get on the shore; and have no houses, at least none that the sailors could see.

CARPENTRAS, the capital of the county of Venaissin, and duchy of Avignon, in Provence, in France, lies on the Rouse, in a jurisdiction of the same name, and in Latin is called Carpentoracte Meminorum, or Forum Neronis. It is subject to the pope, has a bishop and an abbey, 19 miles N. E. of Avignon. Lat. 44, 10, N. Long. 5, 12, E.

CARPHILLY Castle. See CAERPHILLY.

CARPI, a small city belonging to a principality of the same name, a subdivision of Modena, in Upper Italy. It stands on the canal of Secchia, where a bishop resides, suffragan to the metropolitan of Bologna, 12 miles N. of Modena city, and subject to that duke. Lat. 44, 46, N. Long. 11, 10, E.

CARPIS, an ancient city of Africa Propria; placed by Ptolemy one-third of a degree more N. than Carthage. Pliny calls it Carpi. Dr. Shaw supposes the spot which this town occupied to be that which the present Gurbos, or Hammam Gurbos, now now stands on; and that the hot bath near it is the Aquæ Calidæ of Livy.

CARRACK, an island situated between the shores of Persia and Arabia Felix, about 30 leagues from the mouth of Busforah river. In 1750 baron Kniphausen being resident for the Dutch company at Busforah, on some trifling dispute with the Turkish government, was arrested and thrown into prison, and, as is very common with the Turks, had no way to procure his enlargement, but by submitting to pay an exorbitant fine of near 12,000*l.* sterling, which he did, and there being two Dutch ships in the river, he immediately set sail with them for Batavia, where staying only a few days, he returned again into the gulph with two ships of force, landed here with a few workmen, some timber, and other materials for building a fort, and sent his two ships within the mouth of Busforah river to make reprisals. In the mean time two of the Turks ships, bound to Busforah, stopt at Carrack, as usual, for pilots to carry them up the river. The baron not being able to detain them forcibly, he amused the captains till his two ships returned from the river, when he seized them both. When the Turks at Busforah heard of this, the governor sent people to offer to return the money, which the baron had been forced to pay, which was accepted, and the ships were released.

The baron soon after got a grant of the island from the Persians to the Dutch company, and he has built a tolerable good fort, garrisoned with 100 Europeans, a little town, and has also got together about 4000 inhabitants: the island is extremely well situated for trade, and as all ships bound to Busforah must call for pilots, it is likely to be a flourishing place. The soil is rather sandy, but it produces very good wheat. In several parts of the island are remains of Christian churches, by which it is conjectured, that the Portuguese were once settled here, though, on the Dutch coming, it was only inhabited by a few poor Persian fishermen, who were, and are still the pilots to Busforah. Round the island are to be found some fine pearls, but they lie in deep waters. Carrack is about 5 miles in length, and 2 in breadth, in the track of those who travel from our settlements in India to Aleppo, by the way of the gulph. The military commanding officer at Carrack was, in 1758, a Scotch Hollander, and served as an interpreter to the English who visited the place.

CARRÆ, a city of Mesopotamia, (by some supposed to be that by the Hebrews called Charan near Haran, where Abraham dwelt; but built more largely afterwards by the Parthians), and memorable for the defeat of the Romans under the mighty Crassus, who himself was in that fatal battle slain, and had his head and right hand cut off, in order to be sent to the Parthian king Orodes, then in Armenia, and his mangled body left unburies to be devoured by wild beasts; and which blow was doubtless the most terrible one the Romans ever received after the battle of Cannæ. According to Niger and Sanfon, it is now called Herren, and situated near the river Chabora, 40 miles from Edeffa, and 60 from the Euphrates to E. It is now to be reckoned in the Diarbech province, in the Turkish dominions.

CARRARA, (sovereign principality of), is commonly joined with that of Massa, in Upper Italy. It belongs to the duke of Modena, and is a fief of the empire. Both these territories lie between the dominions of Florence, Genoa, and Lucca, on the Ligurian sea. They produce great quantities of citrons, oranges, olives, &c. Of the same name is a small town, which is famous for its quarry of fine white marble, denominated also from it.

CARRICK, one of the three bailiwicks or baileries, into which the shire of Aire, in the South of Scotland, is subdivided. It is bounded on the S. by Galloway, Kyle on the N. part of the latter and Galloway on the E. and the frith of Clyde on the W. It is more fruitful than Galloway, and not so mountainous: but then this has more cattle. It is 32 miles where longest E. and W. and 25 where broadest N. and S. Its rivers Stincher and Girven abound with salmon. The people towards the coast are great fishermen, particularly in catching herrings for the Glasgow merchants, &c.

CARRICKDRUMRUSH, a market-town in the county of Letrim, and province of Connaught, in Ireland. It sends two members to the Irish parliament.

CARRICKFERGUS, i. e. CRAIG-FERGUS, or KNOCK-FERGUS, meaning the rock of Fergus I. king of Scotland, who, according to Scottish history, brought over from Ireland the first body of men into that kingdom; and he himself is said to have been afterwards drowned in the passing the bay here. It is a market-town and distinct county in Antrim, and province of Ulster, in Ireland. It lies on a bay of the Irish channel, has a pier for small vessels, and a capacious road for larger, with a strong castle. It sends members to the Irish parliament, is 18 miles E. of Antrim, and 89 N. of Dublin.

CARRICK-MAC-GRIFFIN, or simply CARRICK, also Carric on Sure, a town in the county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, in Ireland, where was a mansion of the late duke of Ormond; and one of the finest parks, it is said, in the world, 18 miles N. W. of Waterford. Lat: 52, 26, N. Long. 7, 24, W.

CARRIO, anciently Nubis, a river of Leon, in Spain.

CARRION,

CARRION, (de los Condes,) a town of Leon, in Spain; on the river Carrion, or Carrio, and enjoys considerable privileges. Its territory produces an exuberance, not only in the necessaries, but conveniences of human life.

CARRON, a river near Stirling, in Scotland, dry sometimes in summer, but very rapid in winter.

CARTAGO, the capital of Costa Rica in New Spain, situated 10 leagues from the North, and 17 from the South Sea, having a port in each. It was formerly a much more flourishing state than at present; several rich merchants resided here, who carried on a great trade to Panama, Porto Bello, Carthagená, and the Havannah. It had also a governor, and was the see of a bishop; but at present it is only a mean place, has very few inhabitants, and hardly any trade. Lat. 9, 15. N. Long. 83, 16. W.

CARTANA, anciently Cartima, an old town of Granada, in Spain. It lies at the foot of a very high mountain, entirely barren on its N. side, but very fertile and well-cultivated on all the other sides, 12 miles N. W. of Málaga. Lat. 36, 42, N. Long. 4, 30. W.

CARTERET, one of the counties of South Carolina, in the district of Newbern.

CARTHEA, anciently a famous city of Coos, stood on a rising ground at the end of a valley, about 3 miles from the sea. The situation (as described by Strabo,) agrees with that of the present town of Zia, which gives name to the whole island. The ruins of Carthæa are still remaining, out of some of which was built the said Zia, on a height 3 miles from the port, at the farther end of a valley; being a kind of amphitheatre of 2500 houses, built in stories, and terraced, i. e. their tops are quite flat.

CARTHAGE, the metropolis of Africa Propria, for several centuries, is supposed, according to Solinus, to have been built 130 or 131 years before Rome; which, on a critical examination of the various accounts, or rather opinions, of divers writers on the subject, is looked upon as pretty near the truth. Petavius, who has been very particular on the subject, fixes the time of Dido's beginning to build Carthage 137 years before the foundation of Rome; and it is on all hands agreed, that the Phœnicians were its founders.

The Greeks always called this city Charcedon; for which no reason so proper can be assigned as that the person who first settled with a colony on this spot was so named. Something must have determined Dido to choose this particular spot for her Tyrians; nor can any thing be conceived more likely than its having been inhabited some time by Phœnicians, her countrymen, &c. However, it cannot be well denied, that Elisa, called also Dido, sister of Pygmalion, king of Tyre, flying with her brother Barca, in the 7th year of that prince, from Tyre, fixed her residence here, and either founded or much enlarged this noble city. Were there any beginnings of a town here before, yet it could not have been a place of any consideration till her arrival. The wealth of her husband Sichæus, and the Tyrians she brought with her, who at that time were the most polite and ingenious people in the world, enabled her to enlarge and beautify that place, if she did not lay the foundation of it; to wall it round, and to build a strong citadel in it; to lay the basis of a most extensive commerce, and to introduce a form of government, thought by Aristotle the most perfect in the world in his age. Dido's arrival in Africa is supposed to have been 889 or 890 years before the birth of Christ.

Carthage stood at the bottom of a gulph, on a peninsula about 45 miles in circumference, the isthmus joining this peninsula to the continent of Africa being 3 miles and a furlong in breadth. On the W. side projected from it a long tract of land, in shape resembling a tongue, which shooting out into the sea, separated it from a lake or morass, and was strongly fortified on all sides with rocks and a single wall. In the middle of the city stood the citadel, erected by Dido, called Byrsa, having on the top a temple sacred to Æsculapius, seated on a very high hill, upon rocks, and to which the ascent was by 60 steps. This temple was rich, beautiful, and of considerable extent; so that when Byrsa was taken by Scipio, towards the close of the last siege of Carthage, 900 Roman deserters fortified themselves there. At last Asdrubal's wife, setting fire to it, entirely consumed it, together with herself, her children, and the 900 deserters.

On the S. side the city was surrounded with a triple wall, 30 cubits high, abstracted from the parapets and towers, with which it was flanked all round at equal distances, each interval being 80 fathoms, or 180 feet. Each tower had its foundation sunk 30 feet deep, and was 4 stories high, though the walls were but 2. They were arched, and in the lower part, (corresponding in depth with the foundation,) were stalls large enough to hold 300 elephants, with their fodder, &c. Over these were stables for 4000 horses, and lofts for their food. There was also room to lodge 20,000 foot and 4000 horse. Such a number of forces, and beasts were lodged within the walls without incommoding the inhabitants.

The walls were weak and low in one part only, viz. an angle which from the first building of the city city had been neglected, beginning at the long tract of land into the sea towards the W. continent, (before noted,) and extending as far as the harbours, which were on the same side. Of these there were 2, disposed so as to have communication with one another, and had one common entrance, 70 feet broad, and shut up with chains.

The 1st was appropriated to the merchants, and included in it a vast number of places of refreshment, and all accommodations for seamen. The 2d, or inner port, was, as well as the island Cothon in the midst of it, lined with large keys, in which were distinct receptacles for securing and sheltering from the weather 220 ships, being designed chiefly for ships of war. Over these were magazines, wherein were all necessaries for arming and equipping fleets. The entrance into each of these receptacles was adorned with 2 marble pillars, Ionic; so that both the harbour and the island represented on each side 2 magnificent galleries. On the island was the admiral's palace, from whence orders were given, and proclamations issued out; and as it stood opposite to the mouth of the harbour, he could from thence discover whatever was doing at sea, though no one could see what was transacting in the inward parts of the harbour; nay, the merchants themselves, entering their port, had no prospect of the men of war, being separated from them by a double wall, and each port having its particular gate towards the city. Hence it is apparent the city consisted of three parts, Byrsa, Megara, (or Megaria,) and Cothon. Byrsa was near 3 English miles in circumference, and inclined towards the S. or the isthmus which joined Carthage to the continent. It was looked upon as the interior part of Carthage, surrounded by Megara, (which Punic word imports the houses or town,) its exterior part, so that together they formed a kind of double town.

When Scipio blocked up the Old Port, or Cothon, the Carthaginians built a new one, the traces of which (scarce 100 yards square,) are still to be seen. This Cothon, or port, was called the Mandracium in the time of Procopius. The number of inhabitants of this city, at the beginning of the 3d Punic war, was 700,000; a prodigious number, considering the many terrible blows received from the Romans during the 1st and 2d Punic wars, as well as from their own mercenaries betwixt these wars, and their destructive broils with Masinissa. Their riches were immense, near 1,500,000l. sterl. being carried off by Scipio Aemilianus at the final destruction of the town, even after it had been thoroughly plundered, and was thought intirely exhausted and consumed. Which may give us some faint idea what Carthage was in the height of its grandeur and magnificence. One instance of it appears by the statue of Apollo, in the temple of that deity, near the Cothon, of massive gold, whose inside was all covered with plates of the same metal, weighing 1000 talents; which temple, &c. were pillaged and destroyed by a party of Scipio's men. The extent of the city is by Livy recorded to be 23 miles round, it being much larger while in the hands of the Carthaginians than when but a Roman colony.

Thus fell Carthage, about 146 years before Christ, a city whose destruction ought to be attributed more to a faction than to the power of Rome. The character transmitted of the Carthaginians is extremely bad, but as we have it only from the Romans, it must be considered they were implacable enemies.

CARTHAGE, the capital of Costa Rica, in Mexico, in South America, 368 miles W. of Panama. Lat. 9, 55, N. Long. 86, 10, W.

CARTHAGENA, or LITTLE CARTHAGE, in the province of Murcia, in Spain. W. Long. 0, 50. Lat. 37. 40. was built by Asdrubal, the famous Carthaginian general, and by him named Carthago Nova, (New Carthage,) 225 years before Christ, but was taken from the Carthaginians by Scipio, because it was a city situate like Old Carthage on a peninsula, between a noble port and a lake, which last served as a fence to the W. and N. parts of the wall, and the harbour was so commodious and capacious as to receive any fleet.

It continued under the Romans till the coming of the Vandals, who were afterwards themselves drove out of it by the Goths, who held it till its invasion by the Moors, who mastered it in 739, and held it till 1244, when Alphonso the Wise wrested it from them, fortified it with a strong castle, &c. and in 1266 enlarged and beautified the city, which had decayed during the Moorish tyranny; and Philip II. added new fortifications both to it and its harbour in 1570. It had been one of the most considerable towns of Spain under both the Romans and the Carthaginians, who shipped off from it those vast quantities of gold and silver dug out of the mines of the Pyrenees, Sierra Morena, &c. It is still a bishop's see. It is seated on the side of a hill on the Mediterranean coast and the mouth of the river Guadalquivir, being still a commodious and one of the most noted ports in Spain. The harbour is sheltered from storms by the small island Escambrada. It hath plenty of fresh water, and exports great quantities of wool for Italy. The air is so temperate in summer and mild in winter, that the trees are every where covered with leaves, blossoms, and fruit; and even roses blow as fresh and sweet at Christmas as with us in June. Here are dug amethysts, garnets, agates, and other precious stones. The city contains about 1200 inhabitants, inhabitants, and 1 parish, with 4 monasteries and a nunnery.

CARTHAGENA, (New,) the capital of a province of the same name, in the Terra Firma of South America. It is situated in a sandy island, which forming a narrow passage on the S. W. opens a communication with that part called Terra Bomba, as far as Bocca Chica. The neck of land which now joins them, was formerly the entrance of the bay: but it has been closed up, and Bocca Chica is now the only entrance. The city and suburbs are well laid out, the streets being straight, broad, uniform, and well paved; the houses are mostly of stone, except a few of brick. It is equal to a city of the third rank in Europe, and is well peopled, though the greatest number of its inhabitants are descended from the Indian tribes. It has been often pillaged, and consequently is none of the most opulent towns.

In 1741 it sustained a long siege from the English under admiral Vernon; who were obliged to retire, after they had made themselves masters of most of the forts and harbours: principally owing, besides the strength of the place, to the great mortality among the troops, and not a little to the inexperience of the commanders, and the differences which arose between the admiral and the general. However, our English admiral Sir Francis Drake took it in 1585, and M. de Pointis, the French admiral, in 1697. It is the see of a bishop. Besides the cathedral, there is the church of the Trinity in the suburbs, and several convents.

Its bay of the same name is the best in all the known parts of this country, extending 2 leagues and a half from N. to S. with a sufficient depth of water, good anchorage, and very smooth. It abounds with great variety of fish. Here are turtles; but it is very much infested with sharks. Here the galleons from Spain wait for the arrival of the Peru fleet at Panama, upon the first advice of which they sail away for Porto Bello: but during their stay at Carthagena a fair is held. The town lies 310 miles E. of this last-mentioned place, and 320 S. of Port-Royal, in Jamaica. Lat. 10, 26, N. Long. 75, 22, W.

CARTMEL, a market-town of Lancashire, among the hills called Cartmel-fells, near a bay of the Irish sea, with a harbour for boats. Its weekly market is on Monday; and its annual fairs on Whitfun-Monday, and the first Tuesday after October 23: it lies 10 miles N. of Lancaster.

CARVEL, (of St. Thomas,) a rock between the Virgin Isles E. and Porto Rico on the W. At a small distance it appears like a sail, as it is white and has two points. Between it and St. Thomas passes Sir Francis Drake's channel.

CARVER'S RIVER, a small stream that falls into the river St. Pierre, about 40 miles from where that river falls into the Mississippi. Captain Carver named this river after himself.

CARWAR, a town on the Malabar coast, in Hither India, in Asia. Here is an English factory, and the best pepper in the world is said to grow in its neighbourhood, with a small fort. The river can receive vessels of 300 tons. It lies 68 miles S. of Goa. Lat. 15, 5, N. Long. 73, 6, E.

CARY, one of the western islands of Scotland, about a mile in circuit, has good pasturage, and abounds with rabbits.

CASA DEL CAMPO, a royal country-seat, in New Castile in Spain, and W. side of Madrid, on the other side of the river Manzenares, and directly opposite to the royal mansion. Near the entrance into the garden is an equestrian statue in brass of king Philip III.

CASACONI, a district in the N. W. division of Corsica, which can raise 500 men.

CASAL, the capital of a territory called Casafresco, and of the whole duchy of Montferrat, in the principality of Piedmont, in Upper Italy. It lies in a fruitful country, upon the Po; and was formerly a considerable fortress, which, besides its own works, had a castle and citadel, the best in Italy; it has therefore been often besieged.

In 1681, the duke of Mantua ceded it to France: but in 1691 and 1706, the Confederates under the Duke of Savoy, took it in the latter period. It is the see of a bishop, under the metropolitan of Milan. It lies 48 miles E. of Turin. Lat. 45, 0, N. Long. 8, 35, E.

CASSAL MAGGIORA, a small place of the Cremonese territory, a subdivision of the duchy of Milan, in Upper Italy. It lies close upon the Po, 25 miles E. of Cremona, and subject to the house of Austria. Lat. 45, 0, N. Long. 11, 5, E.

CASAN, one of the governments of Asiatic Russia. It extends itself farther than the ancient kingdom of the same name, which the Czar John Basilowitz conquered in 1552. It is bounded on the N. by the province of Permia; on the E. by Siberia; on the S. by the Wolga, and on the W. by the province of Moscow. This government consists of 17 circles; among which is one of its own name, containing CASAN, the capital of the government last-mentioned. It lies on the river Casanka, which about a mile from thence falls into the Wolga. It consists of the fine stone fortress, the wooden town, as it is called, and several slobodes, or palisadoed villages, among which is a Tartar one. Here are about 50 churches, mostly built of stone, and 11 convents, which lie partly in, and partly out of the town. Here also reside a governor, sub-governor, and a commandant in the fort; the garrison of which consists of three regiments, and for these there is an hospital. It is excellently well situated twated for being well supplied with all necessities by land and water, which are very plentiful and cheap. About 7 wersts below the town, in a reach where the river is broad, is a large dock for the building of ships of considerable bulk, which are afterwards sent down into the Caspian sea.

This is the see of an archbishop. In the Tartar nunnery is a famous image of the virgin. At one end of the town is a cloth manufactory, fabrics of which are sold to the government at a stated price, for clothing the soldiers. In the convent of Silaudowo, about 2 wersts from Casan, and on the Casanka, is a school, where youths of Calmuc Tartar, and other remote nations, are instructed in the Russian and Latin languages, the grounds of the Christian religion, and in philosophy, for the converting of their respective tribes to Christianity. In 1740 and 1752 the town was entirely burnt down.

CASBA, a town of Africa, in a fertile plain, 5 miles from Tunis.

CASBIN, CASWIN, or KASPIN, a town of Persian-irak, in Persia. It lies in a delightful plain, on a little river, an arm of the Charoud: it was formerly walled, but is now open every way. It is said to be 6 miles in circuit, containing 12,000 houses and 100,000 inhabitants. Here is a fine palace, once the royal residence, with beautiful gardens. The royal mosque is the largest in all Persia; and the royal caravansera will contain 250 camels. The Persian grandees have several palaces here. The city, though in want of water, has plenty of meat, and all sorts of provisions. In the neighbourhood are grapes as big as an olive, which are dried; and from them a strong luscious wine is made. It lies 185 miles N. of Isfahan. Lat. 36, 5, N. Long. 48, 10, E.

CASCAES, a fortified town of Torre's Vedras, a subdivision of Portuguese Estremadura, at the mouth of the Tagus, on the Mediterranean; and from its situation upon cape Roca, in Latin Promontorium Lunæ, now called Cintra, is one of the most beautiful places in the whole kingdom. It contains 2000 inhabitants in two parishes. The trading vessels frequently anchor here, as a contraband trade may be carried on to great advantage; is 14 miles E. of Lisbon. Lat. 38, 40, N. Long. 10, 25, W.

CASCANTE, a small place of Tudela, a jurisdiction of Navarre, in Spain. It was the Roman colony Cascantum, and is situated on the river Quellas, in a fruitful plain, not far S. from Tudela city. It contains about 800 families in one parish, has a monastery and nunnery.

CASCO-BAY, in the county of York, in the province of New Hampshire, New England. This bay, if reckoned from Cape Elizabeth to Small Point, is 25 miles wide, and about 14 deep; is a most beautiful bay full of little islands. Brunswic stands on the N. E. cove of it, and Falmouth, a sweet pretty town, on a most delightful scite at the S. W. end of it, which is now no more, being destroyed in January, 1776, by the British forces, for refusing to supply them with naval stores. Lat. 44, 10. Long. 69, 35.

CASERTA, a small city of the Lavoro, of Naples, in Lower Italy. Here is a royal palace, it is said cost 5 millions of dollars. It lies near the Volturna, at the foot of Mount Caserta, or St. Nicholas, is the see of a bishop, and gives the title of prince; 16 miles N. of Naples city. Lat. 41, 20, N. Long. 15, 15, E.

CASHAN, a city of Persian-irak, or Eyracagene, in Persia. It is situated in a large plain at the foot of a mountain. It is a league in length, and a quarter of a league in breadth, extending from E. to W. The town is surrounded with a double wall. The city and suburbs contain, it is said, 6500 houses, 40 mosques, 3 colleges, and about 300 sepulchres of the descendants of Ali. The houses are of earth and bricks; but the bazars and baths are well built, and well kept. Here are several caravanseras; and among these the royal inn, without the city; which is the finest in all the empire. The trade of Cashan consists of manufactures of all sorts of silks, stuffs, and tissues of gold and silver, to a very considerable amount. It lies 100 miles N. of Isfahan. Lat. 34, 10, N. Long. 50, 7, E.

CASHAW, or CASCHAW, in Latin Cassavia, a city in Upper Hungary, near the river Horat, or Tareza, E. long. 21, 20. Lat. 48, 42. subject to the house of Austria. It is the metropolis of the county of Mavilar, and inclosed with a triple wall, and a good ditch, and fortified besides with strong bastions and a good citadel. It also has two gates, which are opened alternately, and one of the most considerable arsenals in the kingdom. It received an imperial garrison in 1670, and the town is one of the best built in the kingdom. German, Hungarian, Polish, Slavonian, and Turkish are all spoke here. Most of the Germans here being Lutherans, and the Hungarians Calvinists, the great church is alternately supplied by a minister of each. A rivulet from a neighbouring mountain enters the town, and divides into two branches, that run the length of it, with 34 bridges over them. The town-house is a most beautiful structure, and the parish church an admirable piece of architecture. The governor commands all the troops in the neighbourhood; but, yet within 6 miles of the town, the nobility, &c. of the country used, in time of war, to pay homage to the Turk. In 1537, were two kings of Hungary chosen, by different parties, who between them made great havock here, &c. In 1592 it was besieged by the Turks in vain, as it was in 1604 by the Imperialists, to whom however it submitted in 1606. In 1621, it was resigned resigned by treaty to Bethlem Gabor, prince of Transylvania, who had taken it. In 1668 it was taken by George Ragotski; in 1682, it was possessed by count Tekeli. After which it belonged, now to the Turks, now the mal-contents, now to the emperor; till at length the latter prevailed, and still keeps it.

CASHEL, or CASSIL, a small town of Tipperary, a county in the province of Munster, in Ireland. It sends two members to the Irish parliament; and lies 15 miles N. W. of Clonmell, and 80 S. W. of Dublin.

CASHGAR, a kingdom of Asia, in Tartary, otherwise called Little Bocharia; bounded on the N. by the Calmucs and Mungals; on the E. by Tibet and the deserts of Gobi; on the S. by the dominions of the great mogul, from which it is separated by the high mountains of Imaus, called by the Tartars Mus-tag, and on the W. by Great Bocharia. This country is pretty populous, and fertile, but the air is cold on account of the mountains. Here are rich mines of gold and silver, which the natives do not meddle with, because they are employed wholly in feeding cattle. The musk-animals are found in this country; and they have several precious stones, besides diamonds. The chief town is Cashgar; it stands at the foot of the mountains, and enjoys a pretty good trade with the neighbouring countries. The houses are of stone, and very good. Both men and women have gowns which fall down to the calves of their legs, and fastened to their bodies with girdles; with close breeches, and boots of Russia leather, for both sexes dress alike. Their complexion is swarthy, and they have all black hair; but it is hard to say what their religion is exactly. Long. 73, 25, E. Lat. 41, 30, N.

CASKETS, a range of rocks for 3 leagues, lying W. of Crabby harbour, in the island of Alderney, on the English channel. Having several eddies, they become dreadful to mariners, who gave the whole the name of the principal rock, which advances at the head of the reef; where is a spring of excellent water: but on the largest of them stand 3 light-houses, in form of a triangle, which may be seen 5 or 6 miles off in a dark night. Those lights bear westward of Alderney about 7 miles, of Cape La Hague 6 leagues, and from Guernsey 5 leagues N. by E. $\frac{1}{2}$ E. A ship may pass between the Caskets and Ortach, keeping nearest to Ortach; this channel is good, but in case of a calm, the variety of tides makes it hazardous; for between the Caskets and Guernsey, the tides run very strong, and make the whole round of the compass in 12 hours. Lat. 49, 50. Long. 2, 26.

CASOLO, remarkable as being one of the two first castles that belonged to the republic of Marino, in the Middle Division of Italy.

C A

CASLONA, anciently CASTULO, though now an inconsiderable town of Jaen, one of the subdivisions of Andalusia, in Spain, was formerly large, rich, and celebrated. Here may still be seen the remains of a stately aqueduct.

CASOS, an island in the Cretan sea, 18 furlongs in compass.

CASPE, an old town of Aragon, in Spain, at the junction of the river Guadaloupe with the Ebro, with a strong castle. Alphonsus II. having taken it from the Moors in 1168, gave it to the knights of St. John. Its neighbouring soil produces wine, grain, oil, saffron and silk.

CASPIAN SEA, a large collection of water (which some reckon a lake, as it has no known efflux, nor visible communication with any other sea) lying between Tartary and Persia, in Asia. It is bounded by Astracan and Calmuc Tartary on the N. Bocharao and part of Persia on the E. another part of Persia on the S. and another part of the same and of Circassia on the W. It is situated between lat. 36, 40, N. and between long. 47, 50, E. Its length from N. to S. is upwards of 400 miles; and its breadth from E. to W. 300; but in many places much narrower. Though it receives the great river Wolga, and near 100 others into its bosom, it never is increased or diminished; nor does it ebb or flow, though once in 16 years time it is observed to rise several fathoms, and to overflow the neighbouring countries; by which inundation Astracan has sometimes suffered considerably. The water in it is as salt as that of any other; nor is it of a black colour. In it are many islands; but none large or inhabited, except Enfil, near Terabad, where are only a few huts for fishermen. It has various kinds of fish; also some good harbours, but fit only for small craft. This sea was formerly very little navigated, unless by Cossack robbers; but now the Russians sail on it, since they have become masters of part of the coast.

CASSAGNABERE, a little place in Upper Comenges, and county of the latter name, in Lower Armagnac.

CASSAN, in Nigritia, Africa. The village Petit (or Little) Cassan is about 110 leagues up the river Gamboa, reckoning from the point of Barra, and on the N. side. That of that Great Cassan 3 miles beyond it, being the metropolis of the kingdom, and about three days journey down the Gamboa to Barra. This town is said to be walled, and is the usual residence of the king of Cassan.

CASSANDRIA, a city in Pallene, built by Cassander, and peopled from the Chersonese, &c. to which he added so large and fair a territory, that it quickly grew to be the greatest city of Macedonia.

CASSANO, a small town of the Milanese, in the duchy of Milan and Upper Italy. It is situated on on the Adda, from which river, in the neighbourhood, run two canals; the one of which goes into the Lambro, and the other into the Serio. It lies 12 miles E. of Milan. Near this place an obstinate battle was fought between the Imperialists and the French in 1705, when prince Eugene, the general of the former, defeated the duke of Vendosme. Lat. 25, 20, N. Long. 10, 6, E. Of the same name is a little town and episcopal see, in the Hither Calabria, and kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy. It lies near the Bano, about 10 miles from the Appenine mountains, and the like from the gulph of Tarento. Lat. 40, 0, N. Long. 16, 52, E.

CASSAREEN, in the inland country of the W. circuit of Tunis, Africa, is upon an eminence with the river Zerb winding below it; and upon a precipice that hangs immediately over this river is a triumphal arch, by which it appears this place was the ancient Colonia Scillitana.

CASSEL, in Latin Cassella, anciently Castellum Cattorum, the capital of Lower Hesse, and of the whole landgravate of Hesse-Cassel, in the circle of the Lower Rhine, in Germany. It lies in a rich and pleasant plain on the river Fulda, near the confines of the duchy of Brunswic. It is a place of good trade for wool, and other merchandize; but the inhabitants let other nations run away with the profit of manufacturing the former article. Here the landgrave resides in a palace of free-stone, without the town, surrounded with bulwarks. To the W. the town has walls, ditches, and a citadel. Here is an academy and arsenal, with arms for 25,000 men, besides cannon. The streets are spacious and full of shops; and its several fine markets have plenty of provisions: besides the large cathedral of St. Martin, there are 4 churches, and a church in the palace. There is a stone-bridge over the river, which divides the city into two parts; of which that called the New Town is very well built, where is a fine aqueduct. It lies 45 miles N. E. of Marburg, and 85 of Frankfort. It is subject to the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel. Lat. 51, 24, N. Long. 9, 26, E. But this city and country being overrun by the French in the late war, they suffered extremely from the depredations of their troops.

CASSEL, in Latin Castellum Morinorum, a small city of the quarter of the same name, in French Flanders. It stands on a high mountain, surrounded with a delightful plain. It is the seat of a spacious chancellery; but it has suffered much from frequent fires, and has had several battles fought near it. By the peace of Nimeguen it was yielded up to France. It lies 10 miles N. E. of St. Omer. Lat. 50, 20, N. Long. 2, 36, E.

CASSEL, (county of), in Franconia in Germany. It lies between that of Schwartzburg and the bishopric of Wurtzburg. It is about 27 miles long, and 8 where broadest, and subject to the counts of Remlingen and Rudenhausen; the former being Roman Catholic, and the latter Lutheran. The bishop of Wurtzburg has lately bought several places of this county.

CASSEL, a river in Carnarvonshire which runs into the Conway near Caerhun.

CASSIMERE, one of the 9 northern provinces of Indostan, and Mogul empire, in Asia; bounded on the E. by Kakares and Bankisch, Mount Caucasus dividing it from Tartary on the N. It has Penjah on the S. Cabul and Attock on the W. Its dimensions are variously given, and is said to extend about 260 miles from N. to S. and nearly the same from E. to W. where broadest. It has a healthy air, and a well cultivated soil. It is surrounded by mountains rising one above another, the lower covered with cattle and game, and the higher covered with snow, which melting furnishes several rivulets, besides small lakes: so that the country abounds with pulse, rice, corn, saffron, hemp, and all sorts of fruits and vegetables. The woods abound also with bees. Its streams joining, form the river Tchenas, which carries goods through the greatest part of the kingdom into the Indus at Attock. Their snowy mountains are clear at top above the clouds. Those of Bember are high, steep, and black. The forces which this kingdom furnishes the mogul, are computed at 4000 horse, and 8000 foot, and its revenue 438,125 l. sterling.

CASSIMERE, the principal city of the last-mentioned province of the same name, was once the capital of a kingdom, and since the residence of several moguls. It stands in a plain at the N. end of a lake formed by the river Tchenas, from which a river runs through the town; and over it are two bridges. The city is a league long, and half a league broad, without walls. The houses are of timber. The lake is full of islands, on which they have made pleasure gardens, and planted fruit-trees. These are generally surrounded with tall palms. The inhabitants are very ingenious and industrious, making palankins, and all sorts of cabinets and boxes, in a very curious manner, which are dispersed all over the Indies. They also make a vast number of shawls, which are pieces of stuff about an ell and a half long, and one broad, curiously embroidered. They are extremely fine and soft, and sell at a great price. The Indians, both men and women, wear them over their heads in the winter. The people have a clear complexion, and are well made. The women are very handsome; though only the common sort are generally seen abroad or in the shops. It has been by some suspected, that the 10 tribes of Israel were carried away captive to this country: but this does not seem probable; for there are no traces of Judaism remaining, remaining, all the inhabitants being either Gentōos or Mahometans. E. long. 75, 25. N. lat. 34, 30.

CASSINOGOROD, a considerable town of the Russian empire, in the province of Cassino, seated on a mountain near the river Occa. Long. 34, 30, E. Lat. 55, 20, N.

It lies between the duchy of Mantua and Brescia, a part of the Venetian dominions, and is a fief of the empire; which a younger branch of the Gonzaga family, of the house of Mantua, possessed till 1692, when they were brought into such difficulties as to be obliged to quit it; and the Imperialists seized it in 1701.

CASTIGLIONE DELLA STIVERE, in Latin Castellio Stiverorum, the capital of the last mentioned principality of the same name. It lies high, has a citadel, with a palace for the prince. In it is a collegiate-church, besides 6 other churches and convents, 2 oratories; and without the city 2 churches more. It lies 20 miles from Mantua to the N. W. Lat. 45, 15, N. Long. 11, 0, E. Of this name are several other places in Italy; also a lake of Sienna, in Tuscany.

CASTILE, in general, is the principal and most considerable kingdom of all Spain. It is commonly divided into Old and New Castile, the former having been taken by the Moors more early than the latter. New Castile is also called by some the kingdom of Toledo; it is the center of the monarchy, and seat of the king. It is separated from Old Castile on the N. by a ridge of mountains, and by a like ridge from Aragon and Valencia on the E. It also confines upon Murcia; and to the S. a chain of mountains divide it from Andalusia; it is bounded by Estremadura on the W. Its greatest length from W. to E. is 184 English miles, and greatest breadth from N. to S. 200. This province has a good air, and its soil is very fruitful. The river Tagus, Guadiana, and Guadalquivir, have their source in this province. The other most considerable rivers are the Xucar, which runs through Valencia into the Mediterranean sea; the Xamara, which rises in the mountains of Atienza; and after receiving the Henares and Tajuna, it unites with the Tagus. The Guadarama has its spring-head in the mountains of Toledo; it runs from N. to S. through the country, and falls into the Tagus a little below Toledo.

New Castile had formerly its own counts, till a lasting union was made of the kingdoms of Castile and Aragon, by the marriage of Ferdinand of the latter, to Isabel, heiress of the former country. It consists of three provinces; namely, La Mancha, La Sierra, and Algarria; of which Madrid is the capital, and of all Spain.

CASTILE, (Old,) a province of Spain. It is bounded on the S. by New Castile, on the W. by Leon, on the N. by Asturias and Biscay, and on the E. by Navarre and Aragon. Its figure is irregular; and consequently of an unequal breadth. Its greatest length, namely from Valladolid to Tarragona, is about 112 English miles, and greatest breadth 180. Its principal rivers are the Douro and Ebro, into the first of which run the Atayada, Andaja, Arebalillo, and Pisuerga; with which also the rivers Arlança and Arlançon mingle their waters. All these rise in this province, which is mountainous, and not so fruitful as New Castile. The most fertile part is that district which is called La Tierra de Campos, and lies towards the N. in the neighbourhood of Medina de Rio Seco, and Palencia.

The wine produced here is excellent, and the plains are covered with vast numbers of great and small cattle, especially sheep, which yield fine wool, so that the best of this commodity in all Spain is to be got in this province. It was called Old, as having been taken from the Moors sooner than New Castile; and was formerly only a county under the dominion of the king of Leon, till, in the year 1016, it was erected into a kingdom, and is now no more than a province of Spain.

CASTILE DEL ORO, so called by the Spaniards, who first planted it, from the gold mines found there, a southern province of Terra Firma, in South America.

CASTILLARA, a town of the Mantuan in Italy; 6 miles N. E. of Mantua city, and subject to Austria. Lat. 45, 20, N. Long. 11, 25, E.

CASTILLON, a small town of Lower Perigord, in Guyenne Proper, and government of the former name and of Gascony, in France. It is memorable, as near it the French so entirely routed the English in 1453 that they were obliged to quit the duchy of Guyenne, which they have never been able to recover since. It lies 18 miles E. of Bourdeaux. Lat. 44, 56, N. Long. 16, E.

CASTINEIRA, a town in the kingdom of Portugal situated near Lisbon on the road from that city to Oporto.

CASTLE-ACRE, 4 miles N. W. of Swaffham, Norfolk, had anciently a castle. Fairs on April 18, and July 25.

CASTLEBAR, a town in the county of Mayo, and province of Connaught, in Ireland. It sends 2 members to parliament, and lies 38 miles N. of Galway.

CASTLE CAREY, a market-town of Somersetshire. It carries on woollen manufactures. It is famous for its mineral waters, much like those of Epsom. Its weekly market is on Tuesday, and has annual fairs on Midlent-Tuesday, May 1, and Whitfun-Tuesday; all for bullocks and sheep.

CASTLECARREG, i. e. a castle on a rock, in Caermarthenshire, in S. Wales. It is now in ruins. Under this steep and inaccessible rock, are many spacious caverns, supposed to have been mines of copper, also a fountain which ebbs and flows as the tides do.

CASTLECOMB, in Wiltshire, between Chippenham and Badminton in Gloucestershire. Fair on May 4. It was once called Comb only, but its ancient lord having made this his mansion-house a castle, it was called Castlecomb to distinguish it from Comb-Basset. The Roman fosse-way goes through this place, from Ebdowen to Slaughtford.

CASTLECONNOR, in the county of Sligo, and province of Connaught in Ireland; about a mile from which is a remarkable round hill, in which quadrangular chambers have been found, made of large stones, and arched, the passages to which are circular.

CASTLE-DERMOT, formerly a large fortified town in the county of Kildare, and the residence of the kings who bore the name of Dermot, and is still a boroughborough-town, though much reduced in size. In 1316 it was sacked and plundered by Bruce. Here are the ruins of a fine Franciscan abbey, also a Quakers meeting-house, and a work-house. The Protestant church stands at the verge of the town, and here is the first English Protestant school that was founded in Ireland. Here was a mint to coin money, and in 1377 a parliament was held here; part of which parliament house is now an inn.

CASTLE-DUDLEY, a famous ancient building of great extent, upon a high mountain at the S. extremity of Staffordshire, and just on the confines of Worcestershire. Great part of it is in ruins; but the rest has been converted into a seat for lord Ward. It has an extensive prospect. In the hall was a table of one plank of oak 25 yards long, and 1 yard in breadth.

CASTLE-FORTH or FORD, York, West Riding, near the conflux of the Aire and Calder, by Pontefract, of which it was the mother. There are many remarkable remains of its antiquity, particularly Roman coins, whereof great numbers have been dug up here, called by the people Saracen's heads. It stands upon the Roman way that comes from Doncaster, and leads to Aberforth, and is filled by Hovedon a city. The Calder was made navigable from hence to Wakefield, in 1608.

CASTLE-HEDDINGHAM, 4 miles from Sudbury, in Essex; has a fair May 3.

CASTLE-HILL, that on which the famous castle of Edinburgh stands.

CASTLE-ISLAND, in the West Indies, in the Windward passage, is 4 or 5 miles from E. to W. and more than a mile broad. The W. Point is pretty bold, and the E. side is remarkable for a rising out, resembling something like a castle. It is distant from Acklin's a little more than a league; between them, though rather nearer the latter, is a white rock by itself, with several keys to the southward of it, and breakers which appear to shut up the passage between the two islands. This rock is called the Farellon, or Forillon of Acklin. Acklin's-Island, or Quay, is but little known, except in the W. part, the 2 points of which are distant 4 or 5 miles: between these you may anchor, very near the shore, in clear ground, 7 or 8 fathoms water.

CASTLE-RISING, an old borough of Norfolk, near the sea-side; it sends two members to parliament; and in and about it are several vestiges of Roman, Saxon, and Danish antiquities. Here is an hospital for 12 men, and an alms-house for 20 widows.

CASTLETON, a place in Derbyshire, so called from a castle near it, on a high and steep rock; which is very ancient, and accessible only one way; and so full of windings, that it is 2 miles from the bottom to the top.

VOL. I.—No. 31.

CASTLETOWN, the capital of the Isle of Man. It lies on its S. W. part, and was anciently the see of a bishop. Lat. 53. 50, N. Long. 4. 40.

CASTLE-WILLIAM, a fort in Lochaber, in Inverness-shire; but its proper denomination is Fort-William.

CASTON, or CAWSTON, Norfolk, 10 miles from Norwich 112 miles from London, has a bridge over the Bure. It has a market on Tuesday, and fairs on January 1, April 14, and August 28.

CASTOR, Lincolnshire, 157 miles from London, was built by Hengist on a track of ground which he encompassed with an ox's hide cut into thongs, pursuant to a grant of Vortigern; was therefore by the Saxons called Thuang-Castor, i. e. Thong-Castle. The market is on Monday, and fair June 1, and October 23. It stands between Binbrook and Glanford-bridge.

CASTOR, Northamptonshire, 3 miles from Peterborough, and 1 from the river Nene, is supposed, from the chequered pavements found here, together with Roman copper coins and urns, to have been part of the ancient city called by the Romans Durobrivæ, and the Saxons Dornmancheffer. The Roman highway, called Erming-street, goes from hence to Lincolnshire. Its church, which appears to have been consecrated in 1174, stands on a hill where the castle stood, which was the seat of the Roman governor.

CASTOR, Norfolk, 3 miles S. of Norwich, was the Venta Icenorum of the Romans, who had a garrison here; and several of their urns have been found in it. It was the most flourishing city in these parts; but it is fell to decay, and Norwich rose on its ruins. Camden calls this place Castor St. Edmund, and says, that Edmund the Danish King kept his court here, and that it was the seat of the famous sir John Falstaff, in the reign of Henry V.

CASTRES, a diocese of Upper Languedoc, in the government of the latter name, in France. It is the second town of Albigeois; and is divided by the river Agout into two parts. It is the see of a bishop, who is a suffragan to the metropolitan of Alby, has a diocese of 79 parishes, and a yearly income of 30,000 livres. He pays the court of Rome a tax of 2500 florins. Upon the death of Henry II. the religious troubles beginning, the inhabitants of Castres embraced the reformation, and in 1567 demolished all the Roman Catholic churches, and also fortified the town: but in 1629 they were obliged to submit to Lewis XIII. when the place was dismantled. Lat. 43. 38, N. Long. 2. 20, E.

CASTRI, the present name of the ancient Delphi, or Delphos, in Livadia, or Greece proper, a province of European Turkey. It lies about 2 miles N. of the gulph of Lepanto, upon a rugged mountain: but it is now an inconsiderable place, though formerly famous and much frequented, on account of the temple and oracle of Apollo here; as also the dark cave from which the Pythian priestess pronounced her sentences.

CASTRO, a duchy belonging to the Ecclesiastical State, in the Middle Division of Italy, bounded on the N. by the Orvietano, on the S. by the Mediterranean, on the E. by the river Marta, which divides it from St. Peter's Patrimony, and on the W. by Tuscany. The country is naturally fertile, but ill peopled.

CASTRO, the capital of the last mentioned duchy of the same name, was formerly a pretty place, and the see of a bishop: but the inhabitants murdering the prelate sent them by pope Innocent X. the pope removed the bishopric to Acqua in 1646, and ordered the place to be razed; and confiscated the country to the apostolic chamber. It formerly belonged to the Farnese family. Lat. 42, 30, N. Long. 12, 35, E. Of the same name is also an episcopal city in the province of Otranto, and kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy. It was anciently called Castrum Minervæ. It is fortified, has a harbour, and good trade. Lat. 40, 8, N. Long. 19, 25, E.

CASTRO, the capital of the island of Chiloe, on the coast of Chili, in S. America, 180 miles S. of Baldivia, and subject to Spain. It was taken by the Dutch in 1643. Lat. 43, 5, S. Long. 82, 8, W.

CASTRO AROGENESE, a small fortified town on the N. W. coast of the island of Sardinia, in Upper Italy, with a harbour on the mouth of the river Coquinas, and a bishop's see. Lat. 41, 0, N. Long. 8, 45, E.

CASTRO DE REY, a town of Galicia in Spain; in the neighbourhood of which is the source of the river Minho.

CASTRO VERDE, a town in the audience of Ourique, and province of Alentejo, in Portugal. It lies on the river Corbos, and contains 2700 inhabitants.

CASTRO DE URDIALIS, a good castle, with an arsenal, in Biscay Proper, a subdivision of the province of the former name in Spain.

CASTRO EXERES, the principal place of a county in Old Castile in Spain. It stands high, and has a citadel.

CASTRODAIRE, a town in the district of Lamego, and province of Beira, in Portugal. It contains between 17 and 1800 inhabitants.

CASTROMARIN, a small but fortified place in the district of Tavira, and province of Algarve, in Portugal, on the confines of Andalusia, in Spain. It stands at the mouth of the river Guadiana, directly opposite to Ayamonte; contains 1000 inhabitants, and has a district of 2 parishes. Its castle is one of those borne in the royal arms of Portugal. Lat. 37, 5, N. Long. 8, 16, W.

CASTROMENA, ancient Bithynium, as also Claudianopolis, in Paphlagonia, is supposed built on the ruins of the latter, once an episcopal see. It is now dwindled into a poor town, though still a bishop's see. E. long. 31, 39. Lat. 40, 38.

CASTRO VIRREYNA, a jurisdiction in South America, and kingdom of Peru, subject to the archbishop of Lima, remarkable for a valuable wool from the sheep called vicunna. These were wild, and are almost exterminated by hunting, on account of their wool. All kinds of corn, grain, and fruits are here in plenty.

CASTRUM ALTUM, anciently a fortress of great strength, in Hispania Tarraconensis, and famous for the death of the great Hamilcar; situated in the mid-way between Saguntum to S. and Carthage to N.

CATACOMBS, large subterraneous vaults, with several repositories, in Egypt, Barbary, and Italy, where the ancients are supposed to have buried their dead.

CATALONIA, (principality of), is a province of Spain, bounded on the W. by Aragon and Valencia; on the S. and E. by the Mediterranean sea; and on the N. it is divided from France by the Pyrenean mountains. Its greatest length from W. to E. extends to 112 English miles, and greatest breadth from S. to N. 148. Anciently it was larger: for the county of Roussillon and Conflans, a good part of Cerdagne, and a long time before that Foix, likewise came into the possession of France. This fine province of Catalonia is watered by several rivers, which partly mingle with one another, and partly run immediately into the sea. Of the first sort is the Segre, in Latin Sicoris, which is the largest among all the Catalonian rivers. It rises in Cerdagne; near Camarasa it receives the Noguera Pallarela; and not far from Lerida, the Noguera, Ribagorzana (Nocharia Ripacurtiana) and the Cervera: it afterwards unites with the Cinca: and lastly, near the Mequinencia, it empties itself into the Ebro. The little river Corp runs into the Cervera just mentioned, and the Noya into the Llobregat near Martorel. Of the second sort of rivers, besides the large one, namely the Ebro, which runs only a little way through Catalonia, is the Francolí, which falls into the sea, now Tarragona; the Llobregat, anciently Rubricatus, that rises in Mount Pendis, and discharges itself into the sea, below Barcelona; the Besos (Betulus) which falls also into the sea, not far from Barcelona; the Ter (Thicis, Thiceris) which has its source between Canigo and Col. de Nuria, and mingles its waters with the sea below Torroello; the river Fluvia (Fluvianus, Chavianus) which falls falls into the sea near Empurias; and another Llobregat, the mouth of which is near Roses.

Catalonia is a very good and fertile country, though it produces no sugar-canes, as the other provinces in Spain do. It enjoys a clear and healthy air, and in the northern part confining on the Pyrenean mountains, some frost and snow in winter; on the contrary, in its southern parts, and especially on the coast, the weather is moderate at that season. It is almost entirely mountainous, some few parts excepted, which consist of fine plains; yet the mountains are not unfruitful, but covered with forests and plantations of fruit-trees. The country yields wine, grain, pulse, all sorts of fruit and oil, in great plenty. Here grow great quantities of flax and hemp. The flesh of this country, and in general all provisions are excellent; here also is marble, crystal, alabaster, jasper, amethyst, &c. likewise gold, silver, tin, lead, iron, allum, vitriol, salt, and but very little copper. On the eastern coast they fish good coral. This province is one of the best inhabited in all Spain. It contains one archbishopric, two duchies, five marquisesates, 17 counties, fourteen vice-counties, and a great number of baronies. Catalonia having, in 1705, strenuously espoused the party of Charles, archduke of Austria, afterwards the emperor Charles VI. but in 1714, Barcelona being obliged to surrender at discretion, the whole country came under the dominion of king Philip V. and thereby lost all their noble privileges, which they had before resolved to maintain, or die in the defence of them.

Some geographers divide the country into Old and New Castile; to the former they reckon the strip of land lying from the Pyrenean mountains along the river Llobregat, as far as the Mediterranean on the E. and in the latter they comprehend that tract to the W. extending from Llobregat to the confines of Valencia and Aragon. The Spanish geographers usually divide it into 15 vigueries or jurisdictions, of which 6 lie along the coast; and these are Tortosa, Moulane, Tarragona, Villa Franca de Panades, Barcelona, and Gerona; in which last that of Ampurdan is included: two along the Pyrenean mountains, namely, Campredon and Puicerda, with the county of Cerdagne; two on the W. along the frontiers of Aragon; and these are Belaguer and Lerida, in the middle of the province: the other 5; namely, Agramont, Tarraga, Cervera, Manieza, and Vique.

CATANEA, anciently Catana, a city in Val di Demona, in the island of Sicily, and Lower Division of Italy; situated near the foot of mount Etna on the sea; by the fiery irruptions of which mountain, and by earthquakes, it has been frequently damaged; and the worst disaster of this kind which befel it was in the year 1693, when the cathedral, with great part of the city, was swallowed up, and 18,000 people are said to have perished in the ruins; but it was not so utterly destroyed as not to recover itself again; it is the see of a bishop, and has a port-town. In ancient times it was one of the richest and most powerful cities in all Sicily. Lat. 42, 40, N. Long. 20, 30, E.

CATANZARA, the capital of the Further Calabria, in the kingdom of Naples and Lower Division of Italy, is a small place, but the see of a bishop, and seat of a jurisdiction. Lat. 39, 2, N. Long. 18, 20, E.

CATARACTONIUM, an ancient city of the Romans in Yorkshire. It most probably stood at the confluence of the Tees and Greta, at a place called Merton, where indeed ruins are still visible, and also about Greta-bridge just by.

CATARO, capital of the territory of Cataro, in the Venetian Dalmatia, situated on the E. side of the gulph of its own name, over against the farthest point of Italy; E. long. 19, 12. Lat. 42, 40. This port, with about 17 villages and castles dependent on it, has been subject to the Venetians since 1400, and is the see of a bishop. It stands near the frontiers of Albania, on the declivity of a hill, both strong by situation and works, being defended by a strong castle on the top of the hill.

CATECK, a walled city of Orissa, one of the southern provinces of Indostan and Mogul empire, in Asia. It stands on an island, in a river of the same name; a league in length, and a mile broad, with a garrison of 500 horse, and the same number of foot. The English East India Company had once a fine factory here: their fabrics are cotton-cloths. The place is not a quarter inhabited, and lies about 25 leagues from the sea, CATEGAT, the passage from the German ocean into the Sund or entrance into the Baltic. It lies between the N. part of Jutland, the islands of Funen and Seeland, and the coasts of Sweden and Norway.

CATELET, a town of Vermandois, in the Upper Stadtholdership, and government of Picardy and Artois, in France; and lies in a small territory which contains the bourg of Beaufort, near which rises the river Scheld. It has belonged to the archbishopric of Cambrai above these 300 years. In 1674 it was dismantled.

CATHARINENBURG, (Circle of), in the province of Tobolskoi, in Siberia, and Asiatic part of Russia. It is so called from the Empress Catharine, wife of Peter the Great, and is rich in mines, which are worked.

Of the same name is a regular town, built after the German fashion, on the river Iset, which runs through the middle of it. By reason of the vicinity nity of the Bashkirs it is provided with fortifications, and two companies of soldiers, together with a company of artillery, as a garrison. In the town are upwards of 450 dwelling-houses built at the emperor's charges. The public structures are a wooden church, a stone chancery-house, a warehouse with shops, an arsenal and custom-house, where the goods of merchants which go through this place to the annual fair at Irbitz are allowed to be deposited, but at no other time. This place may be looked upon as the center of all the Siberian mine-works. And on the Iset is made a dam 98 fathoms long, 3 high, and 20 broad, so strong against undulations as to supply the many hammer or flattening mills with a sufficient quantity of water. These works are in a flourishing condition.

CATHARINENTHAL, a fine Imperial palace with gardens, in the general government of Reval, and province of Livonia, now belonging to Russia.

CATHARINENHOF, an Imperial country-seat of Ingermanland, in European Russia. It lies on the Neva-stream, and in one of the most delightful places in the wood about Petersburg; but exposed to frequent inundations.

St. CATHERINE'S ISLAND, on the coast of Brasil, lies in W. long. from London 49, 45, and extends from S. lat. 27, 35, to that of 28. It is esteemed by the natives to be no where above 2 leagues broad, though about 9 long. Although it be of considerable height, yet it is scarce discernable at the distance of 10 leagues, being then obscured under the continent of Brasil, whose mountains are exceeding high; but on nearer approach it is easily distinguished, and may be readily known by a number of small islands at each end, and scattered along the E. side of it. The best entrance to the harbour is between a point of land and the Island of Alvaredo, where ships may pass, under guidance of their lead, without the least apprehensions of danger. There are 4 forts for the defence of the harbour.

The soil of the island is truly luxuriant, producing fruits of many kinds spontaneously; and the ground is covered with one continual forest of trees of a perpetual verdure, which from the exuberance of the soil are so entangled with briars, thorns, and underwood, as to form a thicket absolutely impenetrable, except by some narrow pathways, which the inhabitants have made for their own convenience. These, with a few spots cleared for plantations along the shore facing the continent, are the only uncovered parts of the island. The woods are extremely fragrant, from the many aromatic trees and shrubs with which they abound; and the fruits and vegetables of all climates thrive here, almost without culture, and are to be procured in great plenty; so that there is no want of pine-apples, peaches, grapes, oranges, lemons, citrons, melons, apricots, nor plantains. There are besides great abundance of onions and potatoes. The flesh provisions are however much inferior to the vegetables. There are indeed small wild cattle to be purchased, somewhat like buffaloes; but these are very indifferent food. There are likewise great plenty of pheasants, but they are not to be compared in taste to those we have in England. The other provisions of the place are monkeys, parrots, and, above all, fish of various sorts.

CATHERLOUGH, the capital of the county bearing the same name, and province of Leinster in Ireland. It sends 2 members to the Irish parliament. Lat. 52, 45, N. Long. 7, 5, W.

CATHNESS. See CAITHNESS.

CAT-ISLAND, or GUANAHANA, one of the Bahama Islands. It was first discovered by Columbus, on October 11, 1492, to which he gave the name of St. Salvadore. It lies on a particular bank to the E. of the Great Bank of the Bahamas, from which it is parted by a narrow channel, called Exuma Sound. Long. 74, 30. Lat. 24, 30.

CATTOCH, (Cape), the N. E. promontory of Yucatan, in Mexico, a province of North America. Lat. 21, 30, N. Long. 89, 5, W.

CATOLICA, a village of Romagna, a province of the Ecclesiastical State, in the Middle Division of Italy: whither the orthodox bishops retired, when out-voted by the Arian bishops, in the council of Rimini, held in the year 359; in memory of which event it got its name.

CATSAND. See CADSANT.

CATS-STREET, Suffex, 10 miles S. of Tunbridge-Wells. Fairs on April 14, and June 27.

CATSGROVE-HILL, a little rising ground, not a furlong from Reading in Berkshire, to the S. W. and within 100 yards of the Kennet, where is a stratum of oyster-shells 5 or 6 inches through the hill.

CATTARICK, York, West Riding, near Richmond, has a bridge over the river Swale, and there is a sort of cataract near it, from which it seems to have derived its ancient name Caturraeton, in Ptolemy, from whom it appears to have been a great city in the time of the Romans, one of whose highways crosses the river here. On the banks of it are foundations of great walls, like those of a castle, and a mount, with the appearance of 4 bulwarks, cast up, with great labour, to a vast height. The final destruction of this city was by the Danes.

CATTERTHUN, a strong camp in the county of Angus, near Brechin; and supposed by Mr. Pennant to be occupied by the Caledonians before their engagement with Agricola at the foot of the Grampian Mountains.

CATTHANITZ, a fort in the sangiacate of Widin and Bulgaria, a province of European Turkey, which covers the pass over the mountains.

CATTI,

CATTI, a people of Germany, very widely spread; on the E. reaching to the river Sala, on the N. to Westphalia; occupying, besides, Hesse, the Wetterau, and part of the track on the Rhine, and on the banks of the river Lohne. The Hercynian forest began and ended in their country.

CATTON, a market-town of Norfolk, noted for a brazen head being carried before the steward of the demesne, instead of a mace, and for a bridge over the river Duze. Also well known for its woollen manufactures.

CATWYCK, a very large and fine village in the neighbourhood of Leyden, in Holland, about 4 miles W. of that city. It stands on the Rhine. About 2 miles beyond it stands Catwyck on the Sea, the church of which is now washed by the waves; whereas, not many years ago, it stood in the middle of the town.

CATZENELLEBOGEN is a county (in which Darmstadt is situated) in Upper Hesse, divided into Upper and Lower Catzenellebogen, of which latter a part belongs to Hesse-Cassel, and the rest is divided between the branches of Darmstadt and Rhin-feld. This county (which was the seat of the ancient Catti) extends 20 miles E. and W. and 10 N. and S. between Nassau and the Rhine. The property of it was much disputed by the houses of Nassau and Hesse; but at the treaty of Passau it was given to the landgrave Philip; he paying William count of Nassau 600,000 crowns for the surrender of it. However, the house of Nassau still retains the title.

CATZENELLOBOGEN, the capital of the foregoing county, has a strong castle. E. long. 7, 40. Lat. 50, 20.

CAVA, a small, yet fruitful and pleasant island of the Orkneys, in the N. of Scotland, not far from Flotta.

CAVA, an episcopal city of the Hither Principate, and kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy. It is immediately subject to the pope, and lies 16 miles S. of the city of Naples. Lat. 40, 45, N. Long. 15, 5, E.

CAVUNA, one of the considerable streams in Asiatic Russia, that fall into the Ob.

CAVADO, one of the principal rivers of Portugal. Its source is in the province of Traz-los-montes, and below Barcelos it falls into the sea.

CAVAILLON, or CAVILLON, a small town in the jurisdiction of Isle, and county of Venaissin, a subdivision of Avignon, in the government of Provence, in France. It stands high in an island formed by the river Durance, an arm of which falls into the Calavon; is the see of a bishop, and the seat of a provincial judge, also of another particular judge: here is an abbey. Lat. 43, 50, N. Long. 5, 4, E.

VOL. I.—No. 32.

CAVALLA, a town of Macedonia, a province of European Turkey, on the gulph of Contessa, likewise called the gulph of Cavalla. The ruins of walls are still to be seen, that reached to the very top of the mountains. Its castle is still entire; and here are also the remains of an aqueduct, with a double row of arches over one another. This town has some trade.

CAVALLO, a sea-port town in the province of Venezula on the Terra Firma, or Isthmus of Darien, 25 miles N. E. of St. Jago de Leon. It was attacked by commodore Knowles, but without any success. Lat. 10, 15. Long. 68, 1.

CAVAN, the principal place of a county of the same name, and province of Ulster, in Ireland, 6 miles N. W. of Dublin. It sends two members to parliament. Lat. 54, 2, N. Long. 7, 35, W.

CAUCA, a river in the Isthmus of Darien, whose source is in common with that of La Madalena in the lake Papas, near the 8th degree of S. latitude, and which, about 30 leagues from Carthage, falls into this last river, after a course of 160 leagues, nearly in the same direction.

CAUCASUS, the name of a very high mountain in Asia, being one of that great ridge which runs between the Black and Caspian seas. Sir John Chardin describes this as the highest mountain, and the most difficult to pass, of any he had seen. It has frightful precipices, and in many places the roads are cut out of the solid rock. At the time he passed it, the mountain was entirely covered with snow; so that, in many places, his guides were obliged to clear the way with shovels. The mountain is 36 leagues over, and the summit of it 8 leagues in breadth. The top is perpetually covered with snow; and our traveller relates, that the two last days he seemed to be in the clouds, and was not able to see 20 paces before him. Excepting the very top, however, all the parts of Mount Caucasus are extremely fruitful; abounding in honey, corn, fruits, hogs, and large cattle. The vines twine about the trees, and rise so high, that the inhabitants cannot gather the fruit from the uppermost branches. There are many streams of excellent water, and a vast number of villages. The inhabitants are for the most part Christians of the Georgian church. They have fine complexions, and the women are very beautiful. In the winter they wear snow-shoes in the form of rackets, which prevent their sinking in the snow, and enables them to run upon it with great swiftness.

CAUCHAN, close by the Niefter, is the principal seat of the Akerman Tartars, in European Turkey.

CAUDE, one of the rivers near Carlisle.

CAUDEBEC, in Latin Calidum Beccum, i. e. a warm brook or rivulet: a small, but populous town of Ceaux and Upper Normandy, in the government of the latter name, in France. It lies on the N. side of the Seine, into which a brook falls here, which runs through the town, and gives it its name. Its manufacture of hats was formerly more considerable and beneficial than it is at present. They drive a good trade by sea. The English took this place in 1419, and the Reformed in 1562; but the king's troops retook it from the latter in 1592. Lat. 49. 32. N. Long. 0. 45. E.

vernment

C A

CAUDEN, or CODAN, a town in the Circle of Prague, on the river Eger, noted for excellent beer.

CAUDIES, a town in the diocese of Alet, in Languedoc, at the foot of the Pyrenean mountains.

CAUDIUM, a little town in ancient Samnium, about a league from Calatia in Campania, Italy. It is said to be now called Arpaia, a village in the Farther Principate, Naples.

CAVE'S-ISLAND, as called in the Dutch draughts, lies in lat. 3. 25. S. and meridian distance from Cape Mabø 1316 miles in the Southern Country. It is a high island, about 4 or 5 leagues round, very woody, and full of plantations on the sides of the hills; and in the bays by the water-side are abundance of cocoa-nut-trees.

CAVERAC, though a small place in the diocese of Nîmes, has a beautiful castle or palace.

CAVILHANO, a large and populous town of Portuguese Estremadura, near the river Zézere, containing 12,000 inhabitants.

CAVITE, a port in Manila, 3 leagues from Manila, and upon the same bay.

CAUQUENES, a river in Chili, which runs into the river Maule.

CAWLEYWOOD, a fine covert on the top of a hill in Bucks, belonging to the duke of Bridgewater. It is one of the greatest land-marks in the S. of England, overlooking 11 counties.

CAWOOD, a market-town of Yorkshire, about 9 miles S. of York city. It has a castle, and an annual fair on May 12, for cattle and wooden ware.

CAXAMARCA, a jurisdiction in the diocese of Truxillo, in Peru, South America. It lies E. of Truxillo city, extending along a vast interval between the Cordilleras of the Andes; here are all sorts of corn, fruits, and esculent vegetables; with cattle, sheep, especially hogs, the farmers driving a considerable trade in these last-mentioned creatures at Lima, Truxillo, &c. The Indians weave cottons for sails, bed-curtains, quilts, &c. Of the same name is its capital, where Pizarro, the Spanish general, took Atabalipa, the inca of Peru, prisoner; and, in 1533, murdered him in cold blood.

CAXAMARQUILA, a small jurisdiction in the empire of Peru, in the bishopric of Truxillo.

C A

CAXATAMBO, a jurisdiction in the archbishopric of Lima, in the empire of Peru: it begins 35 leagues N. E. from Lima. There are here very fine silver mines, and it abounds with herds and flocks, wheat, barley, maize, and great numbers of Indians are employed in making baize, and other coarse stuffs.

CAXTON, a post-town of Cambridgeshire, between Royston and Huntingdon, and on the great N. road; it is remarkable for being the birth-place of Caxton, who was the first printer in England. It lies 50 miles N. of London. Here two annual fairs are held, May 5, and October 12, for pedlary.

CAYA, a frontier river between Spain and Portugal. It rises near Portalegre, in the latter kingdom, and running S. E. divides both: about a mile from Badajoz, in Spanish Estremadura, it falls into the Guadiana.

CAYAMBURO, one of the largest mountains of the Cordilleras in the province of Quito, South America, 18,000 feet high: its summits are covered with snow and ice. Its vicinity renders the whole plain of Cayambe cold; which is increased by the violence and continuance of the winds.

CAYCOS BANK, in the Windward Passage, West Indies, extends 22 leagues from E. to W. and 19 leagues from N. to S. being surrounded on the N. by the Caycos. On this bank are many little islands or quays. The S. side is encompassed by reefs and rocks, in which are passages to get upon the reef. The white banks form several points and windings, the southernmost of which is in lat. 21. 2, and bears N. from the Grange (Monte Christo) about 21 leagues. The length of the Little Cayco has been measured in a boat, in a fresh breeze, and smooth water; the log hove frequently, and there was not any difference in the going and coming back, therefore it is probably very exact.

This island is low land, whose border is of sharp stones, which resound like a bell: it is the worst ground which can be seen; there are neither salt ponds, savannas, nor fresh water. On the N. side, about 200 paces from the shore, there grow in the sand a few lataniers, which denote always a bad ground; the inland parts are covered with trees or bushes; the trees are smaller than those of the N. Cayco, and on the W. side, are all grubby; the bushes grow on sandy stones. On the middle of the island you find some gum trees, which perfume the air. Brailetto wood, and black candle trees. There are some ponds with brackish water; but as rain is not uncommon here, people who should have the misfortune to be cast away on the Little Cayco, would obtain fresh water; there is also plenty of wood-pigeons, doves, parrots, and teals which are fatter and of a better taste than any where else; some turtle, with shell-fish, crabs, &c. and a great many lizards.

Great Cayco is composed of 2 narrow islands, extending circularly above 30 leagues, and separated only by small creeks, on which there is not more than 2 feet water. The S. W. point of the western island, or northern Cayco, which is very small, is called Cape Mongon, it lies in lat. 21, 45, N. E. by N. $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the N. point of the Little Cayco.

The ground of the Great Cayco is not of the same nature as that of the islands already described, it is higher, more covered with woods, and though a little dry and stony, appears more proper for cultivation. The whole coast is covered with trees, but none of them seem to be fit for timber; among them grows the Brailetto wood. Round Canoe's cove the land is tolerably good, though it produces nothing but small trees, and grafs in the covered places; potatoes and other roots have succeeded well near this cove, where you meet with several lagoons, the water of which is drinkable in a case of necessity. There are some hogs in the island, and some wild dogs, which probably have come from some vessel which has been wrecked there; you find also parrots, wood-pigeons, and teals. The turtle is common, but chiefly of the logger-head kind. There is also plenty of fish, which you catch with the line; the kinds are the same as in the other islands, but they are larger and in greater plenty.

CAYENNE, a rich town and island of S. America, and capital of the French settlements there; bounded on the N. by the Dutch colonies of Surinam, and situated in W. long. 53, 10. N. lat. 50.

This settlement was began in 1635. A report had prevailed for some time before, that, in the interior parts of Guiana, there was a country known by the name of Del Dorado, which contained immense riches in gold and precious stones; more than ever Cortez and Pizarro had found in Mexico and Peru; and this fable had fired the imagination of every nation in Europe. It is supposed that this was the country in quest of which Sir Walter Raleigh went on his last voyage; and, as the French were not much behind their neighbours in their endeavours to find out so desirable a country, some attempts, for this purpose were likewise made by that nation much about the same time; which at last coming to nothing, the adventurers took up their residence on the island of Cayenne. In 1643, some merchants of Rouen, united their stock with a design to support the new colony; but committing their affairs to one Poncet de Bretigny, a man of a ferocious disposition, he declared war both against the colonists and savages, in consequence of which he was soon massacred. This catastrophe entirely extinguished the ardour of these associates; and in 1651, a new company was established. This promised to be much more considerable than the former; and they set out with such a capital as enabled them to collect 700 or 800 colonists in the city of Paris, itself. These embarked on the Seine, in order to sail down to Havre de Grace; but unfortunately, the Abbe de Marivault, a man of great virtue, and the principal promoter of the undertaking, was drowned as he was stepping into his boat. Another gentleman, who was to have acted as general, was assassinated on his passage; and 12 of the principal adventurers, who had promised to put the colony into a flourishing situation, not only were the principal perpetrators of this fact, but uniformly behaved in the same atrocious manner. At last they hanged one of their own number, two died, three were banished to a desert island, and the rest abandoned themselves to every kind of excess. The commandant of the citadel deserted to the Dutch with part of his garrison. The savages, roused by numberless provocations, fell upon the remainder, so that the few who were left, thought themselves happy in escaping to the Leeward islands in a boat and two canoes, abandoning the fort, ammunition, arms, and merchandise, 15 months after they had landed on the island.

In 1663, a new company was formed, whose capital amounted only to 8750l. By the assistance of the ministry, they expelled the Dutch, who had taken possession of the island, and settled themselves much more comfortably than their predecessors. In 1667, the island was taken by the English, and in 1676 by the Dutch, but afterwards restored to the French; and since that time it has never been attacked.

Soon after some pirates, laden with the spoils they had gathered in the South Seas, came and fixed their residence at Cayenne; resolving to employ the treasures they had acquired in the cultivation of the lands. In 1688, Ducasse, an able seaman, arrived with some ships from France, and proposed to them the plundering of Surinam. This proposal exciting their natural turn for plunder, the pirates betook themselves to their old trade, and almost all the rest followed their example. The expedition, however, proved unfortunate. Many of the assailants were killed; and all the rest taken prisoners and sent to the Caribbee islands. This loss the colony has never yet recovered.

The island of Cayenne is about 16 leagues in circumference, and is only parted from the continent by two rivers. By a particular formation, uncommon in islands, the land is highest near the water side, and low in the middle. Hence the land is so very full of morasses, that all communication between the different parts of it is impossible, without taking a great circuit. There are some small tracts

tracts of an excellent soil to be found here and there; but the generalty is dry, sandy, and soon exhausted.

The only town in the colony is defended by a covert way, a large ditch, a very good mud rampart, and 5 bastions. In the middle of the town is a pretty considerable eminence, of which a redoubt has been made that is called the fort. The entrance into the harbour is through a narrow channel, and ships can only get in at high water through the rocks and reefs that are scattered about this pass.

The first produce of Cayenne was the arnotto; from the produce of which, the colonists proceeded to that of cotton, indigo, and lastly sugar. It was the first of all the French colonies that attempted to cultivate coffee. The coffee-tree was brought from Surinam in 1721, by some deserters from Cayenne, who purchased their pardon by so doing. Ten or twelve years after they planted cocoa. In the year 1752, there were exported from Cayenne, 260,541 pounds of arnotto, 86,363 pounds of sugar, 17,919 pounds of cotton, 26,881 pounds of coffee, 91,916 pounds of cocoa, 618 trees for timber, and 104 planks.

CAYLOMA, a jurisdiction in the diocese of Arequipa, in South America. It begins about 30 leagues E. of Arequipa city, and is famous for a mountain of the same name, and the silver-mines it contains, which yield considerably: but the cold here is so intense, that the inhabitants are obliged to have recourse to the neighbouring provinces for the fruits of the earth. In some parts of this province are wild asses.

CAYMANS, 3 small islands, 40 leag. N. N. W. of Jamaica; the most S. W. of which is called the Great Caymans, which is inhabited; its situation is very low, but is covered with high trees, and habitable part is about half a mile long. The first account we have of them is, that Columbus fell in with these islands on his return from Porto-Bello to Hispaniola. Its coasts were covered with turtle, which swarmed in such multitudes as to look like rocks.

These islands were never occupied by the Spaniards; but, after other European adventurers found the way into America, they became much frequented by rovers of different nations, chiefly the French, for the sake of turtle.

The instinct which directs the turtle to find these islands, and to make their annual visitation with so much regularity, is truly wonderful. The greater part of them emigrate from the gulph of Honduras, at the distance of 150 leagues, and perform this tedious navigation with an accuracy superior to the best efforts of human skill. The females are said to lay no less than 900 eggs, which circumstance, if true, may account for the constant amazing multiplication of their species in those seas. When the season for hatching is over, they withdraw to the shores of Cuba, and other large islands in the neighbourhood. The shores of the Caymans being very low and sandy, is perfectly well adapted to receive and hatch their eggs, and the rich submarine pastures around the larger islands, afford a sufficient plenty of nourishing herbage to repair the waste they have undergone.

Cayman Braque and Little Cayman lie within 4 or 5 miles of each other, and about 14 leagues distant N. from the Great Cayman. They are generally seen by navigators, who make their voyage homeward from Jamaica, through the gulph of Florida. It has no harbours for ships of burthen, only a tolerable anchoring-place on the S. W. The number of inhabitants is about 160, who are descendants of the old buccaniers. They have no clergyman amongst them, but go to Jamaica to be married. This little colony is undoubtedly the happiest in the West-Indies; the climate and soil, which are singularly salubrious, render these people healthy and vigorous, and enable them to live to a great age. The Little Cayman produces plenty of corn and vegetables, hogs and poultry, much beyond what is wanted for their own consumption. They have also sugar-canes, and plenty of good water. Their principal employment is fishing for turtle, and piloting vessels to the adjoining islands. The turtles, of which they have great plenty, enable them to supply Port-Royal and other places with great quantities. The Great Caymans lies in Lat 19, 20. Long. 80, 50.

CAYO, a village of Caermarthenshire, in South Wales, which gives denomination to a hundred. It has 2 fairs, viz. on August 21, and October 6, for cattle, horses, and pedlary wares.

CAYOR, or CAJOR, a kingdom Guinea, and Negroland, in Africa. It begins about 2 leagues above the island of St. Lewis, S. of the river Senegal, and extends about 30 leagues S. along the coast a little beyond Cape Verde.

CAYOR, a village near the lake of that name, in the kingdom of the Pholeys, in Negroland, in Africa. Here is a trade not only with the Negroes, but also with the Moors, for millet, elephants teeth, hides, ostrich feathers, and ambergris.

CAYSTER, a river celebrated by the poets for the swans that frequented its banks, has its source in Phrygia Major, and empties itself into the Aegean sea, near Ephesus. It is by the Turks now called Minder scare, or Little Mæander.

CAYTONE, or CAYTONGUE, one of the most considerable inland towns in the island of Bornea, in Asia. It lies 100 miles up the river Banjar. Here the the sultan, who is the most potent prince of the island, has a palace. Lat. 3, 0. S. Long. 114, 0, E.

CAZALLA, a town of Andalusia, in Spain, belonging to the duke of Offuna. In its neighbourhood excellent wine is produced.

CAZENA, a country in Negroland, in Africa. borders E. on the kingdom of Cano, and is full of mountains and dry fields, which yet produce great plenty of millet. The negroes are exceeding black, with great noses and broad lips. None of their villages contain more than 300 families, in forlorn poor cottages, wherein they are greatly oppressed by famine.

CEA, a town of Guarda, and province of Beira, in Portugal; it contains 1000 inhabitants in one parish. To its district belong 10 parishes more.

CEAUX, or CAUX, a country of Upper Normandy, in the government of the latter name, in France; so called from its ancient inhabitants the Caletes: the inhabitants are now called Cauchois. That part of it which forms the government of Havre de Grace is not included here. It lies between the Seine, the ocean, Picardy, the country of Bray, and the Vexin Normand. A point of it advances into the sea, and is called the Cape of Ceaux. It is a high and level country, but little good water; yet is fertile in all sorts of grain. The whole country abounds in apple and pear trees, of which cider and perry are made, the country being too cold for vineyards.

CEBBE, a river in the Isle of Man, which runs into the Irish sea at Caltregh.

CEBRET, (Mount,) in the neighbourhood of the county of Lemos, and province of Galicia, in Spain.* Here is a surprising well, called Lonzana, the water of which is sometimes very cold, and sometimes very warm; and it is said to be regulated according to the ebbing and flowing of the sea.

CEBU, one of the Philippine islands in the Indian ocean, and is situated between those of Layte and Negro.

CECIL, a county in Maryland, runs along parallel with Newcastle and Kent counties in Pennsylvania. The W. part of it is so near the Delaware, that the cut would not be above 8 or 10 miles to join that bay and river to Chesapeake.

CEDOGNA, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Farther Principate, with a bishop's see. It is now half ruined, and seated at the foot of the Appennine mountains, 12 miles N. W. of Melfi. Long. 15, 33, E. Lat. 41, 5, N.

CEDRON, (brook,) runs along the bottom of the valley of Jehosaphat, which lies E. of Jerusalem, between it and Mount Olivet. In summer it is dry, but during winter rains it is level with its banks; and therefore over it is an arched stone-bridge, said to have been built by Helena.

CELALU, anciently Cephalædis, a small city of Sicily, in Lower Italy, with a harbour, and is the see of a bishop. Lat. 38, 5, N. Long. 15, 4, E.

CELANO, a town in the Farther Abruzzo, a province of Naples, in Lower Italy. It gives title of count to the Savelli family, and lies not a great way from the Lago di Celano, that takes its name from it, but anciently called Lacus Fucinus.

CELANOVA, a town of Galicia in Spain, on the river Lima; and in its neighbourhood are produced great quantities of chefnuts.

CELEBES, an island in the Indian sea, seated under the equator, and called by some Macassar. The length and breadth has not been accurately computed; but the circumference, at a medium, is about 800 miles. It had formerly 6 kingdoms, which are reduced to one. The air is hot and moist, and subject to great rains during the N. W. winds, which blow from November to March, at which time the country is overflowed, and for this reason they build their houses on piles of wood 10 feet high. The most healthful time is during the northern monsoons, which seldom fail blowing regularly in one part of the year. The chief vegetables are rice and cocoas; but they have ebony, sanders, &c. Their fruits and flowers are much the same as in the neighbouring parts of the Indies. They have pepper, sugar, betel, areca, the finest cotton, and opium. The natives have bright olive complexions, and the women have shining black hair. They are thought to be very handsome by the Dutch and Chinese, who often purchase them for bedfellows. The men are industrious, robust, and make excellent soldiers. Their arms are sabres, and trunks, from whence they blow poisoned darts, which are pointed with the tooth of a sea fish. Some likewise use poisoned daggers. They were the last of the Indian nations that were enslaved by the Dutch, which could not be effected till after a long war.

They teach their children to read and write, and their characters have some resemblance of the Arabic. Their religion being Mahometan, which they embraced about 2 centuries ago, the men indulge themselves in many wives and concubines. The employment of the women is spinning, cookery, and making their own and their husbands clothes. The men wear jewels in their ears, and the women gold chains about their necks. The inhabitants in general go half naked, without any thing on their head, legs, or feet, and some have nothing but a cloth about their middle. The streets of the town of Macassar are spacious, and planted with trees on every side. It stands by the side of the only large river.

river they have in the island. The Dutch have a fort here, mounted with 40 guns, and garrisoned with 700 men. There is only one other town of note, called Jampandam, where they have also a fort. The island is not near so populous as when the Dutch conquered it; the men being hired for soldiers in most of the neighbouring countries.

The religion of these islands was formerly idolatry. They worshipped the sun and moon. They sacrificed to them in the public squares, having no materials which they thought valuable enough to be employed in raising temples.

CELL, some call it ZELL, a town of Triers, in the Circle of the Lower Rhine, in Germany, on the E. shore of the Moselle. It is a populous and open place, situated among vineyards, and subject to the elector of Triers. Lat. 50, 10, N. Long. 6, 45, E.

CELLERFIELD, a mine-town in the principality of Grubenhagen, and is the seat of the mine-bailiwick office of the common Upper Harz, as also of a common mint, in which between 250,000 and 300,000 rix-dollars are annually coined in silver specie. Here is a good library at the parochial church, and a Latin-school. In 1737 and 1753, this town suffered by fire.

CELLES EN BERRIE, a town of the Lower Division of the latter name, in France, on the river Cher, over which is a bridge. It has a considerable abbey, a convent and hospital.

CELORICO, a town in the district of Guarda, and province of Beira, in Portugal. It contains 1100 inhabitants in 3 parishes, and in its jurisdictions are 19 more.

CELTES, or CELTÆ, a people who inhabited the greatest part of Gaul, hence called also Galli, who sent several considerable colonies into Italy, and other neighbouring parts. They possessed a country, comprising not only all the present France, but part of Italy likewise, as far as the river Rubicon, which falls into the Adriatic sea, between Ravenna and Rimini; and all that part of Germany and Belgium, which lies within the river Rhine.

CELTIBERIA, a country of the Hither Spain, along the right or S. W. side of the river Iberus; though sometimes the greatest part of Spain was called by the name of Celtiberia. The people were denominated Celtiberi, or the Celtæ, seated on the Iberus. They were very brave and warlike, their cavalry in particular was excellent. They wore a black and rough cloak, the shag of which was like goats hair. Some of them had light bucklers like the Gauls; others hollow and round ones like those of other nations. They all wore boots made of hair, and iron helmets adorned with crests of a purple colour. They used swords which cut on both sides, and poinards of a foot long. Their arms were of an admirable temper, and are said to have been prepared in the following manner; they buried plates of iron under ground, where they let them remain till the rust had eaten the weakest part of the metal, and the rest was consequently hard and firm. Of this excellent iron they made their swords, which were so strong and well tempered, that there was neither buckler nor helmet that could resist their edge. The Celtiberians were very cruel towards their enemies and malefactors, but shewed the greatest humanity to their guests. They not only cheerfully granted their hospitality to strangers who travelled in their country, but were desirous that they should seek protection under their roof.

CENCHREA, mentioned Acts xviii. 18. was the port, or road for ships, belonging to Corinth, on the E. bay.

CENEDA, a small episcopal city of the marquisate of Trevigiano, one of the Venetian provinces, in Upper Italy. Lat. 46, 5, N. Long. 12, 40, E.

CENIS, a mountain which is a part of the Alps, and separates the marquisate of Susa from Morianne.

CENTAPOUR, a town of Cuncan, and Mogul empire, in Asia. It has the best bay for shipping on the coast, 4 leagues N. of Rajapour, and 20 from Goa.

CENTO, a town of the Ferrarese, and Ecclesiastical State, in the Middle Division of Italy, formerly well fortified: it is remarkable for nothing now but a fine collection of paintings, by Francisco Barbieri, a native of this place. It stands about 18 miles from the city of Ferrara, and has a communication with it by a canal.

CENTURI, in the Di quo li Monte, in Corsica, is the Centurinum of Ptolemy, and stands on the utmost N. verge or cape of the island, over against the little island Centuria, to which it gives name.

CENTURIFE, formerly one of the richest cities in Sicily, is now but a small village, called by the natives Centorbe. It stood, according to Strabo, at the foot of Mount Ætna, not far from the river Symæthus, now La Jaresta.

CENU, a town of Terra Firma, in S. America, 80 miles S. of Carthagenæ. Lat. 9, N. Long. 76, 10, W.

CEPHALONIA, or CEPHALLENIA, an island in the Ionian Sea, was known in Homer's time by the names of Sames or Samos, and Black Epirus or Epirus Melæna, and reckoned about 80 miles long, 40 broad, and 130 in compass. It had anciently 4 cities; but Ptolemy speaks but of 1, which bore the name of the island; Strabo but of 2 in his time; whilst Pliny speaks of 3, and that the ruins of Samæ

C E

Samæ, which had been destroyed by the Romans, were still to be seen. Samæ was the capital, and is supposed to have stood in the place which the Italians call Porto Guiscardo. The other 3 cities were Prone, Cranii, and Palæ. This island was subdued by the Thebans under the conduct of Amphitryo, who is said to have killed Pterelas, who then reigned here. At this time, one Cephelus, a man of great distinction at Athens, having accidentally killed his wife Procris in shooting at a deer, fled hither to Amphitryo, who pitying him, not only received him kindly, but made him governor of the island, which henceforth was called Cephalonia. It fell in time under the power of the Macedonians, then of the Ætolians, and was at length reduced by M. Ful. Nobilior, who, mastering the metropolis after 4 months siege, sold all the citizens for slaves, and added the island to the demesnes of the Roman republic.

To speak of this island as it is now, we must call it Cephalonia, or Cefalonia; (Cefalogne by the French) and is one of the largest the Venetians have in this sea, and disputes advantage in that respect with Corfu, and Spon says it exceeds it by 20 miles. This island is agreed on all hands to be very fertile, especially in red wines, excellent muscadine raisins and currants, and fine oil; in all which the people here drive a very advantageous commerce. It is chiefly inhabited by Greeks, who pay tribute to Venice. Its bishopric is subject to the metropolitan of Corfu, and united to that of Zante. The island is divided into 17 (according to some, 20 according to others) districts. It is altogether mountainous, there being scarce a plain of any extent. It is situated between the island of Leucades, or St. Maura, N. and Zante S. about 12 miles from the former, and 20 from the latter, and not above 24 from the W. coast of the Morea, under 38 degrees lat. and 20 E. long. The chief town, viz. Cephalonia, a small city and fortrefs in the island from which it has its name, and is situated on a hill about 6 miles from Argostoli, the principal port of the island and residence of the governor; which said port is large and well sheltered on all sides; but anchors stick not fast enough at bottom. At its entrance is a large village, where the raisin-merchants mostly reside. There are 2 other ports, 1 at Pescarda, another at Luxuri, Luckefuri, the former for small, the latter for large vessels. Another fortrefs is called Aſſo, which with Cephalonia are the only places of strength.

CEPHISSUS, a considerable river of Livadia, one of the provinces of European Turkey; it empties itself into the Copay-lake, which it properly forms.

CERAM, one of the Indian islands in the ocean, of the former name, in Asia. On the N. it has Molucca and Gilolo: on the S. Amboyna and the Banda Isles, being about 150 miles in length, and 60 in breadth. It lies between lat. 3, S. and long. 126 and 129, E. Here the Dutch have a fort for curbing the natives, which, at the same time contributes to their defending the possession of the Spice Islands.

CERASUS, a city of Pontus Cappadocius, built by the inhabitants of Sinope, in Paphlagonia, to whom it paid, as Xenophon observes, a yearly tribute. From this town Lucullus brought the first cherries into Italy, therefore by the Latins called Cerasa. The country is very hilly, and the hills covered with woods, wherein cherries grow naturally. Cerasus, according to Arrian, was afterwards named Pharnacia; but Strabo and Ptolemy speak of Cerasus and Pharnacia as 2 distinct towns. It is still a pretty large town, by name Cerasonte, and seated on the sea-coast, at the foot of a little hill between two very steep rocks, with a ruinous castle built by the emperors of Trebizond on top of the rock, which is to the right as you enter the harbour. It doth not appear to have been a considerable place either for traffic or opulence, and seems to have been chiefly valued for its timber and numerous flocks. It was anciently an episcopal see. Tournefort, who failed by it, says it appeared a large well built city. The plain about it produces a great variety of plants as well as cherries. The Turks call it Kirifun. It stands about 44 miles W. of Trebezond, and 9 N. of Zafra. E. long. 38, 7. Lat. 40, 54.

CERAUNIAN or ACROCERAUNIAN mountains, in Chaonia, Epirus, now called Monti della Chimera, parting the Ionian and Adriatic seas, were so called from their being frequently struck with lightning. The sea between these mountains and Italy is so narrow that Virgil reports Æneas's having failed over it in half a night's time.

CERBERA RIVER, or RIO SHERBRO, on the coast of S. Guinea, is a large river coming from very far up the inland to the sea, through the country of Boulm-Manou, a land full of morasses, and swampy grounds, and loseth itself in the Ocean near Cerbera Island. Some call it Madre-Bombe, others Rio Selbobe, others Rio das Palmas, from the Portuguese. It is navigable for ships of burthen for 20 leagues.

CERDAGNE, (La), a small territory, of which one part belongs to Spain, giving title of count, and the other to France. The latter is in the government of Rouffillon, and was ceded to the kingdom of France by treaty in 1660. It is about a league and a half in breadth.

CERE, (St.), a town of Upper Quercy and Guienne Proper, in the government of the former name, and Gascony, in France. It belongs to viscount Turenne. Lat. 44, 45, N. Long. 1, 33, E.

CEREINA, an island which lies near the Little Syrtis, on the coast of Africa, in the Mediterranean, nean, and is now known by the name of Cereara. Here Marius took refuge, till recalled by Cinna.

CEREMISSI, a territory of Little Novogorod, in Russia, lying on the Wolga.

CERENZA, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Hither Calabria, with a bishop's see. It is seated on a rock 10 miles N. W. of St. Severina. Long. 17, 15, E. Lat. 39, 23, N.

CERET, a town of Perpignan, a county of Roussillon, in the government of the latter name, belonging to France. It lies at the foot of the Pyrenean mountains, near the river Tec; the suburb of which is larger than the place itself. It has two convents, and a magnificent bridge of one arch.

CERIGO, anciently Cythera, an island in the Candian sea, and European Turkey, between Candia and the Morea, about 50 miles N. of the former, and near the E. part of the latter. It is a mountainous rocky country, which yields but very little corn, wine, or oil, and has not a great number of inhabitants. The principal town lies on the S. side of the island, and on a dreadful precipice stands a castle, but the harbour under it is exposed to S. winds. This island was anciently dedicated to Venus, whose native country it was; as also of Helen, the occasion of the siege and destruction of Troy. Lat. 36, 5, N. Long. 23, 40, E.

CERINES, a town of the Island of Cyprus, with a good castle, harbour, and a Greek bishop's see. Long. 33, 35, E. Lat. 35, 22, N.

CERINTHUS, a city which Pliny counts among the ancient ones of Eubœa.

CERNACHE, a town in the district of Coimbra, and province of Beira, in Portugal, it has but one parish, containing 1000 souls.

CERNE-ABBEY, Dorsetshire, 5 miles N. of Dorchester, and 123 from London, was built by St. Austin; has a market on Wednesday, fairs on Midlent-Monday, and Holy-Thurday, and on October 2. A rivulet runs from hence to the river Frome.

CEROLICO DE BASTO, a town and district of Guimarens, and province of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal. It includes 38 parishes.

CERRIOY DRUIDON, Denbighshire, North-Wales, 8 miles from Ruthin, and 8 miles from Denbigh. Fairs on April 27, August 27, October 20, and December 7.

CERRITO, a well inhabited place of Lavoro, a province of the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy; here they manufacture good cloth.

CERVERA, a small but strong town of Catalonia, in Spain. It stands high, on a river of the same name, and has a palace or castle belonging to it.

C E

CERVETERI, anciently CÆRE, one of the 12 old Hetruscan cities, but now a small place in St. Peter's Patrimony, a province of the Ecclesiastical State, in the Middle Division of Italy.

CERVIA, a small and newly-erected city of Romagna, a province of the Ecclesiastical State, in the Middle Division of Italy, close upon the sea, with fine broad streets, the houses in which are mostly built under one roof. It was formerly about a quarter of a mile farther from the sea, till in 1703 it was removed by reason of its unhealthy air to its present site. It is the see of a bishop, suffragan to the metropolitan of Ravenna. Towards the land, near the city, is a low piece of ground upwards of half an hour's journey long, and in some parts the same in breadth; into which, in the middle of the summer, the sea-water is conveyed, by means of a fine broad canal; and from it the heat of the sun, by evaporation, prepares salt; which the Papal chamber gathers, and therewith supplies the provinces of Urbino, Ferrara, Ancona, Bologna, and Romagna. Lat. 44, 30, N. Long. 13, 5, E.

CESAREA, or MASA KAISAREA, now CAESAR, once the capital of Cappadocia, in Asia Minor, or Asiatic Turkey. It anciently stood on Mount Argæus, and near the N. banks of the Milas. It was once a considerable and very large city, and the see of the great St. Basil. It now stands in a delightful plain, about half an hour's journey from the above-mentioned river, and is walled; with a castle in the middle of the place. Its bazars are well stocked, and the inhabitants drive a considerable trade in cotton. It is well supplied with water; and in its neighbourhood are several towers of various forms, supposed to have been Persian tombs, with Persian inscriptions upon them. The above-mentioned Mount Argæus is so high, as to have its top always covered with snow, and at the foot are the ruins of the old city, and several catacombs. This was the birth-place of the celebrated Greek historian Pausanias. Lat. 38, 36, N. Long. 35, 39, E.

CESENA, a city of Romagna and Ecclesiastical State, in the Middle Division of Italy, near the river of Savio, at the foot of a mountain, where are the ruins of a citadel. It is the see of a bishop, has good churches, convents, and well-built houses. Near it, on a mountain, stands a Benedictine convent, with a church of Santa Maria del Monte di Cesena. Lat. 44, 20, N. Long. 12, 20, E.

CESENATICO, a place of Romagna, and the Ecclesiastical State, in the Middle Division of Italy, on the sea, and is mostly inhabited by fishermen: it has a fine harbour and commodious canal. On its bridge are 2 beautiful marble pillars, of the Corinthian order.

CESTRICA,

CESTRICA CHERSONESUS. See CHES-TER or CHERSONESUS.

CETTE, SETTE, or St. Louis, a harbour in the diocese of Agde, and Lower Languedoc, belonging to the government of the latter name, in France. It lies near the promontory of St. Louis, and built at the charge of Lewis XIV. yet accessible only by galleys and small vessels, which lie safe here. As the sea, when tempestuously agitated, throws a deal of sand into it, the province is at the expence of cleaning it; so that it hath a depth of between 17 and 18 feet water. Here begins the famous royal canal of Languedoc. Lat. 43, 25. Long. 3, 46, E.

CEVA, a fortified town of the marquise of the same name, in the county of Asti, a subdivision of Piemont, in Upper Italy, with a castle on the river Tanaro, near the Genoese confines. Lat. 44, 25, N. Long. 8, 6, E.

CEVENNES, or SEVENNES, in Latin Cebennæ, the highest and steepest mountains of all Languedoc, in France; but very populous, as being the principal seat of the Reformed in that kingdom: whither they have frequently retired and defended themselves from the tyrannical oppressions of the French kings, and where, in the reign of queen Anne, the English fleet attempted to support them from the Mediterranean; but all to no purpose; for the French troops had occupied all the passes leading to them.

CEUTA, anciently Septa, (and supposed the Esihiia of Ptolemy,) in the province of Habat, in the kingdom of Fez, in Africa, is situate on a promontory, on the S. side of the straits of Gibraltar, almost opposite to it, 150 miles of Fez city; about 6 W. long. from London, lat. about 35, 58. It is situate at the foot of the mount of Apes, but on a rising ground jutting into the straits, and is the nearest point to the Spanish coasts. It is a considerable, well-built, fortified town, with a good harbour, having a very stout castle. It is a bishop's see, suffragan to that of Lisbon, and hath a good cathedral, with several other churches, and monasteries. The Goths took it from the Romans, the Mahometans from them, who lost it to the Portuguese, in 1409, with whom it remained till yielded to the Spaniards in 1668, by the treaty of Lisbon. In 1697, it sustained a vigorous siege against the Moors, who have in a manner carried it on ever since.

CEYLON, a large island in the East-Indies, about 250 miles in length, and 200 in breadth. The air is very good; the country full of mountains, but interspersed with fertile vallies; and is remarkable for producing excellent cinnamon. In some places are rich mines of sapphires, rubies, topazes, and cats-eyes, besides other stones of less value. There is also plenty of wood for dying, and all other uses. The animals are cows, buffaloes, goats, hogs, tigers, monkies, &c. They have large elephants, and monstrous serpents, which are very dangerous. The island is also infested with ants, which do a great deal of mischief. It lies from E. long. 78, to 82, and from N. lat. 6, to 10.

The conquest of this island was the first attempt of Albuquerque the celebrated Portuguese admiral. He found it well peopled, and inhabited by two different nations, the Bedas inhabiting the northern, and the Cinglases dwelling in the southern parts. The former were very barbarous, but the latter a good deal more polished. Besides the advantages already mentioned, which these nations derived from their mines of precious stones, they carried on the greatest pearl-fishery in the east. These nations the Portuguese conquered, and tyrannized over in such a manner, that they assisted the Dutch in expelling them from the island; and by their united efforts this was accomplished in 1658, after a bloody and obstinate war. All the Portuguese settlements fell into the hands of the Dutch East-India company, who still keep possession of them, except a small district on the eastern coast without any port, from whence the sovereign of the country had his salt. These settlements formed a regular tract, extending from 2 to 12 leagues into the inland parts of the island. The company have appropriated all the productions of the island. The several articles of trade are, 1. amethysts, sapphires, topazes, and rubies; the last are very small and very indifferent. The Moors who come from the coast of Coromandel to buy them, paying a moderate tax; and when they are cut, sell them at a low price in the different countries of India. 2. Pepper, which the company buys for about 4d. per pound; coffee for which they only pay 2d. and and cardamum which has no fixed price. These articles are all of an inferior quality, and through the indolence of the inhabitants will never turn to any account. 3. An hundred bales of handkerchief, pagnes, and gingham, of a fine red colour, which are fabricated by the Malabars at Jafranapatan. 4. A small quantity of ivory, and about 50 elephants, which are carried to the coast of Coromandel. 5. Areca, which the company buys at about 8s. 9d. the ammonan, and sells on the spot at 1l. 13s. to the merchants of Bengal, Coromandel, and the Maldives; who give in return rice, coarse linen, and cowries. 6. The pearl-fishery, which was formerly of great consequence, but is now so much exhausted as not to bring in more than 8750l. per annum. 7. After all, the great object of the company is cinnamon. They purchase the greatest part of their cinnamon of the Indians who are subject to them, and all expences deducted, it does not cost them above 6d. per pound.

The

The annual expences of the colony may amount to about 96,250*l.* their revenues and small branches of commerce produce only about 87,500*l.* This deficiency must be supplied out of the profits arising from the cinnamon trade; and they are obliged to provide for the expences of the wars in which they are frequently engaged with the king of Candy, who is at present the sole sovereign of the island. These are very detrimental to the interests of the Hollanders; for which reason they endeavour to engage the good-will of this monarch by shewing him all imaginable civilities. The harmony, however, has been often interrupted. In a bloody war, which terminated on the 14th of February 1766, the natives destroyed all the cinnamon plantations, but the Ceylonese monarch being driven from his capital, the Dutch made a very advantageous treaty. Their sovereignty was acknowledged over all that part of the country they possessed before the troubles broke out; and that part of the coasts held by the natives was ceded to them. They were allowed to gather cinnamon in all the plains; and the court was to sell them the best sort which is produced in the mountains, at the rate of 1*l.* 16*s.* 1*d.* for 18 pounds. The government engaged to have no connection with any foreign power; and even to deliver up any Europeans who may happen to stray into the island. In return for so many concessions, the king was to receive annually the value of the produce of the ceded coasts, and from thence his subjects were to be furnished gratis with as much salt as they had occasion for. The Ceylonese are in the most miserable situation; they are in a state of total inactivity; live in huts without any furniture; and subsist upon fruits; those who are the most affluent have no other covering than a piece of coarse linen wrapt about their waist.

CEZANE, or SEZANE, both a valley and bourg, which formerly were reckoned part of Dauphiny, in France; and is accordingly found so in particular maps; but since the peace of Utrecht, being one of the places ceded to the king of Sardinia, it is now reckoned to be in Piemont, in Upper Italy, on the confines of which principality it lies.

CHACHAPOYAS, a jurisdiction of Truxillo, which is one of the dioceses in the audience of Lima, in S. America. It lies E. of Truxillo. It is hot, being without the cordillera, and to the eastward it lies low. It is a province of great extent, but very thinly inhabited. The productions here are such as are natural to the like climates.

The Indians make cottons, particularly tapestry, which for the liveliness of its colours, and delicacy of the work, is very elegant. These, with the sail-cloth which they make here also, are very profitable, and highly valued in the other provinces.

CHABLAIS, (duchy of,) one of the provinces of Savoy, in Upper Italy. It lies along the lake of Geneva, and produces great quantities of wine, for which there was formerly a considerable demand in Swisserland; but as it rose to an exorbitant price, the Swiss bethought them to plant vines on their own side of the country; since that time the considerable revenues which Savoy drew from its wine have failed for the most part. Chablais is well cultivated, and in it is a beautiful intermixture of fields, vineyards, meadows, groves, and woods.

CHABAL, or CHABLIS, a town of Senonois, a subdivision of Champagne, in the government of the latter name, and of Brie, in France. It lies on the Armançon, near the Rurgundian confines; and is famous for its excellent wine; and also for a bloody battle fought in its neighbourhood, between the sons of Lewis the Debonair, emperor and king of France. It is commonly called the battle of Fontenay, a village about a league north of Chablais.

CHACO, a large country of S. America situated between 19, 37, and S. lat. It belongs to the Spaniards, by whom it was conquered in 1536. It is not naturally fruitful, but abounds in gold-mines, which are so much the more valuable, as they are easily worked. The works are carried on by about 8000 blacks, who deliver every day to their masters a certain quantity of gold; and what they can collect above this, belongs to themselves; as well as what they find on those days that are consecrated to religion and rest, upon condition that during the festival they maintain themselves. This enables many of them to purchase their liberty; after which they intermarry with the Spaniards.

CHADACA, anciently the metropolis of Albania.

CHAGFORD, or CHEGFORD, Devon. near Moreton-Hampstead and Dartmore. It is a flannery town, yet a poor inconsiderable place. It contains about 80 houses, and has a very handsome church. It is 15 miles from Exeter, and 187 from London. Fairs on March 25, May 4, Sept. 29, and Oct. 29.

CHAGRE, a rapid river of the isthmus of Darien, and Terra Firma, in S. America; it was formerly called Lagartos, from the number of alligators in it. The source of it is in the mountains near Cruces. Its mouth is in the N. sea, Lat. 9, 48, N. Long. 82, 0.

Its entrance is defended by a fort of the same name, situated on a rock, and on the E. side near the shore.

About 8 miles from the fort is a town also of the same appellation, built chiefly of reeds, and inhabited by Negroes, Mulattoes, and Mestizos, a brave active people. The town and castle of Chagre have been often taken; particularly about 1670, by the pirate Morgan, and that by the following odd accident, as Ulloa tells us; an arrow having been shot from the fort into the eye of one of his companions, companions, he gallantly pulled it out, and, after wrapping one end of it with cotton or tow, shot it out of his loaded piece, which happening to alight on the straw roof of the fort, set it on fire. Also in 1740, by admiral Vernon, where he found a large quantity of rich merchandise, most of the goods received by the galleons, except the plate, being sent down hither from Panama, in order to be shipped at Porto Bello for Europe. It lies a little S. W. of the last-mentioned place. Lat. 9, 50, N. Long. 82, 20, W. from London.

CHAIN, the name usually given to the great road across that part of Scotland leading from Inverness to Fort-Augustus, and so on to Fort-William or Innerlochy, in Lochaber. This is some part of Wade's roads; in it was a rock, which, before the mending the highways in that kingdom, at the public expence, was almost impracticable; and called Corryarrack, but now made quite easy to travellers.

CHAIN-ISLAND, one of the many new-discovered islands in the South Sea, by captain Cooke, in 1768, situated in lat. 17, 23. Long. 145, 54, W. It consists of low-lands, has a lagoon in the middle, is about 4 miles long, and of an oval figure, with a few clumps of trees, and a few inhabitants.

CHAIS-DIEU, a town of France, in Auvergne, with a celebrated Benedictine abbey, 12 miles E. of Brioude. Long. 3, 4, E. Lat. 45, 15, N.

CHAK, a city of Thebaida, or Upper Egypt, inhabited now by Arabs, in which is said to be the remains of a wonderful Theatre, encompassed by a wall of vast stones curiously carved, 14 spans thick, and of proportionable height. In the midst of it is the Place for Shews, almost 1 mile about, hemmed in by 6 rounds, in all 200, of large pillars, adorned with hieroglyphics, each 150 feet high, with a capital on which 5 persons may sit at their ease. In this theatre some Christians and Arabs live; and because of its strength, the robbers, when pursued by the bassa, retire to it. In the same city is a lake of green salt water, not so coloured by corruption, nor is it known whence it springs, or whither it flows; but it swells as the Nile grows small, and sinks as that river rises. What is more, dirty linen put into it immediately turns white. They say it had formerly a hard stone bottom in all parts, being a quarter of a mile about.

CHALAMONT, one of the 12 castlewards of the sovereign principality of Lombes, lying within the circuit of Burgundy, though not belonging to its government. In it is a small town of the same name, on a mountain, between two lakes, which had anciently a strong castle.

CHALAOOR, or JELOUR, in the kingdom of Bando, Mogul territory, India, lies in the road from Surat, between Amadabad and Agra, about 60 miles W. of Asmer. It is an ancient walled town with a strong castle, on a mount of difficult access, which has a reservoir of water at top and another at bottom.

CHALBIN, a river in Chili, South America, the next to that of Valdivia; is deep, and capable of great vessels, and from it to a place called the Punta de Gallera it is about 2 leagues, and from that to Rio Bueno 7.

CHALCE, or CHALCA, a city of Mauritania Tingitana, mentioned by Scylax and Hecataeus; but in what part of that region we are to look for it cannot be now determined.

CHALCEDON, reproachfully URBS CECORUM, so called by the Delphic oracle, as the Megareans who built it here neglected the more commodious site on the other side the Bosphorus. It lies on the isthmus of a peninsula, opposite to Constantinople. It was once a famous and flourishing city of Bythinia, and had a convenient harbour on the E. and W. side of it: but it has since dwindled into a village. The river of the same name is narrow, but very deep; and runs on the E. side, carrying the salt water a mile above the town.

CHALCIDICA, a region of ancient Macedonia, S. E. of Stagira, in which were the towns of Angæa, Singus, and Acanthus, now called Eristo.

CHALCIDINE, in ancient Syria, was wholly an inland province, bordering neither on the Mediterranean Sea, nor the Euphrates, and was surrounded by Antiochene or Selucis W. Cyrestica N. Chalybonitis E. and Apamene and Cæse Syria S.

CHALCIS, the capital of the fore-mentioned province.

CHALCIS, the ancient name of the Island of Eubœa.

CHALCIS, capital of the said island of Chalcis or Eubœa, stood on the narrowest part of the Euripus, being joined to Bœœtia by a bridge; which situation agrees with that of the present city of Negropont. It was built by Æclus and Clothus, according to some before, according to others after the Trojan war, and is celebrated by all the ancients as a most magnificent, populous, and wealthy city. It is one of the three cities which Philip son of Demetrius used to call The Fetters of Greece. The Chalcidians applied early to navigation, and sent numerous colonies into Thrace, Macedon, Sicily, Corcyra, Italy, Lemnos, &c. In all which were cities, as Aristotle, quoted by Strabo, informs, built and peopled by the inhabitants of Chalcis. The Chalcidians are more commended by the ancients, on account of their courage and bravery than for their morals, having been at all times infamous even among the Greeks for unnatural lust, and avarice.

CHALCO, or CHACO, the capital of a little government belonging to Mexico Proper, in New Spain, in North America. It lies near a lake, from from which issues a river that runs towards that of Mexico. It is the seat of an alcaid, and enjoys considerable privileges, on account of the inhabitants joining with the Spaniards against Montezuma; about 20 miles N. E. from the city of Mexico.

CHALDEA. See BABYLONIA.

CHALEURS, (Des), a bay on the coast of Canada, in North America, mostly frequented by fishermen.

CHALLOCK, a village in Kent, 10 miles N. W. of Canterbury, with one fair on October 8, for horses, cattle, and pedlars ware.

CHALON, in Latin Cahillonum, the capital of Le Chalonois, a subdivision of the government of Burgundy, in France. It is a city mentioned by Cæsar, as belonging to the Ædui, which stands on the Saone, with a citadel; is the seat of a bailiwick, erected into a provincial court; of a collection, chancery, castleward, forest-court, salt-granary, particular governor and episcopal bailiwick. Its bishop is a suffragan to the metropolitan of Lyons, whose first prelate, Donathian, lived in the year 364, with a diocese of 186 (others say 207) parishes, a yearly revenue of 14,000 livres; and he pays a tax of 700 florins to the court of Rome. Besides the cathedral, here are several parish-churches, some abbeys, among which is the famous Cistercian abbey of Cîteaux, or Cîteau, 7 priories, 6 convents, a good college, and 2 hospitals. Upon an island in the Saone, is the small town of St. Laurent, which serves as a suburb to it. Lat. 46, 46, N. Long. 4, 56, E.

CHALONE, a town of France, in Anjou, seated on the S. bank of the river Loir, near the place where the Layon falls into that river. It is opposite to a small island of the same name.

CHALONNOIS, (Le), a territory and subdivision of the government of Burgundy, in France. It had anciently its own counts: it is a fine plain, and is divided by the Saone into two almost equal parts; of which that to the right hand is called Montagne, on account of Mount Beaune extending itself to Maçon, and even farther; the other to the left is called La Bresse.

CHALONNOIS, a subdivision of the government of Champagne and Brie, in France. It is a little territory, which some reckon in Champagne Proper.

CHALONS, or CHAALONS sur Marne, which first name is formed out of the ancient Catalaunum. It is a considerable city in the last-mentioned Chalanois, in the government of Champagne and Brie, in France; and is situated on the river Marne, over which are several bridges. It is the capital of a generality or intendency, and election, the seat of an intendant and prevot-general, the marshalsea of this province; as also of a provincial court and bailiwick. Its bishop, who is a count and peer, is under the metropolitan of Rheims, has a diocese of 304 parishes, 93 chapels of ease, and 19 abbeys. His revenue amounts annually to 24,000 livres; and his tax to the court of Rome is 3000 florins. In this city, besides the cathedral of St. Stephen, with a very high and large tower, there are two chapters, 11 parish-churches, a seminary, a college, 3 abbeys, 9 convents, and 2 hospitals. Here they manufacture some shalloons, and other thin woollen stuffs, and have a very good trade for oats to Paris. In the year 1592, the parliament of Paris was removed hither; and, on account of the unshaken fidelity of this city to king Henry IV. he caused a medal to be struck with this inscription, "Catalaunenſis fidei monumentum." Lat. 48, 57, N. Long. 4, 27, E. The plains about Chalons are very justly judged to be the Campi Catalaunici, and not any of two or three other places in France, as is pretended, where the famous battle was fought by Merovée king of the Franks, Theodoric king of the Goths, and Ætius the Roman general, and Attila king of the Huns, whom they defeated with the slaughter of 200,000 of his own men, as the French say: however, it was a bloody battle. Near the place are remains of intrenchments, and other works, which still bear the name of Attila's camp, and have done so time out of mind.

CHALOSSE, a territory of Gascony, in France. It is situated about the river Adour.

CHALYBONITIS, a province of ancient Syria, on the E. of Chalcidino, on the Euphrates; its chief city Chalybon.

CHALUS, or CHASLUS, a small town of Upper Limosin, in the government of the latter name, in France; in Latin Castra Lucii, or Caſtucium, with a castle, giving title of count. It lies at the source of the Tardoure, one of the rivers that fall into the Charente. A gentleman of Limosin, having found on his estate the statues of an emperor, and his consort, sitting round a table with their children, all in solid gold, Richard I. king of England claimed the whole, as sovereign of Limosin; part of which the gentleman was willing to give him: but Richard, in pursuance of his pretensions, besieging the castle of Chalus, where the other had taken shelter, was wounded with an arrow, of which he died, in 1199. Here is kept a famous annual fair for horses, on St. George's day.

CHAM, in the Canton of Zug, Switzerland, a pretty town on the lake of Zug, most of whose inhabitants live by fishing.

CHAM, or CHAMB, a town in the Palatinate of Bavaria, in Germany, on the rivers Cham and Regen, which joining here run into the Danube at Ratibon, from which town it lies 25 miles N. The queen of Hungary's troops took it in 1742. Its principal trade is with travellers to Bohemia. Lat. 49, 15, N. Long. 5, 45, E.

CHALONS, in CHAMPAGNE and BRIE, FRANCE.

Published March 22, 1845, by J. F. Fiddling, Paper no. 100.

Of the same name is a very pretty town in Zug, one of the Swiss cantons upon the lake of Zug. Its inhabitants live mostly by fishing.

CHAMA, in the county of Adom, on the Gold Coast of Guinea, is a town moderately large, and well peopled, but its inhabitants miserably poor. Here is a small Dutch fort, with 4 small batteries, which was by the Portuguese, from whom the Dutch took it, called St. Sebastian.

CHAMASCIAN, or RIO DE JUAN, a river on the Coast of Guinea, is advantageous to the Dutch of the fort just above-named, &c. for besides the fresh water with which the ships water, it furnishes fuel for kitchen, oven, and shipping.

CHAMBARONIGO, a river in Chili, South America.

CHAMBERS, a town in Cumberland county, Pennsylvania, situated on a branch of the Potomack river, in a trading path from Maryland to Carlisle, from whence it is distant S. W. about 35 miles.

CHAMBERY, in ancient records Camberiacum, or Chamarium, the capital of the duchy of Savoy, in Upper Italy, on the river Leisse, and situated in a delightful valley. It is of a middling largeness, without any other fortifications than bare walls. Here is the seat of the highest court or parliament of Savoy, and many of the nobility of the country reside here. It may be said to be very well built, and to have many stately edifices, though not in the modern stile, and several squares. It belongs to the diocese of the bishop of Grenoble. The college-church of La St. Chapelle was founded by duke Amadeus: the head of its chapter is intitled dean of Savoy. It has been often taken and retaken. In the year 1731, it was almost entirely burnt down, and on July 25, 1773, a great number of the inhabitants, several houses, and walls, were destroyed by an explosion of gunpowder. The streets are mostly straight and clean, the town being washed by several branches of the Alban, and many springs which come down from St. Martin's-hill. Lat. 45, 40, N. Long. 5, 45, E.

CHAMBLEE-FORT, on Lake Champlain, was seized by the provincials, October 20, 1775, retaken by the English troops June 18, 1776.

CHAMBORD, a royal palace of Le Blaisois, in Lower Orleans, in France. It lies in a large park, abounding with deer, and on the river Cosson. It was built by Francis I. in a very stately, though Gothic manner, of free-stone, a pierced tower in the middle of the building, which consists of four pavilions, has a beautiful appearance. It has a curious winding staircase, which two persons may go up or down at different places, and still keep parallel to one another all the way, as may be seen through certain openings. King Stanislaus resided here 9 years, the first time of his reception in France; and the famous count Maurice of Saxony lived also in it till he died in 1750. It lies 4 leagues N. E. from Blois.

CHAMONT. See CHAUMONT.

CHAMPAGNE, a province and government of France, bounded on the W. by the Isle of France; on the S. by Burgundy, on the E. by Lorraine; and on the N. by Flanders; one of the most considerable in the kingdom; for its extent from W. to S. E. or from Laguy to Bourbonne, is 46 French leagues; and from S. to N. or from Raviere to Rocrois, about 54. It has its name from the large plains and fields in the middle of it: but its extreme parts are full of woods, mountains, and hills. The soil produces large quantities of grain, and an excellent light wine, the most delicate in all France; the exportation of which is very considerable, and well known in England under the name of Champagne, though the inhabitants have not the advantage therefrom which might otherwise be expected: for it is rare to have any choice of good wine, and the culture of the vineyards is expensive. The home commodities which they trade in, are corn, wine, iron, wood, cattle, hay, woollen-stuffs, half-silks, linen, &c. Its principal rivers are the Meuse, or Maas, Seine, Marne, the Aube, and the Aisne or Aine.

This country had formerly its own dukes and counts, who were very potent; and, in the year 1361, it was solemnly annexed to the crown of France by king John.

In it are two archiepiscopal dioceses, namely, Rheims and Sens, and four bishoprics, Langres, Chalons, Troyes, and Meaux. It is subject to the parliament, chamber of aids and finances of Paris, the bailiwick and seat of the provincial court of judicature at Sedan excepted. Here are 10 bailiwicks and seats of country courts, one supreme forest-master or judge, several forest-bailiffs, two courts of coinage, and a generalité, which are holden at Chalons; and it is divided into 12 elections. With regard to its military government; under the governor are four lieutenant-generals; the first of which has the direction of the bailiwick of Rheims; the second over those of Vitry and Chaumont; the third over the bailiwicks of Troyes, Langres, and Sens; and the fourth presides over Brie Champenoise. Under these again are four hereditary sub-stadtholders; of which there is one appointed for each department, besides other officers. This province is otherwise divided into I. Champagne Proper; and this again subdivided into the following small territories; 1. Lower Champagne; and, 2. Upper Champagne. II. Chalonnois. III. Reims. IV. Retelos. V. Argonne. VI. Pertheois. VII. Vallage. VIII. Bassigny. IX. Senonois. And, X. Brie Champenoise. It is to be observed, that Sedan, though a distinct government, is yet subject to the generalité of Champagne. Troyes is the capital of the whole country, and lies in Champagne Proper.

CHAMPIGNY, a town and barony in the government of Touraine, in France. It stands on the river Veude or Vetle, and contains one parish-church, two convents, and a small college.

CHAMPION, a fine island in the river Seine, just before the town of Mante, in the fourth sub-government of the Isle of France.

CHAMPLAIN, a large lake with several islands, extending along the northern borders of New-York, on which a naval engagement was fought in 1776, between the British and Americans, in which the latter were totally defeated.

CHAMPSAUR, a territory and subdivision of the Upper Delphinat, in the government of Dauphiny, in France. It lies towards the S. of Graisivaudan, near Ambrunois and Gapençois. It is full of mountains. The dauphins, who were counts of Albon and Graisivaudan, possessed it for some centuries. Humbert, the last dauphin of the house of Tour du Pin, was the first who, in 1336, styled himself duke of Champsaur: it now belongs to the house of Villeroy; and only contains in it the bourg or large village of St. Bonnet.

CHAMPTOSEAUX, a town of France in Angou, and in the election of Angiers, with a castle, and the title of a barony.

CHAMUSCA, a town in the audience of Alenquer, and Portuguese Estremadura. It is said to be small, yet contains 1850 inhabitants.

CHANCEAUX, a large village on a mountain, in that part of Burgundy, in France, called La Montagne. Near it is the source of the river Seine.

CHANCHA, a rich and considerable town of Africa, in Egypt, 5 miles from Cairo, at the entrance of the desert which leads to Mount Sinai.

CHANDERNAGORE, an European settlement in the kingdom of Bengal in the East Indies. It lies on the river Ganges, 2 leagues and a half above Calcutta. The district is hardly a league in circumference, and has the disadvantage of being somewhat exposed on the western side; but its harbour is excellent, and the air is as pure as it can be on the banks of the Ganges. Whenever any building is undertaken that requires strength, it must here, as well as in all other parts of Bengal, be built upon piles: it being impossible to dig 3 or 4 feet without coming at water.

CHANNEL, BRITISH. See BRITISH CHANNEL.

CHANNEL, IRISH. See IRISH CHANNEL.

CHANNERY, commonly so called, and a corruption of Canonry, from the canons of Ross formerly residing here, this being the ecclesiastical name of the royal burgh of Fortrose, in that part of Ross-shire, and N. of Scotland, called Ardmeanach. It is most delightfully situated, in a fruitful valley of southern exposure, and guarded on the N. by fertile and gently rising hills, abounding with most excellent springs of sweet water; and in summer their tops are covered with a beautiful verdure enamelled with flowers. It lies on the Murray frith, and is divided from the new fort on the point of Ardesear, only by a narrow ferry of the latter name; by its vicinity to which it may flourish once more. In Romish and Episcopal times it had a fine cathedral, which was the parish-church, now removed to Rosemarky, a mile to the E. of it; though the body of the church is still standing, and arched with stone: also a castle, where the bishop of Ross resided. Here are two annual fairs, at which are sold vast quantities of green cloth or unbleached linen, both fine and coarse, mostly manufactured in this neighbourhood, and supplying the consumption of the country round; the soil yielding great quantities of excellent flax, and the inhabitants are remarkably dextrous in dressing, spinning, and weaving it. It lies about 8 miles E. of Inverness.

CHANSI, one of the smallest provinces of China, lying near the great wall which separates it from Tartary. It is a mountainous country, but healthy, pleasant, and abounding in coal-mines, corn, and very good grapes. They have likewise abundance of musk, porphyry, marble, jasper, and lapis lazuli, besides several iron-mines.

CHANTEBON, in Upper Siam, East Indies, (in common maps called Liam), stands at the mouth of a river of the same name, near the gulph of Siam, and in the extreme S. E. part of that country, at the foot of one of the chains of mountains that run from N. to S. and separate Siam from Cambodia. Fontenay says the river is broad but not deep, but Gervaise, that it is navigable for large ships.

CHANTILLY, a considerable bourg of La Valois, in the second stadtholdership of the Isle of France, belonging to the house of Condé. In it is a beautiful castle or seat, and opposite to its entrance is a fine equestrian statue in bronze of the last duke and constable of Montmorency.

CHAOURCE, a town of France, in Champagne. It is seated at the source of the river Amande. Long. 4, 5, E. Lat. 48, 6, N.

CHAPEL in the Frith, a market-town in the Peak of Derbyshire, 26 miles N. W. of Derby. It has the following annual fairs; Thursday before Old Candlemas, February 13, March 29, Thursday before Easter, April 30, Holy Thursday, three weeks after Holy Thursday, for cattle; July 7, for wool; Thursday before Bartholomew-day, August 24, for cheese and sheep; Thursday after September 29, and Thursday before November 11 for cattle.

CHAPELLE (de St. André). See ANDRE.

CHAPELLE

C H

CHAPELLE DAM-GILON, (La), in Latin Capella Domini Gilonis, a borough and barony of Upper Berry, in France, on the Little Soudre, and is a castleward.

CHAPELLE D'AUGUILLON, (La), a town of Sologne, and government of Orleannois, in France. It is a castleward and barony, lying on the Little Soudre.

CHAPUS, (Fort), in Brouageais, a government of Aunis, in France. It lies on a rock, at the mouth of the Saubre, which forms a pretty good harbour.

CHARABON, a sea-port town, situated on the N. coast of the island of Java, in the Indian ocean, 130 miles E. of Batavia. Lat. 6, 5, S. Long. 108, 5, E.

CHARACENE anciently was the most S. part of Susiana, a province of Persia, lying on the Persian Gulph, between the Tigris and the Eulæus; and was so named from Chorax city, at first called Alexandria from its founder Alexander the Great; afterwards Antiochia from Antiochus V. king of Syria, who repaired and embellished it; and lastly Chorax Spafines, i. e. the Mole of Spafines, an Arabian king of that name, he having secured it against the overflowing of the Tigris by a high mole extending 3 miles, which served as a fence to all that country. Dionysius Periegetes and Iliodorus author of the Parthicae Mansiones were both natives of this city.

CHARBONNIERS, a town of Savoy Proper, in the duchy of the latter name in Upper Italy. It stands on the river Arc, and was formerly a strong place.

CHARCAS, (Audience of), the S. part of Peru, in South America. In it are vast deserts, impenetrable forests, and extensive plains intercepted by the Cordilleras. This jurisdiction begins on the N. side at Vilcanota, in the diocese of Cusco, and reaches southward to Buenos Ayres; eastwards it extends to Brasil, and terminates in the meridian of Demarcation; the westward part of it reaches to the South Sea, and the remainder confines on the kingdom of Chili. It contains the archbishopric of Plata, and the four following dioceses: La Pas, Santa Cruz de la Sierra, Tucuman, and Paraguay, whose prelates are suffragans to Plata, the city of which last name is the capital of Charcas. In this province, among other curiosities, is the famous silver mine of Potosi.

CHARD, a post-town of Somersetshire, through which run several small streams that keep it clean. It consists of four streets terminating in the market-place, which has a good trade for corn and butcher's meat. Some woollen manufactures are carried on here, and it has two alms-houses. It was formerly a more considerable place than it is at present; and has three annual fairs, on May 3, August 5, and November 2, for cattle of all sorts, and pedlary.

CHARENTE, one of the most considerable rivers in the government of Saintonge and Angoumois. It abounds with fish: its spring-head is at Charennac, and, after receiving the Touvre and Boutonne, it runs by Rochford, and falls into the bay of Biscay opposite to the isle of Oleron.

CHARENTON, a large bourg in the sub-fief-holdership of the Isle of France Proper. It lies on the river Marne, with a stone-bridge near the Seine. Here the Reformed had their principal church, which was a fine building; but after the revocation of the edict of Nantz was demolished, and instead of it two convents were erected. It lies 3 miles S. E. of Paris. Lat. 48, 45, N. Long. 2, 20, E.

CHARIA, AGROS ADRIANOS, or St. ADRIAN, supposed to be on the site of the ancient Mycenæ, in the Peloponnesus and European Turkey. It was once very considerable, and the seat of a kingdom; but now reduced to an ordinary village.

CHARING, near Maidstone, in Kent, the ancient Durolenum, situated upon one of the springs of the river Len. Here are large ruins of a castellated palace, which belonged to the archbishops of Canterbury. Here are two annual fairs, May 1, and October 29, for horses, cattle, and pedlary.

CHARISTUS, a river of Colchis.

CHARITE, a small town of Les Vaux de Nevers, in the government of Nivernois. It stands on the Loire, over which is a good stone bridge. Here is a rich priory, whose prior is lord of the place. Besides, it is the seat of an election, bailiwick, and salt-granary. They make good enamelled work at this place.

CHARKOW, (district of), in the government of Bielgorod, in European Russia. In it is a town of the same name.

CHARLBURY, a town in Oxfordshire, with a market, and four fairs, on January 1, second Friday in Lent, second Friday after May 12, and October 10, for cattle of all kinds. It is 6 miles N. W. of Woodstock. Long. 1, 35, W. Lat. 51, 54, N.

CHARLEMONT, so called from the emperor Charles V. a small fortified place of Namur, in French Flanders. It stands on a steep rock, on the Maes, at the foot of which is Giett, which see. By the peace of Nimeguen it was ceded to France, and lies 18 miles W. of the city of Namur. Lat. 50, 10, N. Long. 4, 40, E.

CHARLEMONT, the capital of the county of Armagh, and province of Ulster, in the Kingdom of Ireland, situated on the Blackwater, has a good fort, and sends two members to the Irish parliament. It gives title of viscount to the Caulfield family. Lat. 54, 16, N. Long. 6, 50, W.

CHARLERoy,

C H

CHARLEROY, so called from Charles II. of Spain, formerly Charnoy; a small, but strong city of Namur, in the Austrian Netherlands, on a hill, near the confluence of the Sambre and little river Pieton, with a fort on the S. of the former river. The marquis de Castillio held it out in 1693, against a numerous French army under Villeroy, for 27 days with open trenches, and at last capitulated upon honourable terms. It is a place of importance, being situated on the confines of Hainault, and 19 miles W. of Namur. Lat. 50, 30, N. Long. 4, 20, E.

CHARLES-CAPE, a promontory of Virginia, in North America, which forms the extreme part of the N. side of the strait which enters Chesapeake-bay. Of the same name is a cape of North America, on the S. W. part of the strait which enters into Hudson's-bay.

CHARLES-COUNTY, in Maryland's bounds, begins on the upper side of Indian Creek and Bud's Creek, where St. Mary's county ends, and extends to Mattawoman Creek, including all the land lying on the upper part of Bud's Creek and Indian Creek branches. Its chief places or parishes are Bristol and Piscataway.

CHARLES-COUNTY, in Virginia, is in the British empire in America, reckoned together with Prince George County; in which two are 161,239 acres, and three parishes, Martin-Brandon, Wyanoke, and Westover.

CHARLES-FORT. See PORTSMOUTH.

CHARLES-FORT, a garrison at the entrance of Kinsale harbour, in the county of Cork, and province of Munster, in Ireland. Lat. 51, 21, N. Long. 8, 20, W.

CHARLES-RIVER, New-England, rises in 5 or 6 sources on the S. E. side of Hopkington and Holliston-Ridge, all running S. The chief stream runs N. E. then N. round this ridge, and N. E. into Natick township, from thence N. E. till it meets Mother Brook on Deadham, and falls into Boston harbour.

CHARLES-TOWN, the metropolis of South Carolina, in Lat. 32, 30, N. Long. 79, 10, W. is happily situated on a neck of land, or peninsula, formed by two navigable rivers, where they mix their streams, and present us with a large commodious harbour. Ashley river washes the town on the W. and S. and Cooper-river on the E. these rivers run parallel to one another, at about a mile's distance, for a considerable way into the country, gradually separating to their sources. The streets are broad, straight, and uniform, intersecting one another at right-angles; those that run E. and W. extend from one river to the other; the Bay-street which fronts Cooper-river and the ocean, is really handsome, and must delight the stranger who approaches it from the sea. There are about 1100 dwelling-houses in the town, built with wood or brick; many of them have a genteel appearance, though generally incumbered with balconies or piazzas.

The white inhabitants are about 4000, and the negro servants near the same number. By a register of the births and burials for 15 years, they are, excepting when the small pox prevailed, nearly equal; the advantage, though small, is in favour of the births; though to the burials are added all transient people who die here, as sailors, soldiers, or the inhabitants of the country, whose business or pleasure bring them frequently to this metropolis. The S. E. part of the town fronts the sea, from which it is about 3 leagues distant, and from whence, in the hot season, they have refreshing breezes, which the flood-tide always brings or increases.

The town is divided into two parishes, St. Philip's and St. Michael's; St. Philip's church is one of the handsomest buildings in America; it is of brick plastered, and well enlightened on the inside. St. Michael's church is built of brick, and consists of a body of a regular shape, and a lofty and well-proportioned steeple, formed of a tower and spire. Besides the churches, there are meeting-houses for the members of the church of Scotland, for those called Independents, two for Baptists, one for French and one for German Protestants: though all of them are neat, large, and convenient, they are too plain to merit particular descriptions. Near the center of the town is the state house, a large, commodious brick building; whose capitals are highly finished, supporting a large angular pediment and cornice; it consists of two stories besides the roof; on the lower are the court-room, the secretary's-office, and apartments for the house-keeper; on the upper story are two large, handsome rooms; one for the governor and council, the other for the representatives of the people, with lobbies and rooms for their clerks: the room called the council-chamber, appears rather crowded and disgusting, than ornamental and pleasing, by the great profusion of carved work in it; in the upper part of the house or roof is a large room for the provincial armoury: near the state-house is a very neat market-place, well-regulated and plentifully supplied with provisions.

Above 300 top-sail vessels enter and clear at this port annually, bringing necessities and luxuries from every quarter of the globe, and carrying the produce to Europe, the northern colonies, and West-Indies. About 30 years ago, a plan was approved of for fortifying Charles-town in a very respectable manner, and soon after began to be put in execution, on the S. and S. E. of the town, but was discontinued, though much money had been laid out for that purpose. The town is at present defended, defended, towards the water, by 7 batteries or bastions, connected by courtine lines, having platforms with about 100 heavy cannon mounted. The old fortification on the land side, is in ruins; a new work was begun in 1757, a little without the other; but a stop was put to this likewise, after a considerable progress was made, either for want of money, or from an opinion that it was unnecessary; besides these works, the harbour is defended by Fort-Johnson, about 2 miles distant from Charles-town, on a sea-island, which forms one side of the harbour; it is placed within point-blank shot of the channel, through which the ships must pass in their way to the town; towards the land is a gate with a ravelin, 2 ditches, 2 bridges, and a glacis, with the beginning of a new work built with tappy, on the N. W. left unfinished. There are barracks in it for 50 men; but on the approach of an enemy the militia of the island march into it for its defence.

There are several charitable societies in the town; the principal of them is called the Carolina-society, which, by an easy subscription, maintains many decayed families; and educates many orphans; I must not forget to mention the St. Andrew's club, which is chiefly composed of Scotchmen, but whose charitable donations are confined to no country. There is a society calculated for the promotion of literature, named the library society, through whose means many useful and valuable books have been already introduced into the province, which probably would not otherwise have soon found their way here, private fortunes not being equal to the expence.

In 1740 the town was burnt; and in 1780 taken by the British troops, having in vain attempted it in 1776.

CHARLES-TOWN, (district,) in S. Carolina, includes all places between the N. branch of Santee river and Combahee river and the sea, including the islands by a line drawn from Nelson's Ferry directly towards Marr's Bluff on Savannah river, till it intersects the swamp at the head of the S. Branch of Combahee river.

CHARLES-TOWN, in the county of Middlesex, in the province of Massachusetts-bay, in New-England; situated at the angular point, formed by the 2 entrances of Charles and Mystic rivers, a neat, populous, well-built, trading town; but was destroyed by the English troops, June 17, 1775, at the battle of Bunker's-hill, which was close to it, to prevent the Provincials annoying them from the houses. It took up all the space between Mystic-river, and Charles-river, which last separated it from Boston, as the Thames does London from Southwark, and is as dependant upon, and in some sense a part of it, as the latter is of the metropolis of Great-Britain. It had a ferry over the river; so that there was hardly any need of a bridge, except in winter, when the ice would neither bear nor admit of a boat. The proprietors out of the profits were obliged by law to pay 150l. sterling to Harvard college, in the neighbouring town of Cambridge. Though the river is much broader above the town, it is not wider at the ferry than the Thames between London and Southwark. It was nearly half as large as Boston, and capable of being made as strong, standing as that did upon a peninsula. It was both a market and county-town, had a good large church, a market-place in a handsome square by the river side, supplied with all necessary provisions both of flesh and fish, and had 2 long streets leading to it. Lat. 42, 26. Long. 71, 5.

CHARLES-TOWN, the only town on the island of Nevis, one of the Caribbees, in the W. Indies. In it are large houses and well-furnished shops, and is defended by Charles-fort. Here their market is kept every Sunday from sunrise till nine o'clock in the forenoon, when the negroes bring to it Indian corn, yams, garden-stuffs of all sorts, &c. iron-wood and ignum vitæ are purchased by the planters of this island, as well as those of St. Christopher, from the islands of Descada, St. Bartholomew, Santa Cruz, in order to serve as posts for their sugar-houses, mills, &c. In the parish of St. John, on the S. side of Charles-town, is a large spot of sulphurous ground, at the upper end of a deep chasm in the earth, commonly called Sulphur-gut, which is so hot as to be felt through the soles of the shoes.

At the foot of the declivity, on the same side of this town, is a small hot river, called the Bath, supposed to proceed from the same cause, which is not above three quarters of a mile higher up in the country. Its course is at least for half a mile, and afterwards loses itself in the sands of the sea. At a particular part of it, towards the sea-side, a person may set one foot in a spring that is extremely cold, and the other at the same time in another that is hot. The water of Black-rock pond, about a quarter of a mile N. from Charles-town, is milk-warm, owing to the mixture of those hot and cold springs; yet it yields excellent fish; particularly fine eels, silver-fish, which has a bright deep body 8 inches long, and tastes like a whiting; also slim-guts, as having a head too large for the size of its body, which is from 10 to 22 inches long, and in taste and colour like a gudgeon.

A prodigious piece of Nevis-mountain falling down in a late earthquake left a large vacancy, which is still to be seen. The altitude of this mountain, taken by a quadrant from Charles-town bay, is said to be a mile and a half perpendicular and from the said bay to the top 4 miles. The declivity from this mountain to the town is very steep half-way, but afterwards easy enough. The hill, here called Saddle-hill, as appearing at the top like a saddle, is higher than Skiddaw-hill in Cumberland, in the north of England. See NEVIS. Lat. 16, 5. Long. 61, 55.

CHARLES-TOWN, in St. Mary's-county, Maryland, is situated on the N. bank of the Potomack river, 42 miles S. W. from Annapolis, and 22 from Belhaven.

CHARLES, a town in the E. division of Maryland, on the bottom of Chesapeake-bay, near the entrance of Susquehannah river.

CHARLETON, an island of North America, situated at the entrance into Hudson's-Bay. Its soil consists of a white dry sand, covered with a white moss, and abounds with juniper and spruce trees, but not large. Lat. 52, 3, N. Long. 80, 50, W.

CHARLETON, a village of Suffex, remarkable as being the seat of fox-hunters, where are several hunting-houses, among which the most beautiful is that of the duke of Richmond. Here is likewise a large room, designed by the earl of Burlington for the fox-hunters to dine in during the season. By the side of this village is a forest, through several parts of which the said duke has cut fine ridings, and made many new plantations therein.

CHARLETON, a well-built pleasant village of Kent, on the N. side of Blackheath; its church is the finest in the county. Here is an old Gothic pile, with four turrets, a long row of cypress trees, with large gardens and a small park, formerly belonging to sir Edward Newton, prince Henry's tutor; but now earl Egmont. This village is noted for an annual fair, or rather bafe rout, held in its neighbourhood on St. Luke's day, October 18, called Horn-fair, for horns and horn toys of all sorts, &c. At this time, the mob greatly increased by accessions from London, take all kinds of liberties; and, to the indelible reproach of any civilized country, the women are eminently impudent that day. This fair owes its origin, they say, to one of king John's intrigues; and it would have been well had it died with him. It is a nuisance in the neighbourhood of the city of London, which the public have not yet removed, among those many of the same nature which they have already extirpated with becoming zeal.

CHARLEVILLE, a small, but well-built town of Retelois, one of the subdivisions in the government of Champagne and Brie, in France. It lies on the river Meuse, and was formerly only a village called Arches, till made a town by Charles Gonzagues, duke of Nevers, and afterwards duke of Mantua. Lat. 49, 45, N. Long. 4, 35, E.

C H

CHARLEVILLE, a small town in the county of Cork, and province of Munster, in the kingdom of Ireland. It lies 50 miles N. of Cork, and sends two members to the Irish parliament. Lat. 52, 13, N. Long. 8, 38, W.

CHARLEY, Lancashire, on the river Cher, near the Yarrow, 6 miles from Preston, N. E. of Eccleston, 201 miles from London. Market on Tuesday. Fairs on May 2, August 20, and September 5.

CHARLIEU, a town of France in the diocese of Macon, on the frontiers of Beaujolois, and Burgundy, near the river Loire, with a rich abbey. Long. 4, 5, E. Lat. 46, 15, N.

CHARLOTTE-TOWN, on the S. W. side of the Island of Dominica.

CHARLOTTE-TOWN, on St. John's-Island, in the Gulph of St. Laurence.

CHARLOTTE-BURG, a town in the county of Brunswick, in North Carolina.

CHARLOTTENLUND, a royal palace, with a fine park, in Seeland, in Denmark; so called from the royal princess Charlotta Amelia, who, in 1733, built this place quite new. It was before that called Guldenlund. It lies about a quarter of a mile from Jagersberg-park, and in the neighbourhood of Copenhagen.

CHARLOTTENTHAL, a well-built castle and pleasure-garden, in the Circle of Brandenburg, in the kingdom of Prussia. It lies in a delightful situation.

CHARLOTTE-SOUND, the strait that divides New Zealand, discovered by captain Cooke, in his voyage to the South Sea in 1770.

CHARLOTTE'S-ISLE, one of the new discoveries in the South Sea. Captain Wallis first visited it in 1767, where he found the natives first opposed his landing, but afterwards supplied him with coconuts, scurvy-grass, and excellent water. They had canoes, with two masts each, and each about 30 feet long, 4 in breadth, and 3 deep. The people had long black hair hanging over their shoulders, were of a dark complexion, and of a middling size. They were dressed in a kind of matting, made fast round the middle; the women were beautiful, and the men justly proportioned. Lat. 19, 18, S. Long. 138, 4, W.

QUEEN CHARLOTTE'S ISLANDS, a cluster of South-Sea islands, discovered in 1767, by captain Cartaret. He counted 7, and there were supposed to be many more. The inhabitants of these islands are described as extremely nimble and vigorous, and almost as well qualified to live in the water, as upon land: they are very warlike; and on a quarrel with some of captain Carteret's people, they attacked them with great resolution; mortally wounded the master and three of the sailors;

lors; were not at all intimidated by the fire-arms; and at last, notwithstanding the aversion of captain Cartaret to shed blood, he was obliged to secure the watering places by firing grape-shot into the woods, which destroyed many of the inhabitants. These islands lie in S. lat. 11. E. long. 164. They are supposed to be the Santa Cruz of Mandana, who died there in 1595.

CHARMES, a town in the bailiwick of Vauge, and duchy of Lorraine, in the government of the latter name, and of Bar, now belonging to France. It is situated on the Moselle, is the seat of a prévôté, and has 2 convents.

CHARWOOD, or CHARLEY-FOREST, near Loughborough in Leicestershire. It is about 20 miles in circuit.

CHAROLLES, the capital of Charollois, one of the territories of Burgundy, in France. It is a small town, on 2 little rivers, and the seat of a bailiwick, collection, and prévôté; here is a salt-granary, a collegiate church, a priory, three convents, and an hospital: and here is also an old castle. Lat. 46, 25. N. Long. 4, 6, E.

CHAROLLOIS, one of the bailiwicks and subdivisions of the government of Burgundy, in France. In Latin, it is called Pagus Quadrigellensis, or Quadrellensis; and is a Burgundian fief, which, after several changes, was restored by France to Spain, in the treaty of the Pyrenees, anno 1659. But Philip IV. gave it to Lewis of Bourbon, prince of Condé. It has its own states.

CHARON, a bourg of Aunis Proper, and government of the former name, in France. It lies on the sea, and has an abbey belonging to it.

CHAROST, in Latin, Carophium, a small town of Lower Berry, in the government of the latter name, in France, on the river Arnon; is walled round, and has two suburbs; in one of which is the parish-church of St. Michael, has a castle on its S. side, also a priory. It gives title of duke and peer to one of the Bethune family. Its neighbouring pastures are full of cattle, with vineyards producing pretty good wine.

CHARRAN, mentioned by St. Stephen, and in Gen. xi. 31, 32, named Haran (in memory, it is thought, of Haran the son of Terah, and brother of Abraham, and father of Lot) was situated in the W. or N. W. part of Mesopotamia, on a river which runs into the Euphrates. It was with little alteration called Carræ by the Romans.

CHARROUX, or CHAIROUX, a town of Upper Poitou, in the government of the latter name, in France, on the river Charente, and in the small territory of Briou: to it belongs an abbey.

CHARTRAIN, in Latin, Belfia Propria, a territory and subdivision of Orleanois, in France; also called Beauce Proper. In it is an exuberance of grain; and to it belongs CHARTRES, in Latin, Carnutum, anciently Autricum, the capital of the last-mentioned territory, and one of the oldest places in the country. It is divided by the river Eure into 2 parts, the largest of which stands on a hill. It is the see of a bishop, election, bailiwick, provincial court, salt-granary, &c. Its streets are very narrow. The prelate of Chartres is a suffragan to the archbishop of Paris; has a diocese of 810 parishes, a yearly income of 25,000 livres, and he pays a tax of 4000 florins to the court of Rome. The cathedral, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, is a beautiful structure; particularly its choir, the church underground, and its 2 steeples, are much admired; a well is also shewn here, into which Quirinus, the Roman proconsul, threw many Christians. In the city are 6 parish-churches, besides some in the suburbs; it has 3 abbeys, 1 priory, 9 convents, 1 seminary, and 2 hospitals. It gives title of duke, and belongs to the house of Orleans, Lewis XIV. having given it to his brother Philip, the founder of that family. The principal trade here is in corn: they carry on also some manufactures, for which the water of the Eure is reckoned very proper. The grove of the Druids, mentioned by Cæsar, stood upon a hill near this city. It lies 42 miles S. W. of Paris. Lat. 48, 27. N. Long. 1, 34, E.

CHARTREUSE, (La Grande,) a famous Carthusian convent, in Graisivaudan, a territory of the Upper Delphinat, in the government of Dauphiné, in France. It stands upon the Alps, about 3 French leagues from Grenoble: to it lead 2 roads, called Sapey and St. Laurent du Pont, being a dreadful ascent, by reason of rocks. The convent itself standing high, and inclosed with still higher rocks, and woody mountains, is an oblong spacious building, and walled round. In the large hall or saloon, where are fine paintings, a general chapter of the Carthusian order is annually holden, by deputies from all their convents, which amount to above 200. Their church is neat, though not large. This being the head of the order chooses their general, who is obliged to reside here all his life.

CHARWELL, a river that runs through Northamptonshire, and Oxfordshire, into the Thames at Oxford.

CHARYBDIS, a celebrated whirlpool in the straits of Messina between Italy and Sicily, much taken notice of by the ancient historians and poets, and described by them in terms of the greatest horror. It is still dangerous, but not so formidable as in former ages; Mr. Brydone only says, that "it often occasions such intestine and irregular motion in the water, that the helm loses most of its power, and ships have the greatest difficulty to get into the harbour of Messina, even with the fairest fairest wind that can blow." He conjectures that it is formed by the falciform promontory of the island of Sicily, which makes part of the harbour above-mentioned, along with some other causes unknown.

CHASTEL, or CHATTE, a lordship which has always been distinct from Lorraine, and a fief of the duchy of Bar.

The town of the same name lies on the Moselle, and was formerly a fortified place.

CHATANSKOI POGOST, a parish in the province of Jenefci and Siberia, in Asiatic Russia. To it is a great resort of the gentlemen from the seats hereabouts, that are very numerous, for the sake of its fine game: but is not to be confounded with Chatanskoi on the river Chatanga, in the very same circle. The latter place lies in lat. 70, 30, N. and the former in lat. 68, 30, N.

CHATEAUBRIAND, a small fenced town, with an old castle, in the bishopric of Nantes, in Upper Bretagne, and government of the latter name, in France. It has one parish-church, and two convents, and belongs to the house of Bourbon Condé. It lies towards the confines of Anjou, between Nantes on the N. E. and Rennes on the S. W. about 8 or 9 leagues from each.

CHATEAU, or CATEAU-CAMBRESIS, the capital of the county of Cambresis, a subdivision of French Flanders. It stands on the Salle, and is subject to the archbishop of Cambrai, who has here a handsome castle, and fine gardens. This was once a strong place; but is open at present: to it belongs an abbey. In the year 1559, the famous treaty of the same name was concluded here between Henry II. king of France, and Philip II. king of Spain, by which the French gave up 198 cities or towns for St. Quintin, Ham, and Le Catelet. Lat. 50, 6, N. Long. 3, 25, E.

CHATEAU-CEAUS, in Latin, Castrum Celsum, a town in the government of Anjou, in France, on the river Loir, and belongs to the duke of Bourbon.

CHATEAU-DAUPHIN, a strong castle near the Alps, on the side of Piemont, in Upper Italy, ceded by France to the king of Sardinia by the treaty of Utrecht. On the other hand, Savoy made over to France the valley of Barcelonette, and its dependencies; in such a manner, that the peaks of the Alps should, for the future, serve as the boundary on that side, between France, Piemont, and the county of Nice; and that the plains to be met with on these peaks and heights be divided; and that lying on the side of Dauphiny and Provence shall belong to France; and that towards Piemont and Nice, to Savoy. Chateau-Dauphin, was taken by the Spaniards in 1744. Lat. 44, 30, N. Long. 6, 40, E.

C H

CHATEAU-DUN, an old town and viscounty, in the territory of Dunois, and government of Orleannois, in France; on the river Loir. It is the capital of the territory, is the seat of an election and bailiwick: here are two collegiate and six parish-churches, one abbey, three convents, two hospitals, and an old castle. The district round produces wine, corn, and fruit; they also make cider here; and in some parts are manufactories of woollen-stuffs. Lat. 48, 5, N. Long. 1, 25, E.

CHATEAU-GONTIER, a pretty large and populous town, in the government of Anjou, in France. It is situated on the Maienne, and gives title of marquis. In it is a collegiate church, three parish-churches, and some convents.

CHATEAU-LANDO, anciently Vellaunodum, a town of Le Gatinois François, and fourth under-government of the Isle of France, on the river Loing, has a prevoté under the bailiwick of Nemurs, two churches, one abbey, one convent, and one hospital.

CHATEAULIN, a bourg in the bishopric of Quimper, and Lower Brittany, in the government of the latter name, in France, on the river Auzon. It has a brisk trade in slate and salmon; and in its neighbourhood are copper and iron mines.

CHATEAU DU LOIR, a small town of Lower Maine, in the government of the latter name, and of Perche, in France. In it are a royal jurisdiction, election, marshalsea, forest-court, salt-house, and two parish-churches. It is the capital of the little territory of Vaux du Loir, and well known in the county for holding out a seven-years siege against Herbert, count of Maus.

CHATEAU-MELLANT, a town of Lower Berry, and government of the latter name, in France. It has a chapter, parish-church, priory, hospital, and an old castle.

CHATEAU-NEUF, a town of Angoumois, in the government of this name, and of Saintonge, in France. It gives title of count: and to it belongs a royal prevoté, with a castellany.

Of the same name is a large village of Upper Orleannois, and government of the latter name, in France; where is a beautiful castle or seat.

Also of this name is a town in Upper Berry, which is situated on the river Cher, gives the title of baron, and has a collegiate church belonging to it. The town is divided into two parts: besides some few more in this kingdom of less note.

CHATEAU NEUF EN THIMERAIS, the capital of Thimerais, a subdivision of the fourth sub-stadtholdership, in the government of the Isle of France, is the seat of a governor and bailiwick, under the provincial states of Chartres.

CHATEAU PORCIEN, a small town of Remois, a subdivision of the government of Champagne.

C H

pagne and Brie, in France, on the river Aine, which separates the castle that stands on a rock from the town. Here is a salt-magazine; it was raised to a principality in 1561, which title is in the house of Mazarin. At this place they make great quantities of ferges.

CHATEAU REGNAUD, a town and district in the little government of Sedan, in France. It has the title of a sovereign principality, to which 27 villages belong. Lewis XIII. exchanged it with the princess dowager of Conti for Pont sur Seine: and Lewis XIV. demolished its strong castle.

CHATEAU-ROUX, in Latin Castrum Radulphi, a town of Lower Berry, in France, on the river Indre, and is the capital of an election, giving the title of duke. In it is one chapter, three convents, four parish-churches, and a considerable manufacture of cloth.

CHATEAU-SALINES, the capital of a prevoté, belonging to the German bailiwick of Lorraine, now subject to France, on the river Seille: and in it are good salt-springs.

CHATEAU-THIERRY, a town situated on the river Marne, in Brie Champenoise, a subdivision of the government of Champagne and Brie, in France. It is the capital of Brie Pouilleuse, the seat of an election, bailiwick, provincial court, royal prevoté, and sub-forest court. In it are three parish-churches, a royal abbey, three hospitals, four convents, the same number of chapels, and a small college. About half a mile out of the town is an abbey at Valfers. The town belongs to the duke of Bouillon, as a duchy-peerdom.

CHATEAU-VILAIN, a town of Vallage, a subdivision of the government of Champagne and Brie, in France. It lies on the river Aujon. To it belongs a collegiate church, with a fine castle.

CHATEL, or CHATEAU CHINON, in Latin Castrum Caninum, a town belonging to the district of Morvaux, a subdivision of the government of Nivernois, in France. It stands on a mountain on the Yonne; it is the seat of an election, marshalsea, and salt-granary. It is also the capital of a lordship, which gives title of count; to whose jurisdiction belong 10 parishes and 5 bailiwicks, of which there is one here.

CHATELAR, one of the castellanies and subdivisions of the government of Burgundy, in France.

Of the same name is a village, the seat of the castleward, which was formerly a town, but reduced to its present condition by the wars of Savoy.

CHATEL-CHALON, a town belonging to the bailiwick of Aval, one of the subdivisions of the Franche Compté, a government of France. Lat. 46, 50, N. Long. 5, 35, E.

VOL. I.—No. 33.

C H

CHATELET, a town of Namur, in the Netherlands, on the river Sambre, 4 miles E. of Charleroy. Lat. 50, 25, N. Long. 4, 30, E.

CHATELLERAUD, in Latin Castellum Eraldi, a town of Upper Poitou, on the river Vienne, over which is a fine stone-bridge leading to the suburb, in the territory and duchy of Châtelleraudois, belonging to the duke of Tremouille. It is the seat of an election, royal provincial district, marshalsea, and forest-court. Here is also a collegiate church, and four convents. Lat. 46, 45, N. Long. 0, 35, E. The duke of Hamilton in Scotland claims this duchy, as king Henry II. of France had in 1552 conferred it upon one of his predecessors, James Hamilton earl of Arran; and in the peace of Utrecht, in 1713, is an article stipulated that justice shall be done the duke on this head.

CHATHAM, a sea-port town of Kent, on the E. side of the river Medway. It is one of the stations, and the principal arsenal, for the royal navy of Great Britain, being in the last respect the most considerable repository in the world. The private buildings, as the houses of the sea-officers, doctors, inspector's, and workmen, are well-built; and many of them stately: but the public edifices are surprisngly large. The warehouses, or rather streets of warehouses, for laying up the naval stores, are the largest in dimensions, and most in number, to be seen any where. The rope-walks and forges bear a proportion to the rest; as also the wet dock, canals and ditches, for keeping masts and yards in the water, to preserve them, &c. all not easy to be described. The stores themselves, and the warehouses, from which the largest fleet may be built or fitted out, are indeed amazing! And the expedition with which such matters are carried on is scarce credible! Though the mouth of the Medway be well defended by Sheerness, and other forts and castles, yet, in the Dutch war in 1667, admiral Brakel, through some neglect of ours, came up the river, broke through the iron chain laid over it, and burnt some of our first rates and other ships of war then lying in the river. Works have been raised here within these 2 years, for the defence of the yard, in case of an attack. That called the Chest at Chatham was instituted in 1558, when the seamen in the service of queen Elizabeth agreed to allow a portion of each man's pay for the relief of their fellow sailors that had been wounded in the defeat of the Spanish armada, which custom has continued ever since. Here is an hospital for the relief of 10 or more aged and maimed mariners or shipwrights. It has fairs on May 15, and September 19. Stroud, Rochester, and Chatham lie so close together, as to form but one continued street, about 3 English miles long. It

It lies about 30 miles E. of London. Lat. 51, 40. N. Long. 30. E.

CHATHAM, a town in Barnstable county, in Plymouth colony, New-England.

CHATIGAN, a town of Asia, in the kingdom of Bengal, on the most easterly branch of the river Ganges. It is but a poor place, though it was the first the Portuguese settled at in these parts, and who still keep a sort of possession. It has but a few cotton manufactures; but affords the best timber for building of any place about it. The inhabitants are so suspicious of each other, that they always go armed with a sword, pistol, and blunderbuss, not excepting the priests. It is subject to the Great Mogul. E. Long. 91, 10. N. Lat. 23, 0.

CHATILLON, (sur l'Indre,) as lying on the river of the latter name, a town in the government of Touraine, in France. It has a collegiate church, a convent of Augustine friars, and one of the Ursuline nuns. The parochial church is without the town.

This is the principal place of the little territory of Brenne, and lies on the confines of Berry, four leagues above Loches, to the N. E.

CHATILLON, (les Dombes,) a small town of La Bresse, a district and subdivision of the government of Burgundy, in France. It lies on the river Chalaronne, has 1 parish-church, near which is a little chapter, a college, hospital, 2 convents, and a salt-house. Lat. 46, 16. N. Long. 5, 40. E.

CHATILLON, (sur Loing,) as situated on the river of the latter name; is a small town of Gatinos Orleanois, a subdivision of the government of Orleanois, in France. This is a duchy and peerdom, and has a collegiate church belonging to it.

CHATILLON, (sur Marne,) on the river of the latter name, a town of Upper Champagne, in the government of Champagne and Brie, in France, is also a duchy and peerdom.

CHATILLON, (sur Seine,) the capital of La Montagne, a territory in the government of Burgundy, in France. Here is a collection, the seat of a bailiwick, provincial court, mayor, royal prevoté, &c. besides that of a particular governor. It has a collegiate church, a parish-church a small college, 2 abbeys, 2 hospitals, 5 convents, and a commendary of Malta. The river Seine divides the town into 2 parts. In the neighbourhood are several iron-works or flatting-mills.

Of the name of Chatillon are many other places in France, and one in Piemont, but all of very small note.

CHATMOSS, a bog or waste between Winick and Manchester, in Lancashire. It extends on the left side of the road in going to that town from the southern parts, about 5 or 6 miles E. and W. and in some places 7 or 8 from N. to S. It is hardly passable for man or horse, but in exceeding dry weather, and then not very safely. From hence the country people cut their peat or turf for fuel. Under the body of the moss are found old fir-trees, a thing usual in such grounds.

CHATRE, (La,) a town and barony of Lower Berry, in the government of the latter name, in France. It lies on the Indre, is the seat of an election and salt-house. Here are 2 churches, one of which is collegiate, 3 convents, an hospital, and an old castle, which serves for a prison. It belongs to the house of Condé.

CHATSWORTH-HOUSE, a magnificent seat of the Duke of Devonshire, and one of the wonders of the Peak of Derbyshire, in a valley amidst precipices. On its E. side, and not far off, rises a prodigious high mountain, thick planted with beautiful trees. On the top of this mountain mill-stones are dug; and here begins a moor, for 15 or 16 miles due N. On the plain, which extends from the top of this mountain, is a large body of water, which takes up near 30 acres, receiving from the ascents round it all the water that falls, which, through pipes, supplies the cascades, water-works, ponds, and canals, in the curious gardens below. Before the W. front runs the river Derwent, which though not many miles from its source, is a rapid river, especially upon hasty rains, or the melting of snow, over it is a stately stone bridge. Here Mary Queen of Scots was for 17 years in custody.

CHAUDÉS AIGUES, in Latin, Aquæ Calidæ, a town in Upper Auvergne, in the government of the latter name, in France. It gives the title of baron, and is famous for its warm baths, from which it takes its name.

CHAVES, a town belonging to the audience of Braganza, in the province of Traz los Montes, in Portugal. It is of middling magnitude, and fortified; stands on the river Tamega, having 2 suburbs, and as many forts; one of which resembles a citadel, and has a convent in it. Between the town and suburb Magdalena, is an old Roman stone-bridge over the river, 92 geometrical paces in length, and 3 in breadth. It contains 2000 inhabitants, a collegiate church, which is also the parish church, one house of mercy, two hospitals, and the like number of convents. In ecclesiastical matters, it is under the archbishop of Braga. It was built by the emperor Flavius Vespasian, and hence called Aquæ Flaviæ. Several remains are still to be seen of its ancient grandeur. 41, 46. N. long. 7, 10. W. lat. To its district belong 53 parishes.

CHAUL, a strong town of Asia, in the kingdom of Visapore, and on the coast of Malabar. It was taken taken in 1507 by the Portuguese; and the river it stands on affords a harbour for small vessels. It is fortified, as well as the island, on the S. side of the harbour; it was formerly a place noted for trade, particularly for fine embroidered quilts; but is now miserably poor. It is 15 miles S. of Bombay. Long. 72, 45, E. Lat. 18, 30, N.

CHAUMONT, in Latin Calus Mons, so called from a bald mountain, upon which was formerly a fort. It lies in Le Mantois, a subdivision of the four substatdholderships of the Isle of France. It is the seat of an election, bailiwick, and forest district. In it is one parish-church, with two convents.

CHAUMONT, a town of Bassigny, a subdivision of the government of Champagne and Brie, in France. It stands on a mountain, at the foot of which runs the river Marne; is the seat of an election, provincial court, royal prevoté, a spacious bailiwick, and forest-court. The collegiate church here is the only parish-church. In this place is also an abbey, a college, and a convent. Lat. 48, 12, N. Long. 5, 15, E.

CHAUNES, in Latin Celviacum, though but a small city of Middle Picardy, in the government of the latter name and of Artois, in France, gives title of duke and peer, belonging to the house of Albret.

CHAUNY, in Latin Calniacum, a town of Noyonnois, in the government of the Isle of France, on the river Oise, which here begins to be navigable. To it belongs a particular governor, a forest jurisdiction, a royal castellany, peculiar laws, two parish-churches, and three convents. It is within the marquise of Guiscard.

CHAYANTA, a province of Charcas, and jurisdiction belonging to the archbishopric of Plata, in South America. It lies about 50 leagues N. W. from the city De la Plata, extending in some parts about 40 leagues. The country is very famous for its gold and silver mines: the former of which are discontinued at present. This province is watered by the river Grande, in whose sand considerable quantities of gold-dust, and grains of that metal, are found. The silver mines are still worked to great advantage: but this province feeds no more cattle than serve its inhabitants.

CHEBECTO, or CHIBUCTO HARBOUR, lies in Nova-Scotia, an English settlement in North America, and near which Halifax is built. Lat. 44, 30, N.

CHEDDER, a parish of Somersetshire, famous for the finest cheese in the world, except the Parmesan. It is 23 miles in circuit, abounding with pastures. By the junction of the milk of several dairies, cheeses are made of 100 and 150 pounds weight. They have also great plantations of apples, from which they make great quantities of cider: it besides produces wool. About this town there is a chasm about a mile in length, between rocks, about 2 or 300 feet high, and which is in the road to Bristol. Out of these hills rises a stream which drives 12 mills, within a quarter of a mile of the head of it, and then runs into the Axe. Fairs, May 4, and October 29.

CHEBRECHIN, a considerable town of Poland, in the palatinate of Russia, which carries on a great trade in wax. It is 15 miles S. E. of Toroubin. Long. 8, 41, E. Lat. 50, 35, N.

CHEDLE, a market-town of Staffordshire, 12 miles N. E. of Stafford town.

CHEGFORD, a market-town of Devonshire. It lies 25 miles W. of Exeter. It has four annual fairs, March 25, May 4, September 29, and October 29; all for cattle.

CHE-KYANG, or TSEKIAN, a province of the empire of China, formerly the residence of the Chinese monarchs, and one of the most considerable in the whole empire, is bounded on the N. and W. by Kyang-nan and Kyangsi, on the S. by Tokyo, and on the E. by the sea. It extends from the 27th to the 31st degree of N. latitude, and from 116 to almost 120 of E. longitude. The climate of it is serene and healthy, and the people very numerous, amounting, according to their registers, to 4,525,700 men. The country is intersected by a multitude of rivers and canals, the last cut wide and deep, and lined with hewn stone. Over these are a great number of bridges, so that travelling here is very commodious, both by land and water. A vast quantity of silk is manufactured in this province, which is here finer, more rich, and curiously wrought with gold and silver, than in any other; and yet is so cheap, that a good silk suit will cost less than one of the most ordinary cloth in Europe. The tribute of silk paid to the emperor is said to amount to 370,466 pounds raw, and, 2574 wrought, besides some other quantities of the finest, sent as a present to the court by the Imperial barges. The province hath 11 capital cities, or cities of the first rank, and 77 of the second and third rank; besides 18 fortresses, most of them upon the sea-coasts, and large and populous enough to pass in other countries for considerable cities. The inhabitants are ingenious, polite, and courteous to strangers, but very superstitious.

CHELMER, one of the palatinates included in Red Russia, in Little Poland. To it belong one castellany and two starosts. Of the same name is a town, with a bishopric; but the prelate resides at Krasnostaw, and is a suffragan to the metropolitan of Lemberg. Here is also a Russian or Greek bishop, who has his cathedral, and is under the archbishop of Kiow. In the town is a castellany, starosts, starosts, provincial diet, and court. It lies 120 miles S. E. of Warfaw. Lat. 51, 25, N. Long. 23, 30, E.

CHELMER, a river in Essex that runs into the sea at Malden.

CHELMSFORD, the county-town of Essex, where the assizes are held. An elegant and convenient new county gaol was erected here in 1777. It stands in a pleasant valley, at the junction of two rivers; namely, the Chelmer, whence it has its name, and the Cann. It has a good free-school, and a large prison on the river, with commodious apartments and a good garden. The carriers and passengers to and from London are its main support. Its weekly market holds on Friday, and it has two annual fairs, on May 12 and November 12, which are remarkable for cattle. Near the town is a pretty seat of the earl Fitzwalter. Chelmsford lies 28 miles N. of London, and sends two members to parliament. Lat. 51, 52, N. Long. 20, E.

CHELSEA, one of the pleasant villages in the neighbourhood of London, on the Thames, about a mile from Westminster. Here is the noblest building, and one of the best foundations of its kind in the world, for maimed and old soldiers. It is extremely convenient, and large, though less magnificent than that of Greenwich, for seamen. In Chelsea hospital a certain number of invalids are comfortably maintained, lodged, and clothed: and to it belong several out-pensioners, as there is not room in the house for them, who have about 7 pounds 10 shillings annually. It was originally founded, besides a school at Chelsea, by the famous Nell Gwyn, one of king Charles II.'s mistresses; confirmed and endowed by that prince, and finished by king William III. To it belong spacious and delightful gardens. In the area is a good bronze statue of king Charles II. Farther up the village is the curious physic garden belonging to the apothecaries of London, given them by Sir Hans Sloane. Here also is Ranelagh, and in the gardens is the rotunda, one of the largest rooms in the world, being 130 feet in diameter; where musical entertainments, both vocal and instrumental, are performed in the spring. Just by are famous water-works, set a-going by the steam of hot water.

CHELSEA, a small town on the N. side of Boston-Harbour, North-America.

CHELTENHAM, a market-town of Gloucestershire. It has a pretty good trade for malt. Here is a handsome church, with aisles, a spire, and a good ring of bells; whose minister must be of Jesus-college, Oxford, though but 40 pounds a year, but cannot hold the vicarage more than 6 years. Here is also a free-school and an hospital, with other charities. Its mineral waters of the Scarborough kind, render it still more famous and frequented. It has three annual fairs; namely, on the second Thursday in April, Holy Thursday for all sorts of cattle, and August 5 for lambs. It lies 8 miles N. E. of Gloucester. This manor paid Edward the Confessor 9l. 5s. a year, and 3000 loaves for his dogs, and 20l. year to William the Conqueror, and 15l. yearly for bread for his dogs.

CHEMILLE, a town in the government of Anjou, in France. It lies on the river Irome, gives title of baron, and in it is a collegiate church.

CHEMNITZ, the capital of the circle of the mountains, in the electorate of Saxony, in Germany. It lies on a small river of the same name, and is famous for mines of lead and tin in its neighbourhood. It is defended by a good castle, called Augustbourg, which is one of the elector's country seats. Here are many linen and stuff-weavers, and some fine bleaching grounds. It was an imperial city till 1312.

CHEMPTERCIER, anciently Oyse, a place in the district of Digne, in Upper Provence, and government of the latter name, in France. It is a barony which has been annexed to the marquise of Villars, in order to constitute the principality of Villars-Brancas.

CHENCIN, or CHECINY, a small town belonging to the palatinate of Sandomir, in Little Poland. Here are lead and silver mines; also marble quarries. It has a castle, which stands on a high rock, with a starosty and provincial court. The ore of the mines belongs to the king.

CHENONCEAU, a place belonging to the government of Touraine, in France, where is a fine palace, with curious marbles and statues, among which that of Scipio Africanus, made of touchstone, and is much admired. It stands on the river Cher.

CHENSI, a province of Asia, in the N. W. part of China. It contains 8 cities of the first rank, and 106 of the second and third, besides many forts on the great wall. The air is temperate, and the inhabitants more civil and affable to strangers than others in the northern parts. The soil is very fertile, and abounds in wheat and millet, though but very little rice. They have also rhubarb, honey, wax, musk, cinnabar, and abundance of coal-mines: they have a great number of deer, bears, wild bulls, and an animal resembling a tiger, whose skin is very curious. There are also musk-goats, and bats as large as hens, besides two or three other sorts of animals quite unknown in Europe.

CHEPELIO, an island of Darien, in the bay of Panama, in South America. It lies opposite to the mouth of Chepo-river, and about a league from the city of Panama, which place it furnishes with fruit and provisions. Lat. 9, 0, N. Long. 81, 5, W.

CHEPHIRAH, one of the cities of the Gibeonites, Joshua ix. 17.

CHEPPING

CHEPING-BARNET, a place in Hartfordshire, and in the St. Alban's road N. where a decisive battle was fought in 1468, between the houses of York and Lancaster, in which the great earl of Warwick, styled Make-king, was killed, with several of the nobility, and 10,000 men. The field is thought to be that near Kickfend, between the St. Alban's and Hatfield roads, a little before they meet. In 1740 a stone column was erected here, on which there is inscribed a particular account of this battle.

CHEPO, or CHEPOOR, a river of Darien, in South America, the mouth of which lies opposite to the island of Chepelio. It rises out of the mountains near the N. side of the isthmus of Panama; and, being pent up on the S. side by other mountains, bends its course westward between both; till finding a passage on the S. W. it makes a kind of semicircle; and by this time, being swoln to a considerable volume, runs rapidly into the sea, 7 leagues eastward of Panama. It is very deep, and about a quarter of a mile in breadth; but its mouth is choked up with sand, so as to be practicable only by barks.

Of the same name is a small town within 6 leagues of the sea, and on the left hand in coming from the sea. The land about it is champaign, with several small hills clothed with woods. On the S. side of the river are spacious woodlands; but the greatest part of the country is savannahs.

CHEPSTOW, a market-town of Monmouthshire, upon the river Wey, which not far from hence falls into the Severn. It is the sea-port for all the towns lying on this river and the Lug. Hither ships of good burthen can come up, and the tide runs up impetuously as at Bristol, rising commonly to six and six and a half fathoms, at the wooden bridge of Chepstow, which is 70 feet from the surface of the water when the tide is out. In January 1738, the water rose here upwards of 70 feet. Its weekly market, which is kept on Saturday, is well-frequented for corn, &c. but especially swine. Its annual fairs are on Friday in Whitfun-week, for horned cattle, Saturday before June 20, for wool; August 1, and Friday se'ennight after St. Luke, October 18, both these for horned cattle. It lies 12 miles S. of Monmouth. A beautiful Roman pavement was found here in 1689. Two miles from Chepstow is the famous passage over the Severn, on this side called Beachley, and on the other Aust. Here begins Offa's dyke, which passes through Radnorshire, Flintshire, and so on to the river Dee, which parts Wales from Cheshire.

CHEQUETAN HARBOUR, on the coast of Mexico, to the Pacific Ocean, lies in lat. 17, 36, N. and is about 30 leagues to W. of Acapulco. Here admiral Anson, on his expedition to the South Seas, anchored April 7, 1742.

VOL. I.—No. 33.

CHER, a river in the government of Orleans, in France. It rises in Combraille, which belongs to Auvergne, is navigable beyond Vierzon, in Berry, and runs into the Loire. Mention is also made of it in the government of Marche.

Of the same name is one of the principal rivers of Lower Alsace; its Latin name is Scara. It lies in the valley called Weilerthale, and empties itself into the Andlau.

CHERA, a river near Colan, in the province of Quito, in the kingdom of Peru, in America, running to Amotage; from whence Paita has its fresh water.

CHERASCO, or CHIARASCO, a town of Piemont, in Upper Italy; on the river Stura (Tanaro.) It is famous for a treaty of peace concluded in it in the year 1631. To it belongs a certain strip of land, with several small places, and is subject to the king of Sardinia. It lies 20 miles S. E. of Turin. Lat 44, 40, N. Long. 7, 45, E.

CHERBOURG, in Latin, Cæsar's Burgum, a town of Coutantin, which is a territory belonging to the government of Normandy, in France. It has a harbour upon the English channel, is the seat of a viscounty, admiralty, bailiwick, mayory, &c. with an abbey, and general hospital. It was formerly a strong place, and besieged by the English in 1418, and by the French in 1450. Off this place the confederate fleet under admiral Russel, obtained a signal victory over that of the French commanded by M. Tourville.

The British troops, in an expedition on this coast, in the year 1758, destroyed its famous piers, and all the ships in the harbour, which the court of France many years ago, had projected to be a second Dunkirk; consisting of 2 piers of near two thirds of a mile long, and carried into 3 fathom at low-water; the harbour to consist of an outer and an inner bason, in which they were to build, dock, and clean, from 50 gun ships downwards. It was far gone on; the inner-bason gates hung, being 42 feet wide; the outer-bason tolerably well cleared, and the inner, when cleared, capable of holding 1000 sail. The eastern pier ran out near 1000 yards, and the foundation laid near as much farther. The western one run about 500 feet; a work of upwards of 30 years labour, at the expence of 1,200,000l. sterling in this country, and which would have cost in England thrice the sum, being all built of coarse marble, and excellently finished, was in 5 days reduced to a chaos. However, the bason has since been cleared, and admitted a vessel for the first time on Dec. 13. 1776. It lies opposite to Hampshire, 50 miles N. W. of Caen. Lat. 49, 38, N. Long. 1, 33, W. Here they manufacture cloth and serge.

CHERESOUL, the capital of Curdistan, or the ancient ancient Assyria, in Asiatic Turkey. It is the seat of the beglerberg, or Ottoman viceroy, 156 miles N. of Bagdat. Lat. 36, 5, N. Long. 45, 10, E.

CHERIBO, or CHAREBAN, a fort and factory belonging to the Dutch in the island of Java, in the Indian ocean, in Asia. It lies 80 miles E. of Batavia.

CHERISH, (brook is,) 1 Kings, xvii, 3, said to be before Jordan; from which nothing else can be well inferred but that this brook ran into Jordan.

CHEROKEES, a mighty Indian nation of Florida, in N. America, seated in the country through which the great road to the Mississippi, &c. leads. They border on Carolina.

CHEROKEES, (river of,) a river of Florida, in America, taking its name from a powerful nation, among whom it has its principal sources. It comes from the S. E. and its heads are in the mountains which separate this country from Carolina, and is the great road of the traders from thence to the Mississippi and intermediate places. Forty leagues above the Chicazas, this river forms the 4 following islands, which are very beautiful; namely, Tahogale, Kakick, Cochali, and Taly, with a different nation inhabiting each.

CHERRY-ISLAND, in the North or Frozen ocean, lies in lat. 74, 5, directly S. of Spitzbergen, between it and the continent of Europe, or in other words between Greenland and Norway; E. long. 20. lat. 75. It was so called in 1603, in honour of Sir Francis Cherry, by the ship's crew, which he had fitted. But this seems by its situation to be the same island which the Dutch discovered in 1596, and which they called Beeren Eilandt, (or Isle of Bears,) because of one of prodigious size they killed there. This they say lies in N. lat. 74, 30. and is about 20 miles long. They landing found plenty of mew-eggs. They went to the top of a mountain so steep, that it seemed perpendicular, and it was with the utmost danger they got down, there being nothing but sharp rocks about them, that they were obliged to slide down gently on their knees or breech. If writers had set down the longitude as well as the latitude, it might be better determined whether it is the same or not. However, we are assured the English made, for several years, many profitable voyages to Cherry-island, where in one season they made 22 tons of oil out of morfes flesh, and got three hogheads of their teeth. In 1610 the Russian company took possession of it, and that year killed 1000 morfes, and made near 50 tons of oil. They likewise discovered 3 lead and coal mines on this and the small islands near it, and found the country so hot towards the end of June, that the pitch ran down their ship's sides. The island abounds with several forts of wild fowl and seals, and a vast number of bears. Yet it does not appear that for the last 100 years any ships have visited this coast.

CHERSO, and island of Venetian Dalmatia, in Hungarian Illyria, joined with that of Osero, by means of a bridge, and gives the title of count. It lies between Istria and Morlachia: has a deal of woodlands, and abundance of cattle.

The town of the same name is pretty well inhabited, has a healthy air, and a secure harbour. Lat. 45, 25, N. Long. 15, 10, E.

CHERSON, (as modern Greeks call it,) was, according to Strabo, built by the Greeks, on the gulph of Carcinites, now the gulph of Negropoli, on the W. coast of Taurica Chersonesus, where its ruins are still to be seen.

CHERSONESUS THRACIA, or HELLES-PONTIACA, a peninsula in the sangiacate of Gallipoli, and province of Romania, in European Turkey: It has the Archipelago on the S. the bay into which the small river Melas falls on the W. and the strait, anciently called the Hellespont, on the E. towards the N. it is joined to the main land by means of a strip of land, the breadth of which the ancients reckoned to be about 35 furlongs. In ancient times it had 11 cities upon it.

CHERSONESUS CESTRICA, a strip of land so called, in Cheshire, which is surrounded with the sea, the broad mouths of the rivers Dee and Mersey, besides the Weaver, by means of which both rivers are joined. It is about 16 English miles long, and between 6 and 7 broad, being extremely fertile, but not one market-town upon it.

CHERTSEY, a market-town of Surrey, where there is a bridge over the Thames, and formerly a stately abbey. From this place the bones of king Henry VI. were removed by king Henry VII. to Windsor. And it was the retreat of the celebrated poet Cowley, where he died. This place maintains itself principally by making of malt, which is carried in barges to London. It lies 7 miles from Kingston, and 19 from London. Its weekly market is on Wednesday; and its annual fairs on the first Monday in Lent, for horses, cattle, and hops; May 14, for the two former articles, and October 6, for these and hogs.

CHERWELL, a river of England, which rises in Northamptonshire, whence it runs S. by Banbury, and falls into the Isis near Oxford.

CHERZ, an ancient town of Poland, in Masovia, 15 miles from Warsaw. Long. 21, 43, W. Lat. 51, 58, N.

CHESAPEAKE-BAY, a large arm of the sea, running about 300 miles inland, between Virginia and Maryland in N. America. It is navigable almost the whole way for large ships, and is about 20 miles in breadth at the entrance; namely, between tween Cape Charles and Cape Henry, and afterwards between 20 and 30 broad, having several navigable rivers which fall into it; so that vessels go up to the very doors of the planters, and take in their lading. It lies between lat. 37, 40, N. and long. 75, W.

CHESES, one of the names of the great river Jangseï, in the Asiatic part of Russia.

CHESHAM, Bucks, on the borders of Hertfordshire, 12 miles S. E. of Aylesbury, and 29 from London; has a market on Wednesday, and fairs on April 21, July 22, and September 28. It has a charity-school for the benefit of the poor natives.

CHESHIRE, or county of Chester. It is very rich in pasture and corn land, and, for the most part level. In it are several heaths or moors, upon which horses and sheep feed. It contains about 72,000 acres, 71 parishes, 13 cities and market-towns, and sends 4 members to parliament. Here they make excellent cheese, well-known by the name of Cheshire, and in such quantity, that London alone takes off 14,000 tons annually, besides vast quantities which they send to Bristol and York, also to Scotland and Ireland. The whole county indeed is employed in it, and part of the neighbouring ones too. For though it goes commonly by the name of Cheshire-cheese, yet a great deal of it is made in Shropshire, Staffordshire, and Lancashire. The soil of Cheshire is extremely good, and the grass has a peculiar richness in it. There is no part of England where are equal numbers of gentry, of such ancient extraction. Besides, it is a county palatine, and has a distinct government from any other, being administered by a chamberlain, a judge special, called chief judge of Chester, a puisne judge, &c. Its ancient counts palatine were very powerful; the first of which was Gherbord, whom William the Conqueror made so; and the last was Simon of Montford, earl of Leicester; after whose death, about the twelfth century, this county was annexed to the crown. It however enjoys its ancient privileges; and at Chester, the capital, are the palatine courts holden for its inhabitants.

CHESHUNT, in Hertfordshire, Antoninus's Duroclitum, which his itinerary places 15 miles from London, and stands near the Ermine-street. It seems a corruption of the Saxon ceastre, from the Roman castra, i. e. a camp, called in Doomsday-book Cestrehunt, the latter part bearing an analogy to hunting, reserved for the use of the crown.

CHESNEGALLON, (spring of,) in the territory of Perche, and government of this latter name, and Maine, in France. Its waters are ferruginous and salutary, but not so strong as those of Herse, in the middle of Belesme forest in Mortagne.

CHESTER, in Cheshire, 182 miles from London; is commonly called West-Chester. It is a large, ancient, populous, and wealthy city, with a noble bridge, having a gate at each end, and 12 arches over the Dee, which falls into the sea. By the late extensive inland navigation, this city has communication with the rivers Mersey, Dee, Ribble, Ouse, Trent, Darwent, Severn, Humber, Thames, Avon, &c. which navigation, including its windings, extend above 500 miles, in the counties of Lincoln, Nottingham, York, Staffordshire, Westmoreland, Warwick, Leicester, Oxford, Worcester, &c.

Here are 11 parishes, and 9 well-built churches. The Cathedral, called St. Werburg's, once a monastery, looks as antique as the castle. Some say they were both built by William the Conqueror's nephew, Hugh Lupus, and others that the church was founded by Edgar. On November 5, 1772, an explosion of gunpowder greatly damaged several houses, and destroyed many of the spectators of a puppet-show. The continual resort of passengers here, to and from Ireland, adds very much to its trade; but its port, which is formed by the Hylelake and the point Aire, is indifferent, the bar being often almost choaked up, so that ships were forced to unload their goods at 6 miles distance, and send them up to the city in small vessels; but by the favour of 2 acts of parliament in 1732 and 1741, this inconvenience is in a great measure surmounted, by a channel being cut 10 miles long, through which great vessels now come up to the quay. The city is supposed to have been founded by the Romans, in whose days it was very eminent, and no city in Britain maintained the Roman splendor so long. After it had submitted to the Saxons, the Britons recovered and kept it, till Egbert, the first Saxon monarch, took it from them about 826; and 60 years after this it was taken by the Danes; but they were besieged, and forced to surrender it to the united Saxons and Britons. In the reign of king Edward the Elder, it was enlarged; and king Edgar having in the 13th of his reign, summoned all the kings and princes of the island hither to pay him homage, the kings of Scotland, Cumberland, and Man, and 5 petty kings of Wales, swore fealty to him, and rowed him in a barge on the river Dee, while himself sat in triumph, steering the helm. In the reign of Henry VIII. this city was empowered to elect members to parliament. In 1695 a mint was established for coining the new money. The houses here in general are of timber, very large and spacious, but are built with galleries, piazzas, or covered walls before them; in which the inhabitants are so hid, that to look into the streets, one sees nobody stirring, except with horses, coaches, carts, &c. and the shops are hardly to be seen from the streets, so that they are for the

the most part, dark and close; but in such parts, where the rows do not cloud the buildings, there are large well-built houses. The streets are generally even and spacious, and, crossing one another in straight lines, meet in the centre. The walls were first erected by Ethelfleda, a Mercian lady, in 908, and join on the S. of the city to the castle; from whence there is a pleasant walk round the city upon the walls, except where it is intercepted by some of the towers over the gates; and from whence there is a prospect of Flintshire and the mountains of Wales.

The city consists chiefly of 4 large streets, which make an exact cross, with the town-house, and exchange in the middle, a neat structure, supported by columns 13 feet high, of one stone each. The city has 4 gates, 3 posterns, and is 2 miles in compass. The episcopal see was first translated to it from Litchfield, immediately after the conquest; but it was afterwards removed to Coventry, and thence back again to Litchfield; so that Chester remained without this dignity till it was restored by Henry VIII. It had been made a corporation and county by Henry VII. It is governed by a mayor, 24 aldermen, 2 sheriffs, and 40 common-council-men. In the castle, where the earls of Chester formerly held their parliaments, is a stately hall, somewhat like that at Westminster, where the Palatine courts and assizes are held. There are also offices for the records, a prison for the county, and a tower ascribed to Julius Cæsar. A Dutch colony was settled here not many years ago, by whose industry the traffic of this city was much augmented; but the manufactures of most note here, is tobacco pipes, said to be the best in Europe, being made of clay brought from the Isle of Wight, Pool, and Biddeford.

Here are weekly assemblies, and horse-races upon St. George's day, beyond the Rhodde, which is a fine large green, but so low that it is often overflowed by the river Dee. The walls, being built like most of the houses of a stone which is a soft red grit, often want repairing; for which purpose there are officers, called murengers. The keeping of the gates was once reckoned so honourable an office, that it was claimed by several noble families; as East-gate by the earl of Oxford, Bridge-gate by the earl of Shrewsbury, Water-gate by the earl of Derby, North gate by the mayor of the city. On the E. side of it there is a postern, which was shut up by one of its mayors, because his daughter, who had been at stool-ball with some maidens in Pepper-street, was stolen, and conveyed away through this gate; this has occasioned a proverb here, "When the daughter is stolen shut Pepper-gate." The city is well supplied with water from the river Dee by mills, and the water-tower, which is one of the gates of the bridge. The centre of the city, where the 4 streets meet facing the cardinal points, is called Pentife, from whence there is a pleasant prospect of all 4 at once. The suburbs of Hanbrid is called by the Welsh Treboth, i. e. Burnt-town, it having been often burnt by them in their incursions. The fee-farm rents of this city are vested in the Princes of Wales, as earls of Chester, who hold them with the castle and profits of the temporalities of the bishopric, and the freemen swear to be true to the king and earl.

The officers established here are, a governor of the city and castle, a lieutenant-governor, with a master-gunner, store-keeper, and furber of small arms; and for the customs, besides a collector, comptroller, and searcher, here are 21 subordinate officers. Here is a charity-school for 40 boys, who are taught, clothed, and maintained by a fund of 500l. and 70l. a year subscription. The markets here are Wednesday and Saturday; and the fairs, to which abundance of merchants and tradesmen come from all parts, particularly Bristol and Dublin, are Feb. 24, July 5, and Oct. 10, each for a week. This place was of great account, so early as in the days of king Arthur, for teaching the arts and sciences, and the learned languages. King Ethelwolf, and 2 other British kings are said to have been crowned here: and it is said, that Henry IV. emperor of Germany died and was buried here, after having lived a hermit here unknown for 10 years.

CHESTER, (Little,) the modern name of the old Roman Derventio, a mile below the town of Derby, in Derbyshire, and upon the Derwent. Remains of walls, vaults, Roman coins, aqueducts, and other marks of antiquity, have been dug up here; as also the foundation of a bridge over the river here. Its weekly markets are Wednesday and Saturday. It has 3 annual fairs: the last Thursday in February for cattle; July 5, and October 10, for cattle, Irish linen, cloths, hardware, hops, drapery goods, and Manchester wares. This is a very considerable fair, and lasts a fortnight.

CHESTER, (in the Street,) a thoroughfare town of Durham, having but few or no remains of its ancient grandeur as a Roman colony. It has a stone-bridge over a rivulet, and which is yet wanted at times.

CHESTER, (county of,) in Pennsylvania, in N. America; so called, as its first settlers were from Cheshire in the mother-country. It lies to the S. of Philadelphia county.

CHESTER, (New,) the capital of the last-mentioned county. It contains above 100 houses. It lies on the river Delaware, about 13 miles S. of Philadelphia, and has a fine road for ships of any burden; the river on which it stands being 3 miles over.

over. It has a court-house, prison, and church, dedicated to St. Paul. Lat. 40, 15; N. Long. 74 E.

CHESTER, (E. and W.) two towns in W. Chester county in the province of New-York.

CHESTER, a town on the S. bank of James-river, in Cumberland county, Virginia.

CHESTERFIELD, a well built, populous mayor-town of Scarfdale, a fruitful tract in Derbyshire, between rivulets, on the S. side of a hill, and N. E. of Chatfworth. It is a place, though in the extremity of this rocky country, of considerable trade in lead, grocery, mercery, malting, tanning, stockings, blankets, bedding, &c. with Yorkshire, Nottinghamshire, Lincolnshire, Leicestershire, and London; also with Bakewell, Tideswall, Wirksworth, Ashbourne, the Peak, and W. of Derbyshire, Chester, Manchester, Liverpool, &c. It has a neat church, and its spire, being timber covered with lead is warped all awry. Its new large market-place is well supplied with the above-mentioned commodities; and the market is held weekly on Saturdays. It has 7 annual fairs; namely, on Jan. 25, Feb. 28, April 3, May 4, for cattle, horses, and pedlary; Sept. 17 for cheese, onions, and pedlary, Nov. 25, for cattle, sheep, and pedlary. Its free-school, reckoned the most considerable in the N. of England, sends great numbers of students, particularly to Cambridge. It gives title of earl to a branch of the Stanhope family.

CHESTERFORD, a place upon the river Cam, in Essex, where in 1719, the vestigia of a Roman city were discovered, including about 50 acres. In the N. W. end of the town is the foundation of a Roman temple, and many Roman coins have been dug up in the borough-field, so the ancient city is termed; the name of which, according to Dr. Stukely, was Camboritum; and not far off, is a large Roman camp upon an eminence, where now is a hunting-tower of brick.

CHELTOP, a river in Northumberland, which runs into the Rede in Redesdale.

CHEVIOT or TIVIOI-HILLS, a range, which running from N. to S. extends N. W. from Alnwick, through Northumberland and Cumberland. They separate Northumberland from Scotland: though there be many hills and reachings for several miles together, yet one of them on the N. side, is a great deal higher than the rest, being a landmark to sailors; and may plainly be seen from the Rosemary-top in the N. Riding of Yorkshire, near 60 miles off. This peak lies towards Berwick, and yet at top it is a smooth and pleasant plain, half a mile in diameter, with a large pond in the middle of it; from which, in a clear day, the smoke of the salt-pans at South Shields may be seen, which is about 40 miles S. of it; also Berwick eastward, and to the N. Soutra-hills, which are in sight of Edinburgh: at the foot of the Chiviot-hills, among many others, a bloody battle was obstinately fought between earl Douglas on the Scottish side, and Piercy earl of Northumberland on that of the English, in which both were killed, besides vast numbers of each army, particularly the nobles. The old English ballad of Chevy-Chace, (Sir Philip Sidney's delight,) has so beautifully described this action, that Mr. Addison has writ several Spectators, exemplifying it from several passages of the immortal Virgil, which, he says, the author of this song imitated. The spots of ground where the two earls are said to have fallen, are still distinguished by 2 stones. The Scots call this the battle of Otterburn, from a place of this name S. of the Chiviot-hills, on the river Rede, near Elledon, a market-town.

CHEVREUSE, a town of Le Hurepoix, a subdivision of the fourth stadtholdership of the Isle of France; it belongs to the famous foundation of St. Cyr, by Madam de Maintenon, and gives the title of duke.

CHEW, (Bishop's) or Chew Magna, a place in Somersetshire, where red bolus, vulgarly called redding, is dug, which is used for marking of sheep, and also by apothecaries for bole ammoniac. It has several considerable hamlets, abounding with coal-pits. The houses here are remarkably neat, even those of the poorest sort. In this parish is Bowditch, so called from its circular form, which was a large camp on a hill, trebly fortified; and from it is a prospect of Flatholm and Steepholm, 2 islands in the British channel.

CHEZIL, mentioned Genesis xxxviii. 5.

CHIACICA, a province in the audience of Charcas, and jurisdiction of the archbishop of La Plata, in S. America. It lies 90 leagues N. of La Plata city, and but 40 from Paz. Its capital of the same name, and all the places southwards of it, belong to the archbishop of La Plata; but many to the northwards are in the diocese of Paz. The countries in this jurisdiction extend in some parts above 100 leagues. Some spots are very hot, and yield cocoa exuberantly: which shrub, supplies all the mine-towns from Charcas to Potosi. The colder parts feed large herds of cattle, together with vicunas, and other wild creatures. Here are also some silver-mines, but neither so many nor so rich as those of Caranges, a neighbouring province.

CHIAMETAN, a province in the audience of Guadalaxara, or kingdom of New Galicia, in New Spain, situated under the Tropic of Cancer; one half in the Temperate and the other in the Torrid Zone, lying along the South Sea, on the W.

bounded by Zacatecas on the N. E. by Cu-liacan on the N. W. and by Xalisco and Guadaxara on the S. and S. E. It is about 37 leagues either way from N. to S. or from E. to W. Is a fruitful soil, yielding great quantities of wax and honey, besides silver-mines. The river of St. Jago, which, according to our maps, comes from the lakes of Guadaxara, empties itself here into the sea. It is one of the principal rivers on this coast, being half a mile broad at the mouth, but much broader farther up, where 3 or 4 rivers meet together. At ebb the water is 10 feet deep on the bar. The chief town in this province is St. Sebastian.

CHIAPA, an inland province in New Spain, or Old Mexico, in the audience of Guatemala. It is bounded by Tabasco on the N. by Yucatan on the N. E. by Soconusco on the S. and by Vera Paz on the E. It is 85 leagues from E. to W. and about 30 where narrowest, but then some parts are near 100. It abounds with great woods of pine, cypress, cedar, oak, walnut, wood-vines, rosin-trees, aromatic gums, balsams, and liquid amber, tacamahaca, copal, and others, that yield pure and sovereign balsams; also with corn, pears, apples, quinces, cocoa, cotton, and wild cochineal, with all kitchen herbs and fallads; which, being once sowed, last for several years. Here they have achiotte, which the natives mix with their chocolate to give it a bright colour; likewise coleworts, or cabbage-trees, so large that birds build in them; and yet they are sweet and tender. Here are most sorts of wild and tame fowls, and very beautiful parrots; also a bird called toto, smaller than a pigeon, with green feathers, which the Indians take for its fine tail, but let it go again after they pulled its feathers out, it being held a capital crime by their law to kill it. It abounds with cattle of all sorts, sheep, goats, and swine from Spain, having multiplied here surprisngly; especially a breed of fine horses, so valuable, that they send their colts to Mexico, though 500 miles off. Beasts of prey, as lions, leopards, tigers, &c. are here in abundance, with foxes, rabbits, and wild hogs. In this province also is plenty of snakes, particularly in the hilly parts, some of which are 20 feet long, others are of a curious red colour, and streaked with white and black, which the natives wear about their necks. Here are two principal towns called Chiapa; which see.

The Chiapese are of a fair complexion, courteous, great masters of music, painting, and mechanics, and obedient to their superiors. Its principal river is that of Tabasco, which running from the N. cross the country of the Quelenes, at last falls into the sea at Tabasco. It is, in short, well watered; and, by means of the aforesaid river, they carry on a pretty brisk trade with the neighbouring provinces, especially in cochineal and silk; in which last commodity the Indians employ their wives for making handkerchiefs of all colours, which are bought by the Spaniards and sent home. Though the Spaniards reckon this one of the poorest countries belonging to them in America, as having no mines or land of gold, nor any harbour on the South Sea, yet is larger than most provinces, and inferior to none but Guatemala. Besides, it is a place of great importance to the Spaniards, because the strength of all their empire in America depends on it; and into it is an easy entrance by the river Tabasco, Puerto Real, and its vicinity to Yucatan.

The principal commerce of this province with Spain is the indigo it produces, which is reputed the best that comes to Spain from America. In the cultivation of it some negroes are employed, and part of those Indians which have survived the tyranny of their conquerors. The labour of these unhappy men annually supply Europe alone with 2500 furrors of indigo, which sell, on an average, at Cadiz for 73l. 10s. each. This rich produce, with some other articles of less consideration, are conveyed upon mules to the town of St. Thomas, situated 60 leagues from Guatemala. Here these commodities remain till they are exchanged for others brought from Spain, in vessels of a moderate size, which commonly arrive in the months of July and August.

CHIAPA, the name of 2 towns in the above province of the same name; the one is sometimes called Ciudad Real, or the Royal-city, and the other Chiapa de los Indos, inhabited by the Spaniards. Ciudad Real lies 100 leagues N. W. from Guatemala, is a bishop's see, and the seat of the judicial courts. It is a very delightful place, situated on a plain, and surrounded with mountains, and almost in the middle, between the North and South Seas. The bishop's revenue is 8000 ducats a year, and the cathedral is a beautiful structure. Here are some monasteries; but the place is neither populous nor rich. Its chief trade is in cocoa, cotton, wool, sugar, cochineal, and pedlars small-wares.

The friars are the principal merchants here for European goods, and the richest men both in the town and country. The Spanish gentry in this place are become a proverb, on account of their fantastical pride, ignorance, and poverty; for they all claim descent from Spanish dukes, who were the first conquerors, as they pretend, of this country. Lat. 17. Long. 96, 40.

CHIAPA, the other town in the above province of the same name, is distinguished from that called Ciudad Real, by the appellation of Chiapa de los Indos, that is, as belonging to the Indians, who are about 20,000. It is the largest they have in this country, lies in a valley on the river Tabasco, which abounds with fish, and is about 12 leagues distant distant from the former, to the N. W. Bartholomew de las Casas, bishop of Chiapa, having complained to the court of Madrid, of the cruelties of the Spaniards here, procured the people great privileges and an exemption from slavery. This town is large and rich with many cloisters and churches, and no town has so many Dons of Indian extraction.

CHIARENZA, or CLARENZA, one of the 4 districts into which the Morea in European Turkey is subdivided. It includes Achaia Proper.

Of the same name is its capital on the N. W. coast of the Morea. It lies opposite to the isle of Zante; 26 miles S. of Patras; has a good harbour on the Mediterranean, and is subject to the Turks. It suffered greatly in the last Venetian war. Lat. 37, 35, N. Long. 21, 15, E.

CHIARI, a small place upon the western confines of Bresciano, one of the Venetian territories, in Upper Italy. In its neighbourhood the Imperialists defeated the French in 1701. Lat. 37, 35, N. Long. 10, 18, E.

CHIARO-MONTE, a town of Italy in Sicily, and in the valley of Noto; seated on a mountain, 27 miles W. of Syracuse. Long. 14, 50, E. Lat. 37, 5, N.

CHIAVARI, a spacious bourg on the eastern part of the Genoese dominions on the continent, and Upper Division of Italy. It has a commodious situation close to the sea.

CHIAVENA, (county of,) in Latin, Clavenna, belonging to the subjects of the Grisons, allies of the Swiss cantons. It takes up the W. part of the great valley which they occupy. It is bounded by the Upper League of the Grisons on the N. and W. the lake of Como on the S. the Valteline on the S. E. and part of the country of Pregel on the N. and E. It lies between high mountains.

Its lake of the same name, of an oval form, and about 2 miles in diameter, runs into that of Como, by means of a canal which is the passage for goods to and from Como, so that a considerable trade is carried on. This country yields more wine than corn, and is well supplied with fish from the rivers Mera and Lyre. They have large herds of cattle, of which, with the butter and cheese, they make great profit, as also from stone-pots, cups, &c. made here from a rock near Pleurs.

Its capital of the same name is a well-built town, delightfully situated on both sides the river Maira, and N. of the lake of Como. It is fortified, has a strong castle, 6 churches within the walls, and 3 without. It is much frequented by merchants, who travel between Italy and Germany, and is a place of great trade. Lat. 46, 15, N. Long. 9, 32, E.

CHICHAS, or TARIJA, a jurisdiction of Plata, and audience of Charcas, in S. America. It lies

C H

30 leagues S. of Plata, its greatest extent being about 35 leagues. The temperature of its air is various; whence it has the advantage of corn, fruits, and cattle.

This country abounds every where in gold and silver mines, especially Chocayas. Between this province and the country inhabited by wild Indians, runs the large river Tipuanys, the sands of which being mixed with gold, are washed in order to find it.

CHICHESTER, in Suffex, 63 miles from London, was the royal seat of the S. Saxon kings, and is the see of a bishop, which was translated hither, in the Conqueror's time from Selsey. Here are 5 churches, besides its cathedral, which has been burnt twice, viz. anno 1114, and again in the reign of Richard III. It is a neat compact town, with a wall and 4 gates, answering to the 4 cardinal winds, which give name to the streets, that meet in the centre, where the markets and fairs are kept. This is a city and county of itself, and the corporation consists of a mayor, recorder, aldermen, and common-council without limitation, and 4 justices of the peace, chose out of the aldermen. Its markets, which are Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday, are furnished with plenty of provisions; and the market-place is adorned with a most stately cross. Its fairs are April 23, Whitfun-Tuesday, St. James's-day, and Michaelmas, which last holds 9 days, and is called Slow-fair. It is encompassed all round, except on the N. side by the river Lavant; which, though very low in the winter, when other rivers are full, yet is apt to overflow in the midst of summer, and is navigable at a little distance from the mouth of it, though not deep enough for a good haven; in it are bred the finest lobsters in England. The market on Saturday is noted, especially for fish, but much more for corn; so that the toll for wheat, barley, malt, and oats there, has sometimes amounted at only an half-penny a quarter (measure,) to 60l. a year. Every Wednesday fortnight, here is one of the greatest cattle-markets in England.

The chief manufactures here are malt and needles. The neighbouring farmers have granaries and mills, near the creek where the vessels come up, and send their corn to London by sea, in meal. Here is some foreign trade, and a collector of the customs, &c. at Dell-key, a small harbour, about 4 miles from the sea, where vessels come in and go out, at high water, with wheat, timber, and coals for London, and other ports on the coast. A canal was dug here in the reign of king James I. because of the city's distance from the haven. The bishop's palace, the cathedral, (which has the pictures of all the monarchs of England since Cissa, and of all the bishops,) and the prebendaries houses, take up all the space between the W. and S. gates. The palace lace has been lately rebuilt; and in October 1727, the workmen in the gardens found some valuable ancient coins, and a curious piece of Roman pavement, dedicated to Neptune and Minerva; a stone was also dug up here, in 1723, denoting, that a temple was erected here in the reign of Claudius Cæsar.

Here is a charity-school for 42 boys, and another for 20 girls. There are several houses of the nobility near it, which have a delightful prospect of the sea, &c. and as the city is healthfully situated on a gravel, within 3 miles of hills, there is very good hunting, coursing, fowling, fishing, &c. round about it, with all necessaries for a pleasant life. It was called Cissa's Cester, i. e. city, because it was rebuilt by Cissa, king of the S. Saxons, after it had been burnt to the ground by some Saxons, and Norwegians. There was once a castle near the N. gate. On the N. side of this city is St. Roch's, commonly call'd Rook's-hill, where was formerly a chapel dedicated, as supposed, to that saint, who was patron of the pilgrims. Here are still the marks of an old camp; a mile and a half to the W. are marks of another camp at Bow-hill, or Gonsill; and another on the same side, but nearer to the city, called the Brill; the last is said to have been Vespasian's.

CHICHESTER, (New,) a town of Chester county in Pennsylvania, in N. America. It stands below Chester town, on the Delaware, and on a creek of the name of Chichester, which is navigable. It contains above 100 houses.

CHICUITOS, a province of S. America, in the government of Santa Cruz de la Sierra. The chief riches consist of honey and wax; and the original inhabitants are very voluptuous, yet very warlike. They maintained bloody wars with the Spaniards till 1690; since which, some of them have become Christians. It is bounded by la Plata on the N. E. and by Chili on the W.

CHIDLEIGH, or CHUDLEIGH, a market-town of Devonshire, near the river Teign, in the road to Plymouth. It gives title of baron to one of the Clifford family. Its weekly market is on Saturday, and annual fairs on June 11 for sheep, and St. Matthew's, Sept. 21, for horned cattle. It lies 8 miles N. W. of Exeter.

CHIELEFA, a strong town of the Peloponnesus, in European Turkey, about a mile in circuit. It stands on a steep rock, about 2 miles from the sea, near the site of the ancient Vitulo, once a trading city of note, but now neither commodious nor safe. Though walled round and flanked with towers, general Morasini took it in 1685, and the Turks in attempting to retake it were routed next year, with the loss of their artillery and baggage; but are now in possession of it.

CHIERI, a small but well-inhabited town of Piedmont, in Upper Italy; subject to the king of Sardinia. In its neighbourhood the French beat the Spaniards in 1639. Lat. 44, 50, N. Long. 7, 45, E.

CHIETI, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and capital of the Hither Abruzzo, with an archbishop's see. It is seated on a mountain near the river Pescara, 8 miles S. W. of Pescara. Long. 14, 13, E. Lat. 42, 22, N.

CHILA, a river of South America, at the mouth of which stands the port of Aranta, from whence it extends through the city Arequippa, 20 leagues distant. Lat. 44, 50, N. Long. 7, 45, E.

CHILI, a province of South America, bounded by Peru on the N. by the province of La Plata on the E. by Patagonia on the S. and by the Pacific ocean on the W. lying between 75 and 85 degrees of W. long. and between 25 and 45 degrees of S. lat. though some comprehend in this province, Patagonia and Terra del Fuego.

The first attempt of the Spaniards upon this country was made by Almagro in the year 1535, after he and Pizarro had completed the conquest of Peru. He set out on his expedition to Chili with a considerable body of Spaniards and auxiliary Indians. For 200 leagues, he was well accommodated with every necessary by the Indians, who had been subjects of the emperors of Peru: but reaching the barren country of Charcas, his troops became discontented through the hardships they suffered; which determined Almagro to climb the mountains called Cordilleras, in order to get the sooner into Chili; being ignorant of the invaluable mines of Potosi, contained in the province of Charcas, where he then was. At that time the Cordilleras were covered with snow, the depth of which obliged him to dig his way through it. The cold made such an impression on his naked Indians, that it is computed no less than 10,000 of them perished on these dreadful mountains, 150 of the Spaniards sharing the same fate; while many of the survivors lost their fingers and toes through the excess of cold. At last, after encountering incredible difficulties, Almagro reached a fine, temperate, and fertile plain on the opposite side of the Cordilleras, where he was received with the greatest kindness by the natives. These poor savages, taking the Spaniards for deputies of their god Virachoca, immediately collected for them an offering of gold and silver worth 200,000 ducats: and soon after brought, a present to Almagro worth 300,000 more. These offerings only determined him to conquer the whole country as soon as possible. The Indians among whom he now was, had acknowledged the authority of the Peruvian incas, or emperors, and consequently gave Almagro no trouble. He therefore marched immediately against those who had never been conquered by the Peruvians, and inhabited the southern parts of Chili. These savages fought with great resolution, and disputed every inch of ground ground: but in five months time the Spaniards had made such progress, that they must infallibly have reduced the whole province in a very little time, had not Almagro returned to Peru, in consequence of a commission sent him from Spain.

In 1540, Pizarro having overcome and put Almagro to death, sent into Chili, Baldivia, or Valdivia, who had learned the rudiments of war in Italy, and was reckoned one of the best officers in the Spanish service. As he penetrated southwards, however, he met with much opposition: the confederated caziques frequently gave him battle, and displayed great courage and resolution; but could not prevent him from penetrating to the valley of Mafiocho, which he found incredibly fertile and populous. Here he founded the city of St. Jago; and finding gold mines in the neighbourhood, forced the Indians to work in them; at the same time building a castle for the safety and protection of his new colony. The natives, exasperated at this slavery, immediately took up arms; attacked the fort; and, though defeated and repulsed, set fire to the outworks, which contained all the provisions of the Spaniards. Nor were they discouraged by this and many other defeats, but still continued to carry on the war with vigour. At last, Valdivia, having overcome them in many battles, forced the inhabitants of the vale to submit; upon which he immediately set them to work in the mines of Quilotta. This indignity offered to their countrymen redoubled the fury of those who remained at liberty. Their utmost efforts, however, were as yet unable to stop Valdivia's progress. Having crossed the large rivers Maulle and Hata, he traversed a vast tract of country, and founded the city of La Concepcion on the South-sea coast. He erected fortresses in several parts of the country, in order to keep the natives in awe; and built the city, called Imperial, about 40 leagues to the southward of Concepcion. The Spanish writers say, that the neighbouring valley contained 80,000 inhabitants of a peaceable disposition; and who were even so tame as to suffer Valdivia to parcel out their lands among his followers, while they themselves remained in a state of inactivity. About 16 leagues to the eastward of Imperial, the Spanish general laid the foundations of the city Villa Rica, so called on account of the rich gold mines he found there. But his ambition and avarice had now involved him in difficulties from which he could never be extricated: He had extended his conquests beyond what his strength was capable of maintaining. The Chilians were still as desirous as ever of recovering their liberties. The horses, fire-arms, and armour of the Spaniards, indeed, appeared dreadful to them; but the thoughts of endless slavery were still more so. In the course of the war they had discovered that the Spaniards were vulnerable and mortal men like themselves; they hoped, therefore, by dint of their superiority in numbers, to be able to expel the tyrannical usurpers. Had all the nations joined in this resolution, the Spaniards had certainly been exterminated; but some of them were of a pacific and fearful disposition, while others considered servitude as the greatest of all possible calamities. Of this last opinion were the Arracceans, the most intrepid people in Chili, and who had given Valdivia the greatest trouble. They all rose to a man, and chose Capaulican, a renowned hero among them, for their leader. Valdivia, however, received notice of their revolt sooner than they intended he should, and returned with all expedition to the vale of Araccœa; but before he arrived, 14,000 of the Chilians were there assembled under the conduct of Capaulican. He attacked them with his cavalry, and forced them to retreat into the woods; but could not obtain a complete victory, as they kept continually falling out and harassing his men.

At last Capaulican, having observed that fighting with such a number of undisciplined troops only served to contribute to the defeat and confusion of the whole, divided his forces into bodies of 1000 each. These he directed to attack the enemy by turns; and, though he did not expect that a single thousand would put them to flight, he directed them to make as long a stand as they could; when they were to be relieved and supported by another body; and thus the Spaniards would be at last wearied out and overcome. The event fully answered to his expectations. The Chilians maintained a fight for 7 or 8 hours, until the Spaniards, growing faint for want of refreshment, retired precipitately. Valdivia ordered them to possess a pass at some distance from the field, to stop the pursuit; but this design being discovered to the Chilians by the treachery of his page, who was a native of that country, the Spaniards were surrounded on all sides, and cut in pieces by the Indians. The general was taken and put to death; some say with the tortures usually inflicted by those savages on their prisoners; others, that he had melted gold poured down his throat; but all agree, that the Indians made flutes and other instruments of his bones, and preserved his skull as a monument of their victory, which they celebrated by an annual festival. After this victory the Chilians had another engagement with their enemies; in which also they proved victorious, defeating the Spaniards with the loss of near 3000 men; and upon this they bent their whole force against the colonies. The city of Concepcion, being abandoned by the Spaniards, was taken and destroyed: but the Indians were forced to raise the siege of Imperial; and their progress was at last stopped by Garcia de Mendoza, who defeated Capaulican.

took him prisoner, and put him to death. No defeats, however, could dispirit the Chilifians. They continued the war for 50 years; and to this day they remain unconquered, and give the Spaniards more trouble than any other American nation. Their most irreconcilable enemies are the inhabitants of Aracca and Tucapel, those to the S. of the river Bobio, or whose country extends towards the Cordilleras. The manners of these people greatly resemble those of North America, which we have already described under the article AMERICA; but seem to have a more warlike disposition. It is a constant rule with the Chilifians never to sue for peace. The Spaniards are obliged not only to make the first overtures, but to purchase it by presents. They have at last been obliged to abandon all thoughts of extending their conquests, and reduced to cover their frontiers by erecting forts at proper distances.

The Spanish colonies in Chili are dispersed on the borders of the South sea. They are parted from Peru by a desert 80 leagues in breadth; and bounded by the island of Chiloe, at the extremity next the straits of Magellan. There are no settlements on the coast except those of Baldivia, Conception-island, Valparaiso, and Coquimbo or La Serena, which are all sea-ports. In the inland country is St. Jago, the capital of the colony. There is no culture nor habitation at any distance from these towns. The buildings in the whole province are low, made of unburnt brick, and mostly thatched. This practice is observed on account of the frequent earthquakes, and is properly adapted to the nature of the climate, as well as the indolence of the inhabitants.

The climate of Chili is one of the most wholesome in the whole world. The vicinity of the Cordilleras gives it such a delightful temperature as could not otherwise be expected in that latitude. Though gold mines are found in it, their richness has been too much extolled; their produce never exceeds 218,750 l. The soil is prodigiously fertile. All the European fruits have improved in that happy climate. The wine would be excellent if nature were properly assisted by art: and the corn-harvest is reckoned a bad one when it does not yield a hundred fold. With all these advantages, Chili has no direct intercourse with the mother-country. Their trade is confined to Peru, Paraguay, and the savages on their frontiers. With these last they exchange their less valuable commodities, for oxen, horses, and their own children, whom they are ready to part with for the most trifling things. This province supplies Peru with great plenty of hides, dried fruits, copper, salt-meat, horses, hemp, lard, wheat, and gold. In exchange it receives tobacco, sugar, cocoa, earthen-ware, woollen-cloth, linen, hats made at Quito, and every article of luxury brought from Europe. The ships sent from Callao on this traffic were formerly bound to Conception-bay, but now come to Valparaiso. The commerce between this province and Paraguay is carried on by land, though it is a journey of 300 leagues, 40 of which lie through the snows and precipices of the Cordilleras; but if it was carried on by sea, they must either pass the straits of Magellan, or double Cape Horn, which the Spaniards always avoid as much as possible. To Paraguay are sent some woollen stuffs, called ponchos, which are used for cloaks; also wines, brandy, oil, and chiefly gold. In return they receive wax, a kind of tallow fit to make soap, European goods, and negroes.

Chili is governed by a chief, who is absolute in all civil, political, and military affairs, and is also independent of the viceroy. The latter has no authority except when a governor dies; in which case he may appoint one in his room for a time, till the mother-country names a successor. If, on some occasions, the viceroy has interfered in the government of Chili, it was when he has been either authorized by a particular trust reposed in him by the court, or by the deference paid to the eminence of his office; or when he has been actuated by his own ambition to extend his authority. In the whole province of Chili there are not 20,000 white men, and not more than 60,000 negroes, or Indians, able to bear arms. The military establishment amounted formerly to 2000 men; but the maintaining of them being found too expensive, they were reduced to 500 at the beginning of this century.

CHILHAM, a village in Kent, 6 miles S. W. of Canterbury, with one fair, on November 8, for cattle.

CHILLON, a place in the Pais de Vaux, belonging to the canton of Berne, in Switzerland, remarkable for a very large castle, which is said to occupy 7 acres of ground, where the bailiff of Vevay resides. It stands at the foot of a steep mountain commanding it.

CHILMARK, a pleasant village of Wiltshire, noted for its quarries of very good white stone, which rises in various dimensions: so that a single stone lies over the mouth of the quarry, said to be full 60 feet long, 12 thick, and without any flaw. Here a fair holds annually on July 30, for cattle, sheep, horses, swine, and cheese.

CHILMARK, a town in Martha's Vineyard, Plymouth colony, New England, chiefly inhabited by fishermen.

CHILOAS, together with Llulla, one of the jurisdictions in the diocese of Truxillo, in Peru, in South America. It lies to the S. of Chachapayas, and on the E. side of the Cordillera of the Andes. Being low, it is both warm and moist, and covered with with woods; so that a great part is uninhabited. It confines on the river Moyabamba, which beginning its course from these southern provinces of Peru, forms the great river of the Amazon. Its principal commodity is tobacco, which, with a sort of almonds called andes, and a few other fruits natural to its climate, constitute the commerce of this province with the others.

CHILOE, a considerable island of Chili, in South America, situated between 42 and 44 degrees of S. lat. being about 50 leagues, or 150 miles in breadth. The S. part of it is divided from the continent by a narrow sea, and the continent there forms a bay. The coast is very subject to storms, especially in March: for then the winter begins, and people cannot put to sea till summer returns; the N. winds are not so furious. The Spaniards have in this island only a little fort, called Chacao, always ill provided with warlike stores. The town of Castro stands between two brooks, with a small castle which commands the harbour. The town has neither walls nor ramparts, and the houses lie scattered up and down. This island produces all necessary provisions, excepting wine; and quantities of ambergris are found. About this island are 40 more which all take their names from it.

CHILQUES, with MASQUES, a jurisdiction in the diocese of Cusco, and audience of Lima, in South America. It begins about 7 or 8 leagues S. E. of Cusco, extending above 30 leagues between the rivers Avancy and Apurimac. It abounds in all sorts of cattle, and the temperate parts yield plenty of wheat, maize, and fruits. Here are gold and silver mines, which were formerly very rich, but now much exhausted.

CHILTERN, a continued ridge of chalky hills so called, which are the natural and civil boundary between the counties of Hartford and Bedford. They run through Buckinghamshire from E. to W.

CHILWORTH, Surry, a hamlet of St. Nicholas's parish, Guildford, though near 2 miles from it. Here are many ponds that abound with carp as bright and sweet as river carp. Here is a fair for 7 days before Michaelmas, for cattle, cheese, fish, &c.

CHIMAY, a town of Hainault, in French Flanders, 20 miles S. of Charleroy. Lat. 50, 6, N. Long. 4, 20, E.

CHIMAY, a considerable inland lake of Asia, lying in the province of Achem, between the East Indies and China.

CHIMERA, anciently a strong town of Albania, one of the provinces belonging to European Turkey, and famous for its hot baths, but at present an inconsiderable place. It is situated at the entrance of the Adriatic sea, 32 miles N. of the city of Corfu. In its neighbourhood are the famous mountains called Monti della Chimera, anciently Montes Ceraunii, or Acroceraunii; being as it were, the natural boundary between the Ionian and Adriatic seas. Their ancient name they have from their being frequently thunderstruck. They divide Epirus from Thessaly. Anciently it was much frequented for its hot-baths, and here was a volcano celebrated by Virgil.

CHIMBORAZO, (desert of,) in the way from Guyaquil to Quito, in S. America. It has different eminences, most of which are of sand. Near it is a mountain of the same name, 20280 feet high, and surpasses more than one third of the altitude of the Pike of Teneriffe.

CHIMI, (Capo,) a considerable promontory of the island of Negropont, in the Archipelago, and European Turkey. It is also called Capo D'Oro, or Capo Figuera.

CHIMLEIGH. See CHULMLEIGH.

CHIMSEE, a small but episcopal town in the archbishopric of Saltzburg, and Circle of Bavaria, in Germany. It lies on an island, in the lake situated between the rivers Inn and Saltza, about 22 miles W. of Saltzburg.

CHINA, a country of Asia, situated on the most easterly part of the continent. It is bounded on the N. by Tartary, from which it is divided partly by a prodigious wall of 1500 miles in length, and partly by high, craggy, and inaccessible mountains. On the E. it is bounded by the ocean; on the W. by part of the Mogul's empire, and India beyond the Ganges, from which it is parted by other ridges of high mountains and sandy deserts. On the south, it is bounded partly by the kingdoms of Lao, Tonquin, Ava, and Cochin-China, and partly by the southern or Indian sea, which flows between it and the Philippine islands. There are several ways of computing its length and breadth. According to some of these, it is reckoned 1269, 1600, or 1800 miles in length, and as much in breadth; however, by the best and latest accounts, this vast country is of an oval form, the breadth being less than the length, by little more than a fourth part. It contains 15 provinces, exclusive of that of Lyau-tong, which is situated without the great wall, though under the same dominion. Their names are 1. Shen-si, 2. Shan-si, 3. Pecheli, which are situated on the N. side, along the wall. 4. Shan-tong, 5. Kyan-nang, 6. Che-kyang, 7. Fo-kyen, which are situated along the eastern ocean. 8. Quang-tong, 9. Quang-si, 10. Yu-nan, 11. Se-chuen, which stretch themselves towards the S. and S. W. And, 12. Ho-nan, 13. Hu-quand, 14. Quey-chew, 15. Kyang-si, which take up the middle part. For a particular description of all these, see their proper articles.

The origin of all nations is involved in obscurity and fable; but that of the Chinese much more so than any other. Every nation is inclined to assume too high an antiquity to itself; but the Chinese carry theirs beyond all bounds. Indeed; though no people on earth are more exact in keeping records of every memorable transaction; yet such is the genius of the Chinese for superstition and fable, that the first part of their history is deservedly condemned by every rational person. What contributes more to the uncertainty of the Chinese history is, that neither we, nor they themselves, have any thing but fragments of their ancient historical books; for about 213 years before Christ, the reigning emperor, Si-whang-ti, caused all the books in the empire to be burned, except those written by lawyers and physicians. Nay, the more effectually to destroy the memory of every thing contained in them, he commanded a great number of learned men to be buried alive, lest from their memories, they should commit to writing something of the true memoirs of the empire. The inaccuracy of the Chinese annals is complained of even by their most respected author, Confucius himself; who also affirms, that, before his time, many of the oldest materials for writing such annals had been destroyed.

The most interesting particulars of the Chinese history relate only to the incursions of the Tartars, who at last conquered the whole empire, and who still continue to hold the sovereignty; though by transferring the seat of the empire to Peking, and adopting the Chinese language, manners, &c. Tartary would seem rather to be conquered by China, than China by Tartary. These incursions are said to have begun very early; even in the time of the emperor Shun, successor to Yau 2000 years before Christ, in whose reign the miraculous solstice happened. At this time the Tartars were repulsed; and obliged to retire to their own territories. From time to time, however, they continued to threaten the empire with invasions, and the northern provinces were often actually ravaged by the Tartars in the neighbourhood. About the year before Christ 213, Si-whang-ti, having fully subdued all the princes, or kings, as they were called, of the different provinces, became emperor of China with unlimited power. He divided the whole empire into 36 provinces; and finding the northern parts of his dominions much incommoded by the invasions of the neighbouring barbarians, he sent a formidable army against them, which drove them far beyond the boundaries of China. To prevent their return, he built the famous wall already mentioned, which separates China from Tartary. After this, being elated with his own exploits, he formed a design of making posterity believe that he himself had been the first Chinese emperor that ever sat on the throne. For this purpose, he ordered all the historical writings to be burnt, and caused many of the learned to be put to death, as already mentioned.

What effect the great wall for some time had in preventing the invasions of the Tartars, we are not told; but in the tenth century of the Christian æra, those of Kitan or Lyau got a footing in China, and continued invading it under different leaders, particularly Jenghis Khan, with various success, till at length in 1644, they entirely subdued it.

The last Chinese emperor was named Whay-tsung, and ascended the throne in 1628. He was a great lover of the sciences, and a favourer of the Christians; though much addicted to the superstitions of the Bonzes. He found himself engaged in a war with the Tartars, and a number of rebels in different provinces. That he might the more effectually suppress the latter, he resolved to make peace with the former; and for that end sent one of his generals, Ywen, into Tartary, at the head of an army, with full power to negotiate a peace; but that traitor made one upon such shameful terms, that the emperor refused to ratify it. Ywen, in order to oblige his master to comply with the terms made by himself, poisoned his best and most faithful general, named Mau-ven-long; and then desired the Tartars to march directly to Peking, by a road different from that which he took with his army. This they accordingly did, and laid siege to the capital. Ywen was ordered to come to its relief; but on his arrival, was put to the torture and strangled; of which the Tartars were no sooner informed, than they raised the siege and returned to their own country.

In 1636, the rebels above-mentioned composed 4 great armies, commanded by as many generals; which, however, were soon reduced to two, commanded by Li and Chang. These agreed to divide the empire between them; Chang taking the western provinces, and Li the eastern ones. The latter seized on part of Shen-si, and then of Honan, whose capital, named Kay-fong-fu, he laid siege to, but was repulsed with loss. He renewed it 6 months after, but without success; the besieged choosing rather to feed on human flesh than surrender. The imperial forces coming soon after to its assistance, the general made no doubt of being able to destroy the rebels at once, by breaking down the banks of the Yellow river; but unfortunately the rebels escaped to the mountains, while the city was quite overflowed, and 300,000 of the inhabitants perished.

After this disaster, Li marched into the provinces of Shen-si and Honan; where he put to death all the mandarins, exacted great sums from the officers in the place, and shewed no favour to any.

any but the populace, whom he freed from all taxes; by this means he drew so many to his interest, that he thought himself strong enough to assume the title of emperor. He next advanced towards the capital, which, though well-garrisoned, was divided into factions. Li had taken care to introduce before-hand a number of his men in disguise; and by these the gates were opened to him the third day after his arrival. He entered the city in triumph at the head of 300,000 men, whilst the emperor kept himself shut up in his palace, busied only with his superstitions. It was not long, however, before he found himself betrayed; and, under the greatest consternation, made an effort to get out of the palace, attended by about 600 of his guards. He was still more surprised to see himself treacherously abandoned by them, and deprived of all hopes of escaping the insults of his subjects. Upon this, preferring death to the disgrace of falling alive into their hands, he immediately retired with his empress, whom he tenderly loved, and the princess her daughter, into a private part of the garden: his grief was so great, that he was not able to utter a word; but she soon understood his meaning, and, after a few silent embraces, hanged herself on a tree, in a silken string. Her husband staid only to write these words on the border of his vest: "I have been basely deserted by my subjects; do what you will with me, but spare my people." He then cut off the young princess's head with one stroke of his scymitar, and hanged himself on another tree, in the 17th year of his reign, and the 36th of his age. His prime minister, queens, and eunuchs, followed his example; and thus ended the Chinese monarchy, to give place to that of the Tartars, which hath continued ever since.

It was some time before the body of the unfortunate monarch was found. At last it was brought before the rebel Li, and by him used with the utmost indignity, after which he caused two of Whey-tsong's sons, and all his ministers to be beheaded; but his eldest son happily escaped by flight. The whole empire submitted peaceably to the usurper, except prince U-fan-ghey, who commanded the imperial forces in the province of Lyau-tong. This brave prince, finding himself unable to cope with the usurper, invited the Tartars to his assistance, and Tsong-te their king, immediately joined him with an army of 80,000 men. Upon this the usurper marched directly to Peking; but not thinking himself safe there, plundered and burnt the palace, and then fled with the immense treasure he had got. What became of him afterwards we are not told; but the young Tartar monarch was immediately declared emperor of China, his father, Tsong-te, having died almost as soon as he set his foot in that empire.

The new emperor, named Shun-chi, or Xun-chi, began his reign with rewarding U-fan-ghey, by conferring upon him the title of king; and assigned him the city of Si-gnan-fu, capital of Shen-si, for his residence. This, however, did not hinder U-fan-ghey from repenting of his error in calling in the Tartars, or as he himself used to phrase it, "in sending for lions to drive away dogs." In 1674 he formed a very strong alliance against them, and had probably prevailed, if his allies had been faithful. But they treacherously deserted him one after another; which so affected him, that he died soon after. In 1681 Hong-wha, son to U-fan-ghey, who continued his efforts against the Tartars, was reduced to such straits that he put an end to his own life.

During this space, there had been some resistance made to the Tartars in many of the provinces. Two princes of Chinese extraction had at different times been proclaimed emperors; but both of them were overcome and put to death. In 1682, the whole 15 provinces were so effectually subdued, that the emperor Kang-hi, successor to Shun-chi, determined to visit his native dominions of Tartary. He was accompanied by an army of 70,000 men, and continued for some months taking the diversion of hunting. This he continued to do for some years; and in his journies took father Verbiest along with him, by which means we have a better description of these countries than could possibly have been otherwise obtained.

This prince was a great encourager of learning, and of the Christian religion; in favour of which last he published a decree, dated in 1692. In 1716, however, he revived some obsolete laws against the Christians, nor could the Jesuits with all their art preserve the footing they had got in China. The causes of this alteration in his resolution, are, by the missionaries, said to have been the slanders of the mandarins; but from the known character of the Jesuits, it will be readily believed, that there was something more at bottom. This emperor died in 1722, and was succeeded by his son Yong-ching; who not only gave no encouragement to the missionaries, but persecuted all Christians of whatever denomination, not excepting even those of the imperial race. At the beginning of his reign he banished all the Jesuits into the city of Canton, and in 1732, they were banished from thence into Ma-kau, a little island inhabited by the Portuguese, but subject to China. He died in 1736, but though the Jesuits entertained great hopes from his successor, we have not heard that they have yet met with any success.

The division of China into 15 provinces, we have already mentioned. In such a vast tract of country, it impossible that either the climate or soil should be alike in all places. The climate, however, is in general, reckoned very moderate, except in the northern provinces, where the cold is extremely piercing, owing to the high ridges of mountains with which those parts are intersected, and which are always covered with snow. Even in those parts which lie under the tropics, the winds that blow from the northern mountains, make the winter, which continues for three, or sometimes four months, extremely cold and piercing. The southern parts are excessively hot and dry; but the heats are more easily borne by means of the cooling grottoes, groves, &c. to which the inhabitants retire in the heat of the day, when there is the same universal silence and cessation from business as if it was midnight. These parts have neither frost nor snow; but are much troubled with storms and violent rain, about the time of the equinoxes, especially the autumnal, which is all the winter they have. They enjoy a serene sky all the rest of the year. It is, however, universally acknowledged, that where nature has been most unequal in the distribution of her gifts, the inhabitants have remedied these inconveniences as far as human industry could go. In some provinces, they have levelled whole ridges of mountains; in others, they have raised artificial ones. In some, they have provided fences against excessive colds; in others, against heats and droughts, &c. In short, by varying their agriculture, manuring, and planting, according to the differences of soils and climates, almost every spot throughout this vast empire produces more than enough to make its inhabitants rich and happy. All these advantages are farther improved by the vast number of canals cut from one river to another, and the innumerable carriages they keep up by land, by which each canton may easily communicate its own peculiar product to all the rest.

On these accounts the Chinese entertained the most extraordinary opinion of themselves and their country. The advantages they had over those neighbouring nations they knew or heard of, appeared to them so considerable, that they looked upon themselves as the only favourites of heaven, and the rest of mankind as barbarians, whom they represented as monsters, dwarfs, and contemptible creatures. They looked upon their country to be placed in the center of the earth; and themselves as the only people who had a human shape or form. All the other kingdoms or nations, the number of which they imagined might amount to 72, were scattered about in small islands, the biggest of which, according to their maps, was not so large as the least of the Chinese provinces. These were stuck round their empire, to which they gave a quadrangular form, like as many satellites, designed only to serve and adorn it. They indeed gave the preference to their four neighbouring kingdoms of Tartary, Japan, Ton-king, and Korea. The inhabitants of these, though reckoned barbarians, they still looked upon as considerably improved by their vicinity to China: but as to the rest, they were looked upon as outcasts into the extreme parts of the earth, and the refuse of nature; and as such they characterised them in their maps, marking them by such emblems as were most fit to inspire their nation with disdain and contempt. It was therefore no small matter of wonder to them, when, upon their becoming acquainted with the Europeans, they found them not only as polite and rational as themselves, but far superior to them in all kinds of learning. From that time they used to say that "the Chinese had two eyes, the Europeans one, and the rest of the world none at all."

When the country was first discovered by the Europeans, they were no less surprised at the ingenuity and politeness of the Chinese, than the latter were at the learning of the Europeans. The first traveller that we know of who visited China, was Francis Paulo, more commonly known by the name of Paulus Venetus, about the end of the 13th century. At that time all Europe was immersed in such a state of barbarism, that the riches and polite behaviour of the Chinese could not but appear very extraordinary in his eyes. His accounts were not believed, but laughed at as romance. When the Portuguese discovered the same country by sea, above 200 years ago, they were almost as much surprised as Paulus Venetus had been. Neither were their accounts credited, till the missionaries whom the pope kept pouring in since the year 1580, published so many accounts concerning the riches of China, that they could no longer be denied. It must be owned, however, that the Chinese were vastly inferior to the Europeans in the liberal sciences; but, on the other hand, the former, to this day, as much exceed them in opulence, manufactures, handicrafts, agriculture, &c.

Another advantage for which this country hath been famed, and in which it certainly exceeds every other in the world, is the vast number of its inhabitants. In most of the provinces, the cities, towns, and villages, are so thick crowded upon one another, that the whole seems to be almost a continued town. All of them swarm with inhabitants, every one employed in some manufacture, traffic, or work. Their roads are crowded with passengers night and day, with coaches, carriages, waggons, and sometimes whole caravans; all employed in carrying on some useful commerce, and in conveying all sorts of merchandises, provisions, and other wares, from one end of the kingdom to another, ther. The number of armies, garrisons, and troops necessary for defending this vast empire, far exceed what is to be found in any other part of the world, and indeed are almost incredible. According to some Chinese registers, the whole number of males amounted to 59,788,364; at that time the army consisted of 902,054 foot, and 989,167 horse, besides 767,970 men kept in garrisons. For these, as well as for the accommodation of the mandarins and other officers of the court, there are reckoned 1145 inns or places of entertainment. In short, to speak in the stile of one of their writers, "the Chinese empire is so immensely populous, that its inhabitants are not to be computed by thousands, but by millions." Many of these live entirely in vessels on the canals, keeping hogs, poultry, dogs, and other domestic animals, on board. Besides these vessels, there is a prodigious number of floats of timber which perpetually go up and down the canals and rivers, carrying whole villages of people upon them. Some of these floats are above a mile in length. The people build huts upon the floats, and live in them till they have disposed of their timber, which they sometimes carry 1000 miles.

From this description, it is natural to imagine that the Chinese must be the happiest nation in the whole world, and that poverty is scarce known among them; but the case is far otherwise. This empire exceeds other nations as much in the misery of many of its inhabitants, as it does in the number of them. This is in a great measure owing to the wickedness and corruption of their magistrates. Every province has its viceroy and several orders of mandarins, who are designed to serve as checks upon each other, and prevent the people from oppressing one another, or being oppressed by their governors. But the misfortune is, that they all find it their interest to wink at one another's crimes; and thus the people are oppressed to a degree beyond what they could be by any single governor however bad. The first class of mandarins are the judges of courts, who determine civil and criminal causes; the next attend the affairs of the treasury and revenue; and the third command the militia. All these, according to the Chinese constitution, ought to keep their offices no longer than 3 years; and are never to be natives of the province where they officiate; lest, if they be of mean descent, they should be despised; or, if rich, should become too much respected and powerful. They are allowed sufficient salaries, that they may be enabled to discharge their offices, and administer justice without fees or bribery. Their palaces and places of residence are also provided for them at the expence of government, to prevent them from being too profuse in furniture, &c. But all these wise regulations they find means to elude; and there is not a nation on earth where extortion and fraud are carried to a greater height, or more universally diffused, than in China. Thus the court at Peking extorts vast sums from the viceroys of the provinces, and these again from the mandarins under them. The mandarins of course must fleece the inferior officers, and they again plunder the people, who having none below them whom they can oppress, are reduced to the necessity of cheating one another, or those foreigners who trade with them. In this they are so expert, that it is commonly said a Chinese will cheat a man of any other nation; but none can cheat a Chinese, except one of his own country.

The consequence of this extortion is manifest, in the misery to which the lower ranks of inhabitants are reduced in years of dearth: which sometimes happen through excessive drought, or the devastations of the grasshoppers; which, in some parts of the empire, at times, appear in such numbers, as not only to devour every herb, leaf, or fruit, but even the small wood of the branches, and fibres of the roots of trees. In these calamitous cases, the common people are often obliged to expose or destroy their children, sell them for slaves, and sometimes to rise in rebellion. Even in their most plentiful seasons, the poorer sort, notwithstanding all their art and industry, are glad to support themselves not only on the very refuse of every kind of provisions, but even on dogs and cats, though they die of old age or sickness, rats, mice, and other vermin; or on the garbage of any flesh, fish, or fowl, they can purchase; for these are sold in the markets as well as the more dainty meats; and there are cooks-shops where the entrails of fishes, fowls, &c. are dressed, and whither those who can afford no better are glad to repair.

The government of China is monarchical, and in the highest degree despotic; and has been so from the earliest ages. Nay, so much were they inured to this kind of government, and so little notion had they of any other, that when the Dutch ambassador made his first application, he found it very difficult to make the court understand what he meant by the High and mighty lords the States General, and the republic of Holland. Their laws are contained in some books which they call canonical; but their monarchs are the sole interpreters of them; so that we may say the whole legislative power is lodged in their breast, and depends entirely on their will.

The revenue of the emperor is computed at about 50,000,000 sterling. Their punishments are are either capital, as in cases of rebellion, murder, treason, &c. or corporeal and pecuniary in lesser crimes. Rebellion and treason being esteemed the greatest of all possible crimes are punished with the greatest rigour, viz. by cutting the criminal into 10,000 pieces, in the following manner: the executioner, having first tied him to a stake, tears the skin off his head and forehead, and lets it hang over his eyes, to prevent him, according to some, from seeing how dreadfully the rest of his body is mangled.

Next to treason or rebellion against the emperor, that against parents is reckoned the greatest crime, and is punished with equal severity. In this case, if a father accuses a son before a magistrate, no farther proof is required, but the criminal is immediately executed. This is done for mere obstinacy or disobedience; but if the offender hath proceeded so far as mockery, insult, or lifting a hand, the whole country is alarmed, and the punishment of the criminal reserved for the emperor himself. In this last case, the magistrates of the place are turned out with disgrace, and the whole neighbourhood is threatened with some severe punishment for having given birth to such a monster. The offender is then condemned to be cut like a traitor or rebel, into 10,000 pieces, and afterwards burnt; his lands, house, or houses, to be destroyed, and to remain so, as a monument of such a detestable crime.

Murder is also capital, and is punished either by beheading or strangling the criminal. Adultery is so far from being a capital crime in China, that some fond parents, out of compassion to their daughter's weakness, will contract with their future husbands, in consideration of some valuable present, to allow her the liberty of now and then indulging herself with a gallant, without being called to an account for it. But where no such contract hath been made, the husband may inflict a corporeal punishment, or divorce a wife who proves unfaithful. Neither is theft capitally punished. Those who are guilty of it, are either condemned to the bastinado, or to the kan-ghe, or wooden ruff, a kind of portable pillory.

There are two kinds of torture used in China, the ordinary and extraordinary. The first is inflicted by a kind of engine, which they clap on the hands or feet, or both; and which distorts the bones to such a degree that the ankles are sometimes squeezed quite flat by it. The extraordinary torture is seldom used, except in cases of treason or rebellion, in order to make the criminal discover his accomplices after the fact has been proved. It is inflicted by cutting slight gashes in the body, and stripping off the skin in narrow slips or fillets. One thing, however, must be said in praise of the Chinese, with regard to the treatment of their criminals, viz. that their prisons are much more capacious, airy, and sweet, than any of the European ones.

As to their persons, the Chinese are generally of a middling stature, broad faced, with black hair, small black eyes, short noses, and thin beards. This last circumstance is the effect of a very painful operation, viz. pulling up the greatest part of the beard by the roots with tweezers. Since the accession of the Tartar monarchs to the crown, they have forced the Chinese to cut off all their hair except a lock on the crown like the Mahometans. Near the tropic, their complexions incline to tawny; but in the northern parts, they are as fair as other people under the same parallel. The women are esteemed for their little feet, which are reckoned their greatest beauty: and in order to form them little, they are bound up from their infancy so tight, that they cannot grow to the common size; the foot of a full grown woman not being bigger than that of a child of four years old. The men wear a cap of the shape of a bell on their heads, which does not cover their ears: they also wear a vest and sash, and over the vest a loose coat or gown, and a kind of silk boots quilted with cotton. In the southern provinces the inhabitants, when at home, throw off every thing but a pair of drawers, and appear naked; as the common people also do in the streets. The women dress with their hair down, having nothing on their heads, in the south. They generally wear a silk vest, red, blue, or green; and over it a loose gown with white sleeves, and embroidered silk shoes; but, by reason of the smallness of their feet, hobble prodigiously when they walk. Here, as in most other countries of the east, the married couple are brought together without any previous acquaintance with each other; the bargain being struck by the parents, or by some go-between, and afterwards ratified by presents sent on both sides. There is scarce any country in the world where grief for the dead is manifested to such a degree as in China, especially for near relations; or where the mourning is so deep, and so long continued. Every Chinese keeps in his house a table whereon are written the names of his father, grandfather, and great-grandfather; before which they frequently prostrate themselves; and when the father of a family dies, the name of the great-grandfather is taken away, and that of the deceased added to make up the number.

The Chinese are said to worship one supreme God, along with several inferior deities, who appear to have been men eminent in several ages; particularly the inventors of arts and sciences.

There are at this day three sects in China.

1. The followers of La-laokun, who lived above 500 years before Christ. He taught that God was corporeal, and had many subordinate deities under his government. His disciples study magic, and pretend to make a drink that will confer immortality. The second is the learned, or disciples of Confucius. He left many admirable precepts in morality, and instructed the people in philosophy. He speaks of God as a most pure and perfect principle, and the fountain and essence of all beings. Though we are told that he prohibited idolatry, he has temples and images erected to him, and is worshipped with the most profound veneration; as appears from the pope's decree against the Jesuits, for indulging their converts in this idolatrous worship. The third sect, which is that of the idol Fo, or Fo-hi, is much more numerous than either of the former. They stile him the only saviour of the world. The Chinese have also an image of immortality, which they worship under the shape of a monstrous fat man sitting cross-legged, with a huge prominent belly. There is another called the idol of pleasure, about 20 feet high; and between these, in their temples is an image 30 feet high, gilded over, with a crown upon his head, and richly dressed. The Christian religion, we are told, was planted in this country, either by the apostle Thomas, or some of his disciples. The Chinese records seem to intimate that a man came there about that time, who preached a heavenly doctrine, and confirmed it by miracles. There is also an ancient marble pillar erected in the province of Shen-si, in memory of a man that brought Christianity thither in the year 636. However, the missionaries of the church of Rome did not find, as we are told, the least vestige of Christianity on their arrival in China.

The learning of the Chinese is, in a great measure, confined to the study of their own language. Their characters are a kind of short-hand, every one of which signifies a word or sentence. There are near 60,000 of these characters in all, but those in common use do not exceed 3000. This vast number of characters, however, is reducible to a pure and simple alphabet like those of any other language: for a character is no more than a word written with its proper consonants and vowels; not indeed at length as we do, but intermingled one with another by some peculiar method known only to them, or perhaps only to their learned men. They write from the top to the bottom of the page. In all other respects the knowledge and learning of the Chinese are very limited. Some knowledge of astronomy they certainly had; but that was exceedingly defective. They are said indeed to have calculated the eclipses of the sun and moon for a vast number of years; but many of these calculations have been found by the Europeans who visited them to be false and erroneous, and whatever progress they have made in that or other sciences, must be attributed entirely to the Jesuit missionaries. They are, however, in some things a very ingenious people. The art of printing they have had from time immemorial. It is true, this is only performed by wooden blocks, in the same manner as cards are done among us; but the vast number of their characters renders it impossible to bring that art to the same perfection which it hath attained in Europe. Their chief commodities are, silk, cotton, tea, china-ware, and cabinets or lacquered ware. Their silks are exceedingly fine; their atlas's, gold and silver stuffs, are not to be paralleled; but their porcelain is thought to be equalled or even excelled by that of Dresden, and their lacquered-ware is greatly excelled by that of Japan. In hard-ware the Europeans excel them prodigiously; the Chinese being mere bunglers at making clocks, watches, door and gun locks, &c. They had the use of gun-powder, and of the mariner's compass, for many centuries before they were known in Europe; but through a neglect unaccountable in such an ingenious people, they scarce reaped one single advantage either from the one or the other.

The Chinese had no traffic with other nations, except those in their neighbourhood, till the Portuguese discovered their country by the way of the Cape of Good Hope. Their junks, as they are called, are many of them 1000 tons burthen, heavy sailers, with square heads and stems. Some of them have two masts, others three, but never any top-masts; and their sails are made of matting, which they let down upon the deck when they furl them. The hold of the ship is divided into many small partitions, which are made so tight, that if a leak happens in one of them, it goes no farther, and the goods stowed in the other partitions receive no damage. The compilers of the Universal History take notice, that the Chinese vessels are built according to the proportions of Noah's ark; viz. 6 breadths to a length; and this they will have to be a proof that the Chinese empire was founded by Noah. They have no coin throughout the whole empire, except a copper one of very little value. Their merchandise is bought with gold and silver cut for the purpose, from ingots or plates. The former is of less value in China than in most other nations; and therefore silver is advantageously exchanged by the Europeans for that precious metal.

CHINCA, a port-town of Peru in South America. It lies on a river, and in an extensive valley of the same name, about 60 miles S of Lima. Lat. 13, 5, S. Long. 76, 5, W.

CHINCHURA, a Dutch factory of Bengal, on the Ganges. It is large, and has a great many good houses and gardens well inhabited, by Armenians, and the natives. The British forces took it in 1781, with immense property. It lies contiguous to Hugueley.

CHINGTU, the capital of Se-chen, one of the provinces of China, in Asia. It suffered much in the civil wars of this country, when the Tartars possessed themselves of it; so that it has only the remains of its ancient splendor. It stands almost in the heart of the province, in a fruitful territory, having 31 cities of the second and third rank under its jurisdiction. Lat. 30, 25, N. and long. 12 W. from Peking.

CHINEY, a city of the Austrian Netherlands, 12 miles S. E. of Namur. Lat. 50, 20, N. Long. 5, 5, E.

CHINON, a town in the government of Touraine, in France, on the river Vienne; has a strong castle, 4 parish-churches, 15 convents; and is remarkable for the death of Henry II. king of England, and for the birth of the famous Rabelais. It is a fertile and pleasant country, in E. long. 6, 18, N. Lat. 47, 2.

CHINSURA. See CHINCHURA.

CHINTIPOUR, or CHITIPUR, the only place of note in Chitor, one of the midland provinces of Indostan, and Mogul empire, in China. It stands on the bank of a river, and is inhabited by Banians, who make great quantities of those callicoos called chintz. It lies 33 miles N. E. from Amadabad; and here is a small garrison for the defence of the caravans.

CHIO, or CHIOS, an Asiatic island lying near the coast of Natolia, opposite to the peninsula of Ionia. It was known to the ancients by the name of Æthalia, Macris, Pithyusa, &c. as well as that of Chios. According to Herodotus, the island of Chios was peopled originally from Ionia. It was at first governed by kings, but afterwards the government assumed a republican form; which, by the direction of Isocrates, was modelled after that of Athens. They were, however, soon enslaved by tyrants, and afterwards conquered by Cyrus king of Persia. They joined the other Grecians in the Ionian revolt; but were shamefully abandoned by the Samians, Lesbians, and others of their allies; so that they were again reduced under the yoke of the Persians, who treated them with the utmost severity. They continued subject to them till the battle of Mycale, when they were restored to their ancient liberty, which they enjoyed till the downfall of the Persian empire, when they became subject to the Macedonian princes. In the time of the emperor Vespasian, the island was reduced to the form of a Roman province; but the inhabitants were allowed to live according to their own laws under the superintendence of a prætor. It is now subject to the Turks, and is called Scio. It is 100 miles in circuit, lying near the coast of Ionia, in Asia Minor; is mountainous and rocky. Besides other inhabitants, it has upwards of a million of Greeks, who have 300 churches here, besides chapels and monasteries. It abounds with excellent wine, for which it has always been famous; and from whence the ancients supposed nectar to have been fetched.

CHIOS, the capital of the last-mentioned island is situated on its eastern coast, and as well-built as most of the towns in the Levant, the Genoese having been long masters of it. At present the Turks have a garrison here of 1400 men; and its port is the rendezvous of their shipping, which trade to Constantinople; and it is commonly the station for a squadron of Turkish gallies. This is one of the 7 cities which pretend that Homer was born in it; and the natives still shew a place which they call his school, lying at the foot of Mount Epos, and about 4 miles distant from the city. Lat. 38, 46, N. Long. 27, 5, E.

CHIOURLIC, an ancient town of Turkey in Europe, and in Romania, with a see of a Greek bishop. It is seated on a river of the same name, 50 miles N. W. of Constantinople. Long. 7, 47, E. Lat. 41, 18, N.

CHIOZA, CHIOGGIA, anciently Fossa Claudia, an island belonging to the duchy of Venice, in Upper Italy, on it is a fine and flourishing little town, not far from the influx of the Brenta Nuova, into the Lagunæ. Here are very profitable salt-works, and such as intend to go to Rome commonly take shipping here, and from thence sail upon the canal, which flows into the Po, as far as the village of Ponte del Lago Oscuro upon that river, and opposite to Ferrara; nay, and still farther. This is a very commodious and pleasant way. Chioza is about a mile and a half in circuit, and is divided by a long street, where the aforesaid canal, called Vena, begins. It hath about 9 bridges over it, some of stone, and others of wood. Here is a convenient harbour, and defended by a hexagonal fort. Besides the cathedral, here are several stately churches, episcopal palace, and convents. The Genoese gained a famous victory here in 1680, and made themselves masters of this city; but it has since fallen into the hands of the Venetians. Chioza is situated 12 miles S. of Venice.

CHIEWAY, a river of N. America, which falls into the Mississippi a little below lake Peppin, and is about 80 yards wide at the mouth, but mach much wider farther up. About 30 miles from its mouth it separates into 2 branches, and on its banks lie fine meadows, in which large droves of elks and buffaloes feed. The track between the 2 branches is termed the road of war between the Chipeways and Naudowessie Indians. Near the heads of this river is a town of the Chipeways, a nation of Indians, whom Carver says are the nastiest he saw in all America. The town contained about 40 houses and could send out 100 warriors.

CHIPPENHAM, commonly Chipnam, a corporate and good market-town of Wiltshire; governed by a bailiff, who returns two members to parliament. It is a populous well-built place, has a bridge of 16 arches over the Avon, with a handsome church. The principal manufacture here is cloth; but its main support arises from its market on Saturdays, and its thoroughfare for carriers and travellers between London and Bristol. It has a charity-school for 24 boys. Its annual fairs are May 6, June 11, October 18, and November 30. Westmead, in its neighbourhood, is noted for horse-races; and its forest was the residence of the West-Saxon kings, particularly Alfred.

CHIPPING, a village in Lancashire, 10 miles E. of Garstang, with 2 fairs, Easter-Tuesday, and August 24.

CHIPPING, commonly Chipping-Wickham, or High-Wycomb, a borough of Buckinghamshire, governed by a mayor, who returns 2 members to parliament. It stands on a rivulet which winds into the Thames; and is one of the greatest corn-markets in this part of England. It contains between 3 and 400 houses, with 2 principal streets; one of which is well-built, and full of large inns. Its church is a fair structure, with a handsome steeple. In the neighbourhood are several mills for paper and corn. When the wheat is ground at the latter, it is sent to Marlow, and put on board barges for London. Its weekly market is on Friday, and annual fair September 25. In 1724, near this place was discovered a Roman pavement, 9 feet square, with stones of various colours, the biggest of which were no broader than the face of a dye.

CHIPPING-NORTON, a market-town of Oxfordshire, governed by 2 bailiffs. Roman coins are frequently found in this neighbourhood. Its church is a good building, in which are monuments, with the arms of several merchants on brass plates, as shew it must have once been a place of great trade. Its weekly market is on Wednesday; and has 7 annual fairs; March 7, May 6, last Friday in May, July 18, September 5, November 8, and last Friday in November. It lies 76 miles from London.

C H

CHIPPING-ONGAR, a market-town of Essex, so called to distinguish it from another place in its neighbourhood, called High-Ongar. Here are two charity-schools for 26 boys and 12 girls. Its weekly market holds on Saturday, and annual fair on September 30. It lies 20 miles from London.

CHIPPING-SODBURY, a borough of Gloucestershire, governed by a mayor, and being a great thoroughfare to Bristol, is full of inns. It has a good weekly market on Thursday, for corn and other provisions, particularly cheese; for which it is reckoned the greatest in England, next to that of Athelstoe, in Warwickshire. Its annual fairs hold on May 23, and June 24. [All the above places, with the Prænomens of Chipping, denote their being market-places, from the Saxon cþpan, to cheapen.]

CHIKUITOS, (Indios,) i. e. Little Indians, are missions in the parts dependent on the bishopric of Charcas, in S. America. The Spaniards call them so on account of the extreme smallness of their doors. Their country lies between Santa Cruz de la Sierra, and lake Zarayes, from which issues the river Paraguay, that, with the accession of other streams, forms the Rio de la Plata. The fathers who first began their preaching here, about the close of the last century, had, in 1732, formed 7 towns, each consisting of about 600 families. The courage of those Indians the Portuguese have often experienced, who used to make incursions, in order to carry off the inhabitants for slaves; so that they have been obliged to desist.

CHIPROWITZ, a well-inhabited town of Bidin, or Widin, sangiacate, a subdivision of Bulgaria, one of the provinces of European Turkey. Here the Greek metropolitan resides.

CHIRWAN. See SCHIRWAN, one of the provinces of Persia, lying on the W. coast of the Caspian sea.

CHIRIQUI, or CHIRIQUITA, a town of Veragua, one of the provinces of Guatemala, in N. America. It stands in a plain of savannahs, surrounded with farms, &c. Its principal trade is in tallow and leather. The harbour stands on a pretty large river, about a league from its mouth, and 3 from the town. There is but one way to enter the river, and that is dangerous. It falls into the bay called Golfo Dolce, and must be distinguished from that near Honduras-bay. It was taken by the Buccaneers in 1686.

CHIRK, in Welch, Gwain, a pretty mountainous country or estate, on the E. side of Denbighshire, in N. Wales. To it belong 2 castles; namely, that called Chirk-castle, which is a handsome seat, and has been long in the possession of the Middletons. Of the other castle, called Bran-castle, or Castell Dinas Bran, hardly the ruins remain. It stood on the top of a hill, and was the residence of Griffith ap Madock, who sided with the English against the Welch, in the reign of king Henry III. At the castle of Chirk, 3 annual fairs are holden; the second Tuesday in February, second Tuesday in June, and November 12.

CHIRNSIDE, the seat of a presbytery, in Berwickshire, containing 14 parishes.

CHIRONISSO, one of the 5 secure harbours on the island of Siphanto, in the Archipelago, and European Turkey.

CHISSELBOROUGH, a village in Somersetshire, 4 miles N. of Crookhorn. It has 1 fair, viz. on October 10, for cattle of all sorts, cheese, and hogs.

CHITANGAR, a town in Cuncan, one of the provinces of the Mogul empire, in Asia. It lies near Indour, 63 leagues S. of Avengeabad. Here is a famous pagod temple, all of transparent stone.

CHITOR, or SANGA, one of the middling provinces of Indostan, and Mogul empire, in the East Indies, in Asia. It is bounded on the W. by Guzurat, Malva on the E. Candisch on the S. and Rajah Ranas on the N. E. It lies on both sides the Tropic of Cancer. Its dimensions are variously given, according to the tracts included in it. The country, which is mountainous, abounds with lions. Its principal productions are stone, salt, and assa foetida. This tract is infested by a barbarous sort of Mahometan priests, called Faquirs, who go armed.

Its town of the same name, anciently Taxilla, and supposed to have been the seat of Porus's dominions, who engaged Alexander, formerly outstripped all the cities in India for magnificence. In 1614, its last sovereign, submitted to the mogul Eckbar, who destroyed the place; so that there is nothing now but the ruins of about 100 temples and stately palaces, &c. Its strong castle stands on the top of a hill, to which there is but one ascent by a path cut out of a rock. It lies 256 miles N. E. of Surat. Lat. 23, 30, N. Long. 76, 10, E.

CHITOR, a town of Piemont, in Upper Italy, on the Po, about 10 miles N. of Turin. In 1705 it was taken by the French, after a stout defence; but next year the Confederates retook it. It is subject to the king of Sardinia. Lat. 45, 12, N. Long. 7, 35, E.

CHITRIANI, one of the 5 secure harbours in the island of Siphanco, in the Archipelago, and in Turkey in Europe.

CHITRO, CITRON, or PYDNA, a place of Macedonia, in European Turkey, on the bay of

C H

Salonichi; and is remarkable, as here the mother, wife, and son of Alexander the Great, were murdered by Cassander; and, in its neighbourhood, Perseus, king of Macedon, was defeated by Paulus Æmelius, the Roman consul. Lat. 40, 30, N. Long. 23, 10, E.

CHIVAS, a strong town of Italy, in Piemont, which has been several times taken and retaken in the late wars, particularly in 1705, by the French, but was retaken the next year by the Confederates, after the victory at Turin. It is so advantageously situated near the river Po, that whoever is master of it has the key of the territory of Turin, Canavez, Vercellois, Monterrat, and Lombardy. It is 12 miles N. E. of Turin, and 9 W. of Verue. Lat. 45, 3, N.

CHIUSI, a town of the Sieneze, in the duchy of Tuscany, and Middle Division of Italy, anciently Clusium, was one of the 12 ancient cities of Etruria, and the seat of the famous king Persenna. It stands on the confines of the papal dominions, and in a little territory called Valla de Chiana, from a marshy fen of the latter name in its neighbourhood. It is the see of a bishop, and but poorly inhabited, by reason of the insalubrity of its air. This place is subject to the grand duke of Tuscany, and lies 38 miles S. E. of Sienna. Lat. 43, 7, N. Long. 13, 12, E.

CHIUSTENGE, or PROSTIWITZA, in Latin Istropolis, a middling town in the sangiacate of Silistria, and province of Bulgaria, in European Turkey, on the Black Sea, and was formerly a very considerable place. Lat. 43, 2, N. Long. 27, 30, E.

CHIUTAYE, a considerable town of Turkey in Asia, capital of Proper Natolia, and the residence of a beglerbeg, as also of the Grand Signior, before the taking of Constantinople. It is seated on the river Ayala, 75 miles S. of Burfa. Long. 29, 47, E. Lat. 39, 42, N.

CHLYNOW, a province of Wiatski, one of the circles belonging to the government of Kasan, in Asiatic Russia. In it is a provincial town of the same name. It lies on the river Wiatka.

CHOASPES, a river in Media, also called the Eulæus; it rises in Media, and burying itself under ground, appears again in Susiana, in which province it is called by the latter name. The ancient kings of Media drinking no other water, it was carried about with them in silver vessels.

CHOCOPE, a town in the road to Lima, in S. America, with between 80 and 90 houses covered with earth, inhabited by between 60 and 70 families, principally Spaniards, with some of the other casts, but not much above 20 of Indians. Here, in the year 1726, was a continual rain for forty forty nights successively, beginning at 4 in the evening, and ceasing at the same hour next morning, the sky being clear all the rest of the day; by it the houses, and a brick church were entirely ruined: the southern winds continuing with such violence as to raise the sand. Two years after a like phenomenon lasted for 12 days, but not so destructive as the former.

CHOCZIM. See CHOTZIN.

CHOEDER. See YERACK.

CHOLLET, a small town and barony in the government of Anjou, in France, on the river Maienne, has a beautiful castle, one parish-church, and three convents.

CHOLMOGORY, a small town in the circle of Dwina, a subdivision of the government of Archangelgorod; in European Russia. It lies upon an island in the Dwina, not far from Archangel, and preserves some memory of the old Holmogard kingdom.

CHONAT, a town of Upper Hungary, and the capital of a county of the same name, subject to the house of Austria. It stands on the river Merisch, 13 miles E. of Segedin, and is the see of a bishop; suffragan to the metropolitan of Colofa. Lat. 46, 22, N. Long. 21, 20, E.

CHONO, (isles of,) on the coast of Chili, which are prevented producing any vegetables on account of incessant rains.

CHONOS, or CHONÆ. See COLOSS.

CHORA, a large town of Romania, in European Turkey. It is pleasantly situated, on a little hill, the ascent to which is steep on every side, and is separated from the high hills which encompass it every way except that towards the sea. It lies about 22 miles from Peresta to the N. E.

CHOROSAN. See KHOROSAN.

CHORGES, or GORGES, an old, but small town of Ambrunois, one of the territories of the Upper Delphinat, in the government of Dauphiny, in France. It preserves some memory of the ancient Catorigi, of whose name it is a corruption. It lies 16 miles E. of Gap. Lat. 44, 36, N. Long. 6, 5, E.

CHORLEY, a village in Lancashire, 7 miles S. E. of Preston, with 3 fairs, viz. on May 3, August 20, and on September 5.

CHOTER, river in Rutlandshire, which falls into the Willand near Stamford.

CHOTZIN, or CHOCZIM, a town of Upper Moldavia, in European Turkey. It is well fortified both by nature and art, and lies on the Neiler-stream, now subject to the Turks. In 1739 the Russians took it, after they had driven the Turks out of their intrenchments, which they had raised near the fort. They were also beaten here by the Poles in the years 1621 and 1674. Lat. 48, 10, N. Long. 27, 5 E.

CHOUTZA, a town of Culmerland, or palatinate of Culm, in Polish Prussia, 2 leagues N. W. of Culm, and on the other side of the Debreutz. It was the most flourishing place in Prussia under the Teutonic knights; but has nothing remarkable now, only a fine church, and some magnificent ruins.

CHOWEN, (county,) in the district of Edenton, in N. Carolina, in a swampy soil, being surrounded by water viz. E. by Pequiman's river, S. by Albemarle-sound, W. by Chowen-river; and in it stand the towns of Hartford and Edendon.

CHRASTOWITZ, or HARSTOWITZA, a fortress of Croatia, on this side the Save, in Hungarian Illyria. It lies not far from the Save, in the jurisdiction of the bishop of Zagrab.

CHREMNITZ. See CREMNITZ.

CHREVASTA, in Latin, the ancient Apfus, one of the 7 principal rivers of Albania, in European Turkey.

CHRISTBURG, or ALT-CHRISTBURG, an old, dark, little town, in the capital bailiwick of Preusch-mark, and circle of Mohrung with Marienwerder, in the kingdom of Prussia. It has an ancient castle.

CHRISTBURG, a good town of the prefecture or palatinate of Marienburg, in Polish Prussia, with an old mountain-castle. It lies on the river Surgun, which falls into the river Drause above Elbing. The Woywode, or Palatine's castle-court, is held here. The place was burnt down in 1400; and taken by the Swedes in 1626.

CHRIST-CHURCH, a large and populous borough of Hampshire, governed by a mayor, who returns two members to parliament. It stands at the mouth of the Avon, near its confluence with the Stour. The modern name it has from the dedication of its church, but was anciently called Twinham-bourn, from its situation between two rivers. The Avon has been made navigable from this town to Salisbury ever since 1680. This river brings with it all the waters of the S. and E. parts of Wiltshire, and receives the Stour and Piddle, which brings with them all the waters of the N. part of Dorsetshire. Its principal manufactures are silk stockings and gloves. Over one of the gates is the statue of Bevis, the famous earl of Southampton. Its weekly market is on Monday, and annual fairs on Trinity Thursday and October 17. The town-seal is stamped with the effigies of Baldwin de Rivers, as early as king Stephen's days. It lies 100 miles from London.

CHRISTIANA, a town in the district of Aggers, and diocese of its own name or Aggerhuus, in Norway.

C H

way. It is the capital, and finest town of the kingdom; where the sub-governor, or amtman of the diocese, the supreme juridical court, and the bishop, have their seats. In it a provincial court is also held. It is pretty large and regular, and drives a pretty good trade. It has a house of correction, a town bailiwick, and two suburbs called Waterland and Piverrigen. Through the former of these runs a river which comes from Maridal.

After Opslo had been burnt down, the town was first built in 1624, on the W. side of the bay, just below the castle of Agerhuus, so as its guns can command all the streets. Its school was made an academy in 1636, with a salary for the master, and foundations for 20 scholars. But since 1653, it has had again the name of a school. Lat. 59, 26, N. Long. 10, 30, E.

CHRISTIANOPEL, commonly Nopeln, a strong market-town of Blekingia, in S. Gothland, in Sweden; surrounded by the Baltic, so as to become a peninsula. It has its name from Christian IV. king of Denmark, who gave it the privileges of a town; but these it lost after it had been taken in 1610, by Gustavus Adolphus. Here is a port. It lies 18 miles W. of Carlscroon. Lat. 55, 56, N. Long. 15, 10, E.

CHRISTIANPRIES, or FREDERICKS-FORT, a small fort in the Danish forest and duchy of Sleswic, in Denmark; situated on the Keilerforde. It has been long a bone of contention between the royal and princely houses of Sleswick-Holstein. The church, arsenal, magazine, and the commandants dwelling, with the barracks for the garrison, and some few more houses are the only buildings in it. Its church belongs to the priory of Gottorff. Not far from this fortress, near Buckhoft the Danish admiral Gabel, defeated the Swedish fleet in 1715.

CHRISTIANSAND, the capital of the diocese of the same name, in Norway, where the diocesan amtman and bishop have their residence. It takes its name from king Christian IV. of Denmark, and the large sandy beach upon which it is built. It is quadrangular, has broad and regular streets, good houses, and a town-bailiff or magistracy. It is commodiously situated, for on 3 of its sides it is surrounded with fresh and salt-water; and on the fourth side are green fields, and partly mountains. In the year 1734, the church with the greatest part of the town was burnt down.

CHRISTIAN'S-HAAB, or CHRISTIAN'S-HORN, a Danish colony of Greenland, in lat. 69, N. where are two Danish missionaries near the Christian communities of Greenland.

C H

CHRISTIANSOE, a small fort two miles to the westward of the island of Bornholm, and diocese of Seeland, in Denmark. It stands upon five ragged rocks, or rocky shelves, called Erdholmen, between which ships can commodiously lie at anchor, in the middle of the sea. Besides the garrison none else live here. King Christian V. built it in 1684, and had a medal struck upon the occasion.

Of the same name is also an island, which is a subdivision of the diocese of Seeland.

CHRISTIANSTADT, a territory and subdivision of Scania, in South Gothland, in Sweden. It is divided into ten districts.

To it belongs a town of the same name, in Latin Christianstadium, or Christianopolis. It stands on the river Hedge-a, which surrounds it on three sides. It was built by King Christian IV. and had its name from him. In it is a fine church, a good country school, a bridge, on which are several packing-houses, a linen and woollen manufactory, with a tannery. It also carries on a good trade, and is said to contain about 1600 inhabitants. The place is surrounded with ramparts and horn-works, besides a fort which lies near the church, but nothing considerable.

The lands-hauptman, or governor of the country, resides here; and it is the 17th town in the order of the general diet. It lies 45 miles W. of Carlscroon. Lat. 62, 47, N. Long. 22, 50, E.

Of the same name is a town in Finland, in Sweden, but more properly called Christinesfadt; which see.

CHRISTIANSTED, the principal town in the island of Santa Cruz. It is situated on the N. side of the island, in a fine harbour; is the residence of the Danish governor, and is defended by a stone fortress.

CHRISTIANSTEIN. See DRONTHEIM.

CHRISTINA, anciently Letoa, an island of the Archipelago, in European Turkey, on the S. side of Candia, and in that part of the Mediterranean called the Sea of Candia.

CHRISTINAHAM, in Latin Christinæ Portus, a town in the district of Cestra, a subdivision of Wermelandia, in West Gothland, in Sweden. It was formerly a market or staple place, and had the privileges of a town granted it by queen Christina, from whom it takes its name. It was built on the royal domain of Bro, near the Wenerlake, and contains 600 inhabitants. From its excellent steel-yard, or weigh house, great quantities of iron are annually exported. In the neighbourhood is a fine medicinal spring; and it is the 67th town in the order of the general diet.

CHRISTINESTADT, a maritime town in the S. division of Korsholm-sief, in Ostro-Bothnia and and Swedish Finland. It was founded by Count Peter Brahe, on the peninsula of Koppo near the sea, and has its name from his first wife. It is ranked the 90th town in the general diet.

CHRISTOPHER's, (St.) or St. Kitt's, an island in the West Indies, discovered in 1595, and the principal of the Caribbees, which gave birth to all the English and French colonies there. It is 15 leagues W. from Antigua. The French and English arrived here the same day, in 1625; they divided the island between them, agreeing, however, that hunting, fishing, the mines and forests, should be in common. Three years after their settling, the Spaniards drove them away; they soon returned, and continued to live in good harmony till 1666, when war being commenced between England and France, St. Christopher's became, at different periods, the scene of war and bloodshed for half a century. In 1689, the French drove the English entirely off; and in the same year, their Jesuits college, and many other works, were destroyed by an earthquake. The next year, the English drove the French off, and transported 1800 French families to Hispaniola; but at the treaty of Ryswick, their part was restored again. A war breaking out in 1702, the French were dispossessed again, and the island, at the peace of Utrecht, was ceded to the English, and the French property sold for the public good. In 1733, 80,000*l.* of the money went for the portion of the princess Anne, to the prince of Orange. This island is about 14 leagues in circuit, the length about 5, and the breadth 1 league and a half, except towards the S. where it is narrowed into an isthmus, which joins it to a head-land, about 1 league long, and half a league broad. It contains in the whole about 68 square miles. The centre of the island is taken up by a great number of high and barren mountains, intersected by rocky precipices almost impassable, in many places of which issue hot springs. Mount Misery, which seems to be a decayed volcano, whose head is in the clouds, is the highest of all these mountains, its perpendicular height being 3711 feet; at a little distance it bears the resemblance of a man carrying another on his back. The assemblage of these mountains makes St. Christopher's appear, to those who approach by sea, like one huge mountain, covered with wood, but they find, as they come nearer, that the coast grows easier, as well as the ascent of the mountains, which rising one above another, are cultivated as high as possible. The climate is hot, the air pure and healthy, but unluckily subject to frequent storms and hurricanes, as well as earthquakes. In Aug. 30, 1772, they experienced a most dreadful storm, which did immense damage.

The soil in general is light and sandy, but very fruitful, and well watered by several rivulets which run down both sides of the mountains; it produces plenty of manioc, a quantity of eatable roots, vegetables, fruits, &c. as well as excellent timber. The whole island is covered with plantations, well managed, whose owners, noted for the softness of their manners, live in agreeable, clean, and convenient habitations, which are in general built with cedar, and their lands hedged with orange and lemon trees. The whole of their plantations take up 44,000 acres; and it is asserted that only 24,000 are fit for canes, but the sugar is excellent.

They have two considerable towns in the island, the principal of which is Basseterre, formerly the capital of the French part. The other is called Sandy Point, and always belonged to the English. There is no harbour, nor any thing that has the appearance of any; on the contrary, the surf is continually beating on the sandy shore at the few places fit to land at; which not only prevents the building of any key or wharf, but renders the landing or shipping goods inconvenient, and frequently dangerous; they have been obliged to adopt a particular method to embark or put the heavy goods, such as hogsheds of sugar and rum, on board; for which purpose they use a small boat, of a particular construction, called a mofes: this boat sets off from the ship with some active and expert rowers; when they see what they call a lull, that is, an abatement in the violence of the surge, they push to land, and lay the sides of the mofes on the strand, and the hoghead is rolled into it; and the same precautions are used in conveying it to the ship. In this inconvenient and very hazardous manner, sugars are conveyed on board by single hogsheds; rum, and other goods that will bear the water, are generally floated to the ship, both in carrying to and bringing from the ship. Calculators differ very much in their accounts of the population of this island; some make the whole number of its inhabitants only amount to 7000 whites and 20,000 blacks; others make them 10,000 whites and 30,000 blacks; however, it is certain that this is one of the islands belonging to the English, where there is the least disproportion between the masters and slaves. In 1770, the exportation of this island amounted to above 419,000*l.* sterling, in sugars, molasses, and rum, and near 8000*l.* for cotton.

The public affairs are administered by a governor, a council, and an assembly, chosen from the nine parishes into which the island is divided, and have each a large and handsome church. The fortifications of this island are Charles Fort and another near the town of Sandy Point; also the forts at Old Road-town and Palmetto-town. London-derry fort is considerable, and covers the town of Bassetterie, but the principal fortrefs on the island is Brimstone-hill, in which there is a well and cistern, and where there are 50 cannon planted, besides mortars, and a good magazine, which was said to be bomb proof, as well as the fort to be impregnable; but in 1782, they were both proved to be otherwise, as the magazine was blown up by a bomb falling on it, and the fort reduced by the French, who also reduced the whole island, and are said to have razed several of the other forts.

CHUCHUNGA, a small town, and the port for Jaen de Bracamoros, in South America. It lies about four days journey from the city, which distance is more increased by the difficulties of the road, than what in real dimensions it is. Chuchunga stands on a little river which falls into the Maragnon. Lat. 25, 29, S.

CHULMLEIGH, or CHIMLEY, Devon, on the river Taw, near the Midway, between Exeter and Barnstaple, with a market on Thursday, and a fair on August 2.

CHURCH-HILL, (fort) a settlement of the Hudson's bay company, and the most northerly belonging to them, at the mouth of the river Church-hill, and E. side of the bay, in the northern countries, or British Canada, in North America. Lat. 59, N. Long. 94, 45, W. The trade at Church-hill, in the year 1742, amounted to 20,000 beavers. Upland Indians come hither in canoes to trade, and northern Indians bring furs and skins upon sledges, partly by water, and partly by land. To the northward of Church-hill, are no beavers, there being no such ponds and woods, as these animals usually frequent; but they have great numbers of martens, foxes, bears, rein-deer, buffaloes, and other beasts of rich fur, the country being mostly rocky, and covered with white moss, upon which the rein-deer or caribone feed. There is a great deal of small wood of the spruce or fir kind, near the old factory: but the wood improves farther up the river from the bay, where they have juniper, birch and poplar; and, more southerly, the timber is larger, with a great variety of trees. At New Church-hill fort, which stands high upon a rock, they are without shelter, close by the shore, surrounded with snow and ice for eight months of the year, and exposed to all the winds and storms that happen, where they can have no conveniency of grass or hay, or gardening.

CHURCHINGFORD, a village in Devonshire, with three fairs, on January 25, last Friday in March, and last Friday in April.

C I

CHURCH-STRETTON, a town of Shropshire, with a market on Thursdays, and two fairs, viz. on May 14, and September 24. It is seated between two hills, and is but a small place, though the market is good for corn. It is 14 miles S. of Shrewsbury. Long. 2, 40, W. Lat. 52, 35, N.

CHURN, a river in Gloucester, and Oxford, which runs into the Thames at Creeklade.

CHURNET, a river in Staffordshire, which runs into the Dare at Roncheffer.

CHUSAN, SHUSAN or CHEUXIAN, an island on the eastern coast of China, in Asia, near the province of Chekiam. It is well inhabited, especially since so many of the Chinese fled thither from the Tartars, upon the latter invading China; and here they drive a considerable trade. It is encompassed with several smaller islands.

Its capital is of the same name, being walled and well-peopled. The English East India company had a factory at the place, till they were obliged to remove, by reason of the extortion of the natives. It has a very safe and commodious bay. Lat. 30, 25, N. Long. 121, 50, E.

CHUSISTAN, a province on the S. W. part of Persia, in Asia. It has the Persian gulph on the S. and Ayrac Agem on the N.

CIACICA, a jurisdiction in South America, and empire of Peru, subject to the archbishop of Plata; it lies 90 leagues distant from that city; abounding in cocoa, cattle, and some silver mines.

CIALUS, a kingdom of Asia, in Independent Tartary, bounded on the N. by the kingdom of Eluth, on the E. by large sandy deserts, on the S. by Great Tibet, and on the W. by Turkistan. The chief town is of the same name.

CIBIN, a river of Altland, a subdivision of the royal territory of the Saxons, in Transylvania, and kingdom of Hungary. It falls into the Aluta.

CICLUT, or CITLUCH, a strong fort of Venetian Dalmatia, in Hungarian Illyria, surrounded with walls after the ancient manner, and stands on a rocky hill, on the right-side of the river Narenta. It was founded by the Turks, and at first called Sedaistan, and after that it had its present name, which denotes a place inclosed within walls. It consists of the old and new town, besides a large suburb. It was taken from the Turks by the Venetians in 1694. Lat. 45, 20, N. Long. 17, 45, E.

CIDAMBARAN, a town of Gingi and Mogul empire, in the East Indies, remarkable for its stately pagods; several of which are very spacious, and full of unknown letters and figures cut out of a rock, as is a castle of four large towers. It lies about forty-six miles N. E. of the city of Gingi.

CIECHANOW,

CIECHANOW, one of the ten districts in the palatinate of Czerſk, or Maſovia Proper, in Great Poland.

Of the ſame name is a town, where a provincial court is holden, together with a diet.

CIERNES, Cerennes, or Cherigues, formerly Ceraunia, a ſmall half-ruined city in the iſland of Cyprus, in Aſiatic Turkey. Its walls and fortifications have been ſuffered to fall into ſuch decay, that there remains little of that place, but a fort for gallies, and a good ſtout caſtle, the only one of note on the northern coaſt. From hence people take ſhipping for the continent, lying oppoſite to Carmani, and two miles N. of Nicofia. It is an episcopal ſee under that of the laſt-mentioned place. About an hour's journey from this city, is a magnificent edifice, called the Palace of Peace, belonging to the Knights Templars: and about nine miles from the ſame place is a Greek monastery, built in the European manner, whoſe monks have cells along the coaſt, on which they catch abundance of fiſh. The principal income of this convent is from cotton. Lat. 35, 23. E. Long. 33, 28, E.

CIFALU. See CEPHALU.

CILICIA, an ancient kingdom of Aſia, lying between the 36th and 40th degrees of N. lat. bounded on the E. by Syria, or rather by Mount Amanus, which ſeparates it from that kingdom; by Pamphylia, on the W. by Iſauria, Cappadocia, and Arminia Minor on the N. and by the Mediterranean ſea, on the S. It is ſo ſurrounded by ſteep and craggy mountains, chiefly the Taurus and Amanus, that it may be defended by a handful of reſolute men againſt a numerous army, there being but three narrow paſſes leading into it, commonly called Pylæ Ciliciæ, or the gates of Cilicia; one on the ſide of Cappadocia, called the Paſs of Mount Taurus; and the other two called the Paſs of Mount Amanus, and the Paſs of Syria. The whole country was divided by the ancients into Cilicia Aſpera, and Cilicia Campeſtris; the former called by the Greeks Trachæa or Stony, from its abounding ſo with ſtones; and to this day, the whole province is called by the Turks, Taſ Wileieth, or the Stony Province.

According to Joſephus, Cilicia was firſt peopled by Tarſhiſh, the ſon of Javan, and his deſcendants, whence the whole country was named Tarſiſ. The ancient inhabitants were in proceſs of time driven out by a colony of Phœnicians, who, under the conduct of Cilix, firſt ſettled in the iſland of Cyprus, and from thence paſſed into the country, which, from the leader, they called Cilicia. Afterwards, ſeveral other colonies from different nations ſettled in this kingdom, particularly from Syria and Greece; whence the Cilicians in ſome places uſed the Greek tongue, in others the Syriac; but the former is greatly corrupted by the Perſian, the predominant language of the country being a dialect of that tongue. We find no mention of the kings of Cilicia after their ſettlement in that country, till the time of Cyrus, to whom they voluntarily ſubmitted, continuing ſubject to the Perſians till the overthrow of that empire; but governed to the time of Artaxerxes Mnemon, by kings of their own nation. After the downfall of the Perſian empire, Cilicia became a province to that of Macedon; and, on the death of Alexander, fell to the ſhare of Seleucus, and continued under his deſcendents till it was reduced to a Roman province by Pompey. As a proconſular province, it was firſt governed by Appius Claudius Pulcher; and after him by Cicero, who reduced ſeveral ſtrong holds on Mount Amanus, in which ſome Cilicians had fortified themſelves, and held out againſt his predeceſſor. It was on this occaſion that the diviſion, formerly mentioned, into Trachæa and Campeſtris took place. The latter became a Roman province, but the former was governed by kings appointed by the Romans, till the reign of Veſpaſian, when the family of Tracodementus being extinct, this part alſo made a province of the empire, and the whole divided into Cilicia Prima, Cilicia Secunda, and Iſauria; the firſt took in all Cilicia Campeſtris, the ſecond the coaſt of Cilicia Trachæa, and the laſt the inland parts of the ſame diviſion. It is now a province of Aſiatic Turkey; and is called Caramania, having been the laſt province of the Caramanian kingdom, which held out againſt the Ottoman race.

That part of Cilicia called by the ancients Cilicia Campeſtris, was, if we believe Ammianus Marcellinus, one of the moſt fruitful countries of Aſia; but the weſtern part equally barren, though famous, even to this day, for an excellent breed of horſes, of which 600 are yearly ſent to Conſtantinople for the ſpecial uſe of the Grand Signior. The air in the inland parts is reckoned wholeſome; but that on the ſea-coaſt very dangerous, eſpecially to ſtrangers.

The rivers of any note are the Pyramus, which riſes on the north ſide of Mount Taurus, and empties itſelf into the Mediterranean between Iſſus and Magaraſus; the Cydnus ſprings from the Antitaurus, paſſes through Tarſus, and diſembogues itſelf into the Mediterranean. It is famous for the rapidity of its ſtream, and the coldneſs of its waters, which proved very dangerous to Alexander the Great.

The Cilicians, if we believe the Greek and Roman hiſtorians, were a rough unpoliſhed race of people, unfair in their dealings, cruel, and liars, even to a proverb. In the Roman times, they became greatly addicted to piracy. They firſt began in the time of the Mithridatic war, to infeſt the neighbouring provinces along with the Pamphyl-ans; and, being emboldened with success, they soon ventured as far as the coasts of Greece and Italy, where they took a vast number of slaves, whom they sold to the Cypriots and the kings of Egypt and Syria. They were, however, at last defeated and entirely suppressed by Pompey the Great.

CILLEY, a regularly fortified town, and the capital of a territory of the same name, in Lower Stiria. It lies on the river Saan, which a little below it falls into the Saave, and has two strong castles, one without, and the other within the town. It is the residence of the burgrave, bailiff, &c. Here Roman coins and other monuments are continually found. In 1492 it repulsed the Turks. Lat. 46, 35, N. Long. 15, 35, E.

CILLEY, (county of), united to the duchy of Stiria, is a fruitful track, extending from the bridge of Pettaw, as far as Trojaneburg. It is bounded on the N. by Lower Stiria, on the S. by Slavonia; on the E. by part of Croatia and the Windischmark; and on the W. by Upper Carniola, and Lower Carinthia. It had counts of its own, till the house of Austria seized upon it; to which it has ever since been subject. It is interspersed with hills and rivers; the principal of the latter is the Saan, and the most considerable place in it is the above-mentioned town of its own name.

CIMBRI, an ancient Celtic nation, inhabiting the northern parts of Germany. They are said to have been descended from the Asiatic Cimmerians, and to have taken the name of Cimbri when they changed their old habitations. When they first became remarkable, they inhabited chiefly the peninsula now called Jutland, and by the ancients Cimbrica Chersonesus. About 113 years before Christ they left their peninsula with their wives and children; and joining the Teutones, a neighbouring nation, took their journey southward in quest of a better country. They first fell upon the Boii, a Gaulish nation, situated near the Hyrcinian forest. Here they were repulsed, and obliged to move nearer the Roman provinces. The republic being then alarmed at the approach of such multitudes of barbarians, sent an army against them under the consul Papirius Carbo. On the approach of the Roman army, the Cimbri made proposals of peace. The consul pretended to accept it; but having thrown them into a disadvantageous situation, treacherously attacked their camp. His perfidy was rewarded as it deserved: the Cimbri ran to arms, and not only repulsed the Romans, but, attacking them in their turn, utterly defeated them, and obliged the shattered remains of their forces to conceal themselves in the neighbouring forests. After this victory the Cimbri entered Transalpine Gaul, which they quickly filled with slaughter and desolation. Here they continued 5 or 6 years, when another Roman army, under the consul Silanus, marched against them. This general met with no better success than Carbo had done. His army was routed at the first onset; in consequence of which, all Narbonne Gaul was exposed at once to the ravages of these barbarians.

About 105 years before Christ, the Cimbri began to threaten the Roman empire itself with destruction. The Gauls marched from all parts with a design to join them, and to invade Italy. The Roman army was commanded by the proconsul Cæpio, and the consul Mallius; but as these two commanders could not agree, they were advised to separate, and divide their forces. This advice proved the ruin of the whole army. The Cimbri immediately fell upon a strong detachment of the consular army, commanded by M. A. Scaurus, which they cut off to a man, and made Scaurus himself prisoner. Mallius being greatly intimidated by this defeat, desired a reconciliation with Cæpio, but was haughtily refused. He moved nearer the consul, however, with his army, that the enemy might not be defeated without his having a share in the action. The Cimbri, by this movement, imagining the commanders had made up their quarrel, sent ambassadors to Mallius with proposals of peace. As they could not help going through Cæpio's camp, he ordered them to be brought before him; but finding they were empowered to treat only with Mallius, he could scarce be restrained from putting them to death. His troops, however, forced him to confer with Mallius about the proposals sent by the barbarians: but as Cæpio went to the consul's tent against his will, so he opposed him in every thing; contradicted with great obstinacy, and insulted him in the grossest manner. The deputies on their return acquainted their countrymen that the misunderstanding between the Roman commanders still subsisted; upon which the Cimbri attacked the camp of Cæpio, and the Gauls that of Mallius. Both were forced, and the Romans slaughtered without mercy. Eighty thousand citizens and allies of Rome, with 40,000 servants and sutlers, perished on that fatal day. In short, of the two Roman armies only 10 men, with the 2 generals, escaped to carry the news of so dreadful a defeat. The conquerors destroyed all the spoil, pursuant to a vow they had made before the battle. The gold and silver they threw into the Rhone, drowned the horses they had taken, and put to death all the prisoners.

The Romans were thrown into the utmost consternation on the news of so terrible an overthrow. They saw themselves threatened with a deluge of Cimbri and Gauls, numerous enough to over-run the whole country. They did not, however, despair. A new army was raised with incredible expedition; no citizen whatever who was fit to bear arms being exempted, exempted. On this occasion also, fencing-masters were first introduced into the Roman camp, by which means the soldiers were soon rendered in a manner invincible. Marius, who was at that time in high reputation on account of his victories in Africa, was chosen commander, and waited for the Cimbri in Transalpine Gaul: but they had resolved to enter Italy by two different ways; the Cimbri over the eastern, and the Teutones and other allies over the western Alps. The Roman general therefore marched to oppose the latter, and defeated the Ambrones and Teutones with great slaughter. The Cimbri, in the mean time, entered Italy, and struck the whole country with terror. Catulus and Sylla attempted to oppose them; but their soldiers were so intimidated by the fierce countenances and terrible appearance of these barbarians, that nothing could prevent their flying before them. The city of Rome was now totally defenceless; and, had the Cimbri only marched briskly forwards, they had undoubtedly become masters of it; but they waited in expectation of being joined by their allies the Ambrones and Teutones, not having heard of their defeat by Marius, till the senate had time to recal him to the defence of his country. By their order he joined his army to that of Catulus and Sylla; and upon that union was declared commander in chief. The Roman army consisted of 52,300 men. The cavalry of the Cimbri were no more than 15,000, but their foot seemed innumerable; for, being drawn up in a square, they are said to have covered 30 furlongs. The Cimbri attacked the Romans with the utmost fury; but, being unaccustomed to bear the heats of Italy, they soon began to lose their strength, and were easily overcome. But they had put it out of their power to fly; for, that they might keep their ranks the better, they had, like true barbarians, tied themselves together with cords fastened to their belts, so that the Romans made a most terrible havock of them. The battle was therefore soon over, and the whole day employed only in the most terrible butchery. An hundred and twenty thousand were killed on the field of battle, and 60,000 taken prisoners. The victorious Romans then marched to the enemy's camp; where they had a new battle to fight with the women, whom they found more fierce than even their husbands had been. From their carts and waggons, which formed a kind of fortification, they discharged showers of darts and arrows on friends and foes without distinction. Then they first suffocated their children in their arms, and then they put an end to their own lives. The greatest part of them hanged themselves on trees. One was found hanging at a cart, with two of her children at her heels. Many of the men, for want of trees and stakes, tied strings in running knots about their necks, and fastened them to the tails of their horses, and the horns and feet of their oxen, in order to strangle themselves that way; and thus the whole multitude was destroyed.

The country of the Cimbri, which, after this terrible catastrophe, was left a mere desert, was again peopled by the Scythians; who, being driven by Pompey out of that vast space between the Euxine and the Caspian sea, marched towards the north and west of Europe, subduing all the nations they met with in their way. They conquered Russia, Saxony, Westphalia, and other countries as far as Finland, Norway, and Sweden. It is pretended that Wodin their leader traversed so many countries, and endeavoured to subdue them only with a view to excite the people against the Romans; and that the spirit of animosity which he had excited, operated so powerfully after his death, that the northern nations combined to attack it, and never ceased their incursions till it was totally subverted.

CIMBRISHAMN, in Latin Portus Cimbrium, a small maritime town of Christianstadt territory, belonging to Scania in South Gothland, in Sweden. It has a harbour, as its name imports, on the Baltic: and from it some of the ancient Cimbri are said to have emigrated. It is the 99th town in the diet. Lat. 57, 10, N. Long. 17, 5, E.

CIMINIAN FOREST, in Old Hetruria, famous for Fabius's penetrating through it, as at that time, Livy says, it was more dreadful than the Hycernian Forest.

CIMMERIAN BOSPHORUS, a province of the empire of Mithridates, now the country of the Crim Tartars.

CIMOLO. See ARGENTIERE.

CINALOA, a province of Mexico, in North America, opposite to the S. extremity of California. It is about 100 miles from S. E. to N. W. and not above 40 where broadest. It stretches out farthest on the W. On the E. side, it is bounded by a ridge of high craggy mountains, called Tepicnan, between 30 and 40 leagues from the sea, on which have lately been discovered some rich gold mines. The air is serene and salubrious; and besides pastures, abounding with cattle, its soil bears all sorts of fruit and grain, particularly Indian corn, as also cotton; with manufactures of which the natives are clad in the Mexican fashion. The Spaniards found much difficulty in subduing them.

Of the same name, or St. Juan de Cinaloa, is its capital, 30 miles E. of the bay of California, and subject to Spain. Lat. 25, 40, N. Long. 113, 12, W.

CINAN, a large and populous town of Asia, in China, seated in a marshy bottom. Long. 103, 35, E. Lat. 30, 7, N.

CINCA,

C I

CINCA, or CINGA, a rapid river of Aragon, in Spain. It rises in the mountains of Beilsa, among the Pyrenees, and running through the province, falls on the N. side into the Ebro.

CINEQUILA, a town of Mexico, in the province of Sonora, where is a very rich gold mine. In this town there are above 2000 inhabitants, under the government of proper magistrates. Here cultivation has lately been much improved, and industry, as well as population, gradually diffused.

CINNABA. See COUCA.

CINNEROTH, a city mentioned in Joshua xi. 2. stood on the sea of Galilee.

CINQUE-PORTS, five harbours in England, namely, Hastings, Dover, Hythe, Romney, and Sandwich, which had anciently very considerable privileges, on account of their fitting out ships for the defence of our coasts against any invader, particularly France. They are still under the government of the constable of Dover-castle, and send members to parliament, which are still stiled Barons of the Cinque-Ports. See under the name of each CINTRA, a town in the audience of Alenquer, and province of Estremadura, in Portugal. It contains 1900 inhabitants in four parishes; has an old castle built after the Moorish manner at the foot of a mountain or promontory, commonly called the Rock of Lisbon, and on the N. side of the Tagus. To its district belong 6 parishes; and its air is reckoned the best in all Portugal: for here is an agreeable coolness, when the heat in Lisbon is extreme. In its castle king Alphonfus VI. died a prisoner. Lat. 39, 5. N. Long. 10, 15. W.

CINYPHE, a town of Regio Syrtica, named from a river which fell into the Sinus Syrticus.

CINYPS, another town of Regio Syrtica.

CIOTAT, a maritime town in the bailiwick of Aix, and Lower Provence, in the government of the latter name, in France. It has rose out of the ruins of Ceireste, in the neighbourhood of which excellent muscadine wine is produced.

CIRCÆUS and NELEUS, two rivers of Eubœa, mentioned by Strabo to turn the wool of the sheep white that drank of the first, and black those which drank of the last.

CIRCASSIA, a province of Asiatic Turkey, between the two streams of the Don or Tanais, and Wolga; these bound it on the N. E. and N. W. as the Caspian sea and Astracan does on the E. It borders on Russia on the N. and Georgia, Mengrelia, and Dagestan on the S. from which it is parted by a long branch of Mount Caucasus. The coasts of this large territory, from the canal of the Palus Meotis to Mingrelia, are reckoned 600 miles in length, being covered with mountains and woods, inhabited by Circassian Tartars, who form a kind of republic, sometimes putting themselves under the protection of Persia, sometimes Russia, and sometimes that of the Turks. They generally dwell in tents, removing from place to place with their herds and flocks. Circassia is now chiefly remarkable for its beautiful children; from which, and his neighbouring country Georgia, the Persian and Turkish seraglios are commonly supplied. They barter honey, wax, furs, leather, and the skins of some animals which they kill in their mountains, for rice, linen, silks, and other commodities; in which trade they are dextrous thieves. They were formerly Christians; but have nothing left of that, or any other religion, but some wild ceremonies. They follow the barbarous method of plundering each other, and selling men and women. Thole in its eastern parts, towards the Caspian sea, called also Caspian Sarmatians, occupy that part of ancient Albania, which is bounded on the E. by the Caspian sea; on the W. by Mount Caucasus; on the N. by the river Bustro; and on the S. by the horrid wilds of Tartary and Astracan. They have neither corn, nor any other valuable production in great quantity, and all the bread they have is made of a small grain like millet. Their language is the same with that used by all the Tartarian nations on this side Caucasus; but most of them understand likewise the Russian. Their capital is Terchi, which is possessed by the Turks. Circassia lies between lat. 45 and 50, N. and between 40 and 50, E.

CIRCUMCISION, (Cape), the most western promontory of a new land discovered in 1739, by the French, in the southern countries on the E. of Belgia Australis, about lat. 54, S. and long. 10 E. from London.

CIRENCESTER, Gloucestershire, 89 miles from London, and 20 miles, but bad road, from Lansdown; is commonly called Cicester, and by some reckoned the largest, as well as the oldest, town in the county. It is said to have been built by Cissa, one of the Saxon viceroys. It was of great note, both under the Romans and Saxons, of whom it is said, the latter built the abbey here, of which two old gate-houses still remain. Its abbot was mitred. King Canute the Dane held a general council here, anno 1020. It was formerly 2 miles round, but suffered so much by the Danes, the barons wars, the civil war, &c. that not above one-fourth of that compass is now inhabited. It had also three parish-churches, and now but one. It is, however, a post-town, and maintains a stage-coach to London. It has its name from the river Churn, that passes by it towards the Thames, and the word Cestre, i. e. castle; it having been fortified by the Romans, and is the Corinium of Ptolemy, and the Durocornovium of Antoninus. Two of the Roman consular ways cross each other here, one of which is still visible, with a high ridge as far as Birdlip-hill; the other runs to Creeklade and Newbury. King Henry III. took its castle from the barons, and demolished it. Henry IV. gave it a charter and several privileges, and queen Elizabeth, in whose reign it first sent members to parliament, gave them another, by which it was incorporated, with a steward and bailiff; but it is now governed by 2 high-constables, and 14 wardmen over the 7 wards, appointed yearly at the court-leet. It has markets on Monday for corn; and on Friday one of the greatest in the kingdom, for wool, the principal manufacture that is carried on here, there having been no less than 5000 packs brought hither in some years, from Leicestershire, Northamptonshire, and Lincolnshire, and sold for the most part, to the clothiers of this county and Wilts. Fairs, Easter-Thursdays, July 17, and November 8. It is observed, that in this town the first act of rebellion was committed in 1641, and that that here was the first blood shed at the revolution in 1688. The church has 28 windows of painted glass, representing scripture history, and the fathers, martyrs, and persecutors of the Christian religion. The foundation of the old wall is visible in many places; and antiquities, especially Roman, are dug up here; as was a fine mosaic pavement in the year 1723, with many coins. Here are several hospitals and alms-houses, besides a free-school and charity-school.

CIRENZA, or CERENZA, a decayed episcopal city of the Hither Calabria, and kingdom of Naples, in the Lower Division of Italy. Lat. 40, 49, N. Long. 16, 56, E.

CIRKACRE, a city of the Cossacks, on the Boristhenes, which was burnt by the Poles in 1637.

CIROLO, or SCIROLO, a town in the marquisate of Ancona, in the Ecclesiastical State, and Middle Division of Italy, a few miles from Loreto; to a pretended miraculous crucifix, here is a great resort of pilgrims; and in this neighbourhood good wine is produced.

CIRRHA, the port-town of the city of Abo, in the ancient kingdom of Phocis, in Greece Proper, situated on the side of Delphi.

CIRTA. See CONSTANTIA.

CISALPINE, any country on this side the Alps. The Romans divided Gaul and the country now called Lombardy, into Cisalpine and Transalpine. That which was Cisalpine with regard to the Romans, is Transalpine with regard to us.

CISBURY, a small hill in Wiltshire, of an easy ascent, on the summit of which was a strong fortified place, having had a double moat full of water, and said to have been the residence of one Cissa, a Saxon viceroy.

CISMONE, a town in the marquisate of Trevigiana, one of the Venetian territories, and in Upper Italy, on the Brenta, into which the river of the same name falls.

CISTEAUX, or CITEAUX, a town in the government of Burgundy, in France, with a celebrated abbey, the principal of the Cistercian order. The abbot is immediately subject to the pope.

CISTERNA, a post-town of the Campagna di Roma, in the Ecclesiastical State and Middle Division of Italy. Here prince Caserta has a beautiful palace. The forest in this neighbourhood intercepts a great part of the noxious exhalations, which otherwise the S. winds would carry to Rome. Here are also great numbers of buffaloes, deer, and other wild game.

Of the same name is a principality in Piemont Proper, in Upper Italy.

CITATESVA, a scone or citadel of Walachia, on this side the Aluta, in European Turkey. It stands on that river, and opposite to Roththurm, in Transylvania.

CITHÆRON, a hill of Bœotia, famed among the poets for the death of Acteon.

CITIBEB, or CITITEB, a town of Tedla, a province of Morocco, in Africa; it stands high. The inhabitants principally carry on a traffic in woollen manufactures, besides feeding vast numbers of cattle on their hills, and in cultivating the fruitful lowlands. After the surrender of their capital, they submitted to the Sheriffs, under obedience to whom they have continued ever since.

CITIUM, an ancient town of Cyprus, and gave birth to the stoic Zeno.

CITLUCH. See CICLUT.

CITTA-DELLA. See MINORCA.

CITTA DI CASTELLO, county of, belonging to the Ecclesiastical State, and Middle Division of Italy. It is situated between the duchy of Urbino, the territories of Florence, and those of Perugia.

Of the same name is a town on the river Tiber, the see of a bishop, who is immediately subject to the pope.

CITTA GUELFO, a town in the county of Citta di Castello, in the Ecclesiastical State and Middle Division of Italy, remarkable only as retaining the name of one of the famous factions which long divided Italy betwixt the emperor and pope.

CITTA LAVINIA, a town of the Campagna di Roma, a province of the Ecclesiastical State, in the Middle Division of Italy. It stands on an eminence, and is the ancient Lanuvium, where the emperor Antoninus Pius was born.

CITTA NUOVA, a maritime town of Istria, one of the Venetian territories, in Upper Italy. Here resides a bishop.

CITTA NUOVA, a maritime town of Ancona, and Ecclesiastical State, in the Middle Division of Italy.

Italy. In it are 16 churches and convents, and near it are 15 more.

By the same name goes La Valette, a town in the island of Malta.

CITTA NUOVA COTTONERA, a regularly fortified town in the island of Malta. It also includes the old fort of St. Margherita.

CITTA VECCHIA. See MALTA-TOWN.

CITTA VITTORIOSA, or IL BORGO, a strong town in the island of Malta. It lies on a narrow neck of land, in a harbour to the left hand of La Valetta, or Citta Nuova; from which a broad natural channel extends itself inland on each side of the town, forming a fine haven, one of which is called Porto della Renella, and the other Porto delle Gallere. The strong castle of St. Angelo stands before the town upon a high rock, and has a communication with the place by means of a bridge. The number of its inhabitants amount to 3000. Formerly this was the residence of the grand master of Malta. The palace of the inquisition, and the arsenal, are reckoned among the principal buildings of the town.

CITY THE GREAT, in Africa, was subject to Carthage, and taken by storm by Agathocles of Syracuse.

CITY of DAVID, built on Mount Sion. Sam. ii. v. 9.

CIVDAD BETANOS. See BETANZOS, and all other Civdades or cities not inserted here, under their proper names.

CIVDAD REAL, a pretty, handsome, and well-inhabited city of La Mancha, a subdivision of New Castile, in Spain. In its neighbourhood excellent wine is produced. The inundations of the river Guadiana sometimes extend thus far, and occasion considerable damage. It lies 60 miles S. of Toledo. Lat. 39, 20, N. Long. 4, 15, W.

CIVDADELLA, one of the four quarters into which the island of Minorca is subdivided.

CIVIDAD REAL, a city in the province of Chiapa, 10 leagues W. of Guatimala, in a plain. It is a bishopric, and is inhabited by Spaniards and Indians.

CIVITA BORELLE, a small Episcopal city of the Hither Abruzzo, in the kingdom of Naples.

CIVITA CASTELLANA, a small city of St. Peter's Patrimony, and Ecclesiastical State, on a very high and steep rock, near the junction of the Triglia with the Tiber. It is the ancient city of Falerii, the seat of the Falisci. Its bishopric is united with that of Orta. Pope Clement XI. built here a bridge of an uncommon height; and by means of it the rock upon which the town stands is so joined with the opposite mountain, as one may pass directly over to it, without traversing the very deep valley that lies below. It lies 25 miles N. of Rome. Lat. 42, 25, N. Long. 13, 12, E.

CIVITA DI CHIETI, anciently Theate, the capital of the Hither Abruzzo, in the kingdom of Naples, on the Pescara; it is the seat of a juridical court and archbishop, to whom the prelate of Ortona is suffragan. From this city the Theatine order has its name, which was founded in 1524, by John Peter Caraffa, afterwards pope Paul IV. having been formerly metropolitan here. Lat. 42, 36, N. Long. 15, 20, E.

CIVITA DI PENNA, anciently Pinna, an episcopal city of the Farther Abruzzo, and kingdom of Naples. It gives the title of duke.

CIVITA TURCHINO, a place in Italy, about 2 miles N. of the town of Corneto in the Patrimony of St. Peter. It is an hill of an oblong form, the summit of which is almost one continued plain. From the quantity of medals, intaglios, fragments of inscriptions, &c. that are occasionally found here, this is believed to be the very spot where the ancient and powerful city of Tarquinii once stood. At present it is only one continued field of corn. On the S. E. side of it runs the ridge of a hill which unites it to Corneto. This ridge is at least 3 or 4 miles in length, and almost entirely covered with artificial hillocks, called by the inhabitants monti rossi. About 12 of these hillocks have at different times been opened; and in every one of them have been found several subterranean apartments cut out of the solid rock. These apartments are of various forms and dimensions: some consist of a large outer room, and a small one within; others of a small room at the first entrance, and a large one within; others are supported by a column of the solid rock left in the center, with openings on every part. The entrance to them all is by a door about 5 feet high, by 2 and a half broad. Some of them have no light but from the door, while others seem to have had a small light from above, through an hole of a pyramidal form. Many of these apartments have an elevated port that runs all round the wall, being a part of the rock left for that purpose.

The moveables found in these apartments consist chiefly of Etruscan vases of various forms: in some indeed have been found some plain sacrophagi of stone, with bones in them. The whole of these apartments are stuccoed, and ornamented in various manners: some indeed are plain; but others, particularly three, are richly adorned, having a double row of Etruscan inscriptions running round the upper part of the walls, and under them a kind of frieze of figures in painting: some have an ornament under the figures, which seems to supply the place of an architrave. The paintings seem to be in fresco, and in general resemble those which are usually seen upon Etruscan vases; though some of them are perhaps superior to any thing as yet seen of the Etruscan art in painting. In general they are are slight, but well conceived; and prove, that the artist was capable of producing things more studied, and better finished; though in such a subterraneous situation, the delicacy of a finished work would in a great measure have been thrown away. It is probable, however, that among the immense number of these apartments that yet remain to be opened, many paintings and inscriptions may be found sufficient to form a very useful and entertaining work. At present this great scene of antiquities is almost entirely unknown, even in Rome. Mr. Jenkins, resident at Rome, was the first Englishman who visited it.

CIVITA VECCHIA, a fortified town of St. Peter's Patrimony and Ecclesiastical State, on a bay of the Tufcan sea, with a harbour, the best in all the Papal dominions; being a free port, it greatly hurts the trade of Leghorn. The place is in good condition, and yet it is but thinly inhabited, its air not being good, and in want of water, which inconvenience has been attempted to be remedied by a canal. Here is commonly the station for the pope's galleys. It received great damage on September 29, 1779, by a flash of lightning setting fire to a magazine of gun-powder. About 6 miles off are the ruins of the city of Leopolis, which pope Leo IV. founded in 854, for the inhabitants of Centumella, a town destroyed by the Moors; but these returned to their old place again, and hence the name of Civita Vecchia. It lies 30 miles N. W. of Rome. Lat. 42, 5, N. Long. 11, 51, E.

CIVRAY, a town of Upper Poitou, in the government of the latter name, in France, on the Charante, and in it is a bailiwick, and a royal provincial court and marshalsea, one parish-church, and two convents.

CIUS, an ancient city of Bithynia, built by the Milesians on a river of the same name, destroyed by Philip, and rebuilt by Prusias, by whose name it was afterwards called.

CLACK, a village in Devonshire, about 7 miles S. S. E. of Frome in Somersetshire, with two fairs, on April 5, and September 19, for horned cattle, sheep, horses, and cheese.

CLACKMANNAN, the capital of the shire of the same name in the S. division of Scotland, on the N. shore of the river Forth, 25 miles N. W. of Edinburgh. Here is a castle, where formerly resided Robert Bruce, king of Scotland, which is a large dwelling, with fine gardens and parks, possessed by Mr. Bruce of Clackmannan.

CLACKMANNANSHIRE, a county in the southern division of Scotland. It is bounded on the N. by the Ochill-hills; on the S. by the frith of Forth; on the E. by part of Perthshire; and on the W. by part of Stirlingshire. It is about 8 miles long, and where broadest but 5. Towards the frith it is a level fertile country, especially with regard to pastures; though that part of it below the Ochill-hills abounds with these, and grain likewise. About Alloa and Clackmannan are several pits of coal, which, with the salt made hereabouts, is exported in great quantities, not only to Edinburgh, but England, Holland, and France: for this shire yields the best coals, and the greatest quantity of any part in Scotland; and is what is distinguished in England by the name of Scotch-coal. The river Divan runs through this shire for 6 miles. In king Robert Bruce's time it gave title of earl, and was the paternal inheritance of that family. The sword that brave king used in his wars, a two-handed weapon, as usual in those days, is shewn at the seat of Mr. Bruce of Clackmannan, a descendant from that prince, and who was hereditary sheriff of Clackmannanshire, till, by a late act of parliament, this, with the other hereditary jurisdictions in Scotland, were vested in the crown for a valuable consideration. This shire joins with that of Kinross, in sending a member to parliament alternately.

CLAGENFURTH, the capital of Carinthia, a subdivision of Austria, in Germany. It stands on the river Glan, is well fortified, and surrounded with a wall, said to be broad enough for 5 coaches to drive a-breast. Here was the seat of the ancient dukes. In the middle of a handsome piazza, is a noble fountain, with a stone statue of Hercules, one of the Roman antiquities brought from Saal. The streets are narrow, but straight and regular. Here are 6 churches, a college, a gymnasium, 3 cloisters, a provincial-house in which the land-states assemble, 2 marble pillars, and an equestrian statue of the emperor Leopold. The Lutheran books were burnt here, and that religion abolished in 1600. The town was almost consumed by fire in 1636 and 1723. It lies 120 miles S. W. of Vienna. Lat. 47, 10, N. Long. 14, 20, E.

CLAIN, a river of Poitou, in France. It has its source on the borders of Angoumois, and mingles its waters with the Vienne, another principal river in this province.

CLAIRVAUX, a famous abbey of the reformed Cistercian order, in Vallage, a subdivision belonging to the government of Champagne and Brie, in France. Of the same name is a town in the Franche Comté.

CLAMENCY, in Latin Clamediacum, a town in the valleys of Yonne, a subdivision of the government of Nivernois, in France. It stands on the river Yonne, into which the Buvron falls here; and for that reason is navigable. It has a castleward and salt-house. One of its suburbs is called Pantenor; on the other side of the Yonne has been the see of the bishop of Bethlehem, who was driven out of Palestine ever since 1180. He is nominated by the count count of Nevers, and enjoys the same privileges with the other French bishops; but has a revenue of only 1000 livres, and his diocese extends no farther than this bourg.

CLAMINE, or CLOMINES, a town belonging to the county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, in Ireland. It sends two members to the Irish parliament.

CLAN, or CLAWHN, denoting in the Highland language children, was the denomination given to the various tribes and subdivisions of the different people inhabiting the western, northern, and insular parts in the Highlands of Scotland.

CLANMAY, a river in the Isle of Man, which runs into the Irish sea opposite Dauby Pit.

CLAPHAM, a village in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 6 miles N. W. of Settle, with one fair, on September 21.

CLARA, (St.), a cape on the coast of South Guinea.

CLARA, or STOR-ELBE, a river of Wermlandia, a province of Westgothland, in Sweden. It abounds with fish, and particularly has a fine salmon-fishery.

CLARA, (St.), an island of Peru, in South America, in Guayaquil-bay, about 70 miles S. W. of Guayaquil, and subject to the king of Spain. Lat. 3, 38, N. Long. 80, 20, W.

CLARATUMBA, or MOGILA, a rich, beautiful, and fortified Cistercian convent, in the palatinate of Cracow, in Little Poland. It lies about a mile from the city of Cracow; and is celebrated on account of queen Vanda's tomb.

CLARE, a river in Suffolk, which runs into the Stour below Clare.

CLARE, Suffolk, on the river Stour, 14 miles from St. Edmundsbury, 56 miles from London. Here are the ruins of a castle. It has a fine large church, but is a little, poor, dirty place, the streets being unpaved; yet it has a manufacture of seys; and the civil and spiritual courts are held at it. The market is on Friday, and the Fairs on Easter-Tuesday, and May 26.

CLARE, or CLEAR Cape and Island, the most southerly land of Ireland, near Baltimore Bay. Long. 51, 18. Lat. 11, 10.

CLARE, a county of Ireland, in the province of Connaught. The Irish call it Towown, North Munster, because it was considered as a part of that province, till Henry Sidney, lord-deputy, annexed it to Connaught. It is bounded on the E. and S. sides by Tipperary, Limeric, and Kerry, from which it is separated by the Shannon; on the N. by the county of Galloway; and on the W. by the ocean. It is about 55 miles in length, and 38 in breadth. It is a hilly irregular country, but not deficient in good pastures, either for breeding or feeding cattle, and is thought to produce the best horses in the kingdom. The soil is also very good, and produces great quantities of corn and rape. It is divided into 9 baronies, in which are 2 market-towns, though but one parliament-borough, namely, Ennis: so that this county sends only 4 members to parliament. Its trade is greatly promoted by the river Shannon.

CLARE, one of the chief towns in the county of the same name. It has barracks for two companies of foot; but is now in a declining condition. Near it is a seat of the earl of Thomond. It lies 2 miles from Ennis, and 17 N. W. of Limeric.

CLARENDON, a large seat and park near Salisbury; and formerly contained two palaces, one called King's Manor, and the other Queen's Manor: part of the latter is still in being, together with the ruins of the former. It gave title of earl to the famous chancellor, sir Edward Hyde. In the reign of Henry II. about the year 1164, a synod was held here, occasioned by the insolence and tyranny of Becket, archbishop of Canterbury; and hither the king and his peers came to witness the bishop's swearing to a declaration, which Henry had caused to be drawn up, by way of recognition, of the customs and prerogatives of the kings of England, which Becket had flagrantly invaded. And hence the articles of this declaration were called the constitutions of Clarendon.

CLARENDON, a county of North Carolina, in America, lying on the N. of Santee river. In this county is the famous Cape Fear, at the mouth of a river of the same name, near which a colony from Barbadoes formerly settled. The Indians who inhabit the neighbouring country are reckoned the most barbarous of any in the province.

CLARENZA, or CHIARENZA, in Latin Clarentia, formerly the capital of a duchy of the same name, and, when under its own dukes, very illustrious. It is situated at the bottom of a gulph, on the western shore of the Morea, 32 miles S. W. of Patras. It is now wholly without inhabitants, and the port choked up with sand; but the superb ruins remaining, declare its ancient grandeur.

CLAROS, formerly Calano, an island of the Archipelago, lying near Patmos. It is about 40 miles in circumference, and very mountainous, some of which are so remarkably high, that their summits may be seen at Ephesus, though 80 miles distant. It was formerly dedicated to Apollo, from whom it obtained the name of Claros. It has only two sea-ports, and one town and castle, called by the same name.

CLARTHY, or CLARWEN, a river in Radnorshire, which runs into the Wye below Ravader Gowy.

CLAUDA, a small isle on the S. W. coasts of Crete, mentioned Acts xxvii. 16.

CLAUDE,

C L

CLAUDE, (St.), a very handsome town of France, in the Franche Comté, with a bishop's see. The cathedral church is extremely elegant. Great numbers of pilgrims flock hither, to visit the remains of the body of St. Claude, which they pretend are yet uncorrupted. It is seated on the river Lison, 15 miles N. W. of Geneva, and 58 S. of Bezançon. Long. 6, 0, E. Lat. 46, 20, N.

CLAUDINOPOLIS, anciently Bithynium, and since Castronema. It is now dwindled into a poor town, though still the see of a bishop. Lat. 40, 38, N. Long. 31, 39, E.

CLAUSENBURG, or COLASWAR, in Latin Claudopolis, the capital of Colaswer, a country of Transylvania, situated on the rivulet Samos, near the foot of the mountains, on the borders of Hungary. It is a large populous town, of considerable trade, defended by a castle, good walls, and strong bulwarks. Over the Portina gate is still to be seen an inscription to the honour of the emperor Trajan. The Jesuits had a college here. The Socinians and Reformed have their places of worship, and were in possession of the cathedral till 1603, when it was taken from them, and given to the Jesuits, whose college and church they had demolished. It is inhabited by Saxons and Hungarians, who are promiscuously permitted to bear offices. It is the more frequented on account of its being the place where the states of Transylvania meet, and where the prince holds the provincial courts of justice. It was besieged in vain in 1601, and taken 1603, and retaken the same year by the Imperialists. Prince Abassi of Transylvania besieged it in 1661, with a large body of Turks; when the governor, though so ill provided with cannon and ammunition, that he was obliged to melt the tower bells, held out till relief arrived, which obliged the Turks to raise the siege. In 1664 it was taken again.

CLAUSTHAL, a large open mine town, in the principality of Grubenhagen, with broad streets and 900 houses, two churches, an orphan-house, a grammar-school, a garrison of invalids, a mint where 500,000 dollars are annually coined, and a house for smelting silver. In 1634 and 1725, it suffered much by fire.

CLAUSURA, or CLASURA, a mountain in the banat of Tameswaer, and circle on this side the Theiss, in the kingdom of Hungary. It lies on the confines of Transylvania, and gives its name to the neighbouring country.

CLAXTON, a village of Norfolk, on the river Yare, and on the main-road. Fair at Midsummer for 5 days.

CLAWDOCK, or CLOWDOCK, a river in Denbighshire, which runs into the Dee above Wrothbury. Another of the same name runs in the Clwyd below Llandurnog.

C L

CLAY, Norfolk, 8 miles from Walsingham, and 125 miles from London, near the road from Lynn to Harwich, is a port, with large salt works; from whence salt is sent all over the county, and sometimes to Holland, and the Baltic. It has a market on Saturday, and a fair on St. Margaret's day.

CLAYTON, a village in Suffex, 6 miles W. of Lewes, with two fairs, on July 5, and September 26.

CLAZAMENE, now Urla, or Vourla, one of the 12 ancient cities of Asia, and the birth-place of Anaxagoras. It is now a small sea-port on the Ionian peninsula. The Clazomenians fled hither from Alexander, and built this new city, which was afterwards made free by the Romans. It is now only an inconsiderable sea-port.

CLEAR, or CAPE CLEAR, a promontory and small island on the S. W. coast of Ireland. Lat. 51, 18, N. Long. 11, 10, W.

CLEDAGH, a river in Monmouthshire, which runs into the Usk above Llanfoyst. A second river of the same name in Caermarthenshire, which runs into the Muthvey near Llangadock. A third river of that name in Glamorganshire, which runs into the Neath, near Neath; and a fourth river in Pembrokehire, which runs into the Clethy near Monacldodge.

CLEDHEWEN, a river in Pembrokehire, which runs into the Dungleddy at Redbarton.

CLEEBURY, or MORTIMER CLEEBURG, from Hugh de Mortimer, who built a castle here, which was soon afterwards demolished by king Henry II. as a nursery of rebellion. It is a small market-town of Shropshire, and stands on the N. side of the river Teme, at the foot of an eminence called Clee-hill; on which are the remains of an ancient camp, and famous for producing the best pit-coal. It is 10 miles from Bridgenorth, and 118 from London. Market on Thursday, and fair May 2, and October 27.

CLEER, (St.), a parish in Cornwall, remarkable for a piece of antiquity, called the Other Half Stone, which indeed are two stones fixed in the ground, and by mortises in each seem to have been formerly joined together. On both are curious diaper-work carvings, with an inscription upon one of them in very antique characters, "Doniert rogavit pro anima." This Doniert or Dugarth, was king of Cornwall, and drowned A. D. 182. Not far off is a heap of large stones, under which lies a large one in the form of a cheese, and hence called Wring-cheese. In the same parish there are likewise 6 or 8 stones of a vast magnitude, standing up in a circle, supposed to be a temple of the Druids.

CLEEHILL. See CLEEBURY.

CLERAC, or CLAIRAC, a town of Agenois, in Guyenne Proper, and government of the former name,

C L

name, and of Gascony, in Gascony, in France. It stands on the river Lot, near the Garonne. It carries on a good trade in tobacco, wine, and brandy. Here is an abbey, a convent, and a beautiful church.

This place suffered considerably from the religious wars. It lies four leagues from Agen, to the S. E.

CLERMONT, the capital of an old county of the same name in Argonne, a subdivision in the government of Champagne and Brie, in France. The dukes of Lorraine formerly made themselves masters of this county, and they annexed it to the duchy of Bar. Lewis XIII. and XIV. retook it several times, the last of whom gave it, 1748, to Lewis of Bourbon, prince of Condé; but with the reserve of the sovereignty and appeal to the parliament of Paris. It lies near the river Aire. Lat. 49, 19, N. Long. 5, 15, E.

CLERMONT, a town in the diocese of Lodeve and Lower Languedoc, in the government of the latter name, in France. It stands upon a rock on the river Lergue. Here they carry on fine manufactures of cloth and hats. It is a barony; and one of the provincial states.

CLERMONT, anciently Urbs Arvernorum, the capital of all Auvergne; it stands on a small eminence, between the rivers Artier, and Bedat, not far from the mountain called Pui de Dome, is a populous city, but the streets are narrow, and the houses dark. It is the see of a bishop, and seat of a court of aids, an election, provincial bailiwick, and jurisdiction, &c. It was formerly the principal place of the counts of Auvergne, who for that reason were also stiled counts of Clermont. Its prelate is first suffragan to the archbishop of Bourges, and lord of the small towns of Billon and Croupieres; his diocese contains 800 parishes, he has an income of 15,000 livres, and his tax to the court of Rome is 4550 florins. Besides the cathedral, here are three collegiate churches, three abbeys; among which, in that of St. Alliere, in the chapel of St. Venerand, are preserved several bodies of saints, and in that of St. André are the sepulchral monuments of the old counts of Clermont and Dauphins of Auvergne, with several convents, and a late Jesuits college.

In the neighbourhood of this city are springs, which deposite a lapideous substance upon bodies laid in them. The most remarkable among these is in the suburb of St. Alliere, which has formed the famous stone-bridge over the brook Tiretaine, the rapidity of whose stream hollows the arches. The inhabitants continually lengthen this natural bridge, by turning the rivulet out of its channel as soon as a new arch is formed. This is the only water generally drank in the suburb, and yet produces no bad effects.

Close by the city are the mineral springs of St. Pierre and Jaude. Lat. 45, 46, N. Long. 3, 10, E.

Of the same name is a mountain-town of Genevois, and duchy of Savoy, in Upper Italy.

CLERMONT, a town of Beauvaisis, a subdivision of the third sub-government in the Isle of France. It stands upon a mountain, on the river Breche; gives title of count, is the principal place of an election, and from it originally spring the royal house of Bourbon. It has a particular governor, and lies 35 miles N. of Paris. Lat. 49, 24, N. Long. 2, 36, E.

CLERVAL, a town of France, in the Franche Comté, seated on the river Doux, belonging to the house of Wirtemberg, but depends on the crown of France. Long. 5, 57, E. Lat. 46, 35, N.

CLERVAUX. See CLAIRVAUX.

CLERY, a bourg of Lower Orleanois, in the government of the latter name, in France. Here is a collegiate church built by king Lewis XI. who is also buried in it.

CLETHY, a river in Pembrokeshire, rises at the foot of a hill called Vrennybawr, some miles S. E. of Newport, and running S. falls into the mouth of the Dougledye, near its conflux with a bay of the sea, called by the English, Milford-Haven, but by the Welch, Aberdau Gledheu, or the haven with 2 swords.

CLETOR, or CLETON, a river in Merionethshire, which runs into the Dee near Llanderval-Gadern.

CLETTER, a river in Cardiganshire, which runs into the Dovy near Aberdovy.

CLEVE, or CLEF, a duchy of the circle of Westphalia, in Germany. It lies between Munster on the E. Guelderland on the W. Zutphen on the N. and Juliers on the S. extending 40 miles in length from N. to S. and 15 in breadth from E. to W. It belongs to the king of Prussia. It abounds in good pastures, corn, fruits, plants and all kinds of game are in great plenty. The Rhine divides the duchy in the eastern and western parts, and the rivers that fall into it, abound in fish. The inhabitants are chiefly Roman Catholics, but the Lutherans and Jews enjoy the free exercise of their religion. They carry on a great trade by means of the Rhine and the Maese.

CLEVE, the metropolis of the last-mentioned duchy. It stands mostly upon cliffs, and on the declivity of a hill, between the Rhine and the Maese. It is a well-built place, though small, with several fine houses of persons of quality. In the the castle, which was the palace of their ancient dukes, the apartments are stately.

From the Swan-tower, a Gothic structure, is a noble prospect of the neighbouring country and the Rhine, for 3 miles N. of it. The governors of the country, who are the king of Prussia's deputies, and the magistrates of the city, are Calvinists; these have a large church, besides the chapel of the castle. But the public churches here and throughout the duchy, are mostly in the hands of the Romanists; in consideration of which the Protestants have a liberty in the dominions of the duke of Newburg and Juliers.

The river Hel running at the foot of the castle is navigable by small vessels to the Rhine. West of the city are prince Maurice of Nassau's seat and noble parks, with fine ponds, water-works, &c.

In the citadel is an inscription shewing that it was founded by Caius Julius Caesar in the year 608 from the building of Rome, and in 1372 and 1328, the town suffered by fire. In 1755 a silk manufactory was established here, and in the king's park near the town, is a medicinal spring.

Above these lies Sternberg, a high hill, from which Utrecht, though 50 miles off, may be seen; besides 40 other cities and large towns, in 12 of which there are vistas, through so many walks cut in the woods. In the palace is a noble collection of Roman antiquities. Besides the great church in the city of Cleve, there is a monastery of Capuchins, and also another of Franciscans, and a nunnery.

On the road, two leagues from this city, is the palace of Moiland, belonging to the king of Prussia; and from thence to Santem, 5 leagues farther, is one continued range of walks. It lies 10 miles S. E. of Nimeguen. Lat. 51, 48, N. Long. 6, 34, E.

CLEVELAND, a territory in the N. Riding of Yorkshire, that lately gave title of duke as well as Southampton, to the Fitzroys, descendants of the dukes of Cleveland, one of king Charles II.'s mistresses. It lies on the confines of the bishopric of Durham, and has its name from steep cliffs near it, at the foot of which the country falls into a plain, fertile, and clayey soil.

CLEVE-PEPPER, N. Wilts, 3 miles from Wotton-Basford, is often also by the vulgar called White-Cleve; though its true name is Cliffe-Pypard, from a cliff, or rock, and a court kept there, by the name of Pypard. This town stands at the foot of hill, that runs along the N. side of the Vale of White-Horse. Here is a hill of stone, which is as white as chalk, but much harder; and is of great use for paving and building, being very durable if kept dry. In the church there are 2 statues of it; and there have been coffins of whole stone dug up in the church-yard, which seem however to be of free-stone. The chief business here is their dairies.

CLIFF, a market-town of Northamptonshire; 25 miles from the town of Northampton and 71 from London. Market on Tuesday; fair on October 29.

CLIFTON, a village, or rather mansion, on an eminence of Westmoreland, 3 miles on this side of Penrith, where a sharp skirmish happened between a party of the king's and the rear-guard of the Highlanders, in the rebellion of 1745, after their retreat from Derby. There was a considerable loss on both sides; but the latter were at length driven from their advantageous posts, defended by several stone-dykes, which served them for entrenchments; and upon that they hurried away to Carlisle and Scotland.

CLIFTON-WELLS, in the parish of the former name, in Somersetshire, about a mile from Bristol, down the river, very much frequented for their medicinal waters, particularly in the diabetes, and all scorbutic and inflammatory cases, it is reckoned preferable to the Bath waters. Near the wells is a house built, with a handsome assembly-room for breakfasting. The water is cried about the streets every morning in Bristol, like milk.

CLINOWA, or KLUNO, a well-built town of Turkish Dalmatia and Hungarian Illyria, in the kingdom of Hungary, where the Turks in war-time generally rendezvous, and where they have a magazine of provisions and warlike stores.

CLISSA, a strong place of Venetian Dalmatia and Hungarian Illyria, in the kingdom of Hungary. It stands on a high hill, where between 2 steep rocks is a narrow valley through which is the road out of Turkey into Dalmatia, and particularly goes towards Spalatro, to which this place serves as a bulwark. Here is no other water than what falls from the clouds, and springs out in a village at the foot of the fortress.

In the year 1646, it came into the hands of the Venetians. The neighbouring country is famous for its excellent vine and olive yards. It lies 10 miles N. E. of Venice. Lat. 43, 26, N. Long. 17, 59, E.

CLISSON, a town and barony in the bishopric of Nantes, a subdivision of Upper Britany, in the government of the latter name in France. It has a collegiate church, 10 miles S. E. of Nantes. Lat. 47, 16, N. Long. 1, 15, W.

CLIST-BROAD, a village on the N. E. side of Exeter, which has a fair May 3.

CLIST, a river in Devonshire, which runs into the Exe below Exeter.

CLITHERO,

C L

CLITHERO, in Lancashire, 214 miles from London, stands with its ruinous castle, built by the Lacy's, at the bottom of Pendle-hill, near the source of the Ribble. It is an ancient borough by prescription, but has several charters from king Henry II. and others; and is governed by 2 bailiffs. On the adjacent moor are frequent horse-races. It has a market on Saturday, and fairs March 24, July 27, and Dec. 7.

CLITUMNUS, a celebrated river of the duchy of Spoleto, in the Ecclesiastical State of Italy. It rises near the town of La Vene. Concerning it the ancients maintained an erroneous opinion, that its waters gave a white colour to the numerous herds which are bred in the neighbourhood of Umbria. Upon this river is the fine chapel St. Salvatore, which is said to have been anciently the temple of Clitumnus.

CLOBUCH, a castle of Turkish Dalmatia, in Hungarian Illyria and kingdom of Hungary. It stands on a high rock, to which there is only a narrow entrance; and for this reason it is impregnable, unless the want of provisions should forward the surrender of it.

CLOGHEEN, a small well-built town in the county of Tipperary, with a good market.

CLOGHER, a small episcopal city in the county of Tyrone and province of Ulster, in Ireland. It lies 20 miles W. of Armagh.

CLOGHNAKILTY, anciently Clowncallow, a town near the sea, in the province of Munster, near Kinsale, with a church, and a market on Fridays for linen yarn. It was a thriving place before the war in 1641, but now has little trade, its harbour being choked with sand.

CLONEFART, though a ruinous town, yet it is the see of a bishop, in the province of Roscommon, and county of Connaught, in Ireland.

CLONEGALL, a small town on the river Slaney, in the province of Leinster.

CLONMEL, the capital of the county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, in Ireland, was a well-fortified place, has the privilege of a market, and sends two members to the Irish parliament.

Clonmel was built before the invasion of the Danes, and consists of 4 cross streets, each of which led to a gate. The market-house is mostly built of marble, and in a good taste, and here is a spacious bridge over the Suire of 20 arches. The chief church, of the Gothic kind, is still kept in repair, and here are the ruins of two more. The barracks are kept in good order, and will hold more men than are generally in them. Oliver Cromwell found more resistance here than at any other place in the kingdom, and on his taking the town demolished the castles and walls, the skeletons of which still remain.

CLOPTON, in Warwickshire, on the N. side of Stratford upon Avon. Here was formerly a collegiate church, and the college is still standing; in the chancel whereof lies the famous William Shakespeare, who has immortalized his memory by his 48 plays.

CLOVELLY, a harbour on the E. side of Hartland-point on the N. side of Devonshire, and the most considerable about here for the herring-fishery. It is secured by a pier.

CLOYNE, a small city in the county of Cork, and province of Munster, in Ireland. It is the see of a bishop, one of whom was the famous dean Berkeley, so well known in the learned world. It sends 2 members to the Irish Parliament, and lies 15 miles E. of Cork. Here is a decent Gothic cathedral, and near it a round tower and a small castle.

CLUN, a river of Shropshire, it joins the Tame at Ludlow, and the united stream runs to Colebury, a town on the confines of Worcestershire, where it falls into the Severn.

CLUNDERT, a town of Holland, one of the United Provinces of the Netherlands. It was formerly a considerable harbour. Prince William, to whom it was given in 1583, fortified it with 8 bastions and some ravelins. It has a fine church and a good chime of bells, and lies about 3 miles from Williamstadt, to the S. E.

CLUDEN, a small lake near Dumfries.

CLUDEN, a river in Dumfries-shire, remarkable for salmon.

CLUNN, a village in Shropshire, 6 miles S. of of Bishops-Castle, with 2 fairs on June 13, and November 22.

CLUNY, or CLUGNY, a town of Le Mazois, one of the subdivisions of the government of Burgundy, in France. It is situated in a valley, has a salt-magazine, a celebrated Benedictine abbey, 3 parish churches, a convent, and hospital, 24 miles S. W. of Challons. Lat. 46, 29, N. Long. 5, 37, E.

CLUNSE, a small fortified town in the lordship of Faucigny, and duchy of Savoy, in Upper Italy. It lies 16 miles S. W. of Geneva, and subject to the king of Sardinia. Lat. 26, 29, N. Long. 6, 36, N.

CLUSON, or PRAGELA, a fine valley, adjacent to the Alps, on the side of Piemont, in Upper Italy, with other places and vallies in France, ceded to the king of Sardinia, by the treaty of Utrecht. It confines on the vallies of Perouse and Martin, including 6 churches, which belong to the Waldenses.

Of the same name with the first, is a river in Piemont, which intersects the valley of Perouse; and into it falls the Germanasque. See PEROUSE.

CLUYD, a river in Denbighshire, which runs into the Irish sea below Rutland Castle.

CLWYD, a fruitful and populous valley beyond the black mountains of Merioneth and Caernarvon shires, in North Wales, so called from the river of the same name. It is full of towns and villages, abounds in corn and pasture, and the river, a gentle stream, runs through it. This agreeable prospect of the country is open, without intermission, for above 20 miles in length, and from 5 to 7 in breadth.

CLYDE, one of the most considerable rivers in the W. of Scotland. It rises from Errick-hill, in the Upper Ward, or Lanerkshire, and on the confines of Tweedale; when after passing by Lanerk, Hamilton, and the city of Glasgow, it falls into Loch-Long, and into the frith of Clyde.

CLYDESDALE, so called from the river Clyde, is a denomination given to the shire of Lanerk. See LANERKSHIRE, from the town of Lanerk, in the W. of Scotland. It gives title of marquis to the duke of Hamilton.

CLYDE, (Frith of), all the bay on the N. side of Upper Galloway, in Scotland, is called so, though near 50 miles from the river Clyde; also along Carrick, Kyle, and Cunningham. In it lie the islands of Arran and Bute, and the opposite mainland of Kintyre.

CLYNFOGFAUR, a village in Carnarvonshire, in North Wales, with two fairs, on August 18, and September 23, for cattle.

CLYPEA, anciently a city in the territory of Carthage.

CNIDOS, or GNVDUS, anciently part of Caria, a province of Asiatic Turkey. It gave also name to the promontory on which it stood. Here are two ports, one on each side of the promontory; and before it an island was situated so, that, being joined to the continent by a causeway or bridge, it formed a double town, the principal part of which is on the continent. It was once famed for a temple of Venus, in which was the celebrated statue of that goddess, by the eminent artist, Praxiteles: this brought a continual resort of people thither. The Cape of Cnidos, called Capo Crico, Capo Girdo, and in the modern French maps the Cape of the Cross, stands on the western coast, as Cresso doth on the eastern; and both pointing to the S.

COALORTON, a place near Ashley de la Zouch, in Leicestershire; famous for its coal-pits, which are said to have burned for many years together in the reign of Henry VIII. and could not be extinguished till the inflammable matter which fed the fire was quite consumed. Here is a noted mineral water called Griffydham.

COAST CASTLE, a fortress of Africa, on the coast of Guinea, and the chief that the English have in these parts. It is a strong place, furnished with good rooms, and makes a handsome appearance, having a turret on the top. Near it is a round tower seated on a hill, and furnished with great guns. Just by the castle is a negroe town, which is the best built of any upon the coast: however, the inhabitants here, as well as in other parts, go quite naked, except a clout or cloth to cover what decency obliges them to hide. Long. 0, 10. W. Lat. 4, 40, N.

COBAN, the same with VERA PAZ.

COBHAM, a town on the S. bank of James-river, Virginia, opposite James-town, 20 miles N. W. of Suffolk.

COBHAM, (Isle) discovered by captain Middleton, 1742. Long. from Churchill Fort, 3, 40, E. Lat. 63, 0.

COBHAM, or CHOBHAM, Surry, 4 miles S. from Windsor, on a rivulet that runs from Bagshot to the Thames, near Chertsey. The parishioners pay no tithe-hay, but a composition only of 1d. per acre, which is called mead silver. In the heath, in this parish, is that called Gracious Pond, above 1 mile round, stocked with excellent carp, which was made by the abbot of Chertsey (in the reign of king Edward III.) who also erected a mile here, and planted a coppice, called South Moor. Here are 2 great ditches, 10 feet deep at least, extending cross the road, at the E. and W. ends of the town. Here is a charity school, and a fair on December 11.

COBER, or ANCOBER, a river in Guinea Proper; its banks are adorned with lofty trees, upon the boughs of which are variegated birds and sportive apes. About a mile from the mouth of this river, is a populous village, extending itself about a quarter of a mile on the western bank.

COBEZA, or COBYA, a village, containing about 50 houses, in Los Charcas, a province of Peru, in South America. The soil being very barren, they generally live upon fish, part of which they exchange for some Indian wheat and papas brought from the town of Atacama. Here is but one rivulet, which is something brackish, not above 5 or 6 trees, and no grass at all.

This port has never been frequented by any but French; and is the nearest to Lipes, where are silver mines, and 100 leagues from Potosi, through a desert country.

COBLENTZ, in Latin Confluentia, from its situation at the conflux of the Rhine and Moselle. It is a large city of the electorate of Triers, and circle of the Lower Rhine, in Germany. It stands in a fruitful vale, and is of a triangular form, two sides being secured by the above-mentioned rivers, and the third by a wall and strong fortifications. It has a stone bridge of 14 arches over the Moselle, a fort of 3 bastions on the other side, and a bridge of boats over the Rhine to Hermanstein. Its situation has rendered it very populous, and it carries on a considerable trade, especially in wine, corn, wood, and iron.

Besides the elector's palace, here are two large churches and seven monasteries and nunneries, a college, a gymnasium, and an archiepiscopal seminary; at this place was not only a citadel in the time of the Romans, but the first Frankish kings frequently resided here. In 1249, the town was walled by the archbishop Arnold II. and is now regularly fortified. The private houses are generally neat.

This is the key of the electorate, and is cut by the two rivers into a fort of peninsula. In 1632, it was taken by the Swedes, and in 1688, the French almost ruined it with their bombs, but could not take it. Coblenz lies opposite to Hermanstein, and 30 miles S. of Cologne. It is subject to the elector of Triers. Lat. 50, 22, N. Long. 7, 5, E.

COBLON, a port on the Coromandel coast, and hither peninsula of India, in Asia; a settlement, and the only one which the Ostend company had in this part of the world, 12 miles S. of Fort St. George. The soil in the neighbourhood is fruitful, and it has good water, with the convenience of a point of rocks to facilitate the landing of boats.

This the English and Dutch East India companies obliged those of Ostend to abandon. Lat 12, 56, N. Long. 80, 20, E.

COBURG, (duchy of), one of the secular dominions of Franconia, in Germany; it has belonged to the dukes of Saxe Gotha ever since 1674. It is 43 miles long, and 16 where broadest.

COBURG, the capital of the principality and the residence of the duke of Coburg Saalfeld, is a walled town, with large suburbs, also walled in. In the prince's palace, called Ehrenburg, the archives are kept, and the town is the seat of the several colleges of government, as the privy council, regency, consistory, treasury, and chancery. Here are also four churches, a gymnasium, a school, a gold and silver manufactory, with one for porcelain. In the palace, curious things in petrified wood are made, which is common in this country. Without the town is an hospital, as is a strong fort on a high hill, where are apartments for the prince, a church, &c.

COCA, a town of Old Castile, in Spain; it stands high amidst mountains, and is called the prison for persons of rank, as near it there is a strong castle in which Philip William, prince of Orange, was formerly confined.

COCCIUM, the Roman name for Ribchester in Lancashire; from which place the military way is still to be traced to Overborough, the ancient Bremetonacce.

COCHEIM, a strong town in the electorate of Triers, and circle of the Lower Rhine, in Germany. It stands on the Moselle.

In 1689, the French, after several repulses, took it by storm, when they massacred 1300 men, women and children, and took 300 prisoners. It lies 30 miles N. E. of Triers city. Lat. 50, 26, N. Long. 6, 56, E.

COCHATRAMBA, a jurisdiction belonging to the archbishopric of Plata and empire of Peru, in South America. It lies 50 leagues S. E. of Plata, and 56 from Potosi. In some directions this province extends above 40 leagues.

Its capital of the same name is a large, populous, and wealthy city. Besides its situation in a very fertile plain, the whole country is so fructified by numerous rivers and streams traversing it, that it is reckoned the granary of the whole archbishopric, and even of the diocese of La Paz. The air is mostly pure and mild, and in some spots silver mines have been discovered.

COCHIN, or KAKOCHIN, a kingdom of the Malabar coast, and Mogul empire, in Asia. It lies between that of Cranganor on the N. and that of Porca on the S. and is about 10 leagues in length. It produces coarse cinnamon, cocoa-trees, and great quantities of pepper, but a lighter kind than that growing on the N. The woods afford plenty of timber, and the trunks of some of the trees are very large, so that skiffs are made of them, that will carry between 20 and 30 pipes of water. They also make large chests and cabinets, which are carried all over the W. coasts of India.

Besides the black cattle abounding in this country, the great numbers of its canals afford plenty of fish and fowl, and its mountains are well stored with wild game. Here are also sugar-canes and bamboes, with iron and steel in plenty, likewise bees wax for exportation.

COCHIN, (City of), the capital of the last-mentioned kingdom of the same name. It is a Dutch factory and port, on the N. side of a river, and has a considerable trade. To its government all the other Dutch settlements on this coast are subject. When they took it from the Portuguese in 1662, the English also were obliged to remove with their effects to their factory at Pennany. The Dutch have very much contracted the town, and fortified it with 7 large bastions and courtyes. The Moors and Christians, with a few Malabar converts, converts, live in separate quarters. The Jews here are all blacks. The commodore or governor's house is a stately structure. Its garrison consists of 300 men. It lies 100 miles S. of Calicut, and was taken in 1781 by the British forces. Lat. 9, 25, N. Long. 76, 0, E.

COCHIN-CHINA, a kingdom of Asia, bounded on the N. by Tonquin, on the E. by the sea of China, on the S. by the Indian ocean, and on the W. by Cambodia, and a ridge of mountains inhabited by a savage people called Kemois, who live independent of any government. Little of the history of this kingdom is known; what follows depends entirely on the credit of M. le Poivre, a French traveller. About half a century before the French first arrived in these distant regions, a prince of Tonquin, as he fled from his sovereign, by whom he was pursued as a rebel, had, with his soldiers and adherents crossed the river, which serves as a barrier between Tonquin and Cochin-China. The fugitives, who were warlike and civilized men, soon expelled the scattered inhabitants, who wandered about without any society or form of government, and founded a new kingdom, which soon grew rich and populous. During the reigns of the first 6 kings, no nation could be happier than the Cochin-Chinese. Their monarchs governed them as a father does his family, establishing no laws but those of nature, to which they themselves were the first to pay obedience. They honoured and encouraged agriculture, as the most useful employment of mankind; and required from their subjects only a small annual free-gift to defray the expence of their defensive war against the Tonquinese, who were their enemies. This imposition was regulated by way of poll-tax, with the greatest equity. Every man, able to till the ground, paid unto the prince a small sum proportioned to the strength of his constitution, and the vigour of his arm; and nothing more.

Cochin-China continued happy under these princes for more than a century; but the discovery of gold-mines put a stop to these mild regulations. Luxury immediately took place. The prince began to despise the simple habitation of his ancestors, and caused a superb palace to be built, a league in circumference, surrounded with a wall of brick in the model of that of Pekin, and defended by 1600 pieces of cannon. Not content with this, he would needs have a winter palace, an autumn palace, and a summer palace. The old taxes were by no means sufficient to defray these expences; new ones were devised; and oppression and tyranny every where took place. His courtiers, to flatter their prince, gave him the title of the king of Heaven, which he still continues to assume. When speaking of his subjects, he styles them his children, but by no means behaves as if he was their father: for our author informs us, that he has seen whole villages newly abandoned by their inhabitants, who were harrassed with toil and insupportable exactions; the necessary consequence of which was, that their lands returned to their former uncultivated state.

M. Le Poivre represents the Cochin-Chinese as gentle, hospitable, frugal, and industrious. There is not a beggar in the country; and robbery and murder are absolutely unknown. A stranger may wander over the kingdom from one end to the other, (the capital excepted), without meeting with the slightest insult. He will be every where received with the most eager curiosity, but at the same time with the greatest benevolence. A Cochin-Chinese traveller, who has not money sufficient to defray his expences at an inn, enters the first house of the town or village he arrives at, and waiting the hour of dinner, takes part with the family, and goes away when he thinks proper, without speaking a word, or any person's putting to him a single question.

The country of Cochin-China is much of the same temperature with that of Tonquin; though rather milder, as lying nearer the sea. Like Tonquin, it is annually overflowed, and consequently fruitful in rice, which requires no other manure than the mud left by the inundations. They have sugar-canes, and the same kinds of fruits common to other parts of India. The country produces no grapes, and therefore they drink a liquor brewed from rice. They have vast woods of mulberry trees, which run up as fast as our hemp. Their silk is stronger than that of China, but not so fine. They have the best timber in the world, particularly a sort which abounds on the mountains, and is called the incorruptible tree; because it never rots under earth or water, and is so solid that it serves for anchors. There are two kinds, black and red. The trees are very tall, straight, and so big that two men can scarce fathom them. They have also on the mountains of the Kemois a tree of the most fragrant scent, which is supposed to be the same with lignum aloes. This being reckoned the best product of the country, is engrossed by the king, and is sold from 5 to 16 ducats per pound. It is highly valued both in China and Japan, where the logs of it are sold for 200 ducats a pound, to make pillows for the king and nobility; and among those Indians which continue to burn their dead, great quantities of it are used in the funeral piles. The young trees called aquila, or eagle-wood, are every one's property, which makes the old ones, called calamba, so scarce and dear. They have oak, and large pines, for the building of ships; so that this country is of the same use to China, that Norway is to Britain. In general, they have the same kind of trees and plants that are to be met with in Tonquin. They have mines of gold, as well as diamonds; but the last they do not value so highly as pearl, pearl. They also esteem their coral and amber very much. In all the provinces there are great granaries filled with rice, in some of which that grain is kept upwards of 30 years.

The merchants of Cambodia, Tonquin, China, Macao, Manila, Japan and Malacca, trade to Cochinchina with plate, which they exchange for the commodities of the country. The Portuguese are the most favoured here of any Europeans. The Cochinchinese themselves not being inclined to travel, seldom sail out of sight of their own shore, but purchase many trifles from foreigners at great rates, particularly combs, needles, bracelets, glass pendants, &c. They are very fond of our hats, caps, girdles, shirts, and other clothes; and, above all, set a great value on coral. The country is said to have 700 miles of coast, with many large inlets of the sea, and above 60 convenient landing places; which, however, according to Captain Hamilton, are but seldom visited by strangers.

COCHINO, one of the two principal places on the island of Stalimene or Lemnos, on the coast of Greece, in European Turkey. This was the ancient Hephæstias, once a considerable city. Lat. 40, 2, N. Long. 25, 36, E.

COCKBURNSPATH, vulgarly Cobberspath, a village of the Merse, in Scotland, at the foot of a steep hill beyond Coldingham-moor, where nature forms a sloping difficult pass, which a few men well armed might defend against a numerous army.

COCKER, a river of Cumberland, at the junction of which with the Derwent stands the town of COCKERMOUTH, between two hills, and is almost encompassed by the two rivers; the former of which runs through it, and is joined again by two bridges. It is a well-built trading place, governed by a bailiff, and sends two members to parliament. Upon one hill is a castle, and upon another a fair church. It lies about 12 miles from the sea; yet vessels of good burthen can come securely up to it. Here are two streets of houses of stone, and slated. In the part above the Cocker is the moot-hall, where the corn-market is kept on Monday, and in the other below is the beast-market. The duke of Somerset's auditor keeps a court here twice a year, and his bailiff has the only apartment habitable in the castle. It was represented in parliament in the reigns of Edward I. and Edward III. but not afterwards till 1640. Market on Monday; and fairs, Whitfun-Monday, and October 10.

COCKET, a river of Northumberland, though small, yet very much abounding in trout. It empties itself into the sea opposite to Cocket island.

COCK-HILL, a place in Somersetshire, where there is a fair on December 28.

COCKLE-ISLAND, lying off the N. W. cape of New Guinea, in the southern, or antarctic countries, and which the Dutch call Cape Mabo, is a small woody island, near which were found such a large sort of cockles, that the fish in one of them is said to suffice 7 or 8 men; and is very good and wholesome. And for this reason Dampier called the island Cockle-island. The same sort of cockles are found near Celebes, the shell of some of the largest weighing 78 lb. Cockle-Island abounds also with pigeons.

COCONATO, a town of Piemont, in Upper Italy. It lies 20 miles E. of Turin, and said to be the native place of Columbus, the first discoverer of America. Lat. 44, 56, N. Long. 8, 20, E.

COCOES, a cluster of uninhabited islands on the coast of Siam, and bay of Bengal, in the East Indies, in Asia. These abound with cocoa-trees, whence they have their name. They lie W. of Martaban coast, and 35 leagues W. S. W. from Cape Negrais. Between these and the most northern of the Andaman islands, the winds commonly blow hard at S. which, joining with a very strong current into the bay, makes it dangerous to go lower or farther S. among the Martaban and Andaman islands. On the E. side of the southernmost of the Coccoes, which lies in lat. 14, 5, N. E. by N. from the N. E. extremity of the great Andaman, there is very good anchoring in a sandy bay, where wood and water are easy to be come at.

Of the same name is also another island opposite to Laban, in Sumatra, and about 10 leagues off.

COCNON, a river in France, in Normandy, which has its source in the diocese of Mans, and falls into the sea between Point Orson and Mount Michael.

CODBECK, a river in Yorkshire, which runs into the Wellobeck at Daulton.

COD CAPE, a promontory in the Atlantic ocean, and on the coast of New England, in North America. It lies near the entrance into the harbour of Boston, at the N. end of Barnstable bay. It is the highest and longest cape on the coast. Lat. 42, 15, N. Long. 69, 27, W.

CODA DE VOLPE, or the Fox's TAIL, the S. W. extremity of the coast of Calabria, and which with Cape Pylorus forms the narrowest part of the straits of Messina, which do not appear more than a mile broad, between these two headlands.

CODOGNO, a place in the territory of Lodigiano, a subdivision of the duchy of Milan. It is 25 miles E. of Pavia. Lat. 45, 15, N. Long. 10, 49, W.

COD-ROY, an island, 2 miles S. of Cape Anguilla, Newfoundland. It is a low, flat, green island, near 2 miles in compass, and between it and Newfoundland, form a small snug harbour for fishing shallops.

CODSAL, Staffordshire, on the borders of Shropshire, near the royal oak, is noted for a sulphurous phurous well, with a mixture of salt, whose water was anciently counted a sovereign remedy for leprosy, and is used at present, both by man and beast, against cutaneous diseases; so that many of the inhabitants boil their meat and brew with it.

CELOSRYIA, one of the three subdivisions of Syria, in Asia, the other two being Syria Proper and Syria Antiochene or Seleucis.

COEST-ELDT, a fortified town in the bishopric of Munster, on the river Borkel, and next to Munster the best town in the bishopric. Here are two churches, a college, four nunneries, and a monastery; and has also a princely judge. It was formerly a Hanse town, and in 1591 it suffered by fire, and was taken by the Hessians in 1631. It lies 25 miles W. of the city of Munster, and is the usual residence of the bishop. Lat. 51, 59, N. Long. 6, 49, E.

COEVRES, a town of Le Soissonois, a subdivision of the second understadtholdership, in the government of the Isle of France. It is a dukedom and peerage under the title of Etrees.

COGGESHALL, or COXALL, formerly a very considerable clothing town in Essex; particularly for baize and says, being very famous for one sort called Coggeshall-whites, finer than any woollen cloth. Here is a market on Thursdays, and a fair Whitfun-Monday and Tuesday. Near the town was found, in a grotto, a phial with a lamp in it, covered with a Roman tile, as also several urns, &c. one of which had upon it this inscription: Cocilli M. i. e. to the manes of Coccillus, from whom very likely the town had its name. It lies on the river Blackwater, 14 miles from Chelmsford, and 47 from London.

COGNI, the ancient Iconium, so called from a celebrated image of Medusa here. It was not only the capital of Lycaonia, but likewise at present of a considerable beglebergate. In the beginning of Christianity it had great numbers of Jews and Greeks, and became early an episcopal see: and having been since conquered by the Turks, they made it their metropolis, till they got footing in Europe. It is the residence of the begleberg or viceroy of Caramania, and a Greek archbishopric. Its sangiacate hath 18 ziamets, 512 timars. Cogni lies in a fertile plain, near the Palus Trogilis, furnishing the city both with fish and water, which is conveyed to it by subterraneous conduits. Its walls are high and stout, with 108 towers, and a very broad ditch; its circuit may be about a good hour's walk. Here are five gates. The city is inhabited only by Turks; but in its two spacious suburbs live Jews, Armenians, Greeks, &c. with convenient kans. Here provisions are very good and cheap; their mutton has an exquisite taste, and the sheep of the Syrian kind have remarkably long and thick tails, sometimes weighing above 30 pounds, which they make them draw upon flight sledges. In one of the suburbs are two large mosques. The largest mosque in town is remarkable for its dome, and stately minarets or towers. It lies 100 miles N. of the Mediterranean, and 250 S. E. of Constantinople. Lat. 38, 21, N. Long. 33, 16, W.

COGNAC, or COIGNAC, the second city of all Angoumois, a part of the government of Saintonge, and of the former name, in France. It is delightfully situated on the river Charente. Here is a castle, in which Francis I. was born, and three convents. A council was holden in it in 1238. It is also noted for its fine brandy, which goes by the name of the place, 20 miles W. of Angoulesme. Lat. 45, 46, N. Long. 0, 29.

COHANZY, a river of W. Jersey, and, though small, is yet deep, and navigable for small craft. On it is a town of the same name, 10 or 12 miles up the river, containing about 80 families, who follow the fishery.

COHOR, or CHORE, a river in Cornwall, which runs into Mount's bay, near the mount.

COJA, a town of Coimbra, and province of Beira, in Portugal. It contains 800 inhabitants in one parish; but in its district are 6 parishes.

COIL-FIELD, a spot in Kyle, one of the subdivisions in Airshire, in Scotland, where, according to the Scottish writers, and traditionary accounts, a great battle was fought between Coilus, or Kylus, a British king, and Fergus I. king of Scotland: of this battle many monuments are still to be seen; the church near it is Coil-town-kirk, and the river near which it was won, that runs into the river Air, about four miles above the town of that name, is called Coil: but a lake not far from it, near which the Scotch were encamped, is called Lake Fergus. A trumpet of a crooked form has been dug up in the field of battle, and is still kept in the laird of Caprington's house, called also Coil-field, and used as a horn for calling his labourers together. Here also was fought another bloody battle.

COIMBRA, a jurisdiction called a Correição, in Beira, a province of Portugal; it consists of one city, namely, that of the same name; and 29 towns: the latter have their distinct lords.

COIMBRA, anciently Colimbria, or Conimbriga, a famous Roman colony, in the district of the same name above-mentioned, and is one of the finest cities in Portugal. It lies on the N. side of the river Mutida, now Mondego, over which is a stately stone-bridge, said to consist of 29 arches. It has lofty walls, and four gates, with towers, turrets, and stately buildings, particularly the royal palace, now unfrequented. It contains 11,900 inhabitants; besides the magnificent cathedral, which is richly adorned, it has 9 parish-churches, a house of mercy, an hospital, 18 colleges, and 9 convents; one of which latter consists of none but noblemen; it is called the monastery of St. Cruz, or Holy cross, and of the order of St. Augustine. It is a large structure, and richly endowed. The bishop, who is a suffragan to the metropolitan of Braga, has in his diocese 343 parishes divided into three archdeaconries, Vouga, Cea, and Penella. He is also lord and count of Arganil, and has an annual revenue of 40,000 crusades, or 6000l. sterling. The university was first founded at Lisbon by king Dennis, in 1291; but soon afterwards was removed hither. The number of students is said to be 2000, (others above 3000); a learned writer says, he was surprised at the Latin spoken in the disputations, it being a medley of Italian and Portuguese. The university buildings are stately. The tribunal do santo officio, or inquisition, founded in 1541, has very great privileges. This city is the capital of the jurisdiction, the seat of a provedor, corregidor, and juiz de fora. The old Coimbra stood in the site of the present Condeira Velha. Here lies buried some royal personages. It has been twice erected into a dukedom; and to its district belong 40 parishes. The peaches in the neighbourhood are particularly valued. It lies 96 miles N. of Lisbon. Lat. 40, 15. Long. 9, 12, W.

COISLIN, though a little place, gives the title of duke. It belongs to Upper Brittany; and is in the bishopric of Nantes.

COIRE, or CHUR, in Latin Curia Rhetorum, the capital of the community, called the League of the house of God, and of all the Grisons in Switzerland. It stands at the foot of two Alpine mountains, near the river Plessur, which, after turning some mills, and cleansing its streets, falls into the Rhine, half a league off, where the latter river begins to be navigable; a vast advantage to the trade of this place. It is a very ancient bishopric, whose prelate is a prince of the empire, and a Roman Catholic; his chapter consists of 24 canons, with handsome revenues. He has several estates and fiefs, not only here, but in Tirol, Alsace, and the valleys of the Valtaline, &c. His annual income is 1000l. sterling; others say 5000l. The inhabitants of his diocese are mostly Protestants. The upper part of the town is called the Court, whence the name of the place, where stand the cathedral, cloister, and close. The Catholics reside in this part of the town, and the Protestants in the other. Upon an eminence above the court, is the chapel of St. Lucius, the apostle of the Grisons, where mass is said on high festivals, though only a vault, 10 feet square, under a grotto cut in the rock. One of the two convents here has been turned into a college for teaching Latin, Greek, and logic; the revenues of the other are applied partly for the maintenance of this college, and partly for an hospital. This was an Imperial free city, till the year 1481, that it entered into a league with the Grisons. It has its own laws and government. Here are two fine churches, in one of which are organs: it is very populous, and the place where the three leagues hold their diets by turns with Ilantz and Davos: but those of the Caddee league commonly here. The town is situated in a very fruitful plain, with a vineyard on one side, producing good red and white wines. Here is plenty of all sorts of wild game, besides fruit. The number of inhabitants here were, in Dr. Burnet's time, between 4 and 5000. The snow on the high mountains about Coire seldom melts till May or June, and it usually falls again in September. It lies 53 miles S. of Constance. Lat. 46, 46, N. Long. 9, 35, E.

COKEIM. See COCHEIM.

COKENHAUSEN, a fortress of Livonia, on the river Dwina, and is subject to Russia. Lat. 57, 10, N. Long. 25, 5, E.

COKENNY, one of the towns lying thick on the coast, E. of Edinburgh, where they make very good salt, with which they drive a considerable trade, (besides supplying the neighbouring parts) to Norway, Hamburg, Bremen, the Baltic, and Holland.

COKER, a river of Lancashire, which runs into the Irish sea below Cokeholme.

COL. See COLL.

COLAN, an Indian town of Quito in Peru, in S. America; the inhabitants of which are fishermen, who go to sea upon round logs of wood, like a raft; and these are made of various forms, according to the uses they are designed for; sometimes carrying goods.

COL-D'AGNELLO, a passage from France into Italy, that leads from Guilietre to Chateau Dauphin.

COL-D'ARGENTIERE, a passage from France into Italy, between the marquissate of Saluce, and the county of Nice.

COL-DE-LIMON, a passage over the Alps, which leads from Sossello to Coni.

COL-DE-TEND, a passage over the Alps, between Piemont and the county of Nice.

COLBERG, or COLBURGH, anciently Colobrega, the capital of the duchy of Cassubia in Lower Pomerania, in Germany. It was regularly fortified by the Swedes, who took it in 1631, after a five month's siege: it has three great ditches, besides bastions and half-moons, though thus the circuit of it be extensive, yet it is not very populous, having been almost half-ruined by a fire and the wars. Here they make salt, considerable quantities of which are exported. This town came by the treaty of Munster from Ducal Pomerania, to the elector of Brandenburg, now king of Prussia. Its harbour, which is good, though something too narrow, is defended by a strong castle. Here a flout garrison is always kept, and the streets and houses which remain are neat. It stands at the mouth of the river Perfant, near the Baltic, 50 miles N. E. of Stetin. Lat. 54, 25, N. Long. 16, 14, E.

COLBROOK. *See COLNBROOK.

COLCHESTER, supposed to be the Iciani of the Romans, an old, large, populous, and partly well-built borough of Essex, with fine streets. It is pleasantly situated upon an eminence, on the river Coln, or Colchester-water, that encompasses it on the N. and E. sides, has 3 bridges over it, and is navigable, by small craft, up to the Hithe, where is a quay, and for ships of large burden to a place within 3 miles of it, where is a custom-house, and a little lower it may receive a royal navy. It is principally noted for the manufacture of baizes and says; for the support of which there is a corporation, called the governors of Dutch-baize-hall, and officers to examine it; and it is said to have returned 30,000*l.* a week, ready money, formerly, for those stuffs. Here is a guild, or, as they call it, a Moat-hall, to which joins the town-jail. The place is about 3 miles in compass, had anciently 15 and now 10 parish churches, 5 meeting-houses, of which 2 are for Quakers, besides a Dutch and French church. It is governed by a mayor, high-steward, recorder, or his deputy, 11 aldermen, a chamberlain, town-clerk, 18 assistants, and 18 common councilmen. It is a liberty of itself, which has 4 wards, 8 parishes within the walls, and 8 without, and extends along the river as far as Mersey-Island, and certain marks in the sea. It had anciently a castle, built by Edward the son of king Alfred, and walls all round, of which there are few marks left. It had once many religious houses, which had churches and chapels belonging to them; particularly an abbey, (whereof only part of the gate-house remains) whose abbots sat in parliament, and about 170 years ago it was the see of a bishop. From the abundance of coins found here, it is supposed to have been anciently a Roman colony; and there was a military way that led from hence by Brain-tree, Dunmow, &c. There is a particular corporation here for maintaining the poor, consisting of the mayor and aldermen, and 48 guardians. Here are 2 grammar schools and 2 charity schools, besides a workhouse for the poor. Such a vast quantity of sprats are caught, and consumed by the woollen manufacturers in those parts, that they are called the weavers beef of Colchester. In the town and its liberty are reckoned 40,000 people. The markets here are on Wednesday and Saturday, and the fairs Easter-Tuesday, June 24, July 23, and October 20.

This place is said to have given birth to Helena, the mother of Constantine the Great, and Lucius the first Christian king; and, in memory of the cross she found, the arms of the town is a cross entangled between four crowns. The founder of the abbey here built St. Mary Magdalen's hospital, on the S. E. side of the town, within its walls, for lepers. It must not be omitted, that this place is of special note for candying eringo roots; but much more for its oysters, which being taken at the mouth of the Colchester water, and about the sand which they call the Spits, are carried up to Wyvenhoe, where they are laid in beds, or pits, on the shore, to feed, as they call it, and then, being barrelled up, are brought to Colchester, from whence they are sent in great quantities to London, &c.

COLCHESTER, a town in Fairfax-county, Virginia, on the N. side of Occoquan-river, a branch of Potowmack river, 16 miles S. of Belhaven, and 12 N. E. of Dumfries.

COLCHIS, by oriental writers called Odische, the modern MINGRELIA, which see, and ARGO-NAUTS. It lies at the extremity of the Black sea, is a kingdom of Asiatic Turkey, was anciently of much larger extent, reaching from the frontiers of Iberia westward to the Palus Mæotis.

COLCURA, a river in Chili.

COLDERON, a town on the Coromandel coast, near Porto Novo.

COLDING, or KOLDING, a small town in the bailiwick of Koldinghuus, and diocese of Ripen, in North Jutland, Denmark; it stands on the river called Truethis, or Koldinger-aue, which falls into a bay, extending itself from the Little Belt for a mile hither. It lies low, between two mountains; is a pretty old place; has a parish-church, a rich hospital with a church of its own, a Latin school handsomely endowed, and a harbour choked up; so that ships do not resort very much to it. On the N. W. side of the town stands on an eminence the fine castle of Koldinghuus, anciently called Oernsborg, i. e. Eagle-castle. Among its greatest curiosities is the giant-tower, built by Christian IV. which is flat at top, and surrounded with a stone balcony, or range, at the four corners of which is a stone image, 7 feet high. This castle has a church of its own. The air here is reckoned very fine and healthy, wherefore king Christian III. made it his usual residence, and here he died in 1559. Here also in 1711, king Frederic IV. and all the royal family, took up their abode while the plague raged in Copenhagen. This town is principally remarkable for the toll paid at the bridge here over the Aue, for all foreign goods brought by carriages this way; also for black cattle and horses, that go into the duchy of Sleswick, or farther. The number of oxen alone, driven annually this way, is computed at 40,000 head, for each of which a rixdollar is paid. In a diet holden here in 1547, the privileges of the Hans-towns were confirmed: and in 1614 an assembly of all the bishops of this kingdom was holden at this place.

COLDINGHAM, a town of Berwickshire, or Merse, in Scotland. It lies on the coast; and had anciently an abbey, built by Edgar king of Scotland, in 1100; the remains of which are used for a parish-church. Its abbess, of the name of Ebba, upon a Danish invasion, it is said, cut off her upper lip, and slit her own nose, and persuaded all her nuns to do the like, in order to save themselves from the brutality of those barbarians. From her, a promontory not far off, is called St. Ebbe's, or vulgarly St. Tabbe's head; upon the point of which was anciently a strong fort, called Fast-castle, belonging to the earl of Hume, now in ruins. Near this town is Coldingham-moor, in which for about 8 miles is neither hedge nor tree, and but one house.

COLDITZ, a town in the electorate of Saxony, in Germany. It lies at the confluence of the Muldaw and Multa, has a fine castle, and a great number of linen weavers.

COLDSTREAM, or CALDSTREAM, a market-town of the Merse in Scotland, close by the river Tweed, where was anciently a monastery. The third battalion of Scottish life-guards take their name from this place, as here, it is said, they were first raised.

COLE, a river which runs through Worcester-shire and Warwickshire, and falls into the Blithe near Colehill.

COLERAIN, a town in the barony and county of the same name, or Londonderry, in the province of Ulster, in Ireland. It is situated on the river Banne, and sends two members to the Irish parliament.

COLESHILL, a small, but handsome market-town and thorough-fare, with good inns, in Warwickshire, 102 miles from London, stands on the ascent of a hill near the river Colne, over which it has a stone bridge. Market on Wednesday, and fairs on Shrove-Monday, May 6, and October 2. Here are two charity schools, and a piece of land in the parish, called Pater-noster-piece, given to encourage children to learn the Lord's prayer; for every house-keeper in the town, where is a child, sends it in turn, one at a time, every morning to the church, at the sound of a bell, where, kneeling, it says the Lord's prayer before the under-master, who rewards it with a penny.

COL-FIORITO, a fine castle or seat in the marquisate of Ancona: near it is an inland lake of the same name.

COLFORD, or COVERD, Gloucestershire, near Monmouth, and 124 miles from London, has a chapel of ease to Newland, a market on Tuesday, and fairs on June 20, and November 24, and a charity-school.

COLIGNY, a bourg and county of La France, a subdivision of the government of Burgundy, in France. It gives name to the ancient and celebrated house of Coligny-Chatillon.

COLIMA, a large and rich town in Panuco, and audience of Mexico, in New Spain, North America. It lies on the South sea, and near the confines of Xalisco, in the most fruitful valley of all Mexico, producing cocoa, cassia, &c. besides some gold. Near it is a volcano with two sharp peaks. In its neighbourhood grows the famous plant Olcacazan, which restores strength, and is a specific against poison.

COLL, one of the Western Islands, 10 miles long, and 2 broad. On the N. side it produces good barley and oats, has plenty of iron-ore, several rivers abounding with salmon, and a fresh water lake with eels and trouts. In this island are several rocks, hillocks, covered with heather or heath. It belongs to a branch of the Macleans, who with its inhabitants are Protestants, and they live here to a great age. It is reckoned more healthy than Tyre-ly, and no venomous creature is in either. It is observed, that in Coll are born more males than females; but in Tyre-ly more females than males: so that the one cannot do without the other. The cod and ling on the coasts of this island are larger than ordinary. On the S. E. side is a ledge of rocks, called the Carn of Coll, very fatal to shipping.

COLLARES, a town of Torres Vedras, a subdivision of Portuguese Estremadura, with 1200 inhabitants.

COLLE, a town belonging to the territory of Florence, in the great duchy of Tuscany, and is the residence of a bishop.

COLLERTON, or COLEOVERTON, Leicestershire, to the N. E. of Ashby de la Zouch, noted for a mineral well, and plenty of pit-coal, whose mines burnt for many years together, in the reign of Henry VIII.

COLLETON, (county of), a subdivision of North Carolina, in North America. After Granville county it is the next to the north. It is watered by the river Stono, which communicates by a cut with Wadmoolaw river. The N. E. part of this country is full of Indian settlements, and the Stono or other rivers form the island called Boon's island, a little below Charles-town, which is well planted and inhabited. Its principal rivers are North-Edistow and South-Edistow. For 2 or 3 miles up the latter, the plantations are thick on both sides; and they continue for 3 or 4 higher on the N. side: and the river branching out there, meets with North-Edistow. On the N. bank of the latter, about 12 miles from its mouth, stands the little town of Wilton, or New London. About 22 miles above this place, there is a fort built on the the North Edistow, called Edistow-fort. This county has 200 freeholders who send 10 members to the assembly; and within this precinct is one episcopal church.

COLLINGBURN-DUKE, a village in Wiltshire, about 10 miles S. of Marlborough, with a fair on December 11.

COLLOS, a town in the audience of Campo de Ourique, and province of Alentejo, in Portugal, with 600 inhabitants.

COLLUCIA, (Lago di), the ancient Acheron, or Lacus Acherusius, in the Terra di Lavora, a province of Naples, and Lower Division of Italy.

COLMAR, in Latin Columbaria, the capital of Upper Alsace, in France, and, next to Strasbourg, the second city of the whole province. It lies on the river Lanch, and near the Ill. It is now the seat of the sovereign council and intendency of Alsace, and of a collection. It was formerly a strong place, but Lewis XIV. dismantled it in 1673: but after the peace of Ryswick, he built new walls round it. Colmar is reckoned to contain above 7000 inhabitants, half of whom are Roman Catholics, and the other half Protestants. Here is a collegiate church. To the jurisdiction of Colmar belongs the little town of Heiligkreuz, with a castle, where the amtman or bailiff resides. It lies 30 miles S. of Strasbourg. Lat. 48, 6, N. Long. 7, 14, E.

COLMARS, a district in the provincial bailiwick of Digne, and Upper Provence, in the government of the latter name, in France.

Of the same denomination is a little town, the seat of a viguerie, collection, and bailiwick. Near it is a spring that sometimes rises, and sometimes falls. It lies on the confines of Piedmont, 18 miles N. W. of Glandèves. Lat. 44, 18, N. Long. 6, 25, E.

COLM-INCH, (St.), or INCHCOLM-ISLE, an island in the frith of Forth, towards the mouth of the river Forth. It has its name, as having been dedicated to St. Columba, and lies within two miles of Aberdour on the W. Here was formerly a famous abbey, now in ruins. Upon the alienation of abbey-lands, it was given to lord Down, which is the title of the eldest son of the Stuarts, earls of Murray.

COLNE, one of the rivers, which, with the Lech, the Churn, and the Isis, all rising in the Cotswold-hills, and joining together, form a full stream at Lechdale, in Gloucestershire, called the Thames, which there begins to be navigable for barges.

COLNE, a market-town in Lancashire, about 8 miles from Burnley, where several Roman coins have been dug up. Fairs, on May 12, and October 11.

VOL. I.—No. 35.

COLNBROOK, or COLEROOK, a market-town in Buckinghamshire, on the river Colne or Cole, which here divides itself into four channels, over which of each is a bridge; and therefore supposed to be the Pontes of the Itinerary, as there is no other place between Wallingford and London, with which the distance therein mentioned agrees. It is but a small place, yet has some large inns, which are its principal support. Its weekly market is on Wednesday, and fairs April 3, and May 3. Here is a charity school, and the chapel is still in being, said to have been founded by Edward III. Part of this town is in Middlesex.

COLOCHINA. See COLOQUINA.

COLOCSA, an archiepiscopal city in the district of Solth, and united county of the latter name, Pesth and Pilis, in the circle on this side the Danube, in Hungary Proper. It was formerly a very flourishing place, but declined, and like Buda was taken by the Turks. In 1602 it was pillaged by the Hungarians, and afterwards by the Turks. It lies 30 miles S. E. of Buda, and is now subject to the house of Austria. Lat. 46, 56, N. Long. 19, 40, E.

COLOGNA, a pretty town of the Vicentino [Paduano] one of the Venetian territories. It lies 30 miles S. W. of Padua. Lat. 45, 39, N. Long. 11, 39, E.

COLOGNE, an archbishopric, and one of the three spiritual electorates, in Germany, Mentz and Triers being the other two. It lies in the circle of the Lower Rhine, extending itself on the western bank of the river Rhine, between the duchy of Cleves on the N. the electorate of Triers, on the S. the duchy of Juliers and the Netherlands on the W. and the duchy of Berg parted from it by the Rhine on the E. It is a very fruitful country, producing, besides corn and other necessities, excellent wine. Though this electorate be upwards of 70 miles long, it is hardly any where above 7 or 8 in breadth. It lies between lat. 50, 33, N. and long. 51, 30, E.

They carry on a considerable trade in this country, of which the archbishop is supreme lord, as also of a pretty large tract in Westphalia. He is richer and more powerful than either of the other two ecclesiastical electors; being also bishop of Munster, Osnaburg, (this alternately with the house of Hanover) Paderbourn, and Hildesheim: also grand master of the Teutonic order. In most of these places he is absolute, except in some free imperial cities, which are sovereign states, and so many republics.

In the year 743 (755) it was raised from an episcopal to a metropolitan see; and in 1021, the dignity of elector was added to it. By virtue of the Golden Bull, he crowns the emperor, only 8 M. when when this ceremony is, to be performed in his own diocese, or that of his suffragans: but when this is performed elsewhere, the elector of Mentz does it with him. By the same bull, he has the second suffrage in the electoral college, immediately by turns after the elector of Triers. The chapter of Cologne consists of 40 canons, who are generally princes or counts of the empire, 24 seniors of which choose the archbishop, and may elect any of their colleagues, or be elected themselves to the vacant dignity. The elector cannot commence a war without the consent of the chapter, who may convene the estates in order to oppose him; the revenue of Cologne is said in time of peace, to bring in 130,000*l.* sterl. per annum, and that of his other territories nearly as much more; so that though the matricula of the empire or the assessment on the members of Germany, for men or money, does not make this elector's quota to exceed that of the elector of Mentz, yet he can maintain twice the number of men. In time of war, besides garrisons, he has guards of horse grenadiers, with partisans and carabines, 3 regiments of horse, the same of foot, and one of dragoons, between 1500 and 2000 men each.

COLOGNE, or COLONE, by the Germans called Keulen, in Latin Colonia Agrippina, or Colonia Ubiorum, was anciently the metropolis of Germania Secunda, and is now the capital of the electorate just mentioned, of the same name; it is a large and beautiful city, being very considerable, on account of its buildings, and great trade, particularly in Rhenish wine, besides other commodities of Germany, which, by means of the Rhine are conveyed thither, and then transported down its course to Holland. It is only a free imperial city, so far as it is governed by its own senate in all civil causes; but the elector has the cognizance of all criminal matters: and must confirm their privileges, upon their paying him homage: thus it is a kind of mixed government between him and the inhabitants, most of whom are Roman Catholics. Here besides the cathedral, which is indeed a very magnificent, though unfinished pile, are 10 collegiate, and 19 parochial churches; also 37 monasteries, with several hospitals. Here is a flourishing university, endowed with very large privileges by Pope Urban VI. under the jurisdiction of the city, where scholastic divinity, the canon and civil law, are principally taught. The walls of the city have 83 towers, and 3 deep ditches round them, being planted with fine rows of trees, and the roofs of the houses are slated.

Cologne is built in the form of a half-moon, and has one strong wall on the side next the Rhine, with out-works, half-moons, and ravelines; but might easily be taken by any who was master of the field.

Here are many Protestants, who are the principal traders. Among these the Lutherans have a church in the city; but the Calvinists are obliged to go as far as Mulheim, which is 2 miles on the other side of the Rhine, to perform divine worship. The town-house is a vast fabric, but in the gothic taste, with several rooms, in which are fine paintings, and antique arms; from its tower is a noble prospect of the city and country. The ships with which they trade to the Netherlands are large and round bellied. Several ecclesiastical councils have been holden here. The pope has commonly a nuncio at Cologne, in order to take care of his interests with the Popish electors. Opposite to the city, on the other side of the Rhine, is the village of Dentz, which see, where is a flying bridge of boats over the river, which brings the chapter in a revenue of 10,000 crowns annually. It can carry over a company of cavalry at a time. In the city the elector has 2 palaces, where the inhabitants will not suffer him to stay above 3 days, nor come with a great train, ever since a battle with the townsmen, gained over the elector who commonly resides at Bonne, 10 miles S. of Cologne. Here is a college with a fine dome; also a beautiful church, and large hall, decorated with paintings.

The church, dedicated to St. Ursula, who, with 1100 virgins, are said to have been martyred here, has considerable revenues, besides offerings and gifts. These belong to an abbess, and 6 canonesses, who must all be countesses. In the cordeliers church, is the tomb of the celebrated Scottish schoolman Johannes Duns Scotus. Among other tombs in the cathedral, are those of the 3 eastern wise men, called the 3 kings of Cologne. The Dutch always defend this city against the pretensions of its electors, as here is the magazine for their trade on the Rhine. The streets, except the principal ones, are dirty and ill-paved, and the houses very dark and thinly inhabited. Some companies of soldiers keep guard at the city gates; the number of which latter some say is 34, others but 20; namely, 11 towards the Rhine, and 9 on the land-side. Juniper shrubs growing in great numbers about this neighbourhood, from the berries they distil the best geneva or gin. This city is so famous, that it is commonly said, to this day, "Qui non vidit Coloniam, non vidit Germaniam." King Charles resided here the 2 last years before his restoration. It lies 45 miles E. of Maestricht. Lat. 50, 55, N. Long. 7, 10, E.

COLOMBOTZ, or GOLOMBOTZ, a strong castle in the sangiacate of Widin, a subdivision of Bulgaria. It stands upon a mountain, under which lies the fortified pass of Urania.

COLOMER,

C O

COLOMER, one of the Balearic islands of Spain, in the Mediterranean.

COLOMIA, or KOLOMYJA, a town in the district of Halicz, a subdivision of the palatinate of Lemberg. It is situated on the confines of Transylvania, 100 miles S. E. of Lemberg town. Lat. 47, 36, N. Long. 25, 15, E.

COLOMIERS, or COULOMIERS, in Latin Colomeriæ or Columbariæ, a town of Brie Champenoise, a small territory in the government of Champagne and Brie, in France. It lies on the river Morin, and has a very beautiful castle, or seat, the building of which cost, it is said, two millions. Having come by marriage with Catherine Gonzague to the duke of Longueville, of the house of Orleans, it is now called the palace of Longueville. Colomiers is the principal place of an election, and is situated in a fruitful country.

COLONE, a town of Belvedere, one of the subdivisions of the Morea; it lies on the sea-coast, and has a small harbour.

COLONIA, the strongest place in all Armenia, when possessed by the Romans.

COLONNA, (La,) a small place in the Campagna di Roma, 18 miles E. of Rome. Lat. 42, 15, N. Long. 13, 25, E.

COLONNA DI RUBICONE, (La,) an old Roman monument in the Romagna, and stands on the river Pisatello, which was anciently called Rubico, and was the frontier, or boundary, between Italy and Cisalpine Gaul, not far from Cesena, which see.

COLONSAY. See ORONSAY.

COLOPHON, an ancient city of Ionia, in Asiatic Turkey; famed for a temple and oracle, which latter was given not by a priestess as at Delphos, but by a priest. The Colophonians were such dexterous horsemens that victory always declared on the side they took; hence the proverbial expression, "Colophonem addere" meant the same, as making sure of success. It lays claim to the birth of Homer, and stands on the sea-coast at the further end of a bay in the Levant; but is now only a poor village and port, almost 30 miles S. of Smyrna.

COLOQUINA, corrupted by the Turks Kontiquina, and the ancient Gytheon; a town of the Morea; a province of European Turkey. The gulph to which it gives its name, was anciently called Sinus Laconicus; now Golfo de Colochina, it lies near the mouth of the famous river Eurotas, now Vasilipotamos. Here the Lacedæmonians kept their marine arsenal. The neighbouring country is full of hills and bogs, and has abundance of excellent springs.

COLOSS, or COLOSSUS, since Chonæ or Chonos, once a considerable city of Phrygia Major, a province of Asiatic Turkey. It lay on the S. side of the river Meander. The inhabitants to whom St. Paul wrote his epistle, received Christianity very early; but it was quickly after overturned by an earthquake, in the reign of Nero. It stood not far from Laodicea and Hierapolis.

COLOSWAR, a large and celebrated town of Transylvania, where the senates have their meetings. It is seated on the river Samos, 37 miles N. W. of Wessenberg, and 250 E. by S. of Vienna. Long. 22, 45, E. Lat. 46, 53, N.

COLOURI, the ancient Salamis, Pityussa, Seiras, and Cychria; an island in the Archipelago, and gulph of Ægina or Eugia, in European Turkey. It lies towards the bottom of the gulph near Umphialia, a promontory of Attica, and divided from the mainland by the strait of Perama, which is a mile over. It is about 50 miles in circuit; has a harbour on its W. side, 8 miles long, and 3 where broadest. At the bottom of its bay is a town of the same name, with about 400 poor inhabitants. In this island are 2 other villages, namely, Metropolis, on the S. side of the harbour, 5 or 6 miles off Colouri; and the other Abemelachi, in the neighbourhood of the ancient Salamis, as its ruins show. This island is famous for the important victory, which Themistocles and the Athenians, gained over the fleet of Xerxes, king of Persia. Ajax, who made such a figure at the siege of Troy, formerly governed this island. It lies 10 miles S. of Athens. Lat. 38, 10, N. Long. 24, 15, E.

COLRADO, one of the two most considerable rivers of California, in N. America; the other is Kio du Carmel.

COLSTERWORTH, a place in Northamptonshire, near Stretton, highly memorable for being the birth-place of that great philosopher and prodigy of human nature, the incomparable Sir Isaac Newton.

COLUBRERA, an island generally placed near the coasts of Spain, in the Mediterranean, and opposite to Cape Oropeza, about 20 miles.

COLUMBARA, (La,) a little island upon which is a fort that defends the neighbouring harbour of Trapani, in the Val di Mazara, a subdivision of the kingdom of Sicily.

COLUMBO, the capital of all the Dutch settlements in the island of Ceylon, and seated on the S. W. coast; and was taken from the Portuguese in 1656, with immense treasures in it, likewise military stores, and 24 light frigates in the harbour, after a siege of 7 months. The Dutch have contracted the town into one fourth of its ancient bounds, and have strongly fortified it with a wall and bastions, being about mile in length, and three quarters in breadth. It has 1 of the most commodious dious ports in the Indies, where small vessels may shelter in the S. W. monsoons. It was taken, with the other settlements, by the English, assisted by the natives, in January, 1782.

At the mouth of the haven is a castle, having the sea on the W. side, the city on the N. E. and besides a good counterscarpe, has several bulwarks, with 20 or 30 guns each. Here resides the governor with the merchants, officers, soldiers, &c. In the town are 2 hospitals, one of which are for Dutch orphans, also a Malabar school. On the out-side of the Dutch church-yard are sold silks, stuffs, and linen, by the Moors and Persians; and all sorts of fruit, dried fish, onions, sugar, and rice, by the Malabarians, &c. and other inhabitants. The Colomba root, which was named after this town, was brought here from the continent of America. The Dutch supply all India with it as well as Europe. Lat. 7, 0, N. Long. 78. 10, E.

COLUMB, a river in Devonshire, which falls into the Ex, a little below Columb-John.

COLUMB, (Magna,) Cornwall, 249, miles from London, and 13 miles from Bodmin, a great parish but a little town, with a market on Mondays and Thursdays, and fairs on Thursday after November 13, and Thursday in Midlent. It is called St. Columb, because its church was consecrated to St. Columba, and had 3 chantries. It is seated on the top of a hill, at the bottom of which is a river, which falls into the sea at a small distance from thence. It has about 130 houses badly built, but the streets are broad, and paved. The justices of the S. division of the county keep their sessions and hold a court here once in 3 weeks, for all actions under 40s. Near it is a hill with a rampart on the summit, and a causeway leading to it, which was an old Danish camp.

COLUMPTON, in Devonshire, 12 miles N. E. of Exeter, 164 miles W. from London, is the best town on the river Columb, whence it has its name, over which there is a bridge, and is a pretty handsome place. It is 67 miles S. W. of Bristol. The church has a curious rich gilded rood-loft, which is still preserved as an ornament, though the image worshipped in days of Popery is removed. It has a market on Saturday, and a fair on May-day and October 28; the woollen is its chief manufacture.

COLUMNIA, KOLOMNA, a small city in the circle and government of Moscow, and subdivision of the same name, in European Russia. It lies at the confluence of the rivers Moscow and Ocea; is the see of a bishop, lying 40 miles S. E. of Moscow. Lat. 56, 10, N. Long. 40, 15, E.

COLUMBUS, (St.) in the Erie or Highland language, called Y-Kollum-kyle, i. e. Malcolm or

C O

Columbus's sanctuary, cell, or sacred ground; anciently called also Iona; and by Bede Hy and Hu; one of the Western islands of Scotland, two miles in length, and about half that in breadth. It lies quite close to the isle of Mull, towards the W. See IONA and Y-COLUMB-KYLE.

COLYCUNDA, a small town on the river Gambia, noted for pretty women.

COM, a large city of the Persian-irak, a province of Persia, in Asia, situated in a plain, near a river side, and about half a league from a very high mountain. It has a moat and wall, with towers half ruined, and encompassed with gardens. Here are two good quays the whole length of the city, and at the E. extremity a fine bridge; also large bazars or market-places, several caravanseras or mosques, among which is a very sumptuous one for Fatima, Mahomet's daughter, and a considerable revenue belonging to it.

Com is a pleasant place, and well supplied with provisions of all sorts, and excellent fruit; of which last article, both dried and raw, especially pomegranates, large quantities are exported, also abundance of soap, sword-blades, and earthen-ware both white and varnished. The white sort in summer cools the water surprisingly and very suddenly, by transpiration. Here are a vast many deep cellars whence very cool water is fetched, a great refreshment in the hot season, which at Com and the adjacent parts is excessive. This city has suffered much from the Turks and the civil wars in Persia. It lies 100 miles N. of Ispahan. Lat. 34, 13, N. Long. 49, 20, E.

COMACCHIO, a small city in the duchy of Ferrara, situated in a lagune or marshy lake, between two arms of the Po, and is the residence of a bishop. It is an imperial fief, wherefore the emperor's troops took possession of it in 1708, and did not restore it till 1726, with the reservation of the rights of the emperor, empire, and Modena. It lies 14 miles N. of Ravenna. Lat. 45, 15, N. Long. 13, 12, E.

COMAGENE, a small part of Syria, in Asiatic Turkey, which Pompey the Great left to Antiochus XII. surnamed Asiaticus, after stripping him of all the rest.

COMANA, a port-town of Terra Firma, in S. America, situated on the Caracao coast, 35 miles E. of Laguara, and subject to Spain. Lat. 10, 16, N. Long. 64, 36, E.

COMANAGOTTA, another sea-port town of the last-mentioned province, and on the same coast, 12 miles W. of Comana, and subject to Spain.

COMANIA, a province of Asiatic Turkey, between the Caspian sea on the E. and the ridge of mountains which parts it from Circassia on the W. it

W. It has Asiatic Russia on the N. from which it is divided by the river Terki, and on the S. it is bounded by Georgia. Some parts of it, especially between the mountains on the N. W. side of the river Terki, are level, and if cultivated would prove fertile, as well as yield good pasture.

It is however but thinly inhabited, whence it is seldom seen that the same lands are sown 2 years together. Though here is no want of rain, the inhabitants convey water by means of canals upon their sown land, from the rivers that cross the country and rise from the southern mountains. One of these is called Coyazow, which is large, deep, and so slow, that its course is hardly discernible. The natives are called Camouchs. They live mostly at the foot of the mountains, where are abundance of fine springs; and as they subsist principally upon plunder, and are in continual apprehensions of one another, they immediately fly upon any danger to some of the mountains; and after some little time hiding there, return to their old trade. The Camouchs are Mahometans, and extremely superstitious. They live under the protection of the kings of Persia, who are fond of their friendship, as they keep the passes on that side, and prevent the Calmucks and others from making inroads; in return for which services, they are supplied by them with linen and silks, with which both the men and the women are clothed, like those of Lesser Tartary. They have only villages, where they live in sorry huts, and about 50 or 60 in a hamlet. They feed chiefly on the milk of their cattle, spontaneous fruits, honey, and rice, the latter from Persia; and sometimes on their cattle and such game as they kill.

COMASCO, or territory and county of Como, in the duchy of Milan, derives its name from the city of Como, and is styled in Latin, Comensis Ager. It is situated between the Bergamese, the Grisons, and the Valteline, and the 4 Italian bailiwicks belonging to Switzerland. It is divided into 2 parts, the district of Como on the N. and the territory of Como.

COMBENELY, a river in Caermarthenshire, which falls into the Lougher, or Logher, against Elandilo-Talabunt.

COMBER, or COMERER, in the county of Down, and province of Ulster, in Ireland, is seated on the N. W. end of the lake of Strangford.

COMBERMERE, a lake in Cheshire, on the borders of Shropshire.

COMB-MARTIN, in Devonshire, on the Bristol-Channel, 7 miles from Ilfracomb, 10 miles from Barnstaple, and 181 miles from London; seated on the Severn sea, where it has an inlet which runs through the town. It is but a mean place. Here is a cove for the landing of boats. The adjacent soil not only produces plenty of the best hemp in the county, but has been famous for mines of tin and lead; the latter of which being found in the reign of Edward I. to have some veins of silver, 337 men were brought from Derbyshire to work them; and the produce was of great service to king Edward III. in his war with France. Nevertheless, they were neglected till the reign of queen Elizabeth. when Sir Bevis Bulmer, a virtuoso in refining metals, got great quantities of silver from them. A new addit has been dug here, which cost 5000l. but the mines have not been wrought lately. Market on Saturday, and fair on Whit-Monday.

COMB, (St. Nicholas,) a village in Somersetshire, with 1 fair on December 16, for bullocks, horses, and sheep.

COMETAU, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Saltz, with a handsome town-house. It was taken by storm in 1421, and all the inhabitants, men, women, and children, were put to the sword. It is seated on a fertile plain, 12 miles N. W. of Saltz, and 60 N. W. of Prague. Long. 13, 25, E. Lat. 50, 30, N.

COMBWELL, in Kent, has a fair on St. Mary Magdalen's day, and the day after.

COMENGES, or COMMINGES, in Latin, Convenæ, a county and subdivision of Armagnac. It is 18 leagues in length, and about 6 in breadth. In it are good marble quarries. It is subdivided into Upper and Lower Comenges. The Upper Comenges has a cold air, on account of the mountains on which it lies. Lower Comenges lies in a plain, and therefore enjoys a warmer air than the other.

Of the same name is one of the dioceses of Upper Languedoc, has 11 parishes lie in this province, and are called Little Comenges; though the territory so called properly belongs to the government of Guyenne.

COMIN, or COMINO, anciently Hephæstia, an island in the Mediterranean. It lies between Malta and Gozo. Lat. 35, 52, N. Long. 14, 15, E.

It is 5000 paces in circuit, and is pretty fruitful, having a fort that defends the strait between it and Malta, and lies opposite to Fort Rosso, in the latter island. Here also is a church, from which the neighbouring harbour Cala di St. Maria has its name.

COMINES, a town in the quarter and castellany of Lisle, in Flanders; divided by the Lys into 2 parts; of which that lying towards the city of Lisle belongs, by the treaty of Utrecht, to the crown of France; but that towards the left-hand, to the house of Austria. The place has been dismantled.

C O
dismantled. In it is a collegiate church. Lat. 50, 39, N. Long. 3, 12, E.

COMMANOES, one of the small Virgin isles, situated to N. N. E. of Tortula. Long. 63. Lat. 18, 25.

COMMENDA, the name of a petty kingdom of Guinea Proper, in Africa, where the Dutch have a strong fort, called Vreden-burgh, built in 1688.

About a musket-shot or two from it the English have also a fort called Commenda; which is the largest and strongest belonging to them on the gold coast, except Cape-coast-Castle. It has about 21 pieces of cannon mounted; though there are ports for as many more.

COMMENWINE, a river which falls into the Surinam in N. America; the mouth of which is defended by Sommeswelt fort, built by the Dutch.

COMMERCH, a river in Brecknockshire, that falls into the Irven at Langamarch.

COMO, (lake,) called by the Latin poets Larius Lacus, hath its Italian name from the city near which it stands, and extends about 30 miles N. from it; but its breadth where widest is not above 5, and is as it were hemmed in between two mountains on each side.

COMO, (city,) in Latin, Comum and Novocomum, in the territory of Comasco, is said to have been built by the Gauls in their invasion of Italy under Brennus, and was a considerable place in Cisalpine Gaul, and in the Lombardic kingdom, but suffered much from foreign and neighbouring invaders, and hath passed through many masters, Italian, French, German, and Spanish. It is a very considerable city still, large, well-built, and well-inhabited, and is an episcopal see under that of Milan, and in the patriarchate of Aquileia. Its cathedral, palace, and other public buildings, are very grand and rich, the streets and houses are neat and beautiful; and the place full of ancient inscriptions; and gave birth to the younger Pliny, and other famous men. We must distinguish between the Como Vecchio and Novo, or Old and New Como, for they lie a mile or two distant from each other. They are both situate on the side of the lake, and not above 6 miles from the borders of Switzerland, about 25 N. of Milan, and as many from Burgamo to the W.

COMONAVA, a town of Macedonia, a province of Turkey, in Europe, in the neighbourhood of which is a Greek convent.

COMORA-ISLANDS, lie between the N. end of the island of Madagascar, and the coast of Zanguebar, from 10 to 15 degrees of S. latitude. Authors differ greatly with regard to their number, some speaking of 3, others of 5, and some of 8 of these islands. They all abound in horned cattle, sheep, hogs, and a variety of fruits common in warm countries. They are said also to produce a kind of rice which turns of a violet colour when boiled. The most remarkable of them, and which the Europeans are best acquainted with, is the island of Johanna. See that article.

COMORIN, (Cape,) the most southern promontory of the Hither India and Malabar coast, in Asia. It lies N. W. of the island of Ceylon. Lat. 7, 56, N. Long. 78, 10, E.

The variation of the compass here, is said to be 14 degrees and a half. The inhabitants are continually at war with their neighbours, the Malabars, and poison their arrows.

COMORRA, a province of the Farther Circle of the Danube, in Lower-Hungary. It is inhabited by Hungarians, Germans, and Bohemian slaves, with some few Rascians.

In this province is a royal free-town of the same name, on the E. extremity of the island of Schutt, formed between the Danube and Waag, both which rivers unite here. In it is the courthouse of the county, a college, and an academy. Also near it is an impregnable fortress, which is surrounded on the W. by a deep ditch full of water, on the S. and N. by the two rivers above-mentioned, whose streams join towards the S. The Turks never took it, though besieged and attacked by them. It was totally destroyed by an earthquake on June 28, 1763. Lat. 48, 21, N. Long. 18, 26, E.

COMPIEGNE, in Latin Compendium, an old town of Le Valois, in the second substadtholdership, and government of the Isle of France. It is situated on the Oise, is the seat of an election, and has a palace. Here are two parochial churches, a college, and alms-house. A governor resides here, and the jurisdiction is divided between the crown and the abbey. Its principal trade consists in grain, timber, and wool. About 6 ecclesiastical councils have been held here. In 1430 the English took the maid of Orleans prisoner at this place, and hither the elector of Bavaria retired in 1709. It lies 49 miles N. E. of Paris. Lat. 49, 32, N. Long. 3, 15, E.

COMPOSTELLA, or St. JAGO DE COMPOSTELLA, the capital of Galicia, a province of Spain, and the see of an archbishop. It lies between the rivers Tamra and Ulla (Sar and Sarella) in a delightful plain, which is surrounded with moderately high rocks, which serve as a defence to it against the noxious winds that come from the mountains: yet the air here is moist. In Compostella are several good streets, fine squares, a strong castle, castle, and several convents of both sexes. Among the hospitals is a magnificent one for the reception of pilgrims, who come to pay their devotion to St. Jago, and beautiful churches; among which the cathedral, both magnificent and rich, is particularly remarkable; as in it is preserved the supposed body of the apostle James the Less, the patron of all Spain, which is said to have been discovered in the 9th century by a divine revelation. The city is walled, and has 7 gates. The archbishop has 12 suffragans, 1803 parishes, 5 collegiate churches, 5 archpriestships, and 1 vicarage; his annual revenue amounts to 60,000 ducats. The bishopric, removed thither in the year 900, was raised to a metropolitan see, in 1120. The order of St. Jago, or St. James, takes its name from this city, and a certain number of the knights reside here. They possess 87 commanderies, amounting to 170,000 ducats per annum; and none are admitted into their order, but such as prove their nobility for two generations, and that they are descended from the ancient Gothic Christians, and their blood unmixed with that of the new Christians; namely those converted from Jews or Moors. Its university, consisting of four magnificent colleges, was founded in 1532. And at this place was also a court of inquisition.

The cupola of St. James's church is of vast height and extent, with four stately towers. The tabernacle, or repository, is the finest, it is said, in all the world, being silver gilt, with the effigies of St. James, enriched with ornaments, and of the most curious workmanship. This city has a good trade, and is a flourishing place. It lies 56 miles E. of Cape Finisterre, and 305 N. W. of Madrid. Lat. 42, 58, N. Long. 9, 52, W.

COMPOSTELLA, the most considerable city, though not the capital, of the province of Xalisco, and audience of Guadalaxara, in New Spain. It is situated near the South sea, about 30 miles N. of it. This is a rich town, and has several mines of silver at St. Pecaque, in its neighbourhood, where the Spaniards keep many hundred slaves at work in them. But the city is in a bad situation, the soil being so barren, that there is no pasture for cattle, nor the necessary materials for building houses; and the air is so hot and moist, that it breeds several insects. The Spaniards built Compostella in 1531, and made it a bishop's see; but because of its bad air, it was transferred to Guadalaxara. The Spaniards are not very numerous throughout this whole audience, except in the two cities of Guadalaxara and Compostella. The Mestizos, indeed, made a considerable figure both in regard of number and estate. But the bulk of the people are the natives. Lat. 21, 4. Long. 107, 0.

COMPREDON, a pretty well fortified town of Catalonia, in Spain, on an eminence, upon the river Ter, and in the middle of the place is a citadel. The French besieged and took it in the year 1698.

CONA, one of the small islands, lying opposite to the province of New Andalusia, in the Terra Firma, North America.

CONAUGHT, or CONNAUGHT, one of the 4 provinces of the kingdom of Ireland: it is parted from Leinster on the E. by the river Shannon, which also separates it from Munster on the S. and S. E. it has the province of Ulster, and a part of the Western ocean on the N. and N. W. and the main ocean on the W. It is 130 miles in length from Cape Lean, or Loop-head, the most southerly point of Thomond, to the northern parts of Letrim, and about 84 in breadth, from the eastern points of Letrim to Black-harbour, in the west parts of Mayo. It is about 500 miles in circuit; but reckoning the creeks and windings of the bays, it would seem to be a great deal more. It contains an area of 6072 square miles. It was formerly a distinct kingdom. In some places this province is fruitful and verdant; but in others boggy and woody, in which latter the air is not so clear. It contains 6 counties; namely, Letrim, Flego, Mayo, Roscommon, Galway, and Clare, or Thomond. The soil abounds with cattle, deer, hawks, and honey. On the coast are several convenient bays and creeks for navigation. The Shannon is its principal river; the others besides are the Moy, Suck, Drogha, and Gyll. Camden thinks, the S. part of this county was inhabited by the Concani, descendants from the Ganani of Spain, originally Scythians. In this province is 1 archbishopric, 5 bishoprics, 7 market-towns, 8 marts or places of trade, 12 boroughs that return members to parliament, 24 old castles, besides modern fortresses, and 366 parishes.

CONCA, a borough of the Campagna di Roma, in the Middle Division of Italy. It is situated on a small inland lake.

CONCALE BAY, is on the coast of France, in Brittany, where the English forces landed in June 1758, in order to go to St. Maloe's, which they did, and burnt all the ships in that harbour, which were above 100, of all sorts. Concale is the town which gives name to the bay, and is famous for oysters. It is 18 miles E. of St. Maloe's, and 197 W. of Paris. Long. 1, 47, W. Lat. 48, 41, N.

CONCARNEAU, CONQUERNEAU, or CONEQUE, a town in the bishopric of Quimper and Lower Brittany, in the government of the latter name, in France: it lies in a bay, where the sea, which surrounds it, forms its port by a small trenchment trenchment that leaves but a very narrow entrance for vessels to come in at, which are here secured from all storms by the neighbouring mountains. This place has a strong castle to defend it. Concarneau is 4 leagues from Quimper-Corentin to the S. E. and 28 N. W. of Port Louis. Lat. 47, 54, N. Long. 3, 50, W.

CONCEPTION, (city of), in the kingdom of Chili, South America. It lies on the S. W. shore of a fine bay in the Pacific ocean, on an uneven sandy ground and small declivity, with a little river running through it. Since its destruction in the dreadful earthquake and inundation of the sea, in the year 1730, all the houses have been built low, of topias, mud-walls, or unburnt bricks, but tiled. The churches and convents are small and mean; but the Jesuits college is of tolerable architecture. It is governed by a corregidor, nominated by the king of Spain, and is dependent on Santiago as its capital. Here are all the courts and offices, usual in the cities of South America. It is an episcopal see, and a suffragan of Lima. Its jurisdiction extends from the river Maule, on the coast N. of this city, as far as Cape Lavapies. It has few villages; but the country is full of seats, farms and cottages. The women are particularly famous for their skill in horsemanship; and the peasants surprisingly dexterous in managing the noose, which they throw over man or beast at full speed, and never fail, and the lance, which are their chief arms. The great affinity between this climate and that of Spain is evident from its productions, though there is a remarkable difference with regard to their goodness and plenty in this country. Wheat here yields a hundred-fold; it being common for one stem to bear 5 or 6, sometimes 34 ears; but for want of a market, great part of this country lies fallow, and they sow only what is wanted for home-consumption. Their vines are also exuberant. The principal use made of their rich lands, is for fattening oxen, goats, or sheep. The commerce of Conception is at a very low ebb, from the thinness of its inhabitants, consisting chiefly in provisions, wines, &c. and this in very small quantity. Their exports are tallow, grassa, cordova, and tanned leather, excellent butter, and dried fruit. The goods brought hither in exchange, are woollen stuffs from Quito and Europe, with iron and mercury. Here is a good harbour. Conception lies 152 miles S. of St. Jago. According to an observation made by M. Ulloa at Talcaguano, which lies exactly E. and W. with this city, its lat. is 36, 43, S. Long. 72, 35, W. from London.

CONCEPTION-BAY, in the neighbourhood of the city last-mentioned of the same name, besides its excellent bottom, its length from N. to

S. is nearly 3 leagues and a half, and its breadth from E. to W. almost 3 leagues, being the distance between the harbour of Talcaguano, and the Cirillo Virde, or little green mountain near the city; from whence its breadth is contracted by the island of Quiriquina, which lying in the mouth of it, forms two entrances, of which that on the E. side is the safest, being 2 miles in breadth. The W. entrance is between the island and Talcaguano-point, and near half a league broad. The principal entrance has 30 fathoms water, decreasing to 11 and 10, till within about a mile of the shore. The western channel has the same depth of water, and in the middle of the entrance between rocks projecting about a quarter of a league from Talcaguano-point and Quiriquina. Within the bay are three roads or harbours, in one of which only ships can ride safe, being no where else sheltered from the wind; and this is about half a league from the land, in about 12 fathoms water.

Two rivers empty themselves into this bay, one of which passing through Conception, has its name; the other is called St. Pedro. The country round the bay, within 4 or 5 leagues of the shore, has a singular curiosity, that at the depth of half, or three-quarters of a yard below the surface, is a stratum of shells of different kinds, two or three toises thick; and in some places more, without any intermixture of earth, or other heterogeneous substance; and that not only in the plains, but in the mountains, and the very same with the shells found in the bay, and neighbouring places: a plain proof of the universality of the deluge! The seas on these coasts abound with fish, also whales, tunny-fish, and sea-wolves.

CONCEPTION, the capital of Veragua, a province of Guatimala, in Mexico, or New Spain, in South America. It is not a large place, but is the seat of the governor, and others of the king of Spain's officers. It is situated near the end of a bay, which runs into the North sea, and not far from Panama, 40 leagues W. from Nombre de Dios, and 48 N. of Santa Fé.

CONCHEE. See MALO, St.

CONCHES, a town and marquise of Compagne de St. André, a subdivision of Compagne, in Upper Normandy, and government of the latter name, in France. It is the seat of an election, viscounty, bailiwick, marshalsea, mayory, policy, and salt-granary. It has one abbey, three parishes, and an hospital. It belongs to the county of Evreux.

CONCHUCOS, a jurisdiction in the empire of Peru, in South America, under the archbishop of Lima; it begins 40 leagues N. N. E. of the metropolis, and runs along the center of the Cordillera. It produces fruits, grains, and affords extensive extensive pasture for cattle of all kinds. Several branches of the woollen manufacture are carried on here, which constitute its greatest commerce with the other provinces.

CONCORD, a small town near Boston, in New England, in the province of Massachusetts-Bay, and county of Middlesex, near which was the first attack of the king's troops on April 10, 1775. It is situated on the river Concord, over which it has a bridge.

CONCORDIA, a town in the duchy of Mirandola, in the Upper Division of Italy. It is situated on the Secchia, and gives title of marquis. It lies 18 miles S. E. of Mantua. Lat. 45, 15, N. Long. 11, 29, E.

CONCORDIA, though now a small place, was formerly a considerable city, till destroyed by Attila. It lies in Patria del Friuli, one of the Venetian territories, not far from Porto Gruaro.

CONCORSALT, or CONCRESSANT, the former is the ancient name; in Latin Concreffanum, or Concordiæ saltus; a small town, resembling a bourg, in Upper Berry, and government of the latter name, in France. It lies on the little river Saudre, 4 leagues from the Loire on the W. and 26 miles N. of Bourges. Lat. 47, 36, N. Long. 2, 46, E.

CONDA, one of the many rivers which join their streams with the Ob, in Asiatic Russia.

CONDE, a small city of French Hainault, and government of Flanders, near the confluence of the rivers Haine and Scheld. Its fortifications have been considerably improved by the French, since they took the place in 1676; and it was yielded to them by the treaty of Nimeguen in 1678. By means of sluices, the whole neighbouring country can be laid under water. It gives title of prince to a branch of the Bourbon family, and is the seat of a collection, has a collegiate church, the chapter of which consists of 26 prebendaries. Here is a military governor, king's lieutenant, major, aid-major, and a captain of the gates. It lies 13 miles W. of Mons. Lat. 50, 36, N. Long. 3, 48, E.

CONDE, a town in Bocage, a little territory, belonging to Lower Normandy, in the government of the latter name, on the river Nereaux or Noireaux. It has a mayory, two parochial churches, and an hospital, and belongs to the house of Matignon.

CONDECEDO, (Cape of), a promontory of Jucatan, in North America. Lat. 21, 15, N. Long. 93, 26, W.

CONDEVAL, a large town on the frontiers of Balaguete, a province of Decan, in the peninsula intra Gangem and Mogul empire, in Asia. Here, it is said, the best sword-blades are made in all India.

CONDER, a river in Lancashire, which empties itself into the Irish sea, at Ashton-park.

CONDESUYOS, (de Arequipa), a jurisdiction in the diocese of the latter name, and audience of Lima, in South America. It lies N. of Arequipa, and 30 leagues distant from that city. It extends about 30 leagues, with different temperature of air, producing grain and fruit. Here is bred the wild cochineal, which is taken off by the provinces where the woollen manufactures flourish. From 4 ounces of cochineal, pulverized and mixed with 12 of violet maize, are formed square cakes, weighing 4 ounces, which sell for a dollar per pound. In this country are gold and silver mines still worked, though not with equal care as formerly.

CONDEVIR, a large city of Golconda, in India, within the Ganges. It has a castle and double moat, faced and paved with free-stone. From hence to Condapoly, is a road inclosed with walls and towers. On the E. side of this city is a mountain, about a league in circuit, surrounded with walls; within which are three fortresses and half-moons. In this city the king of Golconda keeps his diamonds and treasure.

CONDOM, the capital of Condomois, a subdivision of Gascony, in France. It lies on the river Baïse, is the seat of a provincial court, and bailiwick; also the see of a bishop, who is a suffragan to the archbishop of Bourdeaux; has a diocese of 140 parishes, and 80 chapels of ease, with an annual income of 50,000 livres, and he pays a tax of 2500 florins to the court of Rome. Besides the cathedral, which was once an abbey of Benedictines, but secularized, are two other churches, and five convents. Here is but very little trade: and the place suffered considerably in the religious wars. It lies 14 miles S. W. of Agen. Lat. 43, 55, N. Long. 1, 27, E.

CONDOMA, a river of Asiatic Russia, which falls into the Ob on the left hand, and opposite to the town of Kutsnezk.

CONDORA, or CONDIESKI, a large province in the eastern part of European Russia, between the Dwina on the W. Jugoria on the N. Petzora on the E. and Permia on the S. It gives title of duchy; but is boggy, woody, and mountainous. Ancient maps place this province between the White sea and Siberia, which is the country of the Samoiedes; and they inclose it within the river Ob, or Umar. Its capital Wereatoura lies in its northern part, under lat. 66, N.

CONDORÉ, or PULO CONDORÉ, a small, but fruitful island, of the Indian ocean, in Asia. It has a convenient harbour; from which consideration the English East-India company were induced to make a settlement upon it in 1702. But in 1705, most of their factors and servants were assassinated by the Cochin Chinese, and the rest driven out. It lies in lat. 9, 39, N. Long. 107, 5, E.

CONDRIEUX, a town of Upper Forez, in the government of Lyonnois, on the Rhone, and has one parish-church, and two convents.

CONEY-ISLAND, a small island in Bantry-Bay, on which horses fatten very fast in spring.

CONFLANS, a fine castle in the government of the Isle of France, and neighbourhood of Paris, near the confluence of the Seine and Marne, belonging to the archbishop of that capital. Of the same name is a valley, formerly a county, but now one of the vigueries, or bailiwicks, of the government of Roussillon, in France. It is surrounded by the Pyrenean mountains, and the river Tec runs through it. In 1659 it was annexed to Roussillon, when this province was ceded to that crown by the famous treaty of the Pyrenees.

CONGLETON, a market-town of Cheshire, though ancient, is a handsome place, and on the borders of Staffordshire. The middle of the town is watered by the brook Howty, the E. side by the Daningshow, and the N. by the Dan. It is governed by a mayor and 6 aldermen. It has nothing but a chapel of ease, the church, a stately structure, being near two miles distant. Its manufactory is the making of leather gloves, but the most considerable is silk, there being a large silk mill lately erected here by some Turkey merchants, which employs 700 hands. Its market is on Saturday; and fairs, Thursday before Shrove-tide, May 12, July 5, and July 12.

CONGO, a kingdom of Africa, bounded on the N. by the river Zair, or Zarah, which divides it from Loanga; on the S. by the river Danda, which separates it from Angola; on the E. by the kingdoms of Fungono and Metamba, and the burnt mountains of the Sun, those of crystal or salt-petre and silver, or (according to Anthony Cavazzi, a late traveller into those parts) by the mountains of Coanza Berbela, and the great mountain of Chilandia or Aquilonda; and on the W. by that part of the Atlantic ocean called the Ethiopic sea, or the sea of Congo. According to these limits, Congo Proper extends about 3 degrees from N. to S. lying between 6 and 9 S. latitude; but widens in its breadth inland, by the course of the rivers Zair, which runs winding above 2 degrees more to the N. Its length from E. to W. is very uncertain, as no observations have been taken of the exact situation of those mountains which bound it.

The history of this kingdom affords but few interesting particulars. Before its discovery by the Portuguese, the history is altogether uncertain and fabulous, as the inhabitants were totally unacquainted with letters and learning. So little were they acquainted with chronology, that it is said they did not even distinguish between day and night; much less could they compute their time by moons or years; and therefore could remember past transactions only by saying they happened in such a king's reign.

The country was discovered by the Portuguese in 1484. The discoverer was named Diego Cam, an expert and bold sailor. He was very well received by the natives, and sent some of his men with presents to the king, but they being detained by unexpected accidents beyond the promised time of their return, Cam was obliged to sail away without them, and took with him 4 young Congoes, as hostages for the safety of his countrymen. These he taught the Portuguese language, in which they made such progress that king John was highly pleased, and sent them back next year to Congo with rich presents; charging them to exhort their monarch, in his name, to become a convert to the Christian religion, and to permit it to be propagated through his dominions. A firm alliance was concluded between the two monarchs, which continues to this day, though not without some interruptions, to which the Portuguese themselves have given occasion more than the natives.

Any particular account we have of this kingdom, rests almost entirely on the credit of Anthony Cavazzi, the traveller above-mentioned. He was a capuchin-friar, a native of the duchy of Modena, and was sent missionary into those parts, de propagandi fide, in the year 1654, and arrived at Congo the same year. During his stay there, his zeal to make converts, made him travel through all these different kingdoms; and the credit he gained, as well as the great employments he was entrusted with, gave him an opportunity of informing himself of every thing relating to them with great exactness. The extent and situation, however, he could not ascertain, for want of instruments; nor hath this defect been since supplied. According to him, the dominions of Congo extended a great deal farther E. and S. before the introduction of Christianity than afterwards, a great number of the states that were under the Congoes monarchs, either as subjects, or tributary, having withdrawn their allegiance out of dislike to them on that account. Not content with opposing the officers and troops, that came annually to raise the tribute imposed by the king, they made such frequent and powerful incursions into his dominions, that they obliged him to draw his forces nearer the centre of Congo, to prevent an invasion; by which means the kingdom, from an extent of 600 leagues, was reduced to less than one half.

Congo Proper, being situated within the torrid zone, is liable to excessive heats; as it lies on the S. side of the equinoctial, the seasons are of course, opposite to ours. They reckon only 2 principal seasons, the summer and winter; the former begins in October, and continues till February or March; during which time the sun's rays dart with such force, that the atmosphere appears to an European to be in a flame. The excessive heat, however, is mitigated by the equal length of the days and nights, as well as by the winds, breezes, rains, and dews. The winter takes up the other part of the year; and is said by the natives to be proportionably cold, though to an European it would appear hot. These 2 seasons they divide into 6 lesser ones, viz. Masfanza, Neasu, Ecundi, Quitombo, Quibiso, and Quibangala.

Masfanza begins with the month of October, which is the beginning of their spring. The rains begin to fall at that time, and continue during the next 2, and sometimes 3 months. When they do so, the low lands are generally overflowed by the extraordinary floods, and all their corn carried off. A disaster of this kind is commonly followed by a famine; for the lazy inhabitants take no care to lay up any provisions, although such misfortunes happen very frequently. This first season they reckon commences at the time the plants begin to spring.

The second season, Neasu, begins about the end of January, when the produce of their lands are arrived at its full height, and wants but a few days of being ripened for harvest. Their first-crop is no sooner gathered in, than they sow their fields afresh, their land commonly yielding them two harvests.

The third and fourth seasons, called Ecundi, and Quitombo are frequently blended together towards the middle of March, when the more gentle rains begins to fall, and continue to do so till the month of May. These two seasons are distinguished by the greater or lesser quantity of rain that falls during that interval. During the rest of the time, the air is either very clear, hot, and dry; or the clouds being overcharged with electric matter, burst out into the most terrible thunders and lightnings, without yielding the least drop of rain, though they seem loaded with it.

The 2 last, viz. the Quibiso and Quibangala, make up their short winter, which consists not in frost or snow, but in dry, blasting winds, which strip the earth of all its verdure, till the next Masfanza begins to restore them to their former bloom.

They now divide their year into 12 lunar months, and begin it in September. They have also weeks consisting of 4 days only, the last of which is their sabbath; and on it they religiously abstain from every kind of work. This practice, the compilers of the Universal History conjecture to have arisen from the extreme laziness for which this people, and indeed all the African nations, are so remarkable. To this shameful indolence also is to be ascribed the little produce they reap from their lands, while the Portuguese settled among them, who are at more pains in the cultivation of theirs, enjoy all manner of plenty. The natives, however, had rather run the risk of the most terrible famines, than be at the tenth part of the labour they see the Portuguese take. They seem to think it below them to use any other exercises than those of dancing, leaping, hunting, shooting, &c. the rest of their time they spend in smoking, and downright idleness, committing the laborious part of their household affairs to their slaves, or, in want of them, to their wives.

Nothing is more common than to see these poor creatures toiling in the fields and woods, with a child tied to their backs, and fainting under their excessive labour and heavy burdens, or (which is still worse,) hunger and thirst. What is yet more surprisingly shameful is, that though they have plenty of domestic animals, which they might easily make use of for cultivating their grounds, and for other laborious services, and though they see the Portuguese do it every day to great advantage, yet they will rather see their tender females sink under their toil and labour, than be at the trouble of breeding up any of these useful creatures to their assistance.

The ground produces variety of grain, but no corn or rice, except what is cultivated by the Portuguese. The maize, or Indian wheat, grows very strong, and is well laden. This, being well ground, they make into bread, or boil with water into a kind of pap. Of this they have 4 kinds; 1 of which resembling what we call French wheat, is produced in plenty, and makes some amends for the want of industry in the people. They cultivate also a variety of the pease and bean kind; but what they chiefly live upon, as most suitable to their lazy disposition, is a kind of nut, like our filberds, which fall to the ground of themselves, and are to be found every where; every nut that falls to the ground, producing a new shrub next year. They have scarcely any fruit-trees, but what have been brought thither by the Portuguese. They have various sorts of palm-trees, useful both by their fruit, leaves, and their juice, which is easily converted into wine; also by affording a kind of oil with which they dress their victuals, though the Europeans use it only to burn in their lamps. They have also a vast number of plants and shrubs, which it would be impossible to describe or enumerate. Wheat is the only thing that the ground will not produce. It pushes forth indeed, the straw and the ear; the former of which grows high enough, we are told, to hide a man on horseback, but the latter is empty, without 1 grain fit for use.

Father Labat, however, who had lived a considerable time in some of the American islands, where he had observed the same thing, tells us, that he had the curiosity to examine these ears more carefully, and had found some few grains; and that, having having sowed them afresh, they produced very long ears, full of large heavy grain. Whence he conjectures, that if the Portuguese had tried the same experiment in their African settlements, it might perhaps have been attended with the same success.

In the low lands the grass grows so high, rank, and thick, that it becomes one of the most dangerous receptacles for wild beasts, serpents, and other venomous insects; on this account travelling is exceedingly hazardous, as they have few beaten roads in the whole country, and travellers are obliged to march over it through vast plains, in continual danger of being devoured or stung to death; to say nothing of the many diseases produced by the unwholesome dews with which the grass is covered during some part of the day. The only method of guarding against all these evils effectually, is by setting fire to the grass in the hot weather, when it is quite parched by the heat of the sun; but even this cannot be done without the greatest danger; because both the wild beasts and venomous reptiles, being roused out of their places of retirement, will fly furiously at those who happen to be in their way. In this case there is no possibility of escaping, but by climbing up the highest trees, or defending one's self by fire arms or other weapons. In such emergencies the natives have a much better chance than the Europeans; the former being able to climb trees with surprising swiftness; while the latter must be assisted with rope-ladders, which they commonly cause their blacks to carry about with them, and to go up and fasten to one of the branches.

The flowers are here exceedingly beautiful and numerous. Almost every field and grove yields a much noble prospect than the European gardens can boast of, notwithstanding the pains bestowed on their cultivation. The flowers are remarkable, not only for the prodigious variety of their colours, but the vast quantity of heads which grow upon one stalk. In the day-time, indeed, they seem to have lost their natural fragrancy: that being in some measure exhaled by the heat of the sun; but this is amply compensated after its setting, and more especially a little before its rising, when their sweetness is again condensed, and revived by the coldness and dews of the night, after which they exhale their various refreshing scents in a much higher degree than ours. The lilies, which there grow naturally in the fields, vallies, and woods, excel those of our gardens, not only in their extreme whiteness, but much more in a delightful fragrancy, without offending the head, as the European lilies do by their faintish sweetness.

The tulips, which there grow wild, though generally called Perfic, have something so surprisingly charming in the variety and combination of their colours, that they dazzle the eyes of an intense beholder; neither do their flowers grow singly as with us, but 10 or 12 upon one stalk; and with this double advantage, that they diffuse a very reviving and agreeable sweetness, and continue much longer in their full bloom. Of the same nature are their tuberoses, hyacinths, and other native flowers; which spring up in vast groups of 100 and 200 from one root, though somewhat smaller than ours; some of them finely variegated, and all of them yielding an agreeable smell. The roses, jessamines, and other exotics brought thither from Europe or America, come up likewise in great perfection; but require a constant supply of water, and diligent attendance to prevent them from degenerating. The American jessamine, in particular, instead of single flowers, will grow up by dozens in a bunch, some of them of an exquisite white, and others of the colour of the most vivid fire.

A vast variety of animals of different kinds are found in the kingdom of Congo; the chief of which are the elephant. This creature is mostly found in the province of Bamba, which abounds with woods, pasture, and plenty of water; the elephants delighting much to bathe themselves in the heat of the day. They commonly go in troops of 100 or more; and some of them are of such a monstrous size, that we are told the print of their hoof hath measured 4, nay 7 spans in diameter. From the hair of their tails, and that of some other animals, the natives, especially the women, weave themselves collars, bracelets, girdles, &c. with variety of devices and figures, which denote their quality; and are in such esteem, that the hair of 2 elephants tails is sufficient to buy a slave. The reason of this is, that the natives have not the art of taming them, but are obliged to send some of their bravest and stoutest men to hunt them in the woods; which is not done without great labour and danger, they being here exceedingly fierce. The most common way of hunting them is by digging deep holes in the ground, the top of which they cover with branches and leaves, as is practised in most parts of Asia.

Lions, leopards, tigers, wolves, and other beasts of prey abound here in great plenty, and do much damage. Here are also a great variety of monkeys of all sizes and shapes. The zebra, well known for its extreme beauty and swiftness, is also met with in this country. They have also a variety of buffaloes and wild asses; but the dante seems to be an animal peculiar to this kingdom. It is shaped and coloured much like an ox, though not so large. Its skin is commonly bought by the Portuguese, and sent into Germany to be tanned and made into targets, which are then called dantes. The natives make use of their raw hide dried, to make their shields; which are so tough that no arrow or dart can pierce them, and they are also large enough to cover the whole body. The creature is vastly swift, and when wounded will follow the scent or smoke of the gunpowder with such fury, that the hunter is obliged to climb up a tree with all possible speed; and this retreat he always takes care to secure before he ventures to fire. The wounded beast finding its enemy out of its reach, stays for him at the foot of the tree, and will not stir from it; of which the hunter taking the advantage, dispatches it with repeated shots. The forests of Congo also swarm with wild dogs, who, like the wolves, prey upon the tame cattle, and are so fierce that they will attack armed men. Their teeth are exceeding keen and sharp; they never bark, but make a dreadful howling when famished or in pursuit of their prey.

This country also abounds with all the different kinds of birds that are to be found in other warm climates. One sort, which they call birds of music, is greatly esteemed, inasmuch that persons of the highest rank have from time immemorial taken the greatest delight in keeping them in cages and aviaries, for the sake of their surprising melody. On the other hand, as the Congolese are superstitious to the last degree, there are several kinds of birds which they look upon as ominous, and are so terrified at the sight or hearing of them, that if they were going to enter upon ever so momentous an expedition, if they were met in council, or going to engage an enemy with ever so great an advantage, the flight or cry of such birds would throw them into a general panic, and disperse them in the utmost haste and confusion. The most dreadful of the ominous kind are the crows, ravens, bats, and owls. The great owl is the most terrible of all, and to him they give the name of kariam pamba, by which words they likewise denote the devil.

Fish of different kinds abound on the coasts of Congo in great numbers. But the inland parts are infested with such numbers of serpents, scorpions, and other venomous insects, as are perhaps sufficient to overbalance every natural advantage we have yet mentioned. The most pernicious and dangerous kind are the ants; of which they reckon no less than 6 several species, of different colours and sizes; all of them formidable, on account of their prodigious numbers, and the mischief they do, not only to the fruits of the earth, but to men and beasts; whom they will surround in the night time, and devour even to the very bone.

It is a common practice, we are told, to condemn persons guilty of some atrocious crimes, to be stripped naked, tied hand and foot, and thrown into a hole where these insects swarm; where they are sure to be devoured by them in less than 24 hours to the very bones. But criminals are not the only persons who are in danger from the jaws of these little devouring insects. People may be attacked by them, as we have already hinted, in the night time; and while they are sleeping in their beds. This obliges the natives to be careful where they lie down, and to kindle a small fire, or at least to have a circle of burning hot embers round their beds. This caution is still more necessary in the country villages and hamlets, where persons are otherwise in danger of being attacked by millions of them in the dead of the night. In such a case the only expedient to save one's self is to jump up as soon as the bite is felt, to brush them off with all possible speed, and then at once to set the house on fire. The danger is still greater in travelling through the country, where a person is often obliged to take up his lodging on the bare ground; and may be overtaken during the heat of the day with such profound sleep, as not to be awaked by these diminutive animals till they have made their way through the skin; and in such a case nothing will prevent their devouring a man alive, though there were ever so many hands to assist him: in such incredible quantities do these creatures abound, notwithstanding the great numbers of monkeys who are continually ferreting the ants out of their retreats, and feed upon them with the utmost avidity. This can only be ascribed to the natural laziness and indolence of the inhabitants; which is such, that they not only neglect to rid their lands of them by proper cultivation, but will suffer their houses, nay even their very churches, to be undermined by them.

Another kind of these destructive vermin lie so thick upon the paths and highways, that a person cannot walk without treading upon, and having his legs and thighs almost devoured by them. A third sort of a white and red colour, but very small, will gnaw their way through the hardest wood, penetrate into a strong chest, and in a little while devour all the clothes, linen, and every thing that is in it. A fourth sort, small and black, leave a most intolerable stench upon every thing they touch or crawl over, whether clothes or household-stuff; which are not easily sweetened again: or if they pass over victuals, it is entirely spoiled. A fifth sort harbour chiefly on the leaves and branches of trees; and if a man chance to climb up thither to save himself from a wild beast, he is so tormented by them, that nothing but the fear of the jaws of the one could make him endure the stings of the other. A sixth sort is of the flying kind, and is probably one of the former kinds, that live wholly under ground, till nature furnishes them with wings. After this, they rise in such swarms as darken the air, and would make terrible havoc among all kinds of vegetables, did not the natives come out against them in whole companies, and by dint of flaps, and other flat weapons, knock them down by myriads, and then laying them in heaps, set fire to their their wings, which half boils them for food. Amidst all this variety of pernicious insects, however, they have one species of a more friendly and profitable kind, viz. the industrious bee, which furnishes the inhabitants with honey and wax in such plenty, that there is scarce a hollow tree, cleft of a rock, or chop of the earth, in which their combs are not found in great quantities.

With respect to the populousness of the kingdom of Congo, some authors writing either from mere conjecture, or at best precarious inferences, have represented it as thinly peopled. The accounts of the missionaries and Portuguese, however, are directly opposite to these. They found the country for the most part covered with towns and villages, and these swarming with inhabitants; the cities well filled with people, particularly the metropolis, which is said to contain above 50,000 souls. The provinces, though not equally populous, yet in the whole, make up such an amount, as plainly proves that what is wanting in the one is amply made up by another. We are told that the duchy of Bamba is still able to raise 200,000 fighting men, and was formerly in a condition to raise double that number; and that the army of the king of Congo, in the year 1665, consisted of 900,000 fighting men, who were attended by an infinite number of women, children, and slaves. The numbers of the Congoesse will appear the more credible, when we consider the extreme fecundity of their women, the hardness with which they bring up their children, and the stoutness and healthiness of their men. In some villages, if the missionaries are to be credited, the number of children is so great, that a father will part with one or two, for any commodity he wants, or even for some trifling bawble he fancies; so that the number of slaves they sell abroad, seldom amounts, communibus annis, to less than 15 or 16,000.

There is scarce a nation on earth that have a higher opinion of themselves or their country, than the Congoesse, or that is more hardened against all conviction to the contrary, from reason, experience, or the most impartial comparison with other countries in Europe or Asia. Indeed, it is impossible they should think otherwise, when it is one of the fundamentals of their belief, that the rest of the world was the work of angels, but that the kingdom of Congo, in its full and ancient extent, was the handy-work of the Supreme Architect; and must of course have vast prerogatives and advantages over all others. When told of the magnificence of the European and Asiatic courts, their immense revenues, the grandeur of their palaces and edifices, the riches and happiness of their subjects, the great progress they have made in the arts and sciences to which their country is wholly a stranger, they coolly answer, that all this comes vastly short of the dignity and splendor of the kings and kingdom of Congo; and that there can be but one Congo in the world, to the happiness of whose monarch and people all the rest were created to contribute, and to whose treasury the sea and rivers pay their constant tribute of zimbis, (or shells, which are their current coin); whilst other princes must condescend to enrich themselves by digging through rocks and mountains, to come at the excrements of the earth, for so they stile gold and silver, which are in such request among other nations. Accordingly, they imagine, that the nations which come to traffic with them, are forced to that servile employment by their poverty, and the badness of their country, rather than induced to it by luxury or avarice; whilst they themselves can indulge their natural indolence or sloth, though attended with the most pinching poverty, rather than disgrace the dignity of their blood by the least effort of industry, which, how laudable and beneficial soever, is looked upon by them as only a lesser degree of slavery. But though they generally esteem it so much below their dignity to apply to any useful work, they think it no disgrace to beg or steal. With respect to the first, they are said to be the most shameless and importunate beggars in the world. They will take no denial, spare no crouching, lying, prayers, to obtain what they want, nor curses nor ill language when sent away without it. With regard to the last, they deem no theft unlawful or scandalous, except it be committed in a private manner, without the knowledge of the person wronged. It is esteemed a piece of bravery and gallantry to wrench any thing from another by violence; and this kind of theft is so common, not only among the vulgar, but also among the great ones, that they make no scruple, in their travels from place to place, to seize not only upon all the provisions they meet with in towns and villages, but upon every thing else that falls in their way. These violences oblige the poor people to conceal the few valuables they have, in some secret place out of the knowledge and reach of those harpies; and they think themselves well off, if they can escape a severe bastonading, or other cruel usage frequently inflicted upon them in order to make them discover the place of their concealment.

The complexion of the natives, both men and women, is black, though not in the same degree; some being of a much deeper black than others. Their hair is black and finely curled; some have it also of a dark sandy colour: their eyes are mostly of a fine lively black; but some are of a dark sea-colour. They have neither flat noses, nor thick lips, like the Nubians and other negroes. Their stature is mostly of the middle size; and, excepting their black complexion, they much resemble the

Portuguese,

Portuguese. In their temper they are mistrustful, envious, jealous, and treacherous; and where they once take a distaste or affront, will spare no pains, nor stick at any means however base, to be avenged of, and crush their enemies under their feet. There is no such thing among them as natural affection. A husband, if an Heathen, may take as many wives as he pleases; and if a Christian, may have any number of concubines, whom he may divorce at pleasure, or even sell them though with child. So little regard have they for their children, that there is scarce one among them who will not sell a son or a daughter, or perhaps both, for a piece of cloth, a collar or girdle of coral or beads, and often for a bottle of wine or brandy.

The religion of the Congoe in many parts is downright idolatry; accompanied with the most ridiculous superstitions, and the most absurd and detestable rites, invented by their gangas or priests; and even in those parts where Christianity is professed, it is so darkened by one kind of superstition or other, that we may justly question whether the people are any gainers by the exchange.

The government of this kingdom is monarchical, and as despotic as any in Asia or Africa. The kings are the sole proprietors of all the lands within their dominions; and these they can dispose of to whom they please, upon condition they pay a certain tribute, out of them, upon failure of the payment of which, or any other neglect, they turn them out. Even the princes of the blood are subjected to the same law; so that there is no person of any rank or quality whatever, that can bequeath a foot of land to his heirs or successors; and when these under the crown die, the lands immediately return to it again, whether they were in their possession, or had been let to ever so many tenants under them; so that it entirely depends on the will of the prince whether these lands shall be continued in the same, or be disposed into other hands. The Portuguese, however, since their settling in these parts, have prevailed upon the monarchs to permit the heirs and successors to continue in the quiet possession of such lands, in order to avoid the confusions, or even rebellions, which the alienation and deprival of them frequently occasioned, and to oblige the tenants of them to pay their tribute more exactly and readily than they did before.

In Congo there are only 3 offences deemed capital, viz. treason, murder, and sorcery. In the former the offender's punishment chiefly depends on the prince's will, who commonly condemns him to the loss of his head and estate, the latter being confiscated for the king's use. A murderer is immediately beheaded, unless some atrocious circumstances seem to require, or the relations of the deceased petition for a more severe death; in which last case, he is usually delivered up to them, to suffer such punishment as they choose to inflict on him, and which is generally put in execution immediately after sentence is pronounced. Magic or sorcery, a crime very common in the unconverted provinces, is, on that account, more severely punished by the Christians; and the person convicted of it is immediately burned alive; which punishment seems to have been introduced by the Portuguese. Other punishments for lesser crimes are the bastinado, whipping, fines, and imprisonment. The Portuguese are allowed a judge of their own nation, not only for their law suits among themselves, but between them and the natives, who decide all controversies according to the laws of Portugal; a privilege granted to no other Europeans.

St. Salvador is the chief place of traffic the Portuguese and other Europeans have in this country. There are thought to be about 4000 of them settled here, who trade with most parts of the kingdom. The chief commodities they bring thither are either the product of Brazil, or European manufactures. The former consist chiefly of grains, fruits, plants, &c. the latter of Turkey carpets, English cloth, and other stuffs; copper, brass vessels, some kinds of blue earthenware, rings, and ornaments of gold, silver, and other baser metals; coral, glass-beads, bugles, and other trinkets; light stuffs made of cotton, woollen, and linen, for cloathing, and a great variety of tools and other utensils. In return for these they carry off a great number of slaves, amounting to 15 or 16,000 annually, as we have already observed. Formerly they used also to carry away elephants teeth, furs, and other commodities of the country; but these branches of commerce are now greatly decayed; and the slave-trade is what the Portuguese merchants principally depend on.

CONGON, a town of Farfistan, one of the provinces of Persia, with a pretty good trade; for most of the pearls taken up at Bahara, on the Arabian side, are brought hither for a market; and great numbers of fine horses are sent from this place into the Indies, where they generally sell very well. It stands on the S. side of a large river, about 90 miles from Benderic on the S. E.

CONHAM, a place in Gloucestershire, on the edge of King's-wood forest, about a mile from Bristol, and belonging to the parish-church of St. Philip and St. Jacob in that city, where are famous works for smelting copper, which supply the East-India and other companies, with vast quantities of that metal every year, besides what is used by the brass-works works in the neighbourhood. The principal part of the ore which is smelted here, comes from Ireland and Cornwall.

CONI, CONIO, CUNIO, or CUNENUM, a strong town of Piemont Proper, on a hill, and is defended by a stout, high castle, at the confluence of the rivers Stura and Gesso, or (Grez.) It is so fortified both by nature and art, that it hath often withstood the French arms, and was never taken by that nation but once; namely, in the year 1641, by count Harcourt, in the reign of Lewis XIII. after a very stout resistance. It had before baffled the attempts of Francis I. who had been obliged to raise the siege of it.

In 1691 the French made a new, but equally successful attempt against it. In 1705, the duchess of Savoy retired to this place with her family and treasure, upon the apprehension of her capital going to be besieged; and next year she retired thither again, when Turin was actually besieged; but the French who had begun the siege, were obliged to abandon it soon after. In 1744 it was again briskly besieged by the French and Spaniards, but Baron Leutrum, made so long and vigorous a defence, and killed so many of their troops, that the advanced season, rains, and other concurring accidents, obliged them to raise it. At the same time a battle was fought in the neighbourhood, when vast numbers were killed on both sides. To Coni belongs a certain district, with some small places, called Cunes. The town lies 35 miles N. of Nice. Lat. 44. 25. N. Long. 7. 30. E.

CONIGLIANO, a small but very populous town in the marquisate of Trevigiano, one of the Venetian territories.

CONIL, an ancient small town of Andalusia, in Spain, belonging to the dukes of Medina Sidonia, or Celi, who have here a pretty well fortified castle. At this place is a considerable tunny-fishery.

CONINGHAM. See CUNNINGHAM.

CONINGSECK, the capital of a country of the same name, in the circle of Suabia, in Germany. It gives title of count, and lies 20 miles N. of Constance. Lat. 47. 56. N. Long. 9. 33. E.

CONINGSBOROUGH-CASTLE, in Yorkshire, in British called Caer-Conan. It stands upon a rock, in view of the river Dun, and is not only famous for its antiquity, but also for its pleasing site. Its out-walls are still standing, but overtopped by a high hill, on which is the town. In the churchyard, under the wall, is a very ancient stone of blue marble, with antique figures; one representing a man, with a target, encountering a vast winged serpent; and another bearing a target behind him, Upon it, being ridged like a coffin, is a man on horseback, curiously engraved, and very ancient.

C O
Here Matthew of Westminster, says Aurelius Ambrosius, a British prince, vanquished Hengist the Saxon general, and took him prisoner. He afterwards cut off his head, in revenge of his barbarous murder of the British nobility, in cool blood, near Stonehenge, Wiltshire. Before the gate of the castle is said to be the burying-place of Hengist.

CONINGSBURG. See KONINGSBERG.

CONITZ, a town of Little Pomerania, in Polish Prussia, on the the river Bro.

CONNAUGHT. See CONAUGHT.

CONNECTICUT, (colony of,) is commonly considered as a province of New England, in N. America. It also comprehends Newhaven. It is bounded on the W. by New-York, divided from Long-Island by an arm of the sea on the S. It has Rhode-Island on the E. with part of Massachusetts colony, and the other part of it on the N. From Stony-town in New London county, to Rye on the borders of New-York, it is about 110 miles long; and in breadth from Saybrook in New London county, to the confines of Hampshire, about 86, N.

The Connecticut river runs through the heart of it, dividing itself into different parts, and is navigable above 40 miles for ships of burthen, and many more for smaller vessels. The country on both sides the river abounds with timber, and it is here that they produce so great a quantity of tar and turpentine as to require numbers of hands to extract it. The business of the people here is, besides fisheries, that of timber-felling, or cutting timber for knee-timber, plank for ship-building, deals, baulks, and spars for houses, masts and yards for ships. And the New-England merchants sent a present to Charles II. of several masts so large as to serve for first-rates. The great floats of timber brought down this river have very much improved their navigation. Several sorts of metals have been found here, as lead, iron, copper. The iron-mines are still worked, and greatly improved, but the attempts to raise a stock for working the lead and copper have failed. The colony is populous and increasing, containing about 192,000 people. This colony is divided into the counties of Windham, Hertford, Litchfield, New London, New-haven, and Fairfield. Lat. 42. 0. Long. 72. 50.

CONYERN, a town in the duchy of Madgeburg, of great antiquity, with a Lutheran and a Calvinist congregation, an alms-house, and a magistracy of 5 persons; in 1004 it was conferred on the cathedral, by the Emperor Henry II. In 1473, it suffered greatly by a fire, and in the 30 years was almost destroyed.

CONNESTIGUCUNE, a settlement a little to the N. of Albany, in the county of that name, and to the E. of Schenectady, or the Mohawk's-river, which a little lower tumbles down a precipice of about 70 feet high.

and

CONNOR, in the county of Antrim, and province of Ulster, in the kingdom of Ireland; though a small town, yet it is the see of bishop, united with that of Down. It lies 6 miles N. of Antrim.

CONEQ, or CONEQUEE. See CONCAR-NEAU.

CONQUES, a bourg of the Lower Marché, of Rouergue, subdivision of Guyenne Proper. It is a chapter.

CONQUET, (Le,) or CONQUEST, in Latin, Conquestus, a small town in the bishopric of S. Pol. de Leon, a subdivision of Lower Brittany, in the government of the latter name in France. It stands on the most westerly point of the province, has a good port and road on the N. of Cape St. Mahé, 10 miles W. of Brest. It gives name to the nearest cape to this place, and also to the road between it and the islands of Belinguier, Molines, &c. Lat. 48, 30, N. Long. 4, 35, W.

CONRADSBURG, a Dutch fortress on a high hill, called St. Jago, in Fetu and Guinea Proper, in Africa. It is quadrangular, and strengthened with 4 good batteries, besides 4 smaller in the out-wall surrounding it. In the midst of it is a pretty high tower, which only adorns the place; and from its top is a prospect of the neighbouring land and ocean, where ships may be discovered 7 or leagues at sea.

CONSENZA, anciently Consentia, the capital of the Hither Calabria, in the kingdom of Naples. It is the seat of the juridical court, and though small, is the see of an archbishop, who has considerable revenues, and only one suffragan; namely, the bishop of Martorano. It lies 16 miles E. of the sea. Lat. 39, 25, N. Long. 16, 39, E.

CONSERANS, or COUSERANS, anciently a viscounty, a small territory of Lower Armagnac, among the Pyrenean mountains.

Of the same name is a bourg, which stands on an eminence, and was formerly the capital of this territory.

CONSTANCE, (bishopric of), in Suabia, situated on both sides of the lake of the same name, and on the confines of Swisserland, among the allies of which it is commonly reckoned: and indeed part of it may be said to lie in Swisserland, as well as part in Germany, being only divided by the lake. It extends about 30 miles E. and W. and 24 S. and N. where broadest, including the lake. Its bishop, besides being a baron, count, and prince, of the empire, was sovereign of the city of Constance, before it was made imperial; and is said to have had 1000 castles and villages under his jurisdiction, 6 deanries, divided into 1760 parishes, 17,000 priests, and 400 convents. He has hereditary officers belonging to him, and is perpetual chancellor of the university of Friburg in the Brisgaw; which was transferred in 1677 to Constance. His diocese extends into the cantons of Schaffhausen, Zurich, and Berne, in which he has the collation of several ecclesiastical benefices, Protestant as well as Catholic. He has also great possessions in Turgaw, in Swisserland; he is styled baron of Richenaw, and is co-director of the Circle of Suabia with the duke of Wirtemberg, but is named first in the commission.

This was formerly one of the largest and richest bishoprics of Germany, but has been greatly reduced since the reformation; notwithstanding which it is still considerable. The bishopric disputes the navigation of the lake with the prince of Furstenburg: his annual revenue is reckoned at about 12 or 14,000*l.* sterling; which sum is raised principally by the toll on the lake and the Rhine. Its chapter consists of 20 canons, besides 4 who are expectants of vacancies. The religion of this diocese is Roman Catholic.

CONSTANCE, the capital of the last-mentioned bishopric of the same name, in German Costnitz or Constantz, in Latin Constantia, and in Latin Constanza. It is a very pretty city, pleasantly situated on the S. W. shore of the lake of the same name, where the Rhine issues out of it. Some reckon it the metropolis of Austria, or Lower Suabia; and the country on both sides of the lake is called Hegow. It is supposed to be the ancient Vitodurum or Gaunodurum. It was taken by Attila, and afterwards possessed by the old French kings; and in their records called Villa regia Dugoberti regis. From Windisch in Ergow, the bishopric was translated hither, and is a suffragan of Mentz: upon which it was enlarged, and so fortified, that it withstood a great army of Hungarian savages, who over-ran this country in the year 938; and that year a tournament was held here, at which all the nobility on the banks of the Rhine were present. Several diets of the empire were kept here: and in 1044, or 1045, an assembly of princes met under the emperor Henry III. in which he appeased the troubles of Germany, by the peace of Constance, at a juncture when there were three popes, who were set aside, and a pope chosen, who took the name of Clement II. in the year 1056. In 1514, an ecclesiastical council was held here, in the spacious edifice, now called the custom-house, which kindled a flame of war that laid Bohemia waste, together with several other provinces of Germany. It was called by the emperor Sigismund, in order to remove a schism in the Romish church, like that just mentioned, upon three popes, pretending to the infallibility, who were set up by the Italians, French and Spaniards respectively; but were all three deposed by this council, and a new one chose by them; namely, Martin V. They also condemned the doctrines of John Wickliff of Oxford, John Hus, and Jerom of Prague; causing Wickliff's bones to be dug up and burnt, and the other two to be burnt alive, though Hus had a safe conduct granted him from the emperor. This council was one of the most important events of the 15th century, and the greatest of all synods that was ever held, considering the dignity and number of the princes, prelates and doctors, who assisted at it; for there was not a kingdom, state, or scarce any city or community, but had its ambassadors or deputies at this council. Ten popes presided in it by turns, and the emperor was hardly ever absent from it.

There were 30 cardinals, 4 patriarchs, 2 popes' legates, 27 archbishops, 206 bishops, 33 titular bishops, about 150 other prelates, and 203 abbots: the number of these in short, is reckoned at 18,000, and there were 80,000 laymen, all strangers, besides a vast many auditors, secretaries, &c. At one time there were not less than 30,000 horse in the city. This famous council, which lasted four years, and had 45 sessions, made that infamous canon, „That faith is not to be kept with heretics, nor those suspected of heresy”.

Constance was once a free imperial city; but refusing to conform to the interim, a regulation formed by the emperor Charles V. with regard to religious quarrels, he besieged, took, and subjected it to the house of Austria, who maintain a governor and garrison here. It is a populous, rich place, and has a considerable trade, by means of its lake, and the neighbourhood of the Rhine, which comes out of the former, not above a musket-shot below the town, and runs into the lake of Zell or Cellersee, by means of a canal upon which the town stands. It is a well-built place, and strongly fortified. The churches, public buildings, and bishop's palace, are very magnificent. Over the river is a wooden bridge, 6 arches at one end excepted, which are of stone. Here is an university, which was translated hither from Friburg in 1677. Lat. 47, 42, N. Long. 9, 27, E.

CONSTANCE, (Lake of), a collection of inland water, upon which the city of the same name stands. It is 21 miles long, and between 8 and 10 in breadth, through which the Rhine runs with remarkable rapidity. It is divided into two arms, opposite to the city; the one called the lake of Bodmer, or Uberlinger; and that on the W. the Cellersee. The former is the largest.

CONSTANTINA, a province of Algiers, in Africa, bounded on the E. by part of Tunis and Bona, Latex on the W. Atlas on the S. and the Mediterranean, with part of Bona, on the N. The low-lands abound with corn, fruit, &c. and the mountains with pasturage. The mountaineers are stout and warlike, and so numerous as to be able to bring 40,000 men into the field.

CONSTANTINA, the capital of the last-mentioned province of the same name, and the ancient Cirta Numidiae, or Cirta Julia. Here the emperor Constantine built an aqueduct; and here are many Roman antiquities, particularly a triumphal arch. It is the seat of the eastern government of Algiers, stands very high, and is surrounded with steep hills. Its citadel on the N. side is the governor's residence, 96 miles S. of Bona. Lat. 35, 36, N. Long. 7, 20, E.

CONSTANTINOPLE. Authors are divided in opinion with respect to the motives of the emperor Constantine's building this city. Zosimus writes, he did it out of hatred to the Romans, who scorned and insulted him for having embraced a new religion. Eutropius says he did it to display his power, in being able in a few years to build a city equal to Rome, which for so many ages had so deservedly been looked on as the wonder of the universe. Others, that he, disliking Rome for reasons unknown, resolved to build another city for his imperial residence. That he disliked Rome is plain; for though he had been master of that metropolis of the empire near 20 years, he had never made any long stay in it, but passed most of his time in Gaul and in Thrace. The first place he chose to execute his design was between Troas and ancient Ilium on the coast of Asia; but changing his mind, upon a vision he had, or imagined to have had, he resolved to enlarge the ancient city of Byzantium, and make it the second, or if he could the first, of the empire. He began with extending the walls of that ancient city from sea to sea; and, while some of the workmen were busied in rearing them, others were employed in raising within them a great number of stately buildings, and among the rest a palace no ways inferior in magnificence and extent to that of Rome.

As he designed to fix his own court there, and was desirous the succeeding emperors should follow his example, and honour his new city with their ordinary residence, he spared no cost nor labour to render it both beautiful and convenient. With this view he built a capitol and amphitheatre, made a circus maximus, several forums, porticos, and public baths, and divided the whole city into 14 regions, securing the inhabitants with many wholesome laws, and granting them great privileges and immunities. By this means Byzantium became in a short time one of the most flourishing and populous cities of the empire, whole families flocking thither from all parts, especially from Pontus, Thrace, and Asia, Constantine having appointed, by a law then then enacted, that such as had lands in those countries should not be able to dispose of them, nor even leave them at their death to their heirs, unless they had a house in this his new city. The common people were enticed thither from the different and most distant provinces, and even from Rome itself, by the great quantities of corn, oil, and meat, that were daily distributed among them. He caused idols to be pulled down, and the old temples to be consecrated to the true God. He built besides an incredible number of churches, and caused crosses to be erected in all the squares and public places. When most of the buildings were finished, the emperor, on May 11, A. D. 330, the 25th of his reign, caused his new city, by a very solemn dedication, to be consecrated, according to Cedrenus, to the Virgin Mary, but according to Eusebius, to the God of martyrs, and styled the new city, from his own name, Constantinople, i. e. the city of Constantine.

At the same time he equalled it to ancient Rome, granting it the same rights, immunities, and privileges, enjoyed by that metropolis. He established a senate, and other magistrates, with power and authority equal to those of the Roman, and declared this his New Rome the metropolis of the east, as Old Rome was of the west. Constantine, having accomplished this great work, according to some in 5, according to others in 2, years, fixed his residence in the new city, and never more returned to Rome. By this removal the Roman empire received a fatal stroke, and shrunk by degrees into nothing. Constantius, son of the said Constantine, finished the walls, which it seems his father had not perfected, repaired at a great expence many of the buildings, and embellished the city with fountains, baths, and other stately edifices; and Julian, after him, enriched that metropolis, (which was the place of his nativity) with many privileges, formed a large harbour to shelter the ships from the S. wind, built a magnificent porch leading to it, and in another porch a stately library, in which he lodged all his books.

Among the remarkable events that happened to this city in its ancient state, was a fire in 465, which burnt 8 of the 14 quarters the city was divided into. In 477 another fire happened, which consumed great part of the city and the library, containing 120,000 volumes. The greatest tumult mentioned in history raged here in 532, in which 30,000 citizens were murdered, and many stately buildings destroyed.

Constantinople, now called Istambol by the Turks, continued in the possession of the Christian emperors in the eastern part of the Roman empire, till 1453, when it was taken from the emperor Constantine (who was killed at the siege,) by the Turks under Mahomet II. in 54 days, ever since which it has been the capital of their dominions. It is seated on the most eastern point of Romania, on a neck of land which juts out towards Natolia, from which it is separated by a canal or strait about a mile broad; the sea of Marmora washes its walls on the south side, and a gulph of the canal of Constantinople, or Thracian Bosphorus, waters it on the N. It is about 1435 miles S. E. from London. Its situation is the most agreeable and the most advantageous of the whole world. It seems as if the canal of the Dardanelles and that of the Black Sea, were made on purpose to bring to it the riches of the 4 quarters of the world. These 2 canals are as the door of Constantinople; the north and south, which are the ordinary winds there, are, as it were, the two leaves of the door: when the N. wind blows, the S. door is shut, that is, nothing can come in from the S. coast; this door opens, when the S. wind reigns; and if you will not allow these winds to be called the doors of Constantinople, you must allow them to be at least the quays of that city.

Constantinople is of a triangular figure, two of whose sides are washed by the sea, and the third is on the firm land. To the 2 first are generally allowed 7 miles, and 9 to the third. The walls are very good, those of the land-side have a double range, 20 feet from each other, and defended by a flat-bottomed ditch about 25 feet broad; the outer-wall which is about 12 feet high, is defended by 250 low towers; the inner-wall is above 20 feet high, and its towers, which answer to those of the other, are well proportioned. The battlements, the courtines, and the port-holes are well contrived. These works consist mostly of free-stone. The walls that are washed by the sea appear to be somewhat more disregarded, and there is no going round them for the several outjettings to the water. There is no wharf or quay; some part of the walls, especially towards the port, is faddled with houses; the towers of both are set at a proper distance, but have been often damaged by storms, and as often repaired by the Roman emperors, as may be seen by the inscriptions on the 7 towers and other places in and about the walls.

There are 7 gates from the point of the seraglio, to the 7 towers; 5 landwards, and 11 on the port; but, whichever gate you go in at, you mount an ascent. Constantine the Great, who designed to make this city like Rome, could not have found a better spot for eminences. It is a very tiresome city for foot-travellers; persons of note go on horseback. This town affords a fine prospect to those who behold it from without. Nothing upon earth can be more delightful than with one glance of the eye to discover all the buildings of one of the largest cities in Europe, whose roofings, terraces, balconies balconies, and gardens form a variety of amphitheatres: so that strangers are commonly swelled with a high conceit of it; but perhaps no place in the world deceives their expectations more than this; for the streets are narrow, dark, and steep, very ill paved, and some not at all; the only street that is respectable, is that which leads from the seraglio to the gate of Adrianople; the rest look like so many cut-throat lanes. The private houses are but mean and beggarly, being small, low, and ill-built, consisting of wood, earth, or, at best, but rough or unhewn stones. However, you frequently meet with good buildings, bagnios, bazars, and some houses of great men, built with lime and sand, and angled with freestone, the apartments running very cleverly into one another.

As the houses are mostly of wood and mud, a fire often consumes thousands of them in a day; a disaster which frequently befalls them, either from the Turks smoking in bed, or on purpose by the soldiers for the sake of pilfering. In 1754, an earthquake did immense damage here, a fire breaking out at the same time: and in 1755 and 1756, there were two more terrible conflagrations. It would be no great damage if nothing but the houses were destroyed, for they cost but a trifle to build again, and there is wood enough on the coasts of the Black sea to rebuild Constantinople once a year, if there were occasion; but numberless families are utterly undone by the burning of their merchandises. The foreign merchants have, of late years, wisely bethought themselves to build at Galata, one of the suburbs of Constantinople, very substantial warehouses of free-stone, standing single, and having no more windows than are barely necessary; the shutters of which, as well as the doors, are covered with iron plates.

The mosques, of which there are 7 stiled royal, are very handsome edifices of their kind, completely finished and kept in perfect good condition. They stand every one single, within a spacious inclosure, planted with fine trees and adorned with beautiful fountains. The Turks suffer not a dog to enter the mosques, and no one presumes to hold discourse in those inclosures, nor to do the least irreverend action. The mosques are all well endowed; and though their architecture is inferior to ours, yet they fail not to make an impression on the beholders, by their largeness and solidity. In all parts of the Levant the domes are well executed; those of the mosques are of an exact proportion, and accompanied with other smaller domes, which make them appear full and stately to the eye. It is not so with minarets, which are spires as high as any of our belfries, and as small about as a may-pole. These minarets are a great ornament to the mosques and to the whole town, nor have we any works of that boldness among us.

St. Sophia is the most perfect of all these mosques. Its situation is advantageous, for it stands on one of the best and finest parts of Constantinople, at the top of the ancient Byzantium, and of an eminence that descends gradually down to the sea by the point of the seraglio. This church, which is certainly the finest structure in the world, next to St. Peter's at Rome and St. Paul's at London, looks to be very unweildy without; the plan is almost square, and the dome rests outwardly on 4 prodigious large towers, which have been added of late years to support this vast building, and make it immoveable, in a country where whole cities are often overthrown by earthquakes.

The frontispiece has nothing grand, nor answerable to the idea entertained of St. Sophia. You first enter in at a portico about 18 feet broad, which in the time of the Roman emperors served for a vestibulum. This portico communicates with the church by 9 marble folding-doors, the leaves whereof, which are of brass, adorned with basso-relievos, are extremely magnificent. On the middlemost of them are some figures of Mosaic work, and even some paintings. This vestibulum is joined to another which is parallel to it, but has no more than 5 brazen doors, without basso-relievos. On the leaves there were crosses, but the Turks have only left the upright posts of them, and have taken away the cross-beam. You do not enter frontways into these 2 vestibulums, but only at doors opened on the sides; and, according to the rules of the Greek church, these vestibulums were necessary for the placing those that were distinguished, either for being about to receive the sacraments, or undergo public penance. Parallel to these vestibulums the Turks have built a great cloister, for lodging the officers of the mosques. A dome of admirable structure holds the place of a nave; at the foot of this dome runs a colonade, which supports a gallery 30 feet broad, the archwork whereof is exquisite. In the interspaces of the columns, the parapet is adorned with crosses in basso-relievo, which the Turks have spared. By some this is called Constantine's gallery, and it was formerly set apart for the women. At the roof and on the cornish of the dome runs a small gallery, or rather balustrade, no broader than just for one person to pass at a time, and above this there is also another. These balustrades make a beautiful shew at the time of their Ramadan, when they are all adorned with lamps. The columns of this dome have scarce any belly or swelling, and their chapters seem to be of a singular order. The dome is 108 feet in the clear, that is, from wall to wall; and rests upon 4 huge pillars, about 48 feet thick. The arch seems a perfect demi-sphere, illuminated with 24 windows, disposed in a circumference. From the E. part of this dome you pass straight on to the demi-dome, which terminates nates the edifice. This dome or shell was the sanctuary of the Christians, and the great altar was placed there.

Mohammed II. when he conquered this city, went and sat there with his legs crossed under him, after the manner of the Turks: having said his prayers, he caused himself to be shaved, and then he fastened, to one of the pillars where the patriarch's throne was, a fine piece of embroidered stuff with Arabic characters on it, which had served as a screen in the mosque of Mecca; such was the consecration of St. Sophia. There is at present in this sanctuary nothing but the niche where they keep the Koran; it looks towards Mecca, and the Musselmén always turn that way, when they say their prayers. The musti's chair is near it; raised on 7 steps; and on the side of it a kind of pulpit for the officers to repeat certain prayers.

This mosque, built like a Greek cross, is in the whole 252 feet long and 228 broad. The dome takes up almost all the square, with 107 columns of different marble, porphyry, or Egyptian granite. The whole dome is lined or paved with variety of marble; the incrustations of the gallery are Mosaic, mostly done with cubes or dice of glass, which grow daily loose from their cement; but their colour is unalterable. These glass dice are really doublets, for the variegated leaf is covered with a piece of glass very thin, and glued on so as nothing but boiling water can make it scale off. The Turks have destroyed the noses and eyes of some of the figures, as well as the faces of some of the cherubim, placed in the angles of the dome.

The port of Constantinople can never be too much admired. It is a basin 7 or 8 miles in circuit towards the city and as much on the suburb side. Its entrance, which is about 600 paces broad, begins at the point of the seraglio, or cape of St. Demetrius, situated on the S. and is the cape of the Bosphorus, where stood the ancient town of Byzantium. Thence to the W. the port extends like a crooked horn, more like that of an ox than stag, as Strabo has it; for the coast has no in and out turnings, like divisions. It is true, it has been observed that many alterations have destroyed its ancient form. It opens to the E. and faces Scutari; Galata and Cassun-pacha are to the N. and it lastly terminates to the N. N. W. where the river Lycus empties itself. This river consists of 2 streams; the larger, on which is a paper-mill, comes from the W. and the other flows from the N. W. These streams are of very singular use to cleanse the haven, for they wash all the coast of Cassun-pacha, and Galata, while part of the waters of the canal of the Black sea, which descend from the N. like a torrent, dash violently against the cape of Bosphorus, and recoil to the right towards the W. By this motion they sweep away the mud that might gather about Constantinople, and by a piece of natural mechanism, shove it on by degrees as far as the fresh waters. And these fresh waters help to preserve the shipping; for experience shews, that they are less subject to be worm eaten in such ports where there is fresh water than where there is salt. Nothing but the E. wind can disturb the port of Constantinople, as being entirely exposed to it. Whenever it blows hard from that quarter, especially, if it be in the night, it occasions a frightful noise, for the seamen make such a bawling, and the dogs such a barking, that the town might seem ready for destruction, if one was not apprised of the cause of it.

The grand Signior's seraglio affords a pleasant prospect, when one comes to Constantinople by sea, because of its pleasant gardens on the water-side. The architecture is by no means magnificent, being, on the contrary, very plain in respect to what the palace of so powerful a prince ought to be. The Turks call it Padisha Serai, the king's or emperor's palace. Sera signifying any great building, and from that the western Christians have formed Serail, or Seraglio. This palace is just at the mouth of the port, and stands on the very spot of the old Byzantium, exactly where the Bosphorus is. It is nearly 3 miles about, is a kind of triangle, whose side next the city is the biggest; that next the Bosphorus is at the E. and the other, that forms the entrance of the port, is to the N. The apartments are on the top of the hill, and the gardens below stretch to the sea. The walls of the city, flanked with towers, joining to the point of St. Demetrius, make the circumference of the palace towards the sea. The apartments of the seraglio having been constructed at different times, and according to the caprice of the princes and sultanas, it is become rather a heap of houses, clustering together without any manner of order, than a beautiful palace. They are, however, spacious, commodious, and richly furnished. Their best ornaments are not pictures nor statues, but paintings after the Turkish manner, inlaid with gold and azure, diversified with flowers, landscapes, tail-pieces, such as printers adorn the end of a book or chapter with; and compartments like labels, containing Arabian sentences. Marble basons, bagnios, spouting fountains, are the delight of the Orientals, who place them over the first floor, without fear of overpressing the ceiling.

If there is any thing curious in the seraglio, it is what the ambassadors of foreign princes have brought thither; such as French and Venice looking-glasses, Persian carpets, oriental vases, and the like. It is said most of the pavilions are supported by arches, under which are lodged the officers that serve the sultanas. These ladies dwell over-head, in apartments ments commonly terminated by a dome covered with lead, or by spires with gilded crescents; the balconies, galleries, cabinets, belvederes, are the most agreeable places of these apartments. In short, take the seraglio all together, and it will be found answerable to the greatness of its master; but to make a fine edifice of it, it should be pulled down, and the materials employed to build another on a new model.

There is another seraglio, called the Old, in which, after the Grand Signior's death, are shut up all his ladies for the rest of their days, in which they bewail at leisure his death, or that of their children, whom the new sultan often causes to be strangled. It was built by Mahommed II. the Turks call it Esqui-Serai. It is inclosed with a wall 24 spans high, for 2 miles in compass, within which are lodgings and gardens. There is no going into it, the gate being guarded by janizaries and capigis.

The public buildings and other remarkable places at Constantinople consist of the bazars, or bezestins, places like our changes, for selling fine wares of all sorts; the caravanserais, erected in convenient parts of the city for the markets and traffic of different commodities. These are for all men of what quality, condition, country, or religion soever; the Hippodrome, or running-place for horses, is an oblong square, 400 paces long and 100 wide. It was anciently adorned with several excellent ornaments, of which only 3 pillars remain; namely, the hieroglyphical pillar, the white marble pillar, and the brazen pillar; lastly, the castle of the 7 towers, so called, because it has so many eminent spired towers. It is situated in that angle of the city nearest the Propontis. It is a prison for state-criminals, as the tower of London is with us. No stranger is admitted to see it. The place is pentagonal, but not large, and has no ditch on the side of the city. It looks not strong enough for a castle, but is sufficiently so for a prison. The gilded or golden gate, which was the most considerable of Constantinople under the Roman emperors, is now within this prison's walls. It is adorned with basso-relievos, on oblong tables of white marble. On one is the fall of Phæton, on another Hercules fighting with a bull, on a third the same hero in combat with Cerberus, and on a fourth Venus coming to visit Adonis sleeping, and lighted by Cupid's torch.

We come now to the suburbs of Constantinople, if they may be so called, for there are no buildings contiguous to the city, the walls being bare all round the 3 sides. The first is Castum-Pacha, which seems to be a large village. Here, by the water-side, is the arsenal, where the Grand Signior's ships are built. There are 120 houses arched over for keeping the galleys. The store-houses and work-houses are under very good economy, and all is subject to the captain basha. From this suburb, you cross some burying-place to go to Galata, which is the handsomest suburb of the whole city, and formerly made its 13th region. It is built over against the seraglio, in that which is called the fig-quarter. It stands upon the S. side of a considerable steep hill, jetting out into a promontory on the N. side of the harbour. It is defended by pretty good walls, flanked with old towers; and comprehending the houses built without the walls, may be reckoned a good large town and very populous. This suburb is peopled by Christians and Jews more than by Turks, and is the resort of merchants, who have a good bazar. You go up from Galata to Pera, a suburb situated beyond the gate of Galata.

The situation of Pera is perfectly charming, as from it there is a view of part of the coast of Asia and of the Grand Signior's seraglio. The ambassadors of England, France, Venice, and Holland, have their palaces in Pera. From Pera you go down to Topana, another suburb, just as you enter the canal of the Black Sea. Here such as have a mind to divert themselves on the water usually take boat. Nothing is so agreeable as the amphitheatre formed by the houses of Galata, Pera, and Topana, running from the top of the hills as far as the sea. Topana is somewhat less than either of the 2 others. Scutari, though situated on the opposite shore, on the coast of Asia, is likewise reckoned a suburb of Constantinople, the strait here not being much above a mile over. It is a large and beautiful town, and the only one upon the Bosphorus on the Asiatic side. It is seated part on a plain and part on a hill, and is agreeable enough, especially in summer, upon account of its greens and good fruits. There are very good bazars, or market-places, in the lower part of the town.

The famous canal, which separates the 2 best quarters of the earth, Europe and Asia, is commonly called the Hellespont or the Dardanelles; the first name being given it from Helle being drowned therein, as she was going to Colchis, with her brother Phrygeus, to carry the golden fleece: the second from Dardana, an ancient city, not far off, which would have been buried in oblivion, but for the peace which was there concluded between Mithridates and Sylla, general of the Roman army. This canal is in a fine country, bounded on each side with fruitful hills, on which are seen sometimes vineyards, sometimes olive plantations, and large spots of arable land. As you go in, you have Thrace and Cape Greek on the left hand; Phrygia and Cape Janissary on the right; the Propontis or sea of Marmora presents itself on the N. and the Archipelago remains behind on the S. The mouth of the canal is four miles and a half over, and is defended by the 2 castles which Mohammed IV. built there in 1659, to secure his fleets against the insults of the Venetians, who used to come and attack it in sight of the old castles. The waters that pass through this canal, from out of the Propontis, are as rapid as if they flowed beneath a bridge, and when the N. wind blows, no ship can enter; but when it is S. you hardly perceive any current at all: You must only beware of the castles, and yet the passage might be forced without much danger, the castles being above 4 miles asunder. The Turkish artillery, however monstrous it looks, would not much annoy the ships, if they had a good wind and went in file. The port-holes of the cannon belonging to these castles, look like coach-house doors; but the cannon, not being set on carriages, cannot fire above once; and who would dare to charge them in the presence of ships of war, that would pour in such broadsides upon them as would soon demolish the walls of the castles, which are not terraced, and bury beneath their ruins both guns and gunners? Half a dozen bombs would do the business. Such merchant ships as come from Constantinople, stop 3 days at the castle on the Asiatic shore, to be searched, whether they have any of the Turks slaves on board; and yet there passes not a day but some or other of these poor creatures make a shift to escape.

No ship of war of whatever nation, is exempted from being thus visited, without an express order from the Porte; it is true, it is rather a ceremony than a search. The greatest length of the sea of Marmora, which lies between the canal of Constantinople, or Bosphorus of Thrace, and that of the Dardanelles, is about 150 miles, and its greatest breadth about 45. It is so much encompassed by land on all sides, that it resembles a lake. The climate is so temperate, that it is neither subject to sharp colds, nor burning heats; which occasioned so many famous cities to be built on both sides of it in ancient times.

CONSTANTINOW, a town of Volhinia, in Little Poland, has a well-fortified castle, near the source of the river Slucz; 96 miles N. of Kaminiec. Lat. 50, 21, N. Long. 26, 49, E.

CONSUEGRA, a town of La Mancha and New Castile, in Spain; at the foot of a mountain, and is defended by 2 castles. It is a commendary of the order of Malta.

CONTENTAYNA, a bourg of Valencia in Spain; on Mount Mariola, where grows an uncommon variety of rare plants and medicinal herbs. This place gives title of count.

CONTESSA, or CONTESSA, a place in Macedonia, at the mouth of the Strymon, now Stroma, which falls into the gulph thence called Sinus Strymonicus, and now the gulph of Conteffa.

It lies 20 miles from the ruins of Philippi, to the S. W. and 69 E. of Salonichi. Lat. 41, 20 N. Long. 25, 27, E.

CONTI, a bourg of Amienois, on the little river Seile, and gives title of prince, which is in the second line of the royal house of Bourbon. It lies 18 miles S. W. of Amiens. Lat. 49, 46, N. Long. 2, 20, E.

CONVERSANO, a small city of Terra di Bari, in the kingdom of Naples, and is the see of a bishop, suffragan to that of Bari. It lies among high hills, on the Adriatic sea, and gives title of count, 14 miles E. of the city of Bari. Lat. 41, N. Long. 17, 25, E.

CONWAY, or ABER-CONWAY, a delightful-ly situated market-town of Caernarvonshire, in the N. of Wales, at the mouth of a river of the same name, with a spacious harbour, 229 miles from London. It is a large walled town, with a castle, and the houses are tolerably well built, but they do not fill up the space inclosed within the walls, which are nearly perfect. Near the town, corn, timber, and oak bark are in great plenty; and they clear out at the custom-house from 11 to 12,000 bushels of grain every year. A vast body of marcasite is found up the river, of which copperas is made; and it is thought that there are veins of copper ore near it. This town was formerly famous for a pearl-fishery; but though there are still plenty of pearl-muscles, they are neglected. Here is 1 church, in which they preach one Sunday in English, and another in Welch. It has a market on Friday, and fairs on April 6, Sept. 4, Oct. 10, and Nov. 8.

CONWAY, a river which separates Denbighshire from Caernarvonshire, and falls into the Irish sea at the town of Conway. It rises from a lake where these 2 counties join with Merionethshire.

CONWYDD, a village in Merionethshire, in N. Wales, with 1 fair on October 21, for sheep, horned cattle, and horses.

CONZA, an archiepiscopal see in the Farther Principate of the kingdom of Naples, at the foot of the Appennine mountains, near the source of the Aufidus or Ofante, and on the confines of the Capitanate and Hither Principate. It was destroyed by an earthquake in 1694, and lies 57 miles S. E. of Naples. Lat. 41, 30, N. Long. 16, 15, W.

COOLTICORMACK, a town in the county of Cork, and province of Munster, in the kingdom of Ireland, 24 miles S. of Limerick.

COOS, Cos, or LONGA, an island of Asiatic Turkey, near the S. W. coast of Asia Minor, and 56 miles N. W. of the Isle of Rhodes. It extends from N. to S. about 70 miles or upwards in circuit. It has a fruitful soil, and agreeable mountains in the the E. part. It is subject to the Turks, who are very careful of their cypress and turpentine trees. Here was Apelles' much admired picture of Venus rising out of the sea. He was a native of this island, as was Hippocrates.

Of the same name is the capital of the island, situated on the E. coast, E. long. 27, 38. lat. 36, 52, and is large, well-built and inhabited, and fortified, having a good convenient haven secured by a mole, and well guarded against pirates by galleys as well as by a good stout castle, which commands both it and the port, and all kept in good repair by the Turks. The ships that go to and from Constantinople, to Syria, Egypt, &c. do generally touch here. The next and only place in the island worth taking notice of is the castle of Bodron. It stands over against Coos, on the opposite coast, and is about 12 miles from it. It was formerly a good haven, but is now much choaked with sand. There are 7 gates at the entrance of the castle, over which are 300 coats of arms of the knights of Rhodes, who formerly commanded here; and beyond the 6th gate is a platform with 6 cannons pointed towards the sea; and the last gate, which is an iron one, is always kept by a good guard. The whole fortress is strong, walls high and of stone, cannon-proof. The sea surrounds it on one side, which is mounted with cannon to prevent the approach of strange ships; and on the land side it is very strong, and cannot be approached by horse. The only danger it labours under is of having its water cut off, which is conveyed to it by an aqueduct. The stately marble pillars of Hippocrates' house are still to be seen in the town of Harangues, among a number of other ancient houses of the same stone.

COOK'S-STRAITS, the opening to Charlotte Sound in New Zealand, so named from its discoverer in 1770.

COPENHAGEN, in Latin, Hafnia, the capital of the island of Zealand, and of all Denmark, and the royal residence. The appellation, which literally signifies the Merchants Port, seems to originate in the convenience and utility of a harbour equally beautiful and capacious. The city is situated upon a fine bay of the Baltic, near the strait called the Sound, on the eastern shore of Zealand, in 55, 40, N. lat. and 12, 56, E. long. and is 634 miles S. W. of Petersburg; 340 N. E. of Amsterdam; 580 N. E. of Paris; 450 N. W. of Vienna; and 560 N. E. of London.

Copenhagen was originally a mean little village of fishermen's huts, which, by the assistance of the bishops of Roschild, gradually rose to magnitude and consequence. It was in process of time constituted a city, and made the royal seat of the Danish sovereigns. The houses were formerly of wood, but in the year 1728 almost the whole were reduced to ashes by fire; and since that time they have been more sumptuously and securely built of free-stone. The present superb palace was then erected at an immense expence, and the town embellished with various elegant houses for the nobility, magnificent churches, and some stately public edifices. The exchange of the East India company, their military repository, the king's stables, the college, the magazine of provisions, the orphan-house, the opera-house, and the martial academy, are all structures planned and finished with taste and elegance.

The citadel is a regular fort, defended by 5 good bastions, a double ditch full of water, and several advanced works. The arsenal is furnished with naval stores sufficient for the equipment of no inconsiderable armament; it exceeds that of Venice, and the royal fleet usually lie here. The harbour is surrounded by the fortifications of the town; and the entrance is so narrow, that only 1 ship can enter at a time. In the night-time this entrance is shut up by a strong boom laid a-crofs. The passage is defended on the one side by the cannon of the citadel, and on the other by a strong block-house, well mounted with heavy artillery. The whole haven is capable of containing 500 sail of large ships. It is inclosed by a wooden gallery, close to which every ship has her appointed station; a circumstance that adds greatly to the beauty and conveniency of the scene, than which nothing can be more rich and regular, when a number of shipping happen to lie in the port. The harbour owes most of its excellence to the little island of Amack, which diverts the waves, and shelters it from the surge of the sea. Here stands that lofty range of houses known by the name of the New Town.

The whole city is about 5 miles in circumference, and from the space it occupies in the bottom of a spacious bay, which embraces the sea in the form of an amphitheatre, and the declivity of the situation, exhibiting as it were in detail all the natural and artificial beauties of the place; it makes a most magnificent appearance at a distance. This metropolis contains 4 royal castles; 10 parish and 9 other churches; a considerable number of public and private palaces; above 4000 burghers houses, several of which accommodate 10 or more families; 11 markets and public places, areas, or squares; 186 streets, and 100,000 inhabitants. The city in general is divided into 3 parts; Old Copenhagen, New Copenhagen, and Christianshafen. The 2 last, more modern than the first, are laid out in broad streets running in a straight line. Those in the Old town since the last great fire are sufficiently broad; but their original obliquities could not entirely be avoided. Except in a few lanes and obscure corners, all all the buildings are of brick and stone, which gives to the whole uncommon magnificence and splendor, and renders Copenhagen one of the finest, most beautiful, and elegant cities in Europe. Between Copenhagen and Christianshafen, there is a lofty pillar erected in the middle of the water, on which is a statue representing a naked woman with a swan.

The police of Copenhagen is exceedingly good, and one may walk through the whole city at midnight with the most perfect safety; no robberies, no assassinations. Indeed it is usually almost as quiet here at 11 o'clock at night as in a country village; and scarce a coach passes through the streets.

I do not apprehend this capital can be above the fourth part of the size of London, possibly not so much. It is fortified towards the land by a fosse, always full of water. The streets are commonly of a good breadth, and the houses very neat and handsome. There is one very beautiful place here which approaches nearer to a circus than a square, each side or division of which is only one palace, and in the center is an equestrian statue in bronze of the late king Frederick V.

The royal palace, called Rosenburg, is a small edifice, and built in the semi-gothic taste. It is, however, a grand structure, and adorned with 1 large and 2 small towers, and surrounded by a ditch and fort of fortification. The adjoining gardens are very extensive, and are embellished with a profusion of ornaments. In summer, they serve the inhabitants for a public and pleasure walk; and the royal family at times continues here for some days. The third story of this palace is most remarkable, as it contains a treasure of inestimable value. In the great hall, which includes the whole floor, are 5 pieces of painting by the celebrated Danish virtuoso, Krogk; 12 valuable pieces of tapestry, which represent the achievements of Christian V. and 3 silver lions as big as the life, which are placed round the throne at the king's inauguration. In 2 cabinets adjoining to the hall, the old and new regalia, and other valuable jewels, and a whole service of gold are kept. Another cabinet contains a collection of all manner of curious drinking-glasses, and other glass vessels. In a third apartment stands the royal throne, which is used at the accession.

The new palace was built by the present king's grandfather, Christian VI. and though it cost 6,000,000 of dollars, yet the inscription over the grand portal declares, that the sovereign erected it from the ordinary revenues of the crown, without laying any additional taxes or imposts upon his subjects.

Besides the supreme and other colleges, here are literary societies, academies of painting and drawing, the surgeons theatre, trading companies, the bank, insurance offices, and several manufactories, in which silk and woollen stuffs, cloths, linen, gold and silver lace, porcelain, &c. are made; and the port is frequented by a great number of ships annually. The tower of Trinity-church, designed by the celebrated astronomer, Logomontap, for an observatory, is round, 115 feet high, and 54 feet in diameter. It is flat on the top, and surrounded by an iron balustrade. The ascent is spiral, and so spacious and easy, that a coach and horses may be drove up and down with ease, which experiment was tried in 1716 by Peter the Great of Russia. The apparatus of Tycho Brahe, and other astronomers, and many valuable books and manuscripts were destroyed with a part of this building in 1728.

In the history of this city, it is observed, that from a mean fishing place in the 11th century, it rose to a city in 1254, and then continued an episcopal seat till 1443, in which year it became the residence of the kings of Denmark, and has remained such to the present time. In 1360 and 1372, it was taken and plundered by the Hanse-towns, and in the years 1306, 1428, 1523, 1535, 1658, and 1659, it was closely besieged. The plague visited here in 1546, 1571, 1583, 1601, 1629, 1637, 1659, and in 1711, swept away a great number of inhabitants. In 1626, this city was considerably enlarged, and in 1700 it was bombarded by the British, Dutch, and Swedish fleets. The fire in 1728, alluded to above, broke out on the 20th of October; and in 48 hours destroyed 24 streets, &c. 1650 houses, 5 churches, the university, the council-house, and several public buildings. The anniversary of this accident is kept in a religious manner.

COOPER'S-ISLAND, one of the lesser Virgin Isles in the West-Indies, situated on the S. W. of Ginger-island. It is about 5 miles long, and 1 broad; but not inhabited. Long. 62. 57. Lat. 18. 5.

COPERA. See PLASENTIA.

COPET, a small, yet walled town of Berne, in Switzerland, in a country abounding with vines and fruit, with a handsome castle and gardens, belonging to count Dohna. It is half way between Nyon and Geneva.

COPHTI, or COPTI, a name given to the ancient inhabitants of Egypt, in Africa, and is still applied to a sect of Christians residing there; who are the remains or descendants of them.

COPIAPO, a port town of Chili, in S. America, at the mouth of a river of the same name; W. long. 75. lat. 25. It is an open Spanish town, the houses of which are disorderly scattered, in which are above 900 souls. There are gold mines directly above the town, and others at 2 or 3 leagues distance, whence they bring the ore on mules to the mills; and the ounce of gold is sold here for 12 or 13 pieces of eight cast. Besides the gold, hereabout are mines of iron, brass, tin, lead, which they disdain to work; also much load-stone and lapis lazuli, which the people of the country know not to be of value. On the high mountains of Cordillera, 40 leagues S. E. from this port, are mines of the finest sulphur that can be seen, which is taken pure from a vein 2 feet wide, without needing to be cleansed, and is worth 3 pieces of eight a quintal (100 wt.) at this port, whence it is carried to Lima. All the country is full of mines of Sal Gemm, whereby sweet water is very scarce. Saltpetre is found in the vale, an inch thick on the ground.
8 S. which

COPILOWATS, a middling town of Widinsangiacate and Bulgaria, in European Turkey, where formerly several Albanian merchants of the Roman Catholic religion resided; but were driven out in 1700. Lat. 43, 40, N. Long. 27, 30, E.

COPORIA, a town of the Russian empire, at the mouth of a small river of the same name, in Ingria. It was ceded to the Swedes in 1617, but it was taken from them by Peter the Great, in the beginning of the present century. Long. 29, 50, E. Lat. 59, 36, N.

COPPER-ISLAND. See ARCHIPELAGO, Northern.

COPPER-QUIN, a small town on the Black-water, over which it has a good bridge, in the county of Cork. Here is a fine old castle, handsome barracks, and a church as old as the castle. The country round is beautiful.

COPPINSHA, one of the Orkney islands in the N. of Scotland, abounding with grain and pasture, has a good fishery, and abundance of fowl. It is very conspicuous to seamen, as is the holm to the N. E. of it, called the horse of Coppinsha.

COQUET-ISLE, in Northumberland, between Seaton and Aylmouth, which takes its name from the river; had anciently both a castle and monastery, but the soil is so barren, that except a few huts for the diggers of sea-coal, it has only 1 house. Such flocks of wild fowl continually harbour here, that sometimes it is impossible to walk far on it without treading on their eggs, which the fishermen sell to the neighbourhood; but the air, by reason of the frequent fogs here, is very unhealthy; and it is often troubled with storms.

COQUIMBO, a sea-port town of S. America, in Chili, seated on a river of the same name. It abounds in fruits, and mines of different metals, and the fields are always green, though it seldom or never rains. It has a good harbour, and has been often pillaged by the English. Long. 61, 59, W. Lat. 29, 44, S.

COQUINCHINA. See COCHINCHINA.

CORALAM, one of the most considerable cities in India, and Mogul empire, in Asia. It stands in the center of the Malabar and Coromandel coasts.

CORASAN. See CHORASAN.

CORBACH, a town of Hesse, on the Upper Rhine, in Germany. It has a well-endowed university and gold mine in its neighbourhood. Its principal trade is in brewing of beer. The Allies were defeated near here by the French in 1760. It is subject to the prince of Waldeck. Lat. 51, 29, N. Long. 8, 36, W.

CORBAU, (county of,) in Hungarian Dalmatia, on the river Unna. Its W. part is occupied by the Hungarians, and E. by the Turks, who have a strong garrison in the castle of Udbinva.

CORBECK, a town of Brabant, in the Austrian Netherlands, 5 miles S. E. of Louvain. Lat. 51, 10, N. Long. 4, 39, E.

CORBELL, in Latin, Corbolum, or Josedum, a town of La Brie Françoise, in the government of the Isle of France. It stands at the junction of the Juine or Effone, with the Seine; by which last river it is divided into the Old and New town. It has 2 stone-bridges; the one over the Seine, and the other over the Juine, 2 suburbs, a collegiate church, 3 parish-churches, 2 priories, &c. Its principal trade is in hides, 18 miles S. of Paris. Lat. 48, 36, N. Long. 2, 38, E.

CORBIERES, a small territory of Narbonne, diocese, in Lower Languedoc, in France; remarkable, as on the plain of the same name the Saracens were defeated in the year 737.

CORBIGNY, or St. MARCOUL, a bourg of Le Laonnois, in the Isle of France, where is the celebrated church and Benedictine abbey of St. Marculf, where formerly the kings of France, after their unction, used to perform a neuvaine, i. e. 9 days prayers: upon which it was then believed, that they acquired the power of healing scrophulas; but now they send thither one of their almoners.

A town also of the same name, or St. Leonard, in the vallies of Yonne, and government of Nivernois, in France; near which is likewise a Benedictine abbey.

CORBY, a town of Amienois, in the government of Picardy and Artois, in France, on the river Somme. It has 5 parish-churches, a beautiful abbey, &c. Its works have been demolished ever since Lewis XIII.'s time, 7 miles E. of Amiens. Lat. 50, 20, N. Long. 2, 47, E.

Also of the same name is a town and abbey of Westphalia, in Germany, on the Weser, whose whose abbot has a seat in the imperial diet, being a sovereign prince, with pretty extensive territories, 36 miles E. of Paderborn. Lat. 51, 46, N. Long. 9, 25, E.

CORBY, a village in Lincolnshire, 12 miles N. of Stamford, with 2 fairs, viz. on August 26, and on Monday before October 10, for horses and horned cattle.

CORCANG, otherwise called Jurgantz, a town seated on a river anciently called Oxus, which ran from the Caspian Sea to the lake Aral, but the Tartars have found out means to dry up the channel.

CORCYRA, (now Corfu,) an island in the Ionian sea, was in more ancient times called Drepane, Scheria, and Phæacia. The name Corcyra, (which was also given to another island in the Adriatic over against Illyricum,) it took from a nymph so called, whom Neptune is said to have ravished here. It was once famous for the delightful gardens of king Alcinous, who with great courtesy entertained Ulysses after his shipwreck. It had anciently 2 cities of no small note, Corcyra and Cassiope. The former was the metropolis, and very powerful, as appears from Thucydides and others, who have given us account of their wars. The latter is commended by Pliny and Ptolemy, as a wealthy well-built city; but Cicero calls it only a haven. This island is said to have been first inhabited by the Phæaces, whence named Phæacia; but afterwards the Corinthians sent thither a numerous colony, which made Thucydides reckon it among the countries peopled by the Corinthians. The Corcyraeans were skilful mariners, and, as Thucydides informs, for some time masters of the sea. Their government was first monarchical, but afterwards they formed themselves into a republic, and made a very considerable figure in the flourishing times of Greece. Herodotus tells us they were very powerful by land, and had more ships than any other people of Greece except the Athenians. As to its modern state, see CORFU.

CORDILLERAS, the famous chain of mountains consisting of 2 ridges, that traverse America from S. to N. called the Cordilleras of the Andes. See ANDES.

CORDONA. See CARDONA.

CORDOVA, anciently Corduba, or Colonia Patricia, a fine, trading, and royal city, of a kingdom of the same name, and subdivision of Andalusia, in Spain; on the river Guadalquivir, and at the foot of a high mountain, which is a branch of the Sierra Morena. In its circuit it includes several vineyards and gardens, and has fine large suburbs. Its bishop is a suffragan to Toledo, with a yearly income of 40,000 ducats. The roof of the large cathedral is supported with 365 pillars of different sorts of marble; and, having been a mosque in the time of the Moors, it is still called Mezquita. The episcopal palace is large; the late inquisition-court stands on the river, and the royal palace at the end of the town, to the W. The neighbouring mountains, besides gardens and vineyards, are full of groves of citron, orange, fig, and olive-trees. It contains 14,000 souls; has an university, and a good trade in excellent wine, silk, and Cordovan leather. It lies 73 miles N. E. of Seville. Lat. 38, 10, N. Long. 4, 53, W.

CORDOVAN, (tower of,) a remarkable light-house at the mouth of the Garonne, in Guyenne, in France. Lat. 45, 30, N. Long. 1, 11, W.

CORDOVA, (De la Nueva Andalucia,) a city in South America, and kingdom of Peru, subject to the jurisdiction of Charcas, 80 leagues S. of Santiago del Estero. Here is the episcopal church of Tucuman, with some monasteries, besides a convent of Jesuits. It is very fruitful in grain, fruits, honey, and wax, cotton, and sugars, with luxuriant pastures for mules, who are inconceivably numerous in this part, which also abounds with salt-pits. It is situated on a marshy, though rich and fertile ground, and drives a considerable trade in the above-mentioned commodities with Peru, it lying on the road to Buenos Ayres. The inhabitants are Spaniards, amounting to about 300, who are also employed in tilling the ground, and manufacturing of cotton cloth, which they send to Potosi. Lat. 31, 30, S. Long. 63, 30, W.

CORDUA, (New,) a considerable town of S. America, in the province of Tucuman, with a bishop's see, 175 miles of St. Jago. Long. 62, 5, W. Lat. 32, 10, S.

COREA, a peninsula lying to the N. E. of China, between 99 and 109 degrees of E. Long. and between 32 and 46 of N. Lat. It is divided into 8 provinces, which contain 40 cities of the first rank, 51 of the second, and 70 of the third. The capital of the whole is Hanching, where the king resides. The Jesuits say the people are well-made, of a sweet and tractable disposition, and fond of learning, music, and dancing, and in general resemble the Chinese. Their houses are mean, being covered with thatch; and they have no beds, but lie on the floor. They have little silk, and therefore make use of linen-cloth in its room. Their arms are cross-bows, and very long sabres or swords. Their trade consists in white paper, pencils, ginseng, gold, silver, iron, yellow varnish, fowls, whose tails are 3 feet long, horses no more than 3 feet in height, sable-skins, castor, and mineral salt. In general it is a fertile country, though abounding in mountains. They never bury their dead till 3 years after their decease, but keep them close shut up in coffins for that time. It is tributary to China.

CORFE-CASTLE, a town of Dorsetshire, in the

the middle of the island of Purbeck, 121 miles from London, and 20 miles from Weymouth; has its name from a castle, supposed to have been built by king Edgar, who kept his court here; and it being a royal demesne, great privileges have been granted to it by him, and others of our monarchs. It has a large lofty church, which is a royal peculiar, exempt from episcopal jurisdiction or visitation. It was a borough by prescription, but incorporated by queen Elizabeth, and afterwards by Charles II. with the stile of mayor and barons, having the same privileges as the Cinque-ports; and this in particular, that the chief members, especially those who have been mayors, are called barons. The mayor, as is also his predecessor, is a justice of peace, can hold sessions, choose coroners for life, counsellors, ass-tasters, &c. which were privileges granted by king Charles I. as a reward for the noble defence the castle made for him. It appears, that the circumference was near half a mile by the ruins of the walls, which, standing on a high eminence, are visible a great way. Here is a market on Thursday, and fairs on May 12, and October 19.

CORFU, anciently Corcyra, by the Greeks called Corfi, and Corfous, is situated in the Mediterranean, near the entrance of the gulph of Venice, under the 39th degree lat. and 20th of E. long. It is allowed to be now 120 miles in compass. Pliny gave it 135; but he included with it that of Pazo, which runs along the side of it about 12 miles distance, and might be much nearer to it in his time. It extends along the coasts called Della Chimera, (anciently Acroceraunii, from the mountains of that name,) from N. to S. about 50 miles. Its figure is somewhat like a wedge, it being widest towards the N. W. side, and growing narrowest towards S. E. till it comes almost to a point. This island is very healthy and well inhabited, it being computed to have about 60,000 souls in it. It hath indeed but 2 cities, viz. Corfu the capital, and Cassopo.

The present city Corfu, is not, however, the ancient Corcyra; for this is now called Palæpoli, and stands at some distance from it, and all 3 seated on the E. coast, where it is divided from the land by a narrow strait. Here are reckoned about 100 villages, some pretty large, populous, and wealthy. The Venetians have been in possession of it ever since 1386, when the Corcyreans did of their own accord put themselves under their protection and government. After which Laodislaus yielded all his pretensions to it for 30,000 ducats. It is esteemed the quay of the Adriatic gulph, and hath been often attempted in vain by the Turks, being defended by the fortress called St. Angelo, thought impregnable. Corfu city is also very strong, and keeps constantly between 15 and 20 galleys, besides other vessels, for its guard. It hath besides 2 fortresses; the oldest situate on a steep craggy rock, and surrounded below with strong bastions; the other fortified at immense charge; and the city, which 100 years ago, we are told, was but the old fortress and suburb of the ancient Castrati, is now one of the strongest places in all these coasts. It furnishes Venice with vast quantities of salt, and is very fertile in corn, wine, oil, all sorts of fruits, timber-trees, cedar especially. It is governed by a provisor, camerlingo, and castellano, who are Venetian nobles; as is the archbishop of it, who is primated and metropolitan of all these Venetian islands. The cathedral is a fine building, as is that of the Greeks, both which are enriched with reliques, paintings, and costly ornaments. There are many other noble churches and structures here, and in other parts of the island; and in the capital alone are computed 20,000 inhabitants.

CORIA, (city of,) in Latin, Cauria, in Spanish Estremadura, on the little river Alagon, in a very fruitful plain. Its bishop is a suffragan to the archbishop of Santiago, with a yearly income of 20,000 ducats. In its neighbourhood is a very delightful district, called La Verde Plazencia, i. e. the orchard of Placentia. It lies 37 miles N. of Alcantara. Lat. 39, 59 N. Long. 6, 46, W.

CORIANA, a noted promontory of Galicia, in Spain, not far from the town of Mongia.

CORIENTES, (Las,) a city of Buenos Ayres, in S. America, on the eastern banks of the river Plata, about 100 leagues N. of Santa Fé.

CORIENTES, (Cape,) a promontory on the W. coast of Mexico, in N. America, on the Pacific ocean, and 100 miles S. of Xalisco. Lat. 20, 20, N. Long. 108, W.

Of the same name is another cape in Africa, on the Indian ocean. Lat. 24, 18, N. Long. 36, 49, E.

CORIGLIANO, a place in the Hither Calabria of Naples, noted for a silver mine.

CORINTH, a celebrated city of antiquity, for some time the most illustrious of all the Greek cities. It is said to have been founded 1514 years before Christ, by Sisyphus the son of Eolus, and grandfather to Ulysses. Various reasons are given for its name, but most authors derive it from Corinthus, the son of Pelops. It was situated in the S. part of the isthmus which joins the Peloponnesus, now the Morea, to the continent. It consisted of a citadel built upon an eminence, and thence named Acrocorinthus; besides which it had 2 maritime towns subject to it, named Lecheum and Cenchrea. The whole state extended scarce half a degree in length or breadth; but so advantageously were the above-mentioned ports situated, that they might have have gained the Corinthians a superiority, if not a command over all Greece, had not their advantageous situation inclined them to commerce rather than war. For their citadel was almost impregnable; and commanding both the Ionian and Aegean seas, they could easily cut off all communication from one half of Greece with the other; for which reason this city was called, one of the fetters of Greece.

But as the genius of the Corinthians led them to commerce rather than martial exploits, their city became the finest in all Greece. It was adorned with the most sumptuous buildings, as temples, palaces, theatres, porticos, &c. all of them enriched with a beautiful kind of columns, which from the city were called Corinthian. But though the Corinthians seldom or never engaged in a war with a view of enlarging, but rather of defending their little state, they did not forget to cultivate a good discipline both in time of peace and of war. Hence many brave and experienced generals have been furnished by Corinth to the other Grecian cities, and it was not uncommon for the latter to prefer a Corinthian general to any of their own.

This city continued to preserve its liberty till the year before Christ 146, when it was pillaged and burnt by the Romans. It was at that time the strongest place in the world; but the inhabitants were so disheartened by a preceding defeat, and the death of their general, that they had not presence of mind enough even to shut their gates. The Roman consul, Mummius, was so much surprised at this, that at first he could scarce believe it; but afterwards fearing an ambuscade, he advanced with all possible caution. As he met with no resistance, his soldiers had nothing to do but destroy the few inhabitants who had not fled, and plunder the city. Such of the men as had fled, were all put to the sword, and the women were sold for slaves. After this the city was ransacked by the greedy soldiers, and the spoils of it are said to be immense. There were more vessels of all sorts of metal, more fine pictures, and statues done by the greatest masters, in Corinth, than in any other city in the world.

All the princes of Europe and Asia, who had any taste in painting and sculpture, furnished themselves here, with their richest moveables; here were cast the finest statues for temples and palaces, and all the liberal arts brought to their greatest perfection. Many inestimable pieces of the most famous painters and statuarys fell into the hands of the ignorant soldiers, who either destroyed them or parted with them for trifles. Polybius the historian was an eye witness to this barbarism of the Romans. He had the mortification to see 2 of them playing at dice on a famous picture of Aristides, which was accounted one of the wonders of the world. The piece was a Bacchus, so exquisitely done, that it was proverbially said of any extraordinary performance, "it is as well done as the Bacchus of Aristides." This masterly piece of painting, however, the soldiers willingly exchanged for a more convenient table to play upon; but when the spoils of Corinth were put up to sale, Attalus king of Pergamus offered for it 600,000 sesterces, near 5000l. of our money. Mummius was surprised at such a high price offered for a picture, and imagined there must be some magical virtue in it. He therefore interposed his authority, and carried it to Rome, notwithstanding the complaints of Attalus. Here this famous picture was lodged in the temple of Ceres, where it was at last destroyed by fire, together with the temple. Another extraordinary instance of the stupidity of Mummius is, that when the pictures were put on board the transports, he told the masters of the vessels very seriously, that if any of the things were either lost or spoiled, he would oblige them to find others at their own cost; as if any other pieces could have supplied the place of those inestimable originals, done by the greatest masters in Greece. When the city was thoroughly pillaged, fire was set to all the corners of it at the same time. The flames grew more violent as they drew near the centre, and at last uniting there, made one prodigious conflagration. At this time the famous metalline mixture is said to have been made, which could never afterwards be imitated by art.

The gold, silver, and brass, which the Corinthians had concealed, were melted, and ran down the streets in streams, and when the flames were extinguished, a new metal was found composed of several different ones, and greatly esteemed in after ages. The walls of the city were then demolished, and rased to the foundation; but the city was rebuilt again by Julius Cæsar, and made a Roman colony. It continued subject to the Roman emperors till the division of the empire, after which it fell to the share of those of Constantinople. On the decline of that empire it fell to the Venetians, but was taken from them by Mohammed II. The Venetians retook it in 1678, but the Turks became masters of it again in 1715, and have kept it ever since. It is now greatly decayed, for the houses are not contiguous, but intermixed with fields and gardens, which make it look like a village. The country about it abounds with corn, wine, and oil; and from its castle, is one of the finest prospects in the world, over the sea to the E. and W. and a fertile country to the N. and S. The narrowest part of the isthmus, on which it stands, is above 6 miles over. There are still to be seen the ruins of the temples dedicated to the Sun, Pluto, Diana,

C O
Neptune, Ceres, and Bacchus. The inhabitants are most of them Christians, of the Greek church, who are allowed liberty of conscience by the Turks. E. Long. 28, 13. N. Lat. 38, 14.

CORINTH, (the isthmus of,) in the Morea, is a neck of land which joins the Morea to Greece, and reaches from the gulph of Lepanto to that of Egina. Julius Cæsar, Caligula, and Nero, attempted to cut a channel through it, but in vain; and they therefore afterwards built a wall across it, which they called Hexamilium, because it was 6 miles in length. This was demolished by Amurat II. and afterwards rebuilt by the Venetians, but was levelled a second time by Mahomet II.

CORISCO. There are 2 islands of this name on the coast of S. Guinea, distinguished by the adjectives of Great and Little. At the former the Dutch had once a settled trading-lodge; but they lost it. The said 2 islands are agreeable to fight, for the land is so low, that at a distance the multitude of trees there seeming planted in the water, afford a very pleasant prospect.

CORITA, a town of Leon in Spain, 23 miles E. of Salamanca. Lat. 31, 15. N. Long. 5, 29. E.

CORK, the capital of the county of the same name, in the province of Munster, is a large and extensive city, 3 miles in length, and near 2 in breadth, seated on the river Lea, which divides itself into 2 branches, about a mile above the city, 1 branch running on the N. side, and the other on the S. under 2 well-built bridges. Several canals intersect this city, by which means ships are brought up almost to every street to load and unload. Some of the streets are very broad, but the greatest part of the city is composed of lanes, very narrow. The houses are old and inelegant, but the new city as it is called, built at times since 1718, on ground which has been gained from the river, is built in a much better manner.

The 2 gates, N. and S. of the old city are good buildings, and used as prisons. Near the N. gate is an old tower converted into a powder-magazine, and the custom-house, market-house, exchange, and court-house, are good buildings. Here are 7 protestant churches, 11 mass-houses, and 4 dissenting meeting-houses, and several charity-schools, and alms-houses. On a bridge thrown over one of the canals is an equestrian statue of George II. and here is also a statue of William III. and a pedestrian one of the great earl of Chatham. In this city are 2 public walks, a theatre, and plenty of sedans, but no hackney coaches, and the coffee-houses and taverns are numerous and well-conducted. The exports of this city, except in the article of linen, are greater than those of Dublin; and it may be called the warehouse for supplying the British fleet and garrisons in all parts of the world, with most kinds of provision.

The island on which the city stands was walled before the English had any footing in the kingdom, and those walls were repaired by king John. The old citadel is now converted into barracks, it commanded the town and was once formidable. Oliver Cromwell took this city after a short siege, and taking all the bells out of the churches had them cast into cannon. The earl of Marlborough also took it in 5 days for William III. and it was twice burnt by accident in the reign of James I. Cork harbour is large enough to contain the whole royal navy of Great-Britain, and has a good entrance secured by 2 head-lands, on 1 of which stands the ruins of an old fort, and though cannon planted here would command the entrance of the harbour, there are none. The ships anchor in the harbour off the village called the Cove of Cork, and are secure from all danger; and the 2 islands of Spike and Hawlebowling, shelter them from the land floods and the tides of ebb. On the latter are the remains of an old fortification erected by queen Elizabeth; also an apartment in which a society who delight in sailing, dines on Saturdays, and here is the station for their pleasure-boats. One side of Cork harbour is formed by Barrymore island; and Cove is chiefly inhabited by fishermen, with a few custom-house officers. Between Cove and Cork is a place called Passage, where all ships above 200 tons burthen load and unload; and between this place and Cork is a little island. The environs of Cork are picturesque and beautiful, and enriched with a great number of gentlemen's seats.

CORLIN, a pleasant town of Brandenburg Pomerania, in Germany, with a very good castle on the river Persant, 13 miles E. of Colberg.

CORLINGFORD, a market-town in the county of Lowth, and province of Ulster, in Ireland. It stands on a bay, and sends 2 members to parliament.

CORMEILES, a large bourg and barony of Upper Normandy, in the government of the latter name, in France. It contains 3 parish-churches, and an abbey.

CORMENTIN, (Village,) in the kingdom of Saboe, on the coast of S. Guinea, lies somewhere to the E. of Agga, being so inconsiderable it would deserve no mention here but for the fertility of the country round about, and the Dutch fort Amsterdamm, which commands it. This was the chief residence of the English, till drove out by Admiral de Ruyter, in 1665, but much enlarged and beautified by the Dutch in 1681 and 1682; being a square fort, built with hard rock stone and lime, strengthened by 3 small, and 1 fine large battery, mounted with with 20 cannon; and within is a very large square tower, in the midst, with a cupola on it. There are all offices for use of the commander and garrison of 25 whites, besides Grometto blacks. The breast-works are large, and the prospect from the tower delightful. Large cisterns hold rain-water. It is strong by nature, standing on a rocky hill, in most places steep and craggy, and only accessible by a lane cut into steps along the descent of the hill.

CORMERY, a town of France, in Tourain, with a rich Benedictine abbey. It is very pleasantly seated on the river Indre, 8 miles from Tours. Long. 0, 18, W. Lat. 5, 30, N.

CORNA, KORNA, GORNA, GUORNA, in Yerack or Chaldea, is a considerable fortress on the conflux of the Tigris and Euphrates, 20 leagues above Balfora, (so that vessels may go to it in 7 hours, if wind and tide favour,) E. long. 48, 15, Lat. 31, 3. Here account is taken of all merchandise and persons going up these rivers, and the former pay custom here. It hath 3 stout castles, one on the point where these 2 rivers meet, and which is the largest and strongest of the 3. The second on the Chaldean side, and the third on that towards Arabia; and the tide comes up to the town.

CORNET CASTLE, a fortification upon a small island to the right hand of the pier of St. Peter's, in Guernsey. Lat. 49, 40, N. Long. 2, 42, W.

CORNETO, a town of St. Peter's Patrimony, in the Ecclesiastical State, on a hill, at the foot of which runs the Marta. Its bishopric is united with that of Monte Fiascone. The trade here is chiefly in oil, and next to that in grain. It lies 5 miles E. of the Tuscan sea, and 38 N. W. of Rome. Lat. 42, 26, N. Long. 12, 56, E.

CORNHILL, a village in the bishoprick of Durham, with one fair, on December 6, for pedlars goods.

CORNIGLIA, one of the 5 places near each other called Le Cinque Terre, not far from the strong castle of S. Maria della Suorte, on the bay of Spezza, and Genoese dominions.

CORNWALL. This county extends the farthest of any part of Great-Britain to the W. and is bounded by the English channel S. St. George's channel W. Bristol channel N. and it is parted from Devonshire E. by the Tamer. From E. to W. it is about 70 miles; about 40 broad near Devon, but not above 5 from Mountsbay to St. Ives, where it is narrowest. It has 9 hundreds, 21 parliament boroughs, 27 market-towns, 89 vicarages, 161 parishes, besides chapels of ease, and 12 or 1300 villages. Its circumference is computed at 150 miles, and its acres about 960,000; but according to a survey in the reign of king Edward I. as told by Carew, it contained then 1,500,000; which makes it probable that the Scilly islands were once of a part of it, though since divided by the sea, therefore called the Lioness. Its chief rivers are the Tamer and Hamel. The air is clear and healthy, but sharp; and its being almost encompassed by the sea, subjects it to violent flaws of wind. The spring is more backward, summer more temperate, autumn fruits and corn-harvest later, but winter milder, than elsewhere in England. Though so mountainous and rocky, it has all kinds of soil. In vallies is plentiful pasture. The land near the sea is manured with a sea weed, called oreweed and seasand. Here are the best slate tiles, which are exported in great quantities as well as used at home; as also the moor-stone, which has been used for the curb-stones in new paving London, &c. and is of great use in building. It lies in vast quantities upon the moors, and some of the stones are very large and lie in heaps. This stone when polished looks as well as Egyptian granite. This county abounds with mines of tin, copper, and lead; and along with the tin a yellow ore is dug called mundic, which affords copper as good as the Swedish.

The horses and cattle are generally small. The sheep, for the most part, have no horns, but their flesh is very good, and the wool fine. Here are foxes, badgers, and otters, and in the rivers and bays are trout, lobsters, oysters, plaice, soles, &c. But those they profit most by are pilchards, which swarm on the coasts from July to November, in such quantities that 500,000 have been caught at one draught, and 8 or 900 hogheads filled in one season at the fishery at Mousehole near Mountsbay. Here are multitudes of sea-fowl, with woodcocks and other land-fowl. The most remarkable is the Cornish chough. Pilchards are exported in vast quantities for foreign markets; for which they fit them by fuming, pressing, and pickling. They are salted, but not gutted, the entrails being reckoned the best part; and after having been piled in heaps in a cellar for 10 days, and pressed, to drain of the superfluous moisture of the blood and salt, they are barrelled up with pickle for France; but for Spain, Italy, and other hotter countries, without it. The people in general are well-bred, and the gentry so sociable and respectful to one another, that they commonly intermarry among themselves; whence arose the saying, "all Cornish folk are cousins." The natives have been long famed for wrestling and hurling.

Ever since Edward the III. created his eldest son the prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, the eldest sons sons of the kings of England are born with that title. And they not only appoint the sheriffs of this county, but have peculiar royalties and prerogative in certain actions, and in the stannaries, wrecks, customs, &c. for which they appoint several officers. This county, though but an angle of the kingdom, so remote from the royal residence, sends no less than 44 members to parliament. The chief metals and manufactures are tin and copper; the ore is brought above-ground in the stone, and broke with hammers, then carried to the stamping-mills, which make it ready for other mills, whereby it is ground to powder. After it is washed and cleared from the earth, &c. it is melted at the blowing-houses into pigs of 3 or 400 weight marked with the owner's name, and the value is set upon it at the coining-house, where it is assayed. The times for coining or marking are Midsummer and Michaelmas; and for such as have not their tin then ready, there is a post-coinage at Lady-day and Christmas. The stamp is the seal of the duchy of Cornwall. The tanners are regulated by stannary laws (so called from stannum, the Latin word for tin;) and the trials of their causes are by juries returned by the mayors of the stannary towns; and for which purpose courts are held by the lord warden of the stannaries, who has a deputy. When all legal duties are satisfied, the tinner may sell his tin where he will; only if the king or the duke of Cornwall have a mind to be purchasers, they have a right of pre-emption.

How long these mines have been discovered is not ascertained. It is apparent they were worked by the Britons in the Roman times, and that the Phœnicians had traded hither for tin. The Saxons seem to have neglected them; but after the Normans came, the earls of Cornwall were so enriched by them, that from time to time they granted the tanners new privileges, &c. one, that no Englishman in that duchy shall pay custom for exporting Cornish cloth; a privilege first granted by Edward the Black Prince, and has been always enjoyed, in consideration for their paying 4s. for the coinage of every 100 weight of tin, whereas Devonshire pays but 8d.

King Charles I. granted their trading to all parts of the world, in reward of their loyalty. The coinage towns are Liskard, Lestwithiel, Truro, Helfston, and Penzance. The Mundic, in which the tin lies, as in its bed, yields such a quantity of lapis calaminaris for making brass, that instead of importing it to a great amount, great quantities are exported.

CORNWALL, a territory of France, in Bretagne, which stretches out into the ocean. It comprehends the diocese of Quimper.

CORO. See VENEZUELA.

COROMANDEL, the eastern coast of the peninsula on this side the Ganges in Asia. It is bounded on the north by Golconda, on the east by the bay of Bengal, on the south by Madura, and on the west by Bimnagar. This coast so much resembles that of Orixa, that the Abbé Raynal chooses to consider them as one, and gives to both the general name of Coromandel. Here an excessive heat reigns from the beginning of May to the end of October. It begins at nine in the morning, and continues till nine in the evening. During the night it is allayed by a sea-breeze from the south-east; and most commonly this refreshing gale begins at three in the afternoon. The air is less inflamed during the rest of the year, though in all seasons it is very hot. It rains almost continually during the months of November and December. This immense tract is covered with a parched sand for the extent of two miles, and sometimes only one mile along the coast.

This country was at first neglected by the Europeans for many reasons. It was separated by inaccessible mountains from Malabar, where these bold adventurers endeavoured to settle themselves. Spices and aromatics, which were the principal objects of their attention, were not to be found there. In short, civil dissensions had banished from it tranquillity, security, and industry. At that period the empire of Bimnagar, to which this vast country was subject, was falling to ruin. The governments of Visapour, the Carnatic, Golconda, and Orixa, threw off their dependence, and assumed the title of kings. Those of Madura, Tanjore, Mysore, Gingi, and some others, likewise usurped the sovereign authority, though they retained their ancient title of Naick. This revolution had just happened when the Europeans appeared on the coast of Coromandel. The foreign trade was at that time inconsiderable; it consisted only of diamonds from Golconda, which were carried to Calicut and Surat, and from thence to Ormus or Suez, whence they were circulated through all Europe and Asia. Maffulipatan, the richest and most populous city of these countries, was the only market that was known for linens; they were purchased at a great fair annually holden there by the Arabian and Malayan vessels that frequented that bay, and by caravans arrived from distant parts. The linens were exported to the same places with the diamonds. The fondness for the manufactures of Coromandel, which began to prevail here, inspired all the European nations trading to the Indian seas with the resolution of forming settlements there. They were not discouraged either by the difficulty of conveying goods from the inland parts of the country, where there was no navigable river; by the total want of harbours, where the sea at one season season of the year is not navigable; by the barrenness of the coasts, for the most part uncultivated and uninhabited; nor by the tyranny and fluctuating state of the government. They thought that silver would be industriously sought after; that Pegu would furnish timber for building, and Bengal corn for subsistence; that a prosperous voyage of nine months would be more than sufficient to complete their ladings; and that by fortifying themselves they should be secure against the attacks of the weak tyrants that oppressed these countries.

The first European colonies were established near the shore. Some of them obtained a settlement by force; most of them were formed with the consent of the sovereigns; and all were confined to a very narrow tract of land. The boundaries of each were marked out by a hedge of thorny plants, which was their only defence. In process of time fortifications were raised; and the security derived from them, added to the lenity of the government, soon increased the number of colonists. The splendor and independence of these settlements several times raised the jealousy of the princes in whose dominions they were formed; but their attempts to demolish them proved abortive. Each colony increased in prosperity in proportion to the riches and the wisdom of the nation that founded it. None of the companies that exercised an exclusive privilege beyond the Cape of Good Hope had any concern in the trade of diamonds. This was always left to private merchants, and by degrees fell entirely into the hands of the English, or the Jews and Armenians that lived under their protection. At present this grand object of luxury and industry is much reduced. The revolutions that have happened in Indostan have prevented people from resorting to these rich mines; and the anarchy in which this unhappy country is plunged, leaves no room to hope that they will be again attended to. The whole of the commercial operations on the coast of Coromandel is confined to the purchase of cottons. The manufacturing of the white cottons bought there, differs so little from ours, that it would be neither interesting nor instructive to enter into a minute description of it. The process used in making their printed cottons, which was at first servilely followed in Europe, has since been rendered more simple, and brought to greater perfection by our manufacturers. The painted cottons which are brought there, we have not yet attempted to imitate. Those who imagine we have been prevented from undertaking this branch merely by the high price of labour among us, are mistaken. Nature has not given us the wild fruits and drugs necessary for the composition of those bright and indelible colours which constitute the principal merit of the Indian manufactures; nor hath she furnished us with the waters that serve to fix them. The Indians do not universally observe the same method in painting their cottons, either because there are some nicities peculiar to certain provinces, or because different soils produce different drugs for the same uses.

We should tire the patience of our readers were we to trace the slow and painful progress of the Indians in the art of painting their cottons. It is natural to believe that they owe it to length of time, rather than to the fertility of their genius. What seems to authorize this conjecture is, that they have stopped in their improvements, and have not advanced a single step in the arts for many ages; whereas we have proceeded with amazing rapidity. Indeed, were we to consider only the want of invention in the Indians, we should be tempted to believe, that from time immemorial, they have received the arts they cultivate from some more industrious nation; but when it is remembered that these arts have a peculiar dependence on the materials, gums, colours, and productions of India, we cannot but be convinced that they are natives of that country. It may appear somewhat surprising, that cottons painted with all sorts of colours should be sold at so moderate a price, that they are almost as cheap as those that have but two or three. But it must be observed, that the merchants of the country sell to all the companies a large quantity of cottons at a time, and that the demands for cottons painted with various colours makes but a small article in their assortments, as they are not much esteemed in Europe.

Though cottons of all sorts are in some degree manufactured throughout the whole country of Indostan, which extends from Cape Comorin to the banks of the Ganges; it is observable, that the fine sorts are made in the eastern parts; the common ones in the centre; and the coarse ones in the most western parts. Manufactures are established in the European colonies, and upon the coast; they are more frequent at the distance of 5 or 6 leagues from the sea, where cotton is more cultivated, and provisions are cheaper. The purchases made there are carried 30 or 40 leagues farther into the country. The Indian merchants settled in the European factories, have always the management of this business. The quantity and quality of the goods wanted are settled with these people; the price is fixed according to the patterns; and, at the time a contract is made, a third, or fourth part of the money agreed on is advanced. This arrangement is owing to the necessity these merchants themselves are under of advancing money to the workmen, by the partners or agents who are dispersed through the whole country; of keeping a watchful eye upon them, for fear of losing what they have advanced; and of gradually lessening the sum, by calling for the cottons as fast as they are worked off. Without these precautions, nothing could be depended on in an oppressive government, where the weaver cannot work on his own account, either because his circumstances will not permit, or because he dares not venture to discover them for fear of exactions. The companies that have either success, or good management, constantly keep their stock of one year in advance in their settlements. By this method they are sure of having the quantity of goods they have occasion for, and of the quality they choose, at the most convenient time; not to mention that their workmen, and their merchants who are kept in constant employment, never leave them. Such nations as want money and credit cannot begin their mercantile operations till the arrival of their ships. They have only 5 or 6 months at most to execute the orders sent from Europe. The goods are manufactured and examined in haste; and they are even obliged to take such as are known to be bad, and would be rejected at any other time. The necessity they are under of completing their cargoes, and fitting out their vessels before the hurricanes come on, leaves no room for nicety of inspection. It would be a mistake to imagine that the country agents could be prevailed upon to order goods to be made on their account, in hopes of selling them with a reasonable advantage to the company with whom they are engaged. For, besides that the generality of them are not rich enough to embark in so large an undertaking, they would not be certain of finding their account in it. If the company that employ them should be hindered by unforeseen accidents from sending the usual number of ships, these merchants would have no vent for their commodities. The Indians, whose dress requires different breadths and lengths from those of the cottons fabricated for our use, would not purchase them; and the other European companies would be provided, or certain of being provided, with whatever the extent of their trade required, and their money enabled them to purchase. The plan of procuring loans, which was contrived to remedy this inconvenience, never has, nor can be useful. It has been a custom time immemorial, in Indostan, for every citizen who borrows money, to give a written instrument to his creditor. This deed is of no force in a court of judicature, unless it is signed by 3 witnesses, and bears the day of the month, and the year when it was made, with the rate of interest agreed upon by the parties. If the borrower fails to fulfil his engagements, he may be arrested by the lender himself. He is never imprisoned, because there is no fear of his making his escape. He would not even eat without obtaining leave of his creditor. The Indians make a three-fold division of interest; one kind they call vice; another neither vice nor virtue; and a third, they say is virtue. The first is 4 per cent. a month; the second 2; and the third 1. The last is in their opinion, an act of beneficence that only belongs to the most heroic minds. Yet though the Europeans, who are forced to borrow, meet with this treatment, it is plain they cannot avail themselves of the indulgence without being involved in ruin.

The foreign trade of Coromandel is not in the hands of the natives. In the western part, indeed, there are Mahomedans known by the name of Chalias, who, at Naour and Porto-Nuovo send out ships to Acken, Merguy, Siam, and the E. coast. Besides vessels of considerable burthen employed in these voyages, they have smaller embarkations for the coasting trade for Ceylon and the pearl-fishery. The Indians of Masulipatan, turn their attention another way. They import from Bengal white calicoes which they dye or print, and sell them again at the places from whence they had them, at 35 or 40 per cent. advantage. Excepting these transactions which are of very little consequence, the whole trade is vested in the Europeans, who have no partners but a few Banians and Armenians settled in their colonies.

The quantity of calicoes exported from Coromandel to the different ports of India, may be computed at 3500 bales. Of these the French carry 800 to Malabar, Mocha, and the Isle of France; the English 1200 to Bombay, Malabar, Sumatra, and the Philippine islands; and the Dutch 1500 to their different settlements. Except 500 bales destined for Manilla, each of the value of 100 guineas, the others are of such an ordinary kind that they do not exceed 30 guineas at prime cost; so that the whole number of bales do not amount to more than about 150,000l.

Coromandel furnishes Europe with 9500 bales; 800 of which are brought by the Danes, 2500 by the French, 3000 by the English, and 3200 by the Dutch. A considerable part of these calicoes are dyed blue, or striped blue and red for the African trade. The others are fine muslins, printed calicoes, and handkerchiefs from Masulipatan, or Pallacate. It is proved by experience, that each of these bales costs only about 42l. sterl. consequently they ought to bring into the manufactory where they are wrought, near 360,000l. The payments are not entirely in specie, either in Europe or in Asia; we give in exchange, cloths, iron, lead, copper, coral, and some other articles of less value. On the other hand, Asia pays with spices, pepper, rice, sugar, sugar, corn and dates. All these articles taken together may amount to about 210,000*l.* and from this calculation it follows, that Coromandel receives annually from Europe about 300,000*l.* in money. The British, who have acquired the same superiority on this coast that they have elsewhere, have formed on it several settlements, which will be inserted under their proper names.

CORON, a handsome strong town of Belvedere, a district of the Morea, in Turkey in Europe, with a harbour on a bay of the same name. It is strong by situation, and fortified by art. It is of a triangular figure, and over against 1 of its towers is a large tower, built on a rock by the Venetians, in 1463, to serve for a store-house. The town where it is not washed by the sea, is defended by a fortress, encompassed by old thick walls, flanked with large towers. A small distance from it to N. is a suburb of 500 houses. It has no immediate port but its bay, or gulph, is a safe harbour. The country about it yields good store of fruits, grain, oil, and silks, which the inhabitants vend abroad to great advantage. It made but a weak defence in 1715, when the Turks took it, and the rest of this province from the Venetians; 46 miles W. of Lacedemon. Lat. 37, 2, N. Long. 22, 15, E.

CORONADOS, a river in Chili.

CHORONÆA, once a city of Bœotia, on the river Cephissus, where it discharges itself into the lake Copias, not far from mount Helicon. It is famous on account of the victory which Agesilaus gained over the Thebans and Athenians.

COROO, the least of the Azores, or western islands, having only about 600 inhabitants, who cultivate wheat and feed hogs. Long. 32, 35, W. Lat. 40, 0, N.

CORSLEY-HEATH, a place in Wiltshire, where there is a fair kept the first Monday in August for cattle and cheese.

CORREGIO, (principality of,) one of the subdivisions of the duchy of Modena, in Upper Italy, and an imperial fief. Of the same name is a town with a strong castle, 10 miles N. W. of Modena. Lat. 44, 46, N. Long. 22, 15, E. It gave birth or name to a celebrated painter.

CORRIB-LOUGH, an inland navigable lake of Gallway, in the province of Connaught in Ireland, 20 miles long, and its greatest breadth from N. to S. 5. It is said to contain 300 islands; covered with grass and pine-trees.

CORSICA, an island in the Mediterranean sea, situated between the gulph of Genoa and the island of Sardinia, and between 41 and 43, N. lat. and 8, 10 E. long. It was anciently called by the Greeks Kyrnos, Korfis. And with regard to its history, the Cathaginians had made themselves masters of it before their wars with the Romans. Cornelius Scipio made a conquest of it in the first Punic war, and the Romans continued its masters for a long time, and built several towns there. The Goths took it from the Romans, and the Arabs conquered it afterwards from the Goths. Some lords of New Rome drove the Saracens out of it in the time of Pope Pascal II. who bestowed Corsica on one of the conquerors of those times, named Bianco, and reserved the homage to himself. The island remained peopled with ancient Romans, ancient Carthaginians, the Arabs, and its original inhabitants. The Pisans and the Genoese disputed with each other the possession of it. Pope Urban II. granted it the Pisans by a bull; the original of which remains, it is said, still at Florence. The Genoese, notwithstanding the bull, established themselves in a part of the island in the 12th century.

An Alphonso, king of Aragon, drove the Genoese out of it for some time, who in their turn drove him from it in 1354. The Corsicans then, of their own accord, submitted themselves as subjects of Genoa, because they were poor and the others rich. In the course of all these revolutions, the towns built by the ancient Romans fell to ruin, and the people were sunk into barbarism and wretchedness. The family of the Ornanos, which has since taken shelter and made a figure in France, attempted to restore liberty to their country. It did not however succeed. The king of France, Henry II. who assisted the Corsicans at that time, in order to become their master perhaps, was killed in a tournament.

The Corsicans remained under the dominion of the Genoese; and the more these islanders attempted to shake off the yoke, the heavier it was rendered by Genoa.

The Corsicans were for a long time governed by a law which resembled the law Verimique, or Westphalian, of Charlemagne; a law by which the judge-delegate of the isle condemned to death or the gallies, upon private information, without trying the party accused, or even inserting the least manner of formality in his judgment. The sentence was entered in these terms in a private record: "Being informed in my conscience, that such and such are guilty, I condemn them to death." There was no more formality in the execution than in the sentence.

These islanders were continually assassinating one another, and the judges and the survivors assassinated in their turn, upon the information of their consciences. This, on both sides, was the utmost degree of barbarism. The Corsicans required civilization, and they crushed them; they were to be mollified, and they were rendered more intractable. There were 12 insurrections, which the Corsicans called efforts for liberty, and the Genoese termed crimes of high treason. Since the year 1725, there had been nothing but seditions, punishments, insurrections, depredations, and massacres of Corsican citizens assassinated by their fellow-citizens.

Can it be credited, that in a petition sent to the king of France by the chief Corsicans in 1738, it should be affirmed, that there had been 26,000 assassinations during the government of the 16 last Genoese deputies, and 1700 within the last 2 years? The petitioners added, that the deputies of Genoa connived at these crimes, in order to enrich themselves by fines and confiscations.

A prince of the house of Wirtemberg, a brave officer and a man of liberality, in the service of Genoa, obliged the Corsicans to lay down their arms, and negotiated an accommodation between them and the Genoese in 1732; but it was only a truce soon broken by the animosity of both parties.

The Corsicans began to have some very intelligent chiefs, such as always arise in the course of civil wars; a Giafferi, a Jacintho Paoli, a Rivalora, and above all a canon, named Orticoni, who for some time possessed the principal influence. These chiefs in 1735, dedicated Corsica to the Virgin Mary, and burned the Genoese laws, declaring at the same time the penalty of death on whoever should enter into treaty with Genoa. The Corsicans had scarcely placed themselves under the tutelage of the Virgin, when an adventurer of Lower Germany came to make himself king of Corsica without ever consulting her. He was a poor baron of Westphalia, named Theodore de Neuhoff.

This person having travelled into Spain, and having there made some acquaintance with an envoy from Tunis, passed over into Africa, and persuaded the Bey that he could put him in possession of Corsica, if the Bey would only supply him with a sloop of war mounting 6 cannon, 4000 musquets, 1000 sequins, and some provisions.

The regency of Tunis were weak enough to provide him with what he asked. He arrived at Leghorn in a ship which hoisted false English colours, sold the vessel, and wrote from thence to the chiefs of the Corsicans, that if they would elect him for their king, he would engage to drive the Genoese out of the island with the succours of the principal powers of Europe which he had secured. His proposition was accepted. The baron Theodore landed the 15th of March, 1736, at the port of Aleria, clothed like a Turk, and his head covered with a turban. He began by proclaiming that he had arrived with immense treasures, and by way of proof distributed among the people 50 sequins in brass coin. The musquets and the powder which he distributed were certificates of his power. He gave the natives shoes made of good leather; a magnificence unknown in Corsica. He bribed couriers who used to come to him from Leghorn in packet-boats, and bring him forged dispatches from several powers of Europe and Africa. He was elected king, caused brass money to be coined in his name, had a court established, and secretaries of state appointed him. And what raised his reputation and power still more was, that the senate of Genoa had set a price upon his head. But in about 8 months the principal Corsicans having found out who he was, and the small sum he was master of being exhausted, he departed, as he pretended, to go in quest of more effectual succours.

Being a fugitive in Amsterdam, one of his creditors had him arrested; but this disgrace did not discourage him, he made new dupes, even in jail.

In the mean time, the Genoese solicited in 1737, the good offices of France. Cardinal Fleury, who had pacified the troubles of Geneva, undertook also to be the arbitrator of the peace between Genoa and Corsica.

King Theodore still promised them from his prison in Amsterdam, that he would go and deliver them shortly from the yoke of Genoa, and the arbitration of France. In fine, he had the art to impose upon the Jews and foreign merchants settled at Amsterdam; he prevailed on them not only to discharge his debt, but also to freight a vessel with arms, powder, ammunition, and provisions, with a considerable cargo of merchandise; persuading them that they should be put into possession of the exclusive commerce of the whole island, which he represented to be a trade of immense profit. However, not being suffered to disembark, he took shelter in Leghorn, and his Dutch creditors were ruined.

He fled afterwards into England, and was thrown into jail in London for his debts; there he remained till the beginning of the year 1756, when Mr. Walpole had the generosity to set a subscription on foot for his relief, which served to support him till he was released soon after by an act of insolvency, when he registered Corsica for the benefit of his creditors. He died the year following, and was buried in St. Anne's, Soho.

In the interval while Theodore was making his second attempt of reigning in Corsica, and when he had tried in vain to land in the island, the islanders made it sufficiently appear that they needed not his assistance to defend themselves. They had promised Boissieux, the French general, whom Fleury sent, to carry him their arms: they carried them them indeed the 12th of December, 1738; but it was to surprize a post of 400 French, who were not able to resist them. Boissieux came to their assistance; he was repulsed, and driven back with muskets at their breasts even into Bastia. The Corsicans called this day the Corsican Vespers; though it was but a feeble imitation of the Sicilian Vespers.

At length the marquis of Maillebois, an officer of great reputation, conquered the Corsicans in three weeks, in the year 1739.

He began now to establish in the island a sort of police which had not been known there before, when the fatal war of 1740 obliged Fleury to withdraw all the forces from Corsica.

Genoa always kept possession of Bastia, the capital of the island, and a few other places; the Corsicans held all the rest. They enjoyed their liberty, or rather their licentiousness, under the command of Giafferi, elected their general; a person famous for an intrepid valour, and also for the virtues of a good citizen. He was assassinated in 1753. The senate of Genoa was accused of this act, who probably had no share in the murder.

Discord now divided the Corsicans. But they still reunited against the Genoese.

The old Jacintho Paoli, who had commanded them formerly, and who was then retired to Naples, sent them his son, Paschal Paoli, in 1755. As soon as he arrived, he was acknowledged for commandant-general of the whole island, though he was only 29 years of age.

Two powers very different from each other engaged in the contest between Genoa and Corsica; the one was the court of Rome, and the other that of France.

The ministry of France, more active and more powerful than that of Rome, were solicited again to assist Genoa with its good offices. At length the court of France sent seven battalions to Corsica in the year 1764, but not to act offensively. These troops were only charged to guard the places which the Genoese were yet in possession of.

The senate hoped that France having taken upon her the charge of garrisoning their forts, it might be able with its own forces to regain the rest of the island. But it was mistaken. This republic lost in the space of four years its troops and its money, while Paoli augmented daily both his forces and his reputation.

The four years station of the French in Corsica being expired, the senate of Genoa began to find that it had wasted itself in vain in a ruinous enterprise, and that it was impracticable to subdue the Corsicans.

It then surrendered all its rights in Corsica to the crown of France, and the treaty was signed in the month of July, 1768, at Compeigne. By this treaty the kingdom of Corsica was not absolutely transferred over to the king of France, but only mortgaged to him, with a reservation of the equity of redemption to the republic, on reimbursing him the immense expences he had been at in favour of the said republic.

The French began by negotiating with General Paoli, but in vain. In fine, he had the honour of resisting the king of France for almost a year. No foreign power assisted him. Some English only, enamoured of that liberty of which he was the champion, and was likely to become the victim, supplied him with some money and arms; for the Corsicans were but ill provided with the latter: they had no muskets armed with bayonets; and even when they received them from London, the greater part of the Corsicans knew not how to manage them; they therefore preferred their common muskets and hangers: their principal defence was their courage. This courage was so great, that in one of their battles near a river named Gaulo, they made a rampart of their dead, to gain time to charge behind it, before they were to make a necessary retreat; and even the wounded were thrown into the heap to compleat the pile. Valour is found every where; but such actions as this, are never seen except among a free people. But in spite of all their courage, they were overcome at last. The count de Vaux, seconded by the marquis de Marbœuf, subdued the whole island, but not without great loss. Paoli fled to London, and had a pension granted him. Thus far history: and as to its geography, it would be endless to speak of the mountains, since it is every way covered with them. But one about its center is too remarkable to be overlooked. It is called Monte Gradacio, and is of considerable height. On its top are the 2 famed lakes of Crena and Ino, out of the first of which flow the 2 rivers of Limone and Tavignano, one of which takes its course towards the E. the other the W. coast, where they fall into the sea; out of the other lake springs the river Gollo, which waters the whole county of Mariana. These are the three most considerable rivers of the island. The other lakes of note are those of Diana and Vibino. The island is generally woody, and the ground stony; but in some places it produces good corn, wine, figs, almonds, chestnuts, olives, &c. and some of the pastures breed many cattle, as do the forests plenty of deer, and other game. The natives are a hardy race of people, and are supposed to amount to 200,000.

CORSO, a river on the coast of S. Guinea.

CORSOE, a river on the sea coast of the S. province of Algiers.

CORTATE, a town on the hither peninsula of

S X

India

India and Mogul empire, in Asia, a little N. of Cape Comorin. Lat. 8, 5, N. Long. 77, 12, E.

CORTE, a small town in a district of the same name in the island of Corfica: its fortifications consist in a wall and castle. The malcontents took it in 1733. It is the ordinary residence of the bishop of Alleria, 40 miles S. of Bastia. Lat. 41, 56, N. Long. 9, 34, E.

CORTIS, a town of Liege, in Germany, 10 miles N. E. of Ramillies. Lat. 50, 50, N. Long. 5, 15, E.

CORTONA, a small, but episcopal town in the territory of Florence, and Great duchy of Tuscany. This was one of the 12 ancient cities of Etruria. Lat. 43, 25, N. Long. 13, 12, E.

CORUNNA, city of, commonly called the Groyne: it is the ancient Brigantium, in Galicia, a maritime province of Spain. It stands on a small bay and peninsula, and is divided into the upper and lower town; the former is defended by the castle of St. Diego; the latter stands on a neck of land, surrounded with water on three sides. It is in the form of a half moon, with a castle at each point. The harbour here is large; and to this port the English packet-boats usually come. It is the seat of the royal audience of Galicia, and here is a collegiate church; and in the neighbourhood is a jasper-quarry. Lat. 43, 10, N. Long. 9, 0, W.

CORVE, a river of Herefordshire, joining the Teme at the town of Ludlow, the rich flat country below which is called Corvedale.

CORVO, one of the Azores, or Terceira islands, in the Atlantic ocean. It lies N. of Flores, from which it is divided by a channel, a good mile in breadth. It is only three miles in circuit, has two harbours, and is subject to Portugal. Lat. 39, 48, N. Long. 31, 22, W.

CORRIN, or KOREZYN, or NEW TOWN, in the palatinate of Sandomir, in Little Poland, with a castle on the Vistula. Here is a starosty, and the general diet of Little Poland is held in this place. It lies in the midst of marshes.

CORWEN, Merionethshire, N. Wales, 10 miles E. of Bala. Fairs March 12, May 24, July 21, Oct. 20, and Dec. 26. This little town is rendered remarkable for an encampment near it, thrown up by Owen Gwynedd, prince of North Wales, in 1164, in conjunction with the other Welch princes, to oppose Henry II. At a little distance runs the river Dee.

CORZOLA, or CURZOLA, in Latin Coreyra Nigra, an island of Venetian Dalmatia, and a principality. It serves for a naval store-house, as it abounds with wood.

The town of the same name, and the only one upon it, is the residence of a governor and a bishop.

It has good walls and towers, also a fine harbour, and excellent wine. In the year 1571, the women of this place armed themselves, like heroines, to oppose a landing of the Turks, whilst the men ran away like poltroons. Lat. 42, 36, N. Long. 18, 15, E.

COSBORIR, a city in the Thebaida, Egypt, said to have been Apollo's city, and one of the greatest on the Nile.

COSENZA. See CONSENSA.

COSHAM, a very pleasant village of Wiltshire, in a dry soil, the seat of health and long life. Its principal employment is in the woollen manufacture. The Saxon king Ethelred had a palace here; and here some of the earls of Cornwall resided; one of whom, named Edmund, obtained a charter for the market, of Edward I. Here is a handsome church, an alms-house, and a charity school. Fairs, March 7 and Sept. 4.

COSIRE, the southernmost port on the coast of Egypt, and anciently a place of great note; and is still considerable for the exportation of grain to Arabia, which is brought in caravans from the Nile. The town is in a miserable state of decay, and the country round is a dreary waste.

COSLIN, a town of Brandenburg Pomerania, in Germany, about a league from the Baltic. In the Frische-haff they catch prodigious quantities of fish. Here is a college, 12 miles E. of Colberg. Lat. 54, 20, N. Long. 16, 26, E.

COSMIN, or COSMI, in the kingdom of Ava, in India beyond the Ganges, is 3 days journey to S. E. of Negrais, and is a pretty town, pleasantly situated, and abounding with all conveniences. But they are forced to build their houses on stakes, to which they ascend by ladders, for fear of the ravenous tigers, wherewith the country is much infested.

COSMOPOLI, or PORTO FERRAIO, a strong town of Elba, an island in the Tuscan sea. This fortification at present stands on a distinct isle, as being separated from Elba by a channel, which has been cut, over which is a bridge.

COSNE, anciently Condade, hence Condida, Conada, and at last Cona, a town of Orleans, in France, upon the Loire, has a collegiate church, 3 convents and a priory, also a salt magazine; and in the neighbourhood are iron-works.

COSSA, or COSA, a city once of Etruria, Italy, the inhabitants of which were forced, by prodigious swarms of rats, to abandon their dwellings, and quit the place.

COSSACKS. See UKRAIN.

COSSONA, an episcopal city of the Hither Calabria, of Naples, 16 miles W. of the gulph of Otranto, and 26 N. of Rossano. Lat. 40, 20, N. Long. 17, 15, E.

COSSUVA,

COSSUVA, or COSSOVA, in Bulgaria, near the borders of Servia, is noted for its plain, where many great actions have been performed, though not much bigger (says Dr. Brown, who saw the place,) than Lincoln heath. Some take it for the Campus Merulae. Here Lazarus, despot of Servia, at the head of 500,000 men, the greatest Christian army ever brought into the field, was defeated and killed by sultan Amurath, who viewing the dead bodies, was himself stabbed by Michael Cobilavit, a Christian soldier, who was left for dead in the field; upon which a monument was erected for Amurath; from which this plain is called the field of the sepulchre. Hunniades here fought 3 days successively against Mohammed, but being much unequal in force, was at last routed. The Servians call it Cassowopolye, the Hungarians Rigomezu, the Germans Amelfelt.

COSSYRA, or COSYRUS, a small island in the Africa Propria sea, which some authors refer to Sicily, but Strabo makes a part of the proper territory of Carthage. According to Ptolemy, it had a city of the same name, which, by reason of its vicinity to Carthage, was doubtless a place of some repute. According to Strabo, this island was 150 stadia in circumference.

COSTA-RICCA, (i. e. the rich coast,) a province of New Spain, America; bounded by the N. sea on the N. E. and the Pacific ocean on the S. W. by the province of Nicaragua N. W. and by that of Veraguas on the S. E. It is 90 leagues from E. to W. and 50 where broadest from N. to S. The soil is in some parts pretty good, but it is mostly mountainous and barren. However, it took its name from its rich mines of gold and silver, those of Tinsigal being preferred by the Spaniards to the mines of Potosi. On the N. sea it has 2 large convenient bays, the westernmost called St. Jerome's, and that near the frontiers of Veraguas, called Caribaco, and on the S. sea it has several bays, capes, and convenient places for anchorage. The Spanish towns here are Cartago, the capital, and Nycoya.

COSTANZ, or COSTNITZ, in Latin, Constantia, an ancient town on the Bodensee, in Suebia, and was formerly an imperial town, but in 1549, Ferdinand I. annexed it to Austria. It is fortified, has a cathedral, a college, and 3 cloisters, and its bishopric was removed here in 1570 from Wendisch. From 1414 to 1418, was held here a famous council, which instead of 3 popes who were set up against each other, appointed a new one, and ordered John Hufs and Jerome of Prague to be burnt.

COSTOW, or COSTWAY, a river in Yorkshire, which falls into the Darwent below Cotehouse.

COSWICK, a small town on the Elbe, in the principality of Anhalt-Zerbst; here formerly was a cathedral, and now is the usual residence of the prince's dowager of Anhalt-Zerbst.

COTATI, a town of Asia, in the E. Indies, and in the kingdom of Travancor, in the Peninsula, on this side the Ganges. Long. 77, 33, E. Lat. 8, 0, N.

COTATIS, a town of Asia, in Georgia, seated at the foot of a mountain, on the river Fasso, and in the kingdom of Imeretta, of which it was formerly the capital. It is divided into 3 parts, the town, which is without walls, and contains about 200 houses; the palace, where the king resides, and the houses of the great men, and the citadel, which is on the other side the Fasso, on a high mountain, where the Turks keep a garrison. It was taken by the Russians in 1770. Long. 43, 53, E. Lat. 43, 10, N.

COTBUS, a town of Germany, in Lower Lusatia; it is a strong and important place, and has been subject to the king of Prussia ever since the year 1645. It is seated on the river Spree, 60 miles S. by E. of Berlin and 55 S. E. of Wirtemberg.

LA COTE et LA VAUX. The country (of Berne, in Switzerland,) on the coast of the lake of Geneva, which is therefore called La Coté, part of which is included in the bailiwick of Morges, and that called La Vaux, are the 2 best vineyards in the 13 Cantons. The wine de la Vaux is the most sparkling, brisk, and palatable, but the wine de la Coté is the wholesomest, and better bears carriage. It is exported to Holland, Brandenburg, Italy, &c. and as much esteemed for its delicate flavour as Champagne and Burgundy. It is a white wine, of which the inhabitants of Berne drink to excess without any inconvenience.

COTO, (kingdom,) on the coast of S. Guinea, begins W. from Rio Volta, and extends on the sea-side, thence to the town of Coto or Verhou, about 16 leagues or better E. which is a populous large town and the residence of the king. From Cabo Monteyo E. the cape forms a great bulging of 10 leagues from point to point, to Cape St. Paolo, near which stands the village Quila, which is to be known from sea by a small wood over which 3 palm-trees rise. The sounding there is extreme fine sand, and on the shore very great swelling waves, which hinder the natives from coming out. The shore of the bulging appears broken through in many places, and the land within marshy and watery, as it is all along from Volta hither, and seems to be a large continued lake, out of which about the middle gushes a little river, which does not flow out to sea, but is discernible. The coast from Cape S. Paolo to Cape Monte runs E. N. E. the land low, low, flat, level, and open. Near this cape appears a separation in the shore as of a river, but no canoes ever come out. This kingdom is not extraordinarily populous, and is like to be less by the wars with their neighbours of Popo. It is tolerably stored with cattle, palm, and wild cocoa; and the rivers afford good store of fish; but no sea-fish is seen there by reason of the horrid breaking of the sea all along, which makes fishing there impracticable. They've a very inconsiderable trade in slaves, and those few they get are stolen from the inland.

COTOPAXI, a large volcano, in the province of Quito, lying nearly under the line, yet the tops of it are generally covered with snow. It first shewed itself in 1553, when Sebastian de Belacazar first entered these countries, which eruption proved favourable to his enterprize, as it coincided with a prediction of the Indian priests, that the country should be invaded on the bursting of this volcano, and accordingly it fell out, for before 1559 he had subdued all the country.

COTRONE, anciently Croto, a small but episcopal city of the Farther Calabria of Naples, on the Mediterranean, 16 miles S. E. of St. Severino. Lat. 38, 56, N. Long. 17, 46, E.

COTSWOLD-DOWNS, in Gloucestershire, famous for breeding the best sheep, and finest wool in England. Here is a clear view of the celebrated fosse which crossed all the middle part of the kingdom; also several cross-roads, as ancient as the fosse, which either joined it or branched out of it.

COTTINGHAM, in Yorkshire, E. Riding, near Hull, has 2 fairs on the days of St. Thomas and St. Martin. The river Hull falls, about 6 miles from hence, into the Humber.

COTTMAN-DEAN, i. e. the heath of poor cottages, a common belonging to Darking in Surry, where stands their alms-house, and reckoned the best air in England.

COTTYCEUM. See CHIUTAYE.

COVER, a river in Yorkshire, which falls into the Yowre below Middleham.

COUCO, (kingdom of,) formerly Cinnaba, in Africa. It is inhabited mostly by Bereberes, and Azuages, who keep inaccessible in their mountains, to which there is but one pass. This is a fruitful country, and lies next on the W. to that of Labez.

Its capital of the same name lies between Bugia, and Algiers, being defended by steep rocks, and stout walls. It contains, 1600 houses, with a stately palace. The inhabitants bear an invincible hatred to the Turks.

COUCY, in Latin, Codiciacum, a town in the Isle of France, divided into Upper and Lower; the former upon a hill, is called Coucy le Chatel, and the other Coucy le Ville. It is a barony and peerage belonging to the duke of Orleans, where resides a governor, &c. and here is a Benedictine priory.

COUEL. See COWAL.

COVENTRY, in Warwickshire, almost in the middle of the kingdom, 30 miles from Northampton, and 92 from London; joined with Litchfield, in a bishopric, and had formerly the honour of being such itself. Here was a rich convent, destroyed by the Danes in 1016, from whence the city is supposed to have its name. It was rebuilt by Leofric earl of Mercia, who seems to have been the first lord of this city, as his lady was its best benefactress; for there is a tradition firmly believed here, that her husband having heavily taxed the citizens, for some offence they had given him, this good lady, viz. Godiva, the daughter of Thorold, a sheriff of Lincolnshire, earnestly importuned him to remit it them, and to free the citizens from all servile tenures; but could not prevail on him, unless she would consent to ride naked through the most frequented part of the city, a condition which he was sure her modesty would never comply with; but, in compassion to the city, the tradition says, that after having ordered all the doors and windows to be shut, upon pain of death, she rode through the streets on horseback naked, with her loose hair about her, which was so long, that it covered all her body but her legs. We read in Camden, that no body looked after her; yet 'tis said elsewhere, that a poor taylor would needs be peeping, and that thereupon he was struck blind. Be this as it will, his figure is put up in the same window, of the high-street, to this day; and there is a yearly procession through the town on Friday after Trinity-Sunday; which is one of its fairs, with the figure of a naked woman on horseback. Edward III. granted it a mayor and 2 bailiffs; and Henry VI. having laid several towns and villages to it, granted, by his charter, that the city, with 19 adjacent villages, should be an entire county, incorporated by itself, distinct from the county of Warwick; and that the bailiffs of the said city should be sheriffs of the city and county for ever; and now the citizens began to flourish, and to inclose the city with walls. Edward IV. for his disloyalty, took the sword from the mayor, and disfranchised the city; which re-deemed its charters on payment of 500 marks; and he was so well reconciled, that in four years after he kept St. George's feast here, and stood godfather to the mayor's child. King James I. granted it a charter. After the restoration of Charles II. the walls, which were 3 miles in circumference, with 26 towers, were demolished, and only the gates left standing, which were 12, and are very noble and beautiful. A parliament was held here in the reign reign of Henry IV. called Parliamentum Indoctorum, or the unlearned Parliament, because the lawyers were excluded; and another in the reign of Henry VI. called Parliamentum Diabolicum, or the Devil's Parliament, from the attainders of the duke of York, of the earls of Salisbury, Warwick, and March, and their adherents. It had formerly many religious houses; is large, populous, and rich, but the buildings generally old. Though it has but 3 parish churches, it has 4 steeples, there being at the south end of the town a tall spire by itself, the only remains of a church that belonged to a monastery of grey friars. St. Michael's has a stone spire, of excellent workmanship, 3 hundred feet high, which, it is said, was more than 22 years building. There are 2 or 3 meeting-houses here of Protestant dissenters. The windows of the town-house are of painted glass, representing some of the old kings, earls, &c. who have been benefactors to the city. It is a city and county containing 19 villages and hamlets, and governed by a mayor, 2 bailiffs, sheriffs, 10 aldermen, and other officers. It holds pleas for all actions, has a jail for felons as well as debtors, and sends two members to parliament. It comprehends 10 wards, 3 parish churches, 2 of which have very lofty spires, and was surrounded with strong walls, which were demolished by the order of king Charles II. in 1662. It has a grammar-school with 3 masters, and exhibitions for both universities, and another free-school for poor boys, besides several hospitals; as, one for 10 old men, another for 20 blue-coat boys, a 3d for 8 married couples, and a 4th in West-orchard-street. In the market-place stood the stateliest cross in England, it being 66 feet high, and adorned with the statues of several kings, but it has been lately taken down. It has a considerable manufacture in stuffs, particularly tammies, and also ribands. It is 30 miles W. N. W. of Northampton, 58 N. E. of Gloucester, 11 of Warwick, 50 N. of Oxford, 37 S. of Derby, 26 of Litchfield, and 92 of London. It had a considerable manufactory of cloth and caps, which is much decayed. The market here is on Friday; fairs on May 2, Friday in Trinity week, and Nov. 1. The water of the river Sherburn, on which this city stands, is peculiar for its blue dye. The roads to the town are kept well paved for a mile round.

COVERDEN, a town of Overijssel, one of the united provinces of Holland. It lies near the confines of Westphalia, and a fortified place, in the marshes; 42 miles N. W. of Deventer. Lat. 52, 56, N. Long. 6, 46, E.

COVILHAA, a town of Beira, in Portugal, with 3500 inhabitants, in 13 parishes. Here the manufacture of weaving cloth, serges, and stockings, has been set up, but not with the desired success. To the district of this place belong 47 parishes.

COULAN, or QUILON, a Dutch fort and factory on the Malabar coast of the Hither India, in Asia, 62 miles S. of Cochin. Lat. 8, 36, N. Long. 75, 36 E.

COULANGE LA VINEUSE, a town of Burgundy, in France, on the Yonne. In its neighbourhood is produced wine, which is highly prized.

There is another town, called Coulange sur Yonne, being 5 French leagues distant from the former.

COULNEY, or FOULNEY, a river in Yorkshire, which falls into the Ouse at Blacktoft.

COULOMIERS, a town of Brie Champenois, in the government of Champagne and Brie, on the river Morin, with a very beautiful castle said to have cost 2,000,000 livres. It lies in a fruitful neighbourhood.

COUNTESS-PILLAR, a beautiful free-stone column and obelisk at top, all curiously wrought and enchased, upon the old Roman way in Cumberland; it was erected in 1656, by the Countess of Pembroke, in memory of her parting, in 1616, with her mother the countess of Cumberland, and she left four pounds to be annually distributed here to the poor of Brougham on the 2d of April for ever.

COUPER. See COWPAR.

COUREZE, one of the principal rivers of Limosin, in France; its source is beyond Maignac, and falls into the Vezere.

COURLAND, or CURLAND, duchy of, in Latin Curlandia or Curonia. It imports a country upon, or stretching into the sea, and hence by the Germans called Seeland. It is bounded on the W. by the Baltic, on the N. by the bay of Riga and Livonia, on the E. by Lithuania Proper, and towards the S. by Samojitia. Its length is 50 miles, and breadth in some places 20, but in others scarcely half that; and towards the S. E. it terminates in a point. The soil is for the most part strong, rich, and clayish; and it abounds with forests and morasses. Its chief commodities are flax, hemp, yarn, honey, wax, linseed, tar, masts, timber of all sorts, pot-ashes, tallow, goats-skins, &c. which are carried to Riga, Libau, Windaw, and Memel, to be exported. They have plenty of black cattle and horses, and have many commodities from Riga. It is a populous country, and was formerly tributary to Sweden, afterwards subject to the Livonian knights, then to the Teutonic order, then to the Poles; for though it had its own duke, yet he paid homage to the king of Poland. Ketler, master of the Livonian order, was made hereditary duke in 1558, by Sigismund-Augustus, king of Poland, on condition of quitting Riga and Livonia, and holding the duchy in fee of that crown. His successors were dukes of Courland till 1710; when the heir being a minor, upon the death of his father, the duchess his mother, the king of Poland his uncle, and the nobility of Courland, had a warm dispute who should be his guardian. During this the Saxons and Muscovites over run the country, which they were both soon obliged to abandon to the king of Sweden; but the latter was, not long after his entrance into the duchy, obliged to yield it to the Muscovites, who remained the sole possessors of it; and on the duke's marrying the czar's niece, he was restored to his duchy. He dying soon after his marriage, his young widow, protected by her uncle the czar, remained in possession of the duchy, which Ferdinand, uncle of the last duke, strove in vain to recover; and on his death in 1737, the Courlanders chose Count de Biron, a native. But he was banished in 1741, to Siberia by the czarina; and the states chose prince Lewis-Ernest of Brunswick-Wolfenbüttele; and as this election was done by force, it had not its proper effect. The people in general are Lutherans; but there are some Calvinists and Papists. The Poles have attempted to re-incorporate this duchy with their republic; but it has been always opposed by the Russian court, who have usurped the protection of it ever since the czar's niece, the duchess-dowager of Courland above mentioned, was advanced to the Russian throne: and indeed in 1772, at a division of some part of Poland between Russia, the Emperor, and the king of Prussia, that duchy fell to Russia. The principal rivers are the Dwina, the the Aa, and the Windaw. Several lakes are appropriated to the public, called Free Seas, where any nobleman throughout the duchy has liberty of fishing.

COURLAND, (Proper,) is divided into 2 capital jurisdictions, namely Golding and Tuckum; the former containing nine parishes, and the latter five.

COURTENAY, a town in the isle of France, on the little river Clairay. It gives name to an illustrious family in France, a branch of which came over with William the Conqueror into England, and are now viscounts here. It lies 56 miles S. E. of Paris. Lat. 48, 20, E. Long. 3, 16, E.

COURTLANT, a manor in the county of W. Chester, and province of New-York, in N. America; it sends a member to the general assembly. Here general Washington retired in 1776, when he returned from Kingsbridge. It stands on the N. river, is 20 miles from Croton river, and contains about 20 square miles, the greatest part of which is covered with woods, and from hence to Pekipsy, it is 35 miles of one continued chain of mountains, called very properly the High Lands, as many of them are far higher than the Alps in Italy.

COURTRAY, a city in the Austrian Netherlands, on the Lys, which divides it into 2 parts. It is considerable for its citadel and manufactures of woollen cloths, diaper and damask table linen. It has been often taken. Lat. 50, 48, N. Long. 3, 10, E.

COUTANCES, or CONSTANCES, an episcopal city of the Coutantin, in Lower Normandy, in France, on the Burd. Here are 2 parish-churches, a college, seminary, &c. Its prelate is a suffragan to the archbishop of Rouen, his diocese containing 550 parishes; he has an annual revenue of 22,000 livres, and taxed in 2500 florins to the court of Rome. Lat. 49, 31, N. Long. 1, 22, W.

COUTRAS, a large town of Guyenne Proper, in France, near the confluence of the rivers Isle and Droume. In this neighbourhood, in the year 1587, Henry IV. beat the forces of the League. Lat. 45, 15, N. Long. 1, 26, W.

COWAL, one of the subdivisions of Argyleshire, in the middle partition of Scotland. It lies between Loch-fyn on the W. the frith of Clyde on the E. the isle of Bute on the S. Argyle Proper, and the Grampian mountains on the N. It is a peninsula included between the two bays of Lough-long and Loch-fyn; in it is the inland lake of Lough-heck.

COWBRIDGE, a town of Glamorganshire, in S. Wales, with a market on Tuesdays, and 3 fairs, viz. on April 23, August 1, and Oct. 18. It is called by the Welch Pont-Van, from the stone-bridge over the river, which soon after falls into the sea. It is seated in a low bottom, but in a fertile soil. The streets are broad and paved, and it is governed by 2 bailiffs, 12 aldermen, and 12 common-council. The market is well supplied with corn, cattle, sheep, and provisions. It is 12 miles W. of Cardiff, and 175 from London. Long. 4, 15, W. Lat. 51, 30, N.

COWDEN, a village of Kent, near the Medway, with a fair on July 22.

COWEN, a river in Carmarthenshire, which empties itself into the Severn, against Towy-Haven.

COWES, (E. and W.) Isle of Wight, in the parish of Northwood in W. Medina are 2 pretty towns, on the shore, which have the advantage of trade above any in the island. Several rich merchants live here, and formerly ships from Virginia, &c. used to unload their cargoes here, pay their customs, take in their goods again, and then sail to Holland,

C R

Holland, Hamburg, &c. to entitle them to the drawback of such their goods. Here also masters of ships, &c. are furnished with money for bills on London; and provisions are taken on ship-board at W. Cowes, which is the most thriving place in the island, though it lies so low, that it is not reckoned very healthy. At W. Cowes, is a castle and garrison, which was built by king Hen. VIII. as was another at E. Cowes; and at the former also is a charity-school. In time of war this is a place of general rendezvous for merchant-ships that wait for convoys. It is 8 miles from Portsmouth.

COWETTA, a town of Georgia, in N. America, to which Gen. Oglethorp travelled, and is 500 miles from Frederica. It belongs to the Creek Indians. And here the said general conferred not only with the chiefs of all the tribes of this nation; but also with the deputies of the Coctaws and Chickesaws, who lie between the English and French settlements, and made a new treaty with the natives of the Lower Creeks, more ample than the former ones. Lat. 30, 20, N. Long. 90, 10, W.

COWLING, a village in Suffolk, 6 miles S. E. of Newmarket, with 2 fairs, on July 31, and Oct. 17.

COWPAR, or COUPER. Of this name are 2 places in Scotland; the one lying in the shire of Angus, is distinguished by Cowpar of Angus, and the other by Cowpar of Fife. The latter is a royal borough, which with Dundee, Perth, St. Andrew's, and Forfar, sends one member alternately to the British parliament. It stands on the Eden, and is the shire town.

COWY-STAKES, near Chertsey, in Surry, where Julius Cæsar is said to have crossed the Thames with his army.

COW-ISLAND. See VACHE.

COZWOLD, a market-town in the N. Riding of Yorkshire, 14 miles N. of York city; 214 miles from London. Fair August 25. A free-school was built here, with an endowment for the master and 2 ushers, and 20s. to a preacher, for 3 sermons every year, besides 20s. for annual repast for the visitors of the school.

COZUMEL, an island near the W. coast of Yucatan, a province of Mexico, in N. America. Here Cortez landed his troops, before he attempted the conquest of that kingdom. It is subject to Spain. Lat. 19, 20, N. Long. 89, 20, W.

CRABS-ISLE. See BORRIQUEN.

CRACOW, a palatinate of Little Poland, containing the districts of Sezerye, Prozow, Xiaz, Lelow, Sadecz, Czchow, and Biecz: also the 3 duchies of Oswiecim, Zator, and Severia, formerly belonging to Silesia; the 2 first of which are starof-teys; but the third is subject to the bishop of Cracow, and likewise the county of Scepus.

CRACOW, the capital of the whole kingdom of Poland, in the palatinate of the same name. It stands at the junction of the Rudawa with the Vistula, in a fruitful country. Cracow Proper is walled round, and contains several churches and convents; the principal of the former is St. Mary. To the W. is a suburb, near which is the royal-country-seat, also walled round. On the S. side is the spacious royal castle, upon a rock encompassed with walls, towers and bulwarks. To it belongs the royal palace, besides 2 churches, and several buildings; also the cathedral of St. Stanislaus, bishop of Cracow, whom king Bolislaus slew with his own hand near the altar, in the year 1079, as the good prelate's exhortations became irksome to that savage prince.

Here the royal crown, sceptre, and monde, are kept, and the coronation is performed in it. The bishop's revenue is 40,000 dollars per annum; and he is very powerful, and stiled the duke of Severia. Near the castle is the suburb of Stradomo, where is a bridge over the Vistula, leading to the town of Kazimierz on the E. which may be looked upon as the second part of Cracow, and is walled round. Here is the university; in which are 11 colleges, and 14 grammar-schools, scattered up and down the town, belonging to it. In 1549, all the students went away in one day, as sufficient satisfaction had not been given them, they thought for their fellow-collegians; some of whom had been killed, and others wounded in an affray. Towards the N. is the suburb Kleparz (Clepardia) not walled; where besides other churches, is that of St. Florian, and the bishop's palace. Cracow is large, and was formerly very flourishing; but it has suffered much in the Swedish wars, and been no less than 9 times burnt. In 1707 and 1708, the plague here carried off several thousands of the inhabitants. It lies 40 miles E. of the confines of Silesia, and 140 S. W. of Warsaw, to which the royal residence has been removed from Cracow. Lat. 50, 10, N. Long. 19, 55. E.

CRAIL, or CAREIL, a market-town and royal burgh of Fifeshire, in the S. of Scotland, on the frith of Forth. It is a district, which with Pettenweem, Anstruther, E. and W. and Kilrennie, send 1 member to parliament. It lies 8 miles S. E. of St. Andrew's.

CRAINBURG. See CRAYNBURG.

CRANBROOK, a market-town of Kent, noted as one of the first places where the cloth manufacture was set up in England, 15 miles from Maidstone. Its annual fairs are on May 30, and Sept. 29.

CRANENBURG,

C R

CRANENBURG, a small walled town in the duchy of Cleves. The collegiate church was removed here from Zyfflich in 1436.

CRANGANOR, (town,) stands on a sandy hill, 5 leagues S. of Chitwa river, and N. of Cochin, 20 S. of Calicut. The Portuguese, who were the first European masters of this coast, burnt it in 1507, and after enlarged and fortified it; but the Dutch, after taking Coulan, took this also in 1662, and yielded it to the Samorin; but (say they) on his breaking his word with them, they retook and fortified it. They have a factory here, with a fort, which had a ditch round its walls, about 9 miles up the river, and 1 below the city, called Malabar Cranganor, because inhabited by Malabars. It is not walled, and the houses all stand single, with gardens, and green fields between them. Near its stands the palace of the king or governor of the country.

CRANSAC, a small place of Guyenne, in France, famous for its sulphureous mineral waters, of an excellent quality; and for coal-pits in its neighbourhood.

CRAON, in Latin, Credonium, a town and barony of Anjou, on the Audon. Here is a chapter and priory. The territory belonging to it, which is pretty extensive, is called Craonois.

CRAPAC. See CARPATHIAN mountains.

CRAPATAN, or Carapatan, a town of Cuncan, a province of the Mogul empire, in Asia. It is defended by a fort, and has 14 feet water near the shore, 30 miles S. of Rajapour.

CRATO, (audience of,) a subdivision of Alten-tejo, a province of Portugal. In it is a small town of the same, the capital of the priory of the order of Malta, to which 29 parishes are subject. The prior has jurisdiction in civil, criminal, and spiritual matters. To the district of the town belong 6 parishes. Lat. 58, 56. N. Long. 8, 12; W.

CRAVEN, a very hilly and craggy country, and subdivision of the W. Riding of Yorkshire, on the river Aire; it gives name and title of baron.

CRAVEN, a county in the province of S. Carolina, lying along the banks of the river Congaree, or Santee. It is pretty well inhabited by English and French protestants. In this county is Sewee river, where some families from New-England settled. In 1706, the French landed here, but were vigorously opposed by this little colony, who beat off the invaders, having forced them to leave many of their companions dead behind them. In this county are no towns, only 2 forts on the S. bank of Santee river; the one, Sheniningh fort, is about 45 miles above the mouth of the river; the other called Congaree, an English fort, which stands 65 miles above the former.

C R

CRAVEN, county in the district of Newbern, N. Carolina, in which stands Newbern, the capital of the province, through which runs the river Nuse, the N. boundary from Pitt county. Fort Barnwell, also stands on the same river, in this county.

CRAU, in Latin, Crava, a part of the ancient Campi Lapidei, a strong territory of 10 leagues extent, belonging to the city of Arles, in Provence, and formed by the Rhone. It reaches from that river to the bay of Martigne (lake of Berre) and between that and Marseilles. Here grow very fine herbs, on which great numbers of sheep feed, being very fond of them; and here is also produced excellent wine, and in the morasses, near this plain, are salt-works.

CRAWFORD-LINDSAY, a town in the shire of Lanerk, and S. of Scotland; the former giving title, and the latter surname, to an earl, who is the oldest of that rank in the kingdom, which he accordingly claims. Just by this place is Crawfordmoor, in the brooks of which they find gold, it is said, after rain. And here likewise lapis lazuli is dug up.

CRAWLEY, a village in Suffex, 6 miles E. by N. of Horsham, with fairs on May 8, and September 19.

CRAWLEY, or CRAGLEY, a river in Derbyshire, that runs into the the Rother.

CRAY, (St. Mary's,) a town in Kent, 12 miles from London. Market on Wednesday, and a fair on Feb. 2.

CRAY, a river in Kent, which falls into the Darent below Dartford.

CRAY, a river in Brecknockshire, that runs into the Ufke.

CRAYFORD, a town in Kent, 14 miles from London, on the road to Dover, noted for callicoe printers. Market on Tuesdays, and a fair on the nativity of the Virgin Mary.

CRAYLINGEN, a pretty town of Anspach, and circle of Franconia, in Germany, on the Tauber, with a good trade, 29 miles N. W. of Anspach.

CRAYNBURG, or KRAINBURG, a town of Carniola, and Austria, in Germany, on the Savre, over which is a bridge. It has a strong castle. Here Roman coins are dug up.

CRECY. See CRESSY.

CREDITON, or KIRTON, in Devonshire, 9 miles from Exeter, and 183 from London, stands on the river Credde; and in the time of the Saxons, was the see of a bishop, which, though afterwards translated to Exeter, the cathedral is still standing; and here is a meadow called My Lord's Meadow. Here was born Boniface, archbishop of Mentz, commonly called the German Apostle, because he converted converted the Hessians, &c. in Germany to Christianity. Its chief manufactory is serge, in which it drove a great trade, and was a flourishing town till the 14th of August 1743, when above 460 houses were burnt down, besides the market-house, wool-chambers, and other public buildings; so that the loss in goods and stock in trade was computed at 3000*l.* and the loss in houses and goods uninsured, at or near 50,000*l.* Another terrible fire happened here on May 1, 1772, which again nearly destroyed the town. Here is a market on Saturday, and fairs May 11, Aug. 21, and Sept. 21. In the reign of Edward I. it sent members to a parliament at Carlisle. Here is a charity-school.

CREDENHILL, a vast camp, with inaccessible works, on the top of a high steep mountain, N. of Hereford city, in the county of the same name. From it is a prospect to St. Michael's mount, in Monmouthshire, and is crowned with 2 tops, much resorted to by Romish votaries.

CREEKS, (Lower,) an Indian nation of Georgia, in N. America, consisting of 8 tribes, who are allied together, and speak the same language, though they have each their distinct government; and are in friendship with the British nation. They claim from the river Savannah, as far as St. Augustine, and up Flint river, which falls into the bay of Mexico.

CREMA, a pretty strong city of the Cremasco, a Venetian territory in Italy; it stands in a fruitful plain on the river Serio; is well-built, and also well peopled, the see of a bishop, suffragan to Bologna, containing besides the cathedral, 30 churches, convents, hospitals, and alms-houses. Here are good manufactures of linen-cloth and thread. Lat. 45, 26, N. Long. 10, 25, E.

CREMASCO, (Il,) a small territory of Venice, round its capital Crema last-mentioned. It is a part of Lombardy, and is surrounded by the Milanese, Cremonese, and the Lodiano, and only joining to the Venetian dominions by a highway. The Serio waters it on the N. and the Communa on the S. both falling into the Po, which runs along the S. side of the country. It is extremely fruitful in grain, wine, and hemp.

VOL. I.—No. 37.

CREMIEU, a small town of the Lower Delphinate and Dauphiny, in France, at the foot of a mountain, and about a league from the Rhone. Lat. 45, 46, N. Long. 5, 26, E.

CREMNITZ, a royal free town, and the principal among the mountain-towns, it lies very low, between high mountains, in the Hither circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. The town itself is but small, and its suburbs are the most considerable part, in which are nine streets. Here is coined all the gold and silver found in the mines, to the amount of about 100,000 ducats annually. It has suffered much from the intestine disturbances of Hungary: lies 69 miles N. E. of Presburg, and is subject to the house of Austria. It was totally destroyed by fire in 1777. Lat. 48, 52, N. Long. 19, 21, E.

CREMONA, a city of Cisalpine Gaul, near the (Po) was founded (according to Tacitus, Polybius, and Livy) in the consulate of Tiberius Sempronius and Publius Cornelius, when Hannibal was ready to invade Italy, about anno before Christ 217, as a barrier against the Gauls on the other side the Po, or any other power meditating an irruption from beyond the Alps. It grew and flourished by the conveniency of rivers, the richness of its territory, and affinities with other nations of Italy. In no foreign war had it been ever hurt; but in the civil dissensions it suffered more than any other city; particularly during the triumvirate of Augustus and his 2 associates, and in the contests between Vitellius and Vespasian, anno Domini 69. For, after several engagements between the partisans, the fatal battle of Cremona determined the former's fate. The city was large and very rich, the walls very high, stone towers mighty strong, the gates secured with vast iron bars, the garrison numerous, the inhabitants devoted to Vitellius, and at that time a great part of Italy assembled in the town on occasion of a fair; yet 40,000 soldiers of Vespasian's party, in spite of all manner of opposition, at length entered it, and a greater number of servants and retainers to the camp, more abandoned to acts of cruelty and licentiousness than the soldiers themselves, pillaged, murdered, ravished, &c. without restraint for 4 days together, and then setting fire to the houses, reduced them to ashes. Such was the end of the 1st Cremona, 286 years after its foundation. However, such of the inhabitants as by flight or otherwise, out-lived the general massacre soon returned, and rebuilt the city, being therein countenanced by Vespasian. It fared not better again in the times of the barbarous Goths and Lombards, and afterwards of the Sclavonians, A. D. 630, who totally destroyed it; as did the emperor Barbarossa about 500 years after. Since then it has passed through the hands of so many masters, masters, such as the Venetians, Milanese, French, Spaniards, and lastly the Germans, that we need not wonder if it is now much inferior in wealth and inhabitants to what it formerly had been. However, it is yet a handsome city, with good wide streets, and noble houses, some of them not much short of palaces, several capacious piazzas well built, abundance of beautiful gardens, and stately public edifices. It is a university well endowed with privileges, and the air being very mild and serene, the town well supplied both for use and delight, by its fertile country and the Po, it is much frequented by students and men of letters. Here is an old castle, and a very high tower, of which latter there is a tradition, that the emperor Sigismund and pope John XXIII. being both gone up to the top of it, a certain lord of that city (whom one of their authors styles a tyrant of it, and names Gabrino Fondusio) had formed a design of flinging them headlong down, and often expressed a vexation that he had not executed it, merely to immortalize his memory.

This city is an episcopal see, under that of Milan, and the cathedral a magnificent structure, faced with an elegant portico, supported by white marble columns. Here are a number of other fine churches and monasteries, built in a grand taste, and some noble hospitals, and other public buildings, in the city and suburbs. This city stands about 50 miles E. from Milan; E. long. 10, 20. N. lat. 45. It is watered by the famed canal of Oglio on the N. and E. sides; has the Adda W. and the Po S. all which render the country very rich in wine, corn, fruits, cattle, fish, wool, flax, honey, &c. It surrendered with the rest of the Milanese to prince Eugene in 1706; but it is still more noted for his having here surprised the French general, Marshal Villeroy in his bed, and carried him off, Feb. 1, 1702. And he had then certainly taken the city, but that the troops appointed to support him lost their way.

CREMONESE, a territory in the duchy of Milan, in Upper Italy; it lies along the Po, which divides it from the Parmesan on the S. as it is parted on the E. by the Mantuan, on the W. by the Lodetan, and on the N. by the Bresciano. It is uncommonly fruitful; it produces also costly wine, with large quantities of honey and flax.

CREMPEN. See KREMPEN.

CRESCENTINO, a fortified town of Montferrat and Piemont, in Upper Italy, not far from the Po, and 50 miles N. of Verne. Lat. 45, 10, N. Long. 7, 56, E.

CRESPY, the capital of Le Valois, in the Isle of France, situated between 2 rivers, with a good trade in grain and wood. It was formerly a more considerable place than it is at present. Here is a collegiate church, &c. and a governor. It lies 39 miles N. E. of Paris. Lat. 49, 26, N. Long. 2 59 E.

CRESSY, or CRECY, a burgh of Ponthieu and Lower Picardy in France, on the river Anthie. It is a prevoté, &c. and trades in cattle, wool, and hemp. It is memorable for a glorious, but bloody, victory, obtained here in 1346, by the English, under king Edward III. and the Black Prince, over the French, in the time of Philip of Valois, when the flower of their nobility were slain, and other persons of high distinction. It gave name to a neighbouring forest; and lies 29 miles N. W. of Abbeville. Lat. 50, 20, N. Long. 2, 0, E.

CREST, in Latin Crista, a small fortified town, and the capital of the duchy of Valentinois, in the Lower Delphinat of Dauphiny, in France; it has a castle and tower, with a garrison. It lies 47 miles S. of Vienne. Lat. 44, 46, N. Long. 4 58, E.

CRETAN SEA, and its Isles. The Cretan sea is properly that part of the Egean sea which lies about Crete, and formerly belonged, together with the islands it contained, to the Cretans.

Crete, now Candia, was anciently known by the names of Aeria, Chthonia, Idæa, Curete, Macaris, &c. but its most common name was that of Crete. This last name is by some derived from the Curetes, whom they reckon to have been the first inhabitants of the island; by others from the nymph Crete, daughter of Hesperus; or from Cretus, the son of Jupiter, who reigned here.

The first inhabitants of Crete, according to Diodorus Siculus, were the Idæi Daëtyli, who inhabited mount Ida.

Next to the Idæi Daëtyli were the nine Curetes, supposed to be descended from the Idæi Daëtyli.

The Titans were cotemporary with the Curetes; and dwelt in the country where the city of Gnosus was afterwards built.

Though the island of Crete is one of the most remarkable in the writings of the ancient historians and poets, its history affords nothing interesting. The only remarkable particulars are the wife institutions of one of their kings, called Minos, who reigned in 1282 before Christ. The Cretan laws seem to have been modelled for people who had no other business than to attack enemies, or to defend themselves.

From their infancy they were accustomed to bear hunger and thirst with patience: As they advanced in years, they were taught the exercises of running, hunting, archery, (in which they particularly excelled,) the use of the sword and wrestling. For their martial improvement also the Pyrrhic dance was instituted, in which the young men, completely armed, imitated the motions and actions actions of combatants. Thus they were early accustomed to see arms, and their use, without emotion. Indeed no people had greater occasion for learning the art of war than the Cretans, as they were for many ages in perpetual enmity with one another, the inhabitants of each city claiming the sovereignty of the whole island. Hence also they became very useful auxiliaries to other nations. Many of Alexander's victories were owing to the Cretan auxiliaries; and to the archers and slingers brought from this island the Romans were highly indebted, after they became acquainted with it.

A custom established by Minos gives us reason to believe, that even the slaves in this island were better treated than any where else; for, at the feasts of Mercury, the masters waited on their slaves at table, and performed about them the same offices which they received from their slaves the rest of the year. Plato tells us, that, under the government of so wise a prince, Crete became the abode of virtue, probity, and justice; and that the laws which he established were so well founded in justice and equity, that they subsisted in their full vigour even in his time; that is, above 900 years after they had been first published. It is true the Cretans degenerated by degrees from their ancient probity; and at length, by an entire change of manners, became the most vicious nation known either to the Greeks or Latins. The impurity of their amours is but too well known from the accounts given us by Strabo, Servius, and Athenæus. These authors inform us, that the unnatural passion of the Cretans for boys proceeded to a degree of madness, and that from them it overspread all Crete. But this change of manners, in whatever time it happened, does not affect the probity of the ancient Cretans, nor lessen the glory of their legislature.

Crete was the most ancient maritime power mentioned by the Greek historians. It was exceedingly fruitful, producing all sorts of grain, fruits &c. and from its maritime power was stiled Empress of the Sea. In ancient times also it had the name of Hecatonpolis, as containing 100 cities; 90 of these were built before the Trojan war, and 10 after it. About 66 years before Christ this island fell under the power of the Romans. In the year of Christ 812 it was taken from them by the Saracens, who built the present capital of the island called Chandax, or Candia; from whence the whole island has got its modern name of Candia.

The Labyrinth, as it is called, runs under a small mountain at the foot of mount Psiloriti, or Ida, in a thousand intricate meanders, without any regularity, and seems a work of nature. The entrance is a natural aperture, 7 or 8 paces broad, and very low in some places. The principal passage is about 1200 paces in length, and reaches to the end of the maze, where are two spacious chambers. The most dangerous part of the main walk is about 30 paces from its mouth; if a person happen to take any other course, he is immediately lost amidst the innumerable windings of this maze, and then it is no easy matter to find the way out. Travelers always have guides and torches. It is quite dry; and whether it was the famous ancient labyrinth, is far from being satisfactorily proved.

CREVACOR, a strong town in the principality of Masserano, on the river of Cessera, with a stout castle; 20 miles E. of Biel.

CREVANT, a small town of Burgundy, in France, upon the river Yonne, over which is a stone bridge. Its chief trade is in wine. Here a battle was fought between the English and French, in the year 1423. It lies 12 miles S. of Auxerre. Lat. 47, 45, N. Long. 3, 39, E.

CREVECCEUR, a bourg of Cambra S. of French Flanders, on the Scheld, 7 miles ured. Cambray city. Here serges are manufact Lat. 50, 10, N. Long. 3, 15, E.

Of the same name is a small fortified place in Holland, at the junction of the Dienne with the Maese.

CREVECEUR, a Dutch fort on the Gold Coast of Guinea, between the English fort at Acra and the Danish fort Christiansburg, within cannon-shot of both. It is the residence of a chief governor. This fort surpasses the English in largeness and good guns, though about equal in strength, except that our walls are thinner than theirs, and consequently cannot endure so great a shock.

CREUSE, (Great and Small,) 2 rivers of La Marche, in France, which empty themselves into the Vienne. These receive the Cher and Gar-tempe.

CRÉUSEN, a town on the Red-Mayn, in the principality of Culmbach, where there are great quantities of fine earthen ware made.

CREUTZNACH, a town of the Palatinate and Lower Rhine, in Germany, on the river Nahe; dividing it into 2 parts, with a strong castle, 18 miles almost S. W. from Mentz. Lat. 49, 56, N. Long. 7, 25, E.

CRICCIETH, a village of Carnarvonshire, in N. Wales, with 3 fairs, on May 23, July 1, and October 18, all for cattle.

CRICHINGEN, or CREANGE, a town of German Lorraine, with a lordship of the same name, belonging to the empire. It lies near Falkembourg.

CRICKHOWELL, in Brecknockshire, South Wales, has a very small market, though it is a very pretty place. It is seated on the river Usk, over which there is a bridge, and it has one fair.

It

C R

It is 10 miles E. by S. of Brecknock, and 151 from London. It is governed by a bailiff and two burgessees. Here formerly was a castle called Alisby-castle, the ruins of which are still to be seen, and shew it to have been a place of considerable strength, but by whom it was erected is uncertain.

CRICKLADE, a borough of Wiltshire, governed by bailiff. It sends two members to parliament; and lies at the junction of the rivulets Churn and Rey, with the Thames, where it begins to be navigable: 29 miles S. W. of Oxford, and 81 W. of London. Its weekly market holds on Saturday; and annual fairs, the 2d Thursday in April, and Sept. 21.

CRIM TARTARY, TAURICA, or SCYTHICA, in the Cheronesus. The Turkish maps call it Kirim Athasi, i. e. Crim-island, a peninsula of European Turkey, in the Euxine sea. The ancients reckoned it of the same dimensions as the peninsula of the Morea. It is quite surrounded by the Black sea, and that of Asoph, except on the narrow neck of land which joins it to Little Tartary. In this country are several fruitful fields, producing wine and all sorts of grain, but the Tartars apply themselves no more than mere necessity compells to the cultivation of them, leaving that drudgery to their slaves and to foreigners. The Tartars eat but little bread; horse-flesh, milk, and cheese, being their beloved food. Of all the Mahometan Tartars, these are the likest to the Calmucks. They are subject to the Turks, who, not being able to defend them from the successful incursions of the Russians under Count Munich, into the Crim, from the year 1736 to the year 1739, quit the country, as too remote from their frontiers. At that time the Russians took the line which the Tartars drew directly over the isthmus, fortified it with several strong castles and towers, and put 100,000 men into them; then seized Prekop, and opened the way into the Crim; which has since been laid waste, partly by the Russians, and partly by the Tartars. They have a Chan or prince of their own, who styles himself Sovereign Chan of Little Tartary, &c. yet he is a vassal of the Turks, whom he is obliged to furnish with 30,000 men, when required. They subsist entirely on plunder, every one having two or three horses for carrying off his plunder; and when they lose a horse, his flesh is their highest regale, to the partaking of which they invite their comrades. In time of peace their whole traffic lies in buying of children in Circassia and the neighbouring countries, which they sell the Turks in exchange for rice, coffee, dates, raisins, and cloathing. In the part of the Crim belonging to the Chan, Prekop,

C R

Baktshifazai, and Crim, are the principal towns. And in that belonging to the Turks is Kaffa, once a considerable city.

Upon the decline of the Roman empire the best part of the Crim became subject to the Genoese, who maintained a considerable trade there till the Tartars invaded it, and they have since been entirely routed.

CRIM, CREMENDA, or SOLAT, in Latin Crimæa, which gives name to, and formerly was the capital of, the preceding peninsula, is seated in a beautiful and fertile plain, on the river Gerukesu, 24 miles from Kaffa to N. W. Some take it to be the ancient Cimmerium. But since the Turks have taken possession of it, this town is considerably decayed, so that it has not above 600 houses or cottages, inhabited by Turks and some Jews.

CRISINGHAM MAGNA, a village in Norfolk, 5 miles S. of Swaffham, with a fair, on Aug. 12, for horses and toys.

CROATIA, (kingdom of,) in Hungarian Horvath Orszag, extends itself from the river Drave as far as the Adriatic sea. It is bounded on the E. by Sclavonia and Bosnia, on the W. by Stiria and Carniola; and is a part of the ancient Illyrium. The inhabitants are descendants of the Slavi; and were formerly called Kruati, from which the Greeks formed Crobati. In the middle ages they had kings of their own; but in the 15th century Croatia and Dalmatia devolved to the kings of Hungary.

This country, with regard to its situation, is divided into Croatia on this side, and Croatia on the other side of the Save, as to its dominion into Hungarian and Turkish Croatia, and with regard to its government into the banat and generalate of Croatia.

Croatia on this side the Save, also called Upper Sclavonia, comprehends the following countries; namely, Warasdin, Kreutz, Zagrab, Zagor, and the jurisdiction of the generalate of Warasdin.

Croatia on the further side of the Save, or Croatia Proper, is divided into Hungarian and Turkish. Hungarian Croatia on this side the river Unna, consists of the generalate of Croatia, and the banat of Croatia. Turkish Croatia on the further side of the Unna contains 3 or 4 towns.

It is about 80 miles in extent either way. It pays above twice the sum Sclavonia does to the emperor's extraordinary subsidies. It is a fruitful soil in wine, oil, &c. as well as all necessaries of life, where cultivated: but being a frontier province, like Sclavonia, it labours under like inconveniencies. The people, who are called Croats, and Kرابaton by the Germans, are of good stature, valiant, hardy, good soldiers, the horsemen especially, cially, who are so famous, that they are entertained in most of the courts of Germany as their horse-guards; and the foot, called Ufcoques, or Ufkokes, are exceeding swift, and run up the mountains like bucks. The chief places in Austrian Croatia are Carlstadt, Sifeg, Castanovitz, and Wilnitz, which lying on the S. side the Unna, belongs to the Turks.

CROCCEUS, or HOAMBO, a river of China, in Asia. It rises in the mountains W. of Suchuen province; and, after running along the frontiers of Tartary, beyond the Chinese wall a considerable way, it enters China, and with a southerly course, between Kansu, and Kensi, then E. through Houan, Xantum, and Nankin, having traversed about 2000 miles, it falls into the bay of Nankin.

CROCK, a river in Chester which falls into the Dane at Crockston.

CROJA, a town of Albania, a province of Turkey, in Europe; not far from the bay of Drino, remarkable as being the birth-place of the famous Scanderbeg, the last king of Albania, which he used as a fortress, whence he continually harassed the Turks, who at last destroyed it.

CROISSETTE, (La.) a place near Chalons, in Champagne, in France; where the inhabitants of that city under the conduct of Charles of Anjou, king of Naples, defeated 8000 English.

CROISIC, in Latin, Crociliacum, a town in the bishopric of Nantes, and government of Brittany, in France; with a harbour on the sea, between the mouths of the Villaine and Loire, the Brivas Portas of the ancients, in the neighbourhood are salt-marshes.

CROIX, (St.) a river which falls into Lake Superior, and agreeable to Carver abounds with sturgeon.

CROIX, (St.) a river in Nova Scotia, the E. boundary of Massachusetts-bay province.

CROKEN-TORR, a desolate hill or rock, in the forest of Dartmore, in Devonshire, where the tinners are obliged by their charters to hold their courts of stannary, of which the Lord Warden is judge; from which place, exposed to the weather with no seats but a moor-stone-bench, the steward commonly adjourns to Tavistock.

CROMER, Norfolk, on the N. E. coast, 23 miles from Norwich, 127 miles from London, has a harbour, and was formerly much larger than it is now, having 2 parish-churches, one of which, with many of the houses were swallowed up by an inundation of the sea. It is chiefly inhabited and frequented by fishermen, especially for lobsters, which are caught here in great quantities, and carried to Norwich, and some to London; it is a rocky coast, and the seamen call Cromer-bay the Devil's Throat. Its market is on Saturday, fair Whit Monday.

VOL. I.—No. 37.

Of the same name is a subdivision of Aberdeenshire, in Scotland, but differently pronounced, (Cromarr.)

CROMERTY, in the Highland language called Crowmpa, a burgh of regality, and the principal place in the shire of the same name, in Ardmearach, or the Black-isle, in the N. of Scotland. It is delightfully situated, on a projecture of land, northward, at the mouth of a branch of the Murray-frith, called the frith of Cromerty, and by Buchannan, and sailors Portus Salutis, a road where the whole royal navy might anchor securely, and have sea-room enough; but unhappily it is not much used by the natives or any else. It abounds with fish, and some of the rivers that fall into it are said to have mussels with pearls in them. It runs up 8 or 10 miles, as far as Dingwall and the water of Connon, and where-broadest is a Scottish mile over.

At the entrance to this frith are very dangerous rocks, called the Craigs: and at this town is a ferry, which crosses into Ross-shire; from which side they are supplied with peat or fuel. It gave title of earl to an unfortunate nobleman of the name of Mackenzie, who was hereditary sheriff of the county; but both titles are now fallen to the crown. Cromerty lies about 8 miles N. E. from Channery, and 14 from Inverness.

CROMERTYSHIRE, in the N. of Scotland. It lies in the Black island of Ardmearach, but a small country and peninsula, separated on the S. from Nairnshire, by that part of the Murray frith which goes up to Inverness; and on the N. from Ross-shire by the Cromerty frith; being bounded by a part of Inverness-shire and Ross-shire on the W. It is very fertile in grain, and produces plenty of great and small cattle, and is strewed with several seats up and down. This shire, alternately with that of Nairn, sends a member to the British parliament; and it is a part of Ross-shire.

CRONACH, a town in the bishopric of Bamberg, and circle of Franconia, in Germany; 26 miles N. E. of Bamberg, and subject to the prelate of that city. Lat. 50, 29, N. Long. 11, 30, E.

CRONBURG, one of the bailiwicks of Seeland, in Denmark. It consists of 2 districts, Liunge-Cronburg, which has 8 churches, and Holboe 13.

CRONEBURG, a town of Hesse-Cassel, in Germany; 16 miles N. of Frankfort. Lat. 50, 25, N. Long. 8, 25, E.

CRONENBURG, a famous castle, and considerable fort of Seeland, in Denmark. It lies on the N. side of the town of Helsingoe. Next to Fredericksburg, it is the best old fortress in this country, and in excellent condition, serving for the defence of the Sund, which here is about half a mile broad. At this place ships bound to the Baltic come to, and pay toll to the Danes. In 1659 the Swedes took it by stratagem. Lat. 56, 20, N. Long. 12, 25, E.

CRONSCLOSS, a strong castle in the form of a round tower, built on a sand-bank in the middle of the sea, at the mouth of the Neva, and gulph of Finland, about a cannon-shot from the harbour of Cronstadt, opposite to Ingermanland, in European Russia. It is in such good condition, that, together with Cronstadt, it seems as a bulwark to Petersburg; and was built by Peter the Great, in the middle of the winter 1704, for the defence of his conquests. It has 3 galleries over one another, well provided with guns. Between this and Cronstadt ships sail to Petersburg, and are within-reach of cannon on both sides. Here is a harbour, and one of the stations for Russian men of war, with naval store-houses, docks, and yards. Lat. 60, 20, N. Long. 30, 15, E.

CRONSTADT, a town and excellent fortress, on the isle of Ketufari. It is about a mile long and half a mile broad; 4 good German miles by water from Petersburg, on the gulph of Finland, and a mile from Ingermanland in Russia. The wall, which encompasses the town, is thick set with guns, besides being defended by a citadel and Cronschloss. Here are 3 harbours near one another, in one of which, in a large stone basin or canal, the greatest part of the Russian fleet lies. The number of inhabitants of this place, which consist of seamen, soldiers, and burghers amounts to about 20,000.

CRONSTADT, a considerable free town in Transylvania, and kingdom of Hungary, on the confines of Moldavia, surrounded with walls, towers and ditches. It has been frequently pillaged, and suffered much by earthquakes. It is a considerable place for trade, has a college, and a Lutheran academy, with 3 large suburbs. Lat. 47, 10, N. Long. 25, 16, E.

CROOKED-ISLAND, a small island in the Windward Passage, where the shipping frequently take in wood and water. It lies E. of Long Island, and is reckoned among the Bahama Islands; is at least 7 leagues in length, from the S. to the N. point, and 2 in breadth. About 3 leagues from the N. point, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ from the S. not far inland, is a pond of fresh water. All along the W. side of this island is a bank of white sand, about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles wide, on which you may anchor in 15 or 20 fathoms water but farther out, you will find 60 and 100 fathoms.

There is a little island about a mile from the N. point of Crooked Island; called North Key.

CROOKHAVEN, an inconsiderable fishing town on the S. coast of Ireland, W. of Cape Clear. Near it is an excellent harbour of great extent; one of the best outlets in Europe for vessels to sail to any part of America, or the East and West Indies; but the lands near it are exceedingly rocky and barren.

CROOKHORN, or CREWKERN, in Somersetshire; it is seated on a branch of the river Parret, on the confines of Dorsetshire, and the market is good for corn, sheep, and provisions. It is 50 miles W. by S. of Salisbury, 39 E. by N. of Exeter, and 133 W. by S. of London. Market on Saturdays, and a fair on Sept. 4. for horses, bullocks, linen-drapery, cheese, and toys.

CROSCOMB, in Somersetshire, near Wells and Shepton-Mallet; from which last a river runs through it, that drives several mills. King Edward I. granted it a market, and a fair at Lady-day; and his charter was confirmed by Edward III. and Henry IV. The market being disused, another was procured for it on Tuesdays, at the cross. Some cloth is made here, but the chief manufacture is stockings.

CROSNA, a pretty town of Red Russia, in Poland, on the river Wislock. It carries on a good trade, as here the Hungarian merchants deposit their wines and other goods, to be sold at their fairs. In this place is a college. Lat. 52, 6, N. Long. 15, 40, E.

CROSS-IN-HAND, a place in Suffex, where there are 2 fairs on June 22, and Nov. 19.

CROSSEN, a handsome town of Silesia, in Germany, and capital of a principality of the same name. It is seated at the confluence of the rivers Bobar and Oder, in a fertile country, abounding in wine and fruits. The bridge over the Oder is fortified. Long. 15, 20, E. Lat. 52, 5, N.

CROSTOLO, one of the principal rivers of the duchy of Modena, in Upper Italy.

CROTON, CROTONA, CROTONO, in the Farther Calabria, 6 miles N. from Capo della Columna, and 50 E. from Cosenza. E. long. 18, 2. Lat. 39, 4, is an antient city belonging to the Greeks in Italy, on the mouth of the Esaro; it is said to have been built 18 years before Rome, and surrounded with a wall 1200 paces in circuit; but after Pyrrhus's expedition into the country it was above half demolished; it was famous for breeding the strongest and best wrestlers; among whom was the famous Milo, surnamed from it Crotoniates. The Esaro runs through the town, and its situation is very advantageous for guarding these coasts. The emperor Charles V. added a good fortress to it for that purpose, and put a garrison into it; but it has been since neglected, and the place is now run to decay, and has lost all marks of its former grandeur.

CROTOY, a town of France, in Picardy, and in Ponthieu. The fortifications are demolished. It is is seated at the mouth of the river Somme, 12 miles N. W. of Abbeville. Long. 1, 45, E. Lat. 50, 15, N.

CROUY, a town of France, in Brie, 20 miles from Meaux, near Ferte-Milon.

CROWBOROUGH, a village in Suffex, with a fair on April 25.

CROCOMB, a village in Somersetshire, 8 miles N. of Taunton, with 2 fairs on the first Friday in May, and Oct. 31.

CROWLAND, in Lincolnshire, 11 miles from Peterborough, 36 from Boston, and 88 from London, had formerly an abbey, destroyed by the Danes, but rebuilt by king Eadred. Though this place is so inclosed with bogs, that it is not accessible, but on the N. and E. sides, and there, only by narrow causeways, yet it is pretty well inhabited, and consists of 3 streets, that are separated by water-courses, planted with willows, and built on piles, having a communication with one another, by a triangular bridge, of curious contrivance, at the conflux of the Nyne and Welland, each base whereof is said to be in a different county. Their greatest gain is from wild ducks, of which sometimes they drive 3000 into a net at once by dogs; and they are brought hither by decoy-ducks bred for the purpose.

For the liberty of fishing, they pay now to the king as they did formerly to the abbot, 300l. a year. The soil is much improved of late by drains and sluices; and most of the ponds are now turned into corn fields. The market here is on Saturdays, and the fair August 24. A causeway leads from hence between the river Welland and the marshes; on which, about 2 miles from Crowland, stood a pyramid, with an inscription, denoting that it was the utmost boundary of the abbey's jurisdiction, which was in a sort of island, 3 miles in length and 3 in breadth. The roof of the abbey church fell down about 70 years ago. It was of Irish oak, finely carved and gault; and pieces of it are to be found in almost every house. It was made a garrison in the late civil war. Over the W. gate of the church are the images of divers kings, abbots, &c. and among the rest, St. Guthlac, (to whom the abbey was dedicated) with a whip and a knife, his usual symbols; and he lies buried in a small stone cottage, called Anchor-Church-House, in which he lived a hermit.

CROWLE, a village on the isle of Axhold, in Lincolnshire, has a charity-school and 2 fairs, the last Monday in May, and Nov. 23.

CROWN-POINT, a strong fortress on Lake Champlain, near the Narrows. It was built by the French, and taken in 1759 by the British. The Americans in their march to surprize Quebec, took it in 1775, but abandoned it the year following.

C R

CROYDEN, in Surry, ten and a half miles from London, on the edge of Bansted-Downs. It is said, here is once a royal palace, which, with the manor, was given to the archbishops of Canterbury, who turned it into a palace for themselves; but is much decayed since archbishop Whitgift, who built an hospital here, endowed with farms for the maintenance of a warden, and 28 men and women, decayed house-keepers of Croyden and Lambeth; with a school for 10 boys and 10 girls, and a house for the master, (who must be a clergyman,) and 20l. a-year for his salary. The church here is reckoned the finest and the largest in the county. The market, which is on Saturday, is chiefly for oats and oat-meal for London, though there is a good sale too for wheat and barley; and its fairs are June 24, and Sept. 21, the latter much frequented by the youth of both sexes from London, for walnuts, &c. Here was formerly a chantry. The adjacent hills are well stored with wood, of which great quantities of charcoal are made for London.

CRUGNA, a town of Old Castile, in Spain, with the title of count; it is defended by a strong castle.

CRUSWICK, on the N. bank of Goplo lake, in the palatinate of Uladislaw, in Great Poland. In its brick castle, Popiel II. duke of Poland, is said to have been devoured by rats. Here is a college of 24 canons, and the court resided formerly in this place.

CRWYNY CAFN, a mountain in Merionethshire, in Wales, on the top of which are some ancient entrenchments of a large extent, and from whence there is a prospect of more than 20 miles, and near it is one of the most beautiful pools or lakes in the country, called the lake of Bala.

CSABA, a large bourg in the Hither Circle of the Theifs, and Upper Hungary; one of the colonies peopled by Bohemian Sclavi in this present century.

CSAGE. See CSAKVAR.

CSACK-THURN, or CSAKA-TORNYA, a considerable fort of the Hither Circle of the Theifs, in Upper Hungary. It is surrounded with walls, ditches, and bulwarks. It stands in the middle of a peninsula, which very much abounds with wine and corn.

CSAK-VAR, or CSAGE, an old, but now ruinous castle, in the Hither Circle of the Theifs, in Upper Hungary. It is noted as the original place of the Csaki family, descended from Szabolt, one of the 7 famous Hungarian generals, who came into this country to settle in the ninth century.

CSNAD, an episcopal town in the Hither Circle of the Theifs, in Upper Hungary, and county of of the same name: it was formerly a considerable and fortified place on the river Maros; but since dismantled, it has declined; and in 1599 it came into the hands of the Turks.

CSEIKO, a village of Lower Hungary, in the Hither Circle of the Danube, remarkable, as in its neighbourhood is produced very good wine.

CSEITHE, or CZACHTITZE, an old mountain-castle, in the Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. Under it lies the town of Komarno, whose inhabitants are employed in agriculture, and dressing of vineyards.

CSEPEL, (island of,) in the Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It lies in the Danube, a quarter of a mile below Buda. On the left-hand are ten isles; but on the right is a still greater number: and among these, the most remarkable is the Pheasant Island. Csepel is five Hungarian miles long; being sandy, and but poorly fruitful. Here, besides other wild game, are great numbers of hares. It was formerly a part of the Queen Dowager's allotment, and a park. It has lately belonged to prince Eugene, and after that to the empress dowager Elizabeth.

CSEPREG, formerly a populous town of the Farther Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary; but now reduced, and employed in agriculture.

CSESZTE, a town of the Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It stands on a pleasant eminence, in the neighbourhood of the castle of Biberburg.

CISK-SZEREDA, the capital of the jurisdiction of the former name, and Sicilian territory in Transylvania, in Hungary. It has a strong castle, and carries on a good trade.

CSONGRAD, an ancient fort in the county of the same name, and Hither Circle of the Theiss, in Upper Hungary. Near it is a large town, at the junction of the river Koros with the Theiss.

CTESIPHON, an ancient and celebrated city of Parthia. (the present Arach, Erach, or Yerach,) stood on the Tigris, 3 miles below Seleucia. Polybius and Strabo speak of Ctesiphon as the metropolis of the whole Parthian empire. A. D. 198, this city was taken by assault by the emperor Severus, after a gallant resistance by Vologeses III. king of Parthia, and therein that king's treasures, wives and children, though he himself escaped. The city was plundered, the men all cruelly put to the sword; but the women and children, to the number of 100,000, were sold for slaves.
